

1501/170.

THE ROMAN HISTORY,

FROM THE Building of Rome to the Ruin of the Commonwealth.

Illustrated with MAPS and other Plates.

VOL. I.

By N. HOOKE, Esq;

The FIFTH EDITION.

L O N D O N:

Printed for G. HAWKINS, W. STRAHAN, J. and F. RIVINGTON, R. BALDWIN, W. JOHNSTON, T. LONGMAN, and T. CADELL.

MDCCLXX.

T O

Alexander Pope, Esq;

S I R,

THE displaying your name at the head of these Sheets, is, I confess, like hanging out a splendid Sign to catch the Traveller's Eye, and entice him to make trial of the entertainment the place affords. But when I can write under my Sign, that Mr. POPE has been here, and was content, Who will question the goodness of the House?

You, see, SIR, and I had no desire to hide it, my interested view in this Epistle. Perhaps I should find it difficult, on such an occasion as the present, to address you in any terms, which might not be construed into Self-love, more or less refined. Will not this be the case, if I say, as with truth I can, that I was glad to seize the only opportunity I may ever have of so publickly testifying my just Esteem for a worthy Friend, to whom I have been long and much obliged? Yet allow me to add, that I imagine I do give a Proof of that Esteem, when I inscribe to you this Attempt towards a History of Roman Virtue and Patriotism. No consideration, I hope, could engage me to it, if I were not persuaded that you really are, what your writings declare you to be, a Friend to Virtue, to your Country, and to the Liberties of Mankind.

Epistle Dedicatory.

I am with sincerity and affection,

S I R,

Your most Faithful

Humble Servant,

N. Hooke.

P R E F A C E.

THE compendious History of the REGAL and CONSULAR STATES of ROME, by Mr. Echard, and a translation of the extensive one, written in French, by the Jesuit-Fathers, Catrou and Rouillé, were the only general Accounts which (unmixed * with foreign matters) had been given of them, in our language, when the present work was first offered to the publick. In the structure of it, the Author had an especial regard to those persons, who, wishing to be acquainted with the Roman story by reading it in English, found Mr. Echard too brief to satisfy their curiosity, and the Jesuits too diffuse and verbose to engage their attention agreeably. Not long after its coming abroad, the well known and much esteemed Monsieur Rollin, who, by the solicitation of his friends and admirers, had been prevailed with, in his old age, to undertake a History of Rome from the building of the City to the battle of Actium, obliged the publick with a part of what he had executed. Death prevented his prosecution of the work to its completion; but it has since been continued and finished by the ingenious and industrious Monsieur Crevier; and the whole is translated into English. Had M. Rollin, who not only has avoided, in his relations, the extremes abovementioned, but has drawn his historical matter (for the most part) from the ancient Greek and Latin authors, been somewhat more early in his enterprize, it would have hindered the writer of the present history from attempting any thing of this kind; whose project, at first, was nothing more than to abridge the Jesuits voluminous compilation, making use, occasionally, of Mr. Vertot's sprightly narrative of the revolutions in the Roman government. That project, however, he did not closely and constantly follow, even in this first volume, and he wholly departed from it in composing the second, chusing then to have recourse to the ancients for his materials, and also venturing, with regard to certain things, by them related, to make remarks, and give conjectures of his own; which, he

* Mr. Howel, in his History of the World, has given a dry, but very exact account of the Roman Kingdom and Republick. " His " collections (says Mr. Echard) are admirable, both for their usefulness and exactness; his decisions very just and faithful, " and his learning very uncommon and curious: in short, we may say, that no man

" ever more truly and carefully brought together the principal matters of all the " Roman historians, than he; and that he " was an incomparable collector and compiler, though at the same time he was but " an indifferent historian." Pref. to Ech. Rom. Hist.

imagined,

imagined, might at least occasion to his readers the pleasure of considering, if they proved of no service to assist them in judging. Nor was he diverted, from proceeding in this method, by the pieces M. Rollin had then published, of his Roman history : for this excellent writer, though more exact in his translations, and in giving the sense of his authors when he is not a mere translator, than either Monsieur Vertot or the Jesuits, has not, so often as could be wished, made use of his judgment to distinguish the true from the false, the probable from the improbable ; and he has sometimes chosen to transcribe Monsieur Vertot, where this Abbé did certainly not deserve that honour. Whoever peruses Monsieur Vertot's work must, I think, observe, that, with him, notwithstanding his strong and lively representation of the avarice, ambition, and usurpations of the Nobles, the Tribunes are every way wrong, either in the matter or the manner, or the timing of their proposals for relieving the Plebeians, and commonly in all three. And Monsieur Rollin, though he be not quite so devoted to the ARISTOCRATICAL faction as the Abbé, yet seems to have a stronger bias that way than perhaps in reason he ought to have. In pages 57, 58. of his second volume, speaking of the Agrarian Law, he says, " The demand
 " of the Tribunes on this article does really appear so founded in equity,
 " that it seems as if nothing reasonable could be objected to it ; and one " cannot easily look upon the Senate's obstinate withstanding it, but as " a crying injustice, and a partiality wholly condemnable. Nevertheless,
 " a Society so respectable, and abounding with persons of generally avow-
 " ed prudence and virtue, must undoubtedly have had strong reasons " for acting as they did. That possession [which the Patricians had] of " the lands belonging to the publick, might be unjust in its origin, and it " was then that a remedy might and ought to have been applied. But,
 " as Monsieur L'Abbé de Vertot observes, a new partition was a thing
 " attended with great difficulties." And then, to excuse the Senate, he transcribes Monsieur Vertot's imaginary difficulties ; of which the reader will find some notice taken in pages 287, 288. of this volume.

It is the more extraordinary that Monsieur Rollin should be so ready to ascribe the Senate's opposing the Agrarian Law to prudential motives, and a concern for the tranquillity of the publick, when he had said but five pages before, in speaking of their opposition to the law for a partition of Agrovi Aventine among the people, " There was nothing unreasonable in
 " this law : and the Senate ought to have granted the bill with a good
 " grace, and have even prevented the demand of the Tribunes ; but these " obtained nothing from the Fathers without violent struggle, the discord " being so great, and become, as it were, natural between the two Or" ders."

IF

* The reader will find in p. 548. of the second volume of this history (second edition) some observations on a passage in the 28th Book of M. Rollin's Roman History, which, to my apprehension, are sufficient to show, that he was unreasonably prepossessed against the POPULAR cause.

That supereminently learned and judicious writer, Dr. Blackwell, seemingly under the like prepossession, has (in p. 132. of the first

IF from some passages, in the present edition of this volume, regarding the civil contests at Rome, the Author should be thought too much bias'd to the POPULAR side, he hopes it will be remembered at the same time, that there is a sort of generosity in taking the part of the poor COMMONS, who, in almost all their endeavours to free themselves from oppression, have been usually represented, as an unreasonable, headstrong multitude, insolent, seditious, and rebellious. And he can truly say, that how partial soever to the Plebeians he may seem, he is not conscious of having passed over any material fact, reported by the ancients to the disadvantage of the Plebeian cause, or its advocates; notwithstanding his own incredulity with regard to several pretended facts of this kind. Thus, though he totally disbelieves the story of * Cassius's treasonable plot, with his trial and condemnation; as likewise that of the wicked conspiracy of the Tribunes † against the Senate and the Knights; yet he has given the substance of both these tales as they are related by Dionysius.

* See Hist.
B. 2. c. 14.
† B. 2. c. 21.

IN the Forty-two years, from the SECESSION to the DECENVIRATE, the main FOUNDATIONS were laid of that Free Republican Government, afterwards brought to its perfection by the Licinian laws, and their natural effects. For which reason, and a well grounded apprehension, that several transactions of those times were not placed in their true light by Monsieur Vertot, whose representations of them had been copied in the first edition of this volume, that portion of the history was revised with some attention, and compared with the original writers: and this comparison occasioned, in the second edition, not only some variations from M. Vertot, but here and there a critical remark on the ancient historians themselves; and in the present edition the reader will find several remarks that are not in the former, and of which some, perhaps, will appear to him entirely new. They are not given as things certain, but as probable, as having the appearance of truth.

WHAT is inserted in the margin of p. 133. by way of objection to Livy's account of the Peace made with Porfena, was borrowed from a Treatise entitled, A Dissertation on the uncertainty of the history of the first 500 years of Rome. It seems, for the reasons there given, highly probable, if not certain, that the King entirely subdued the Romans; and the truth of this opinion may perhaps receive some confirmation from another remark. Livy tells us, that it was a custom, transmitted from the ancients, and retained even in his time, for the crier, at publick sales, first volume of his Memoirs of the Court of Augustus) delivered it as his opinion, that the Roman constitution was unbinged, and its government converted from the best of forms to the worst, by those very measures, (in favour of the commons) which, according to Dr. Middleton, brought the government of Rome to its Perfect state: I mean the laying open to the Plebeian families a promiscuous right to all the magistracies of the republick, and by that means a free admission into the senate,—the proposing equally and indifferently the honours of the government to every citizen, who by his virtue and services, either in war or in peace, could recommend himself to the notice and favour of his countrymen. See Dr. Middleton's preface to the life of Cicero, p. xxxvii.

to call the goods, Porfena's goods. (According to Plutarch it was at sales of goods belonging to the publick.) The Latine historian is at a loss for the true origin of this custom; because (as he intimates) it would seem, that the first goods, sold under this appellation, had been taken from Porfena in a hostile manner; and this does not well suit with the King's friendly departure from before Rome. "Either this custom (says he) must have commenced during the war, and been continued after the peace; or it must have taken its rise from an origin of a gentler kind than the outcry imports." Cujus originem moris, necesse est aut inter bellum natum esse, neque transisse in pace: aut maiore crevisse principio, quam hic præ se ferat titulus, bona besuliter vendendi. He adds, "The most credible tradition concerning this matter is, That, when Porfena marched away, he made a present to the Romans of his camp stored with provisions, of which, by reason of the long blockade of their city, they were in extreme want. And lest the people, pressed with hunger, should seize the provisions in a rapacious tumultuous way, these were sold and called Porfena's goods; not to signify that it was a sale of booty acquired by the Romans from the King in war, (for they were not in a condition to make such depredations) but of the free gifts of his bounty."

Tac. Hist.
L. 5. c. 72.
Plin. L. 34.
c. 14.

Now if, as Tacitus informs us, the city surrendered to Porfena, and if, as the treaty mentioned by Pliny imports, the Romans were reduced so low, as to submit to the being prohibited the use of iron, except for agriculture, we may easily believe, that the origin of the outcry, used in publick sales, was an injunction laid upon the Romans by the King, to make an acknowledgment, on all such occasions, that whatever they possessed was his. And this is not inconsistent with the supposition of his freely supplying their necessities, when they, through the pressure of famine, had absolutely submitted to him. The continuation of this custom, whether it arose from gratitude, or from obedience to power, will in either case be difficult to account for, unless we suppose, that the words, Porfena's goods, came soon to signify no more, than that the goods, exposed to sale, would be sold cheap; as probably those given by Porfena were. Father Catrou (upon what authority I know not) gives this meaning to the expression.

Liv. L. 2.
c. 12.
D. Hal. 2.
195.

It may be observed, by the way, that the enterprize of Mucius to stab Porfena is a strong proof, if the fact be true, of the extremity to which the Romans were reduced. And the fact, that Mucius did undertake to assassinate the King, and this (as Livy and D. Hal. report) with the approbation of the Senate, is made credible by that unusual ignominy with which he loaded his conquered enemies, in forbidding them the use of iron for arms; for it seems to have a reference to the dagger of Mucius, and the base attempt to which the great council of his nation had encouraged him.

^a That Porfena chose rather to be himself King of the Romans, than to restore Tarquus to the throne, will not be thought wonderful. But when, and by what fortunate incidents the Romans got, so soon as they did, from under the domination of the Hebrurian, must be left to conjecture.

The P R E F A C E.

v

Monſieur de Beaufort, a member of our Royal Society, and author of the Difſertation above-mentioned, gives ſome very good reaſons for queſtioning, in the ſtory of Mucius, the truth of that circumſtance, his broiling his right hand; and he has made ſeveral other ingenious obſervations on the Hiſtory of the firſt ages of Rome; yet I muſt take leave to ſay, that he ſeems very far from having proved, That there is nothing more uncertain, than the whole Body of the Roman Hiſtory of the firſt 500 years, from the building of the City: Qu'il n'y a rien de plus incertain que tout ce corps d'Hiftoire—qu'on n'y peut compter ſur rien. And, becauſe the matter of the following ſheets is the ſubſtance of what the ancients have written concerning thoſe times, I have, in a Diſcourſe, which is now prefixed to the ſecond volume of this Hiſtory, attempted a defence againſt the attack made on the credit of their accounts.

*Difſertat.
ſec. p. 32, & 43.*

N. B. When Dionysius of Halicarnassus is cited, the Pages of the Frankfort Edition are referred to, becauſe, thoſe pages being marked in the inner margin of Dr. Hudſon's Edition, ſuch Reference will be equally convenient with regard to both.

R E M A R K S

O N T H E

H I S T O R Y

O F T H E

S E V E N R O M A N K I N G S,

Occasioned by Sir Isaac Newton's Objections to the supposed 244 years duration of the Regal State of Rome.

IT is commonly admitted, upon the authority of the ancient Chrono-^{Ant. Ch.}logers, that the fall of Troy was about 676 years before the expulsion¹¹⁸⁴⁻ of Tarquin the last King of Rome, who was indisputably expelled about the year before Christ 508. But Sir Isaac Newton has, by many arguments, made it probable, that those Chronologers have placed the taking of Troy* near 300 years farther back than they ought to have done: And one of his arguments is drawn from the too long space of time supposed to be filled up by the reigns of only 21 Kings in succession (14 at Alba, and 7 at Rome.) For in no Country, of which the Historical and Chronological accounts are certain, is it found, that the like number of Kings in succession reigned near so long as 676 years. And because most of the 7 Roman Kings were untimely slain, and one deposed, he thinks it not reasonable to believe that their reigns took up half the 244 years allotted to them by the Roman Historians.

As the following Remarks, offered in support of Sir Isaac Newton's conclusion, may happen to fall under the inspection of several persons, who have not perused that Great Man's Chronological Work, it may to such, perhaps, be agreeable, if the Remarks be introduced by some of his fundamental reasons for questioning the truth of the received Chronology of ancient Kingdoms in general, and of the Roman Kingdom in particular.

* ALL Nations, before they began to keep exact accounts of time, have been prone to raise their antiquities; and this humour has been promoted, by the contentions between nations about their originals. ^{The Chronology of ancient Kingdoms amended, p. 43, & seq.}

* Herodotus tells us, that the priests of Egypt reckoned from the reign of Menes † to that of Sethon, who put Senacherib § to flight, three hundred forty and one generations of men, and as many Priests of Vulcan, and as many Kings of Ægypt; and that three hundred generations make ten thousand years: For, saith ^{Herod. l. 2. § Ant. Ch. 714-}

* Mr. Whiston, p. 971. of Authent. Rec. part 2. seems confident that Troy was taken just 1270 years before the Christian Era, which computation (he says) agrees with the Chronology of the Author of the life of Homer supposed to be Herodotus.
† He is supposed to be Mixraim the son of Cham, and grandson of Noah, and to have founded a Kingdom in Ægypt, A. M. 1772.
—Ant. Chr. 2232.

- * Heradotus, three generations of men make an hundred years : and the remaining
 * forty and one generations 1340 years : and so the whole time from the reign of * Menes to that of Seth was 11340 years. And by this way of reckoning, and
 * allotting longer reigns to the Gods of Egypt than to the Kings which followed * them, Herodotus tells us from the priests of Egypt, that from Pan to Amosis were
 * 15000 years, and from Hercules to Amosis 17000.
 * So also the Chaldeans boasted of their antiquity ; for Calliphenes, the disciple
 * of Arjstarchus, sent astronomical observations from Babylon to Greece, said to be of * 1903 years standing before the times of Alexander the Great. And the Chaldeans
 * boasted farther, that they had observed the stars 473000 years ; and there were
 * others who made the kingdoms of Affrica, Media, and Damascus, much older * than the truth.
 * Some of the Greeks called the times before the reign of * Ogyges UNKNOWN,
 * because they had no history of them ; those between his flood and the beginning * of the Olympiads FABULOUS, because their History was much mixed with poeti* cal Fables : and those after the beginning of the Olympiads HISTORICAL, because * their History was free from such fables. The FABULOUS ages wanted a good * Chronology, and so also did the HISTORICAL, for the first 60 or 70 Olympiads.
 * The Europeans had no Chronology before the times of the Persian Empire, * and whatsoever Chronology they now have of ancienter times, hath been framed
 * since, by reasoning and conjecture.
 * Plutarch tells us, that the philosophers anciently delivered their opinions in * Verse, as Orpheus, Hesiod, Parmenides, Xenophanes, Empedocles, Thales.—
 * SOLON wrote in VERSE, and all the Seven Wise Men were addicted to Poetry,
 * as * Anaximenes affirmed.
 * Till those days the Greeks wrote only in VERSE, and while they did so, there * could be no Chronology, nor any other History than such as was mixed with
 * poetical fancies.
 * Pliny, in reckoning up the inventors of things, tells us, That PHERECYDES
 * SCYRIUS taught to compose discourses in PROSE in the reign of CYRUS ; and * CADMUS MILESIUS to write History. And in another place he saith, that CAD-
 * MUS MILESIUS was the first that wrote in PROSE.
 * Josephus tells us, That CADMUS MILESIUS and ACUSILAUS were but a little
 * before the expedition of the Persians against the Greeks : and Suidas calls ACUSILAUS
 * a most ancient Historian, and saith that he wrote genealogies out of tables of
 * brass, which his father, as was reported, found in a corner of his house. Who
 * hid them there may be doubted : For the Greeks had no publick table or inscrip* tion older than the laws of Draco.
 * PHERECYDES ATHENIENSIS in the reign of DARIUS HYSTASPIS, or soon af* ter, wrote of the antiquities and ancient genealogies of the Athenians, in ten * books ; and was one of the first European writers of this kind, and one of the * best ; whence he had the name of Genealogus ; and by Dionysius Halicarnassensis * is said to be second to none of the genealogers.
 * EPIMENIDES (not the philosopher, but) an Historian, wrote also of ancient
 * genealogies : and

* According to the old Chronology, the Flood of Ogyges happened 1796 years before the Christian Æra : but according to Sir J. N. little more than 1100 years. Short Chron. p. 10.

* In the beginning of that [the Persian].

“ monarchy, Acusilaus made Phoroneus as “ old as Ogyges and his flood, and that “ flood 1020 years older than the first O“ lympiad ; which is above 680 years older “ than the truth.” Chron. of the Greeks.

p. 45.

• HELLANICUS (who was twelve years older than Herodotus) digested his History by the ages or successions of the Priestesses of Juno Argiva. Others digested theirs by those of the Archons of Athens, or Kings of the Lacedæmonians.

• HIPPIAS the Elean published a breviary of the Olympiads, supported by no certain arguments, as * Plutarch tells us: he lived in the ^b 105th Olympiad, and ^a Plut. in was derided by Plato for his ignorance. This Breviary seems to have contained ^{Num.} nothing more than a short account of the victors in every Olympiad. ^b About 360. Ant. Chr.

• Then § EPHORUS the disciple of Isocrates formed a Chronological History of Greece, beginning with the return of the Heraclides into Peloponnesus, and ending with the siege of Porinthus in the 20th year of Philip, the father of Alexander the Great, that is eleven years before the fall of the Persian Empire: but [§] Diodor. he digested things by Generations, and the Reckoning * by the Olympiads, or by ^{l. 16. p.} any other Æra, was not yet in use among the Greeks. ^{550.} ^{Ant. Chr.} ^{343.} ^{Polyb. p.}

• The ARUNDELIAN MARBLES were composed 60 years after the death of Alexander the Great (An. 4 Olymp. 128.) and yet mention not the Olympiads nor any other standing Æra, but reckon backwards from the time then present. ^{379. B.} ^{Ant. Chr.} ^{265.}

• But Chronology was now reduced to a Reckoning by Years; and, in the next Olympiad,

• TIMÆUS SICULUS improved it: For he wrote a History, in several Books, down to his own times according to the OLYMPIADS; comparing the Ephori, the Kings of Sparta, the Archons of Athens, and the Priestesses of Argos with the OLYMPICK VICTORS, so as to make the OLYMPIADS and the Genealogies and Successions of Kings and Priestesses, and the Poetical Histories suit one another, according to the best of his judgment; and, where he left off, POLYBIUS began, and carried on the History.

• ERATOSTHENES wrote above 100 years after the death of Alexander the Great. ^{223.} He was followed by APOLLODORUS, and these Two have been followed ever since by Chronologers.

• But how uncertain their Chronology is, and how doubtful it was reputed by the Greeks of those times, may be understood by these passages of Plutarch. Some reckon Lycurgus, saith he, contemporary to Iphitus, and to have been his companion in ordering the Olympick festivals, amongst whom was Aristotle the philosopher; arguing ^{In vita Ly-} ^{curgi sub} ^{initio.} [†] from the Olympick Disc, which had the name of Lycurgus upon it. Others supporting the times by the Kings of Lacedæmon, as Eratosthenes and Apollodorus, affirm that he was not a few years older than the first Olympiad. He began to flourish in the 17th or 18th Olympiad, and at length Aristotle made him as old as the first Olympiad; and so did Epaminondas, as he is cited by Ælian and Plutarch: and then Eratosthenes, Apollodorus, and their followers, made him above 100 years older.

[Mr. Whiston accuses Sir I. Newton, of not informing his readers, how very difficult a thing it is to tell the age of Lycurgus; nor that Plutarch himself declares, "How every thing about Lycurgus is disputed; and, above all the rest, ^{Confut. of} ^{Sir I. N.'s} ^{Chron. p.} ^{1047.}

* Sir I. N. says the same in the Introduction to his short Chronicle, and adds there these Words, Nor does it appear that the Reigns of Kings were yet set down by numbers of years.

† N. B. In p. 58. Sir I. N. shews the fallacy of this argument. Iphitus, says he, did not restore all the Olympick Games. Here-stored indeed the Racing in the first Olympiad, Coræbus being Victor. In the 14th Olympiad, the double Stadium was added, Hypænus being Victor. And in the 18th Olympiad, the Quinquertium and Wrestling were added, Lampus and Erybatas, two Spartans, being Victors; and the Disc was one of the Games of the Quinquertium. ^{Pausan. l.} ^{5. c. 8:}

“ the

“the time when he lived.” I cannot see any good ground for this quarrel with Sir I. N.; but I wonder that Mr. Wiffon or any body should build much upon the authority of Chronological Canons, the framers of which were so destitute of authentick records as to be reduced to conjectures concerning the time when Lycurgus lived, than whose Legislature there is not a more memorable event in the History of Greece. And it ought to be observed, that the uncertainty with regard to Lycurgus must be attended with the like uncertainty as to the times of the Kings in the line of Procles; Lycurgus having been tutor to his nephew Charilaus the 7th King of that race. And it is remarkable that the Chronologers have not pretended to know the number of years which each of those Kings reigned, though they have marked the length of the several reigns of the Kings in the line of Eurysthenes down to Polydorus the 10th King.]

In Solon. In another place Plutarch tells us: ‘The Congress of Solon with Cræsus some think they can confute by Chronology. But a History so illustrious, and verified by so many witnesses, and which is more, so agreeable to the manners of Solon, and worthy of the greatness of his mind and of his wisdom, I cannot persuade myself to reject, because of some Chronological Canons, as they call them, which hundreds of authors correcting, have not yet been able to constitute any thing certain, in which they could agree amongst themselves, about repugnances.

Isid. N. p. 50. L. 1. 1. in Plutarch. ‘Disdorus, in the beginning of his History tells us, that he did not define, by any certain space, the times preceding the Trojan war, because he had no certain foundation to rely upon: but from the Trojan war, according to the reckoning of Apollodorus, whom he followed, there were eighty years to the return of the Heraclides into Peloponnesus; and that from that period to the first Olympiad, there were three hundred and twenty-eight years, computing the times from the Kings of the Lacedæmonians. Apollodorus followed Eratoſthenes, and both of them followed Thucydides in reckoning eighty years from the Trojan war to the return of the Heraclides: but in reckoning 328 years from that return to the first Olympiad, Disdorus tells us, that the times were computed from the Kings of the Lacedæmonians; and Plutarch tells us, that Apollodorus, Eratoſthenes, and others, followed that computation: and since this reckoning is still received by Chronologers, and was gathered by computing the times from the Kings of the Lacedæmonians, that is from their number, let us re-examine that computation.

‘The Egyptians reckoned the reigns of Kings equipollent to generations of men, and three generations to an hundred years, as above; so did the Greeks and Latines; and accordingly they have made their Kings reign one with another thirty and three years a-piece, and above.

‘For they make the seven Kings of Rome, who preceded the Consuls, to have reigned 244 years, which is 35 years a-piece.

‘And the first twelve Kings of Sicyon, Ægialeus, Europus, &c. to have reigned 519 years, which is 44 years a-piece:

‘And the first eight Kings of Argos, Inachus, Phoroneus, &c. to have reigned 371 years, which is above 46 years a-piece:

‘And between the return of the Heraclides into Peloponnesus; and the end of the first Messenian war, the ten Kings of Sparta in one race,

1. Eurysthenes,
2. Agis,
3. Echestratus,
4. Labotas,
5. Doryagus,
6. Agelautus,
7. Archelaus,

8. Teleclus,

8. Teleclus,
9. Alcamenes, and
10. Polydorus;

the nine in the other^b race, the ten^c Kings of Messene, and the nine^d of Arcadia; according to Chronologers, took up 379 years: which is 38 years a-piece to the ten Kings, and 42 years a-piece to the nine. And the five Kings [following Polydorus] of the race of Eurysthenes, between the end of the first Messenian war, and the beginning of the reign of Darius Hystaspis; Eurycrates, Anaxander, Eurycrates II, Leon, Anaxandrides, reigned 202 years, which is above 40 years a-piece.

Thus the Greek Chronologers, who follow Timæus and Eratosthenes, have made the King's of their several cities, who lived before the times of the Persian Empire, to reign about 35 or 40 years a-piece, one with another; which is a length so much beyond the course of nature as is not to be credited. For by the ordinary course of nature, Kings reign, one with another, about eighteen or twenty years a-piece: and if in some instances they reign, one with another, five or six years longer, in others they reign as much shorter: eighteen or twenty years is a medium.

So the eighteen Kings of Judah who succeeded Solomon, reigned 390 years, which is one with another twenty-two years a-piece.

The fifteen Kings of Israel after Solomon, reigned 259 years, which is 17½ years a-piece.

The eighteen Kings of Babylon; Nabonassar, &c. reigned 209 years, which is 11½ a-piece.

The ten Kings of Persia; Cyrus, Gambyfes, &c. reigned 208 years, which is almost 21 years a-piece.

The sixteen successors of Alexander the Great, and of his brother and son in Syria; Seleucus, Antiochus Soter, &c. reigned 244 years, after the breaking of that monarchy into various kingdoms, which is 15½ years a-piece.

The eleven Kings of Egypt; Ptolomæus Lagi, &c. reigned 277 years, counted from the same period, which is 25 years a-piece.

The eight in Macedonia; Cassander, &c. reigned 138 years, which is 17½ years a-piece.

The thirty Kings of England; William the Conqueror, William Rufus, &c. reigned 648 years, which is 21½ years a-piece.

The first twenty-four Kings of France; Pharamundus, &c. reigned 458 years, which is 19 years a-piece.

The next twenty-four Kings of France; Ludovicus Balbus, &c. 451 years, which is 18½ years a-piece.

The next fifteen, Philip Valesius, &c. 315 years, which is 21 years a-piece.

And all the sixty-three Kings of France, 1224 years, which is 19½ years a-piece.

Generations from father to son, may be reckoned one with another at about 33 or 34 years a-piece, or about three generations to an hundred years: but if the reckoning proceed by the eldest sons, they are shorter, so that three of them may be reckoned at about 75 or 80 years: and the reigns of Kings are still shorter, because Kings are succeeded not only by their eldest sons, but some-

^b 1. Procles, 2. Sous, 3. Eurypom, 4. Prytanis, 5. Eunomus, 6. Polydeutes, 7. Gharidamus, 8. Nicander, 9. Theopompus.

^c 1. Cresphontes, 2. Epytus, 3. Glaucus, 4. Istbmus, 5. Detadas, 6. Sibetas, 7. Phin-

^d 1. Cypselus, 2. Olaus, 3. Buchalion, 4. Phialus, 5. Simus, 6. Pompus, 7. Ægineta, 8. Polymnestor, 9. Æchmis.

^e times

times by their brothers, and sometimes they are slain or deposed; and succeeded by others of an equal or greater age, especially in elective or turbulent kingdoms.

In the later ages, since Chronology hath been exact, there is scarce an instance to be found of ten Kings reigning any where in continual succession above 260 years: but Timæus and his followers, and I think also some of his predecessors, after the example of the Egyptians, have taken the reigns of Kings for generations, and reckoned three generations to 100, and sometimes to 120 years; and founded the technical chronology of the Greeks upon this way of reckoning. Let the reckoning be reduced to the course of nature, by putting the reigns of Kings one with another, at about 18 or 20 years a piece: and the ten Kings of Sparta by one race, the nine by another race, the ten Kings of Messenia, and the nine of Arcaëia, above-mentioned, between the return of the Heracides into Peloponnesus, and the end of the first Messenian war, will scarce take up above 180 or 190 years: whereas according to Chronologers, they took up 379 years.

Chronologers have [not only] lengthened the time, between the return of the Heracides into Peloponnesus, and the first Messenian war, — they have also lengthened the time between that war and the rise of the Persian Empire.

Herod. l. 7. For in the race of the Spartan Kings, descended from Eurysthene, after Polydorus, reigned these Kings:

11. Eurycrates,
12. Anaxander,
13. Eurycrates II,
14. Leon,
15. Anaxandrides,
16. Cleomenes,
17. LEONIDAS, &c.

Herod. l. 8. And in the other race descended from Procles; after Theopompus [the 9th King] reigned these, Anaxandrides, Archidamus, Anakleus, Leutychides, Hippocleides, Ariston, Demaretes, Leutychides II, &c. according to Herodotus. These Kings reigned till the sixth year of Xerxes, in which Leonidas was slain by the Persians at Thermopylae; and Leutychides II, soon after, flying from Sparta to Texa, died there.

The seven reigns of the Kings of Sparta, which follow Polydorus, being added to the ten reigns above-mentioned; which began with that of Eurysthene, make up seventeen reigns of Kings, between the return of the Heracides into Peloponnesus and the sixth year of Xerxes: and the eight reigns following Theopompus, being added to the nine reigns above-mentioned, which began with that of Procles, made up also seventeen reigns: and these seventeen reigns, at twenty years a piece one with another, amount unto three hundred and forty years. Count these three hundred and forty years upwards from the sixth year of Xerxes and one or two years more for the war of the Heracides, and the reign of Aristodemus, the father of Eurysthene and Procles; and they will place the return of the Heracides into Peloponnesus, 159 years after the death of Solomon, and forty-six years before the first Olympiad, in which Cnæus was victor. But the followers of Timæus have placed this return 280 years earlier. Now this being the computation upon which the Greeks, as you have heard from Diodorus and Plutarch, have founded the Chronology of their kingdoms which were antienter than the Persian Empire; that Chronology is to be rectified by shortening the times which preceded the death of Cyrus, in the proportion of almost two to one; for the times which follow the death of Cyrus are not much amiss.

[The truth of Sir I. N.'s computation with regard to the reigns of the seventeen Kings of Sparta, of whom Leonidas was the last, seems to be well supported by the space space of time filled up by the reigns of the thirteen Kings, (of the same Line) who reigned in succession after Leonidas.

Leonidas was slain in the year before Christ, 480.

Cleomenes, the last of the thirteen Kings who reigned after him, being expelled Peloponnesus, killed himself in Ægypt (as Petavius * hath shewn) in 219, before Christ. * Rat.

The years between the deaths of these two Kings are 261, so that the thirteen Kings in succession from Leonidas reigned but about 20 years a-piece one with another. Temp. par. 1. l. 4. c. 4. Sir I. N.

As for the Chronology of the Latines, that is still more uncertain [than the Chronology of the Greeks] † Plutarch represents great uncertainties in the Originals of Rome, and so doth † Servius. The old records of the Latines were burnt || by the Gauls 120 years after the Regifuge, and 64 years before the death of Alexander the Great: and Quintus Fabius Pictor, the oldest Historian of the Latines, lived 100 years later than that King, and took almost all things [concerning the Originals of Rome] from Diocles Peparethius a Greek. p. 49. † Plut. in Rom. & Num. † In Æn. 7. v. 678. || Diod. l. 1.

When the Romans conquered the Carthaginians, the archives of Carthage came into their hands. And thence Appian, in his History of the Punick Wars, tells in round numbers that Carthage stood 700 years; and Solinus adds the odd number of years [37] in these words: Adrymeto atque Carthagini autor est a Tyro populus. Urbem istam, ut Cato in Oratione Senatoria autumat, cum rex Hiabas rerum in Lybia potiretur, Elissa mulier extruxit, domo Phoenix, & Carthadam dixit, quod Phœnicum ore exprimit civitatem novam; mox sermone verso Carthago dicto est, quæ post annos septingentos triginta septem exciditur quam fuerat extructa. Sir I. N. p. 64. Solin. c. 30.

Elissa was Dido, and Carthage was destroyed in the Consulship of Lentulus and Mummius in the year of the Julian period 4568; * from whence count backward 737 years, and the Encænia or dedication of the city, will fall upon the 16th year of Pygmalion, the brother of Dido, and King of Tyre. She fled in the seventh year of Pygmalion, but the Æra of the city began with its Encænia. Ant. Chr. 146.

Now Virgil and his scholiast Servius, who might have some things from the archives of Tyre and Cyprus, as well as from those of Carthage, relate that Teucer came from the war of Troy to Cyprus, in the days of Dido, a little before the reign of her brother Pygmalion; and, in conjunction with her father, seized Cyprus, and ejected Cinyras: and THE MARBLES say, that Teucer came to Cyprus, seven years after the destruction of Troy, and built Salamis; and Apollodorus, that Cinyras married Metbarme the daughter of Pygmalion, and built Paphos. Therefore, if the Romans in the days of Augustus, followed not altogether the artificial Chronology of Eratosthenes, but had those things from the records of Carthage, Cyprus, or Tyre; the arrival of Teucer at Cyprus will be in the reign of the predecessor of Pygmalion, and by consequence the destruction of Troy, about 76 years later than the death of Solomon. Ant. Chr. 903.

Dionysius Halicarnassensis tells us that in the time of the Trojan war, Latinus was King of the Aborigines in Italy, and that in the sixteenth age after that war Romulus built Rome. By ages he means reigns of Kings: for after Latinus he names sixteen Kings of the Latines, the last of which was Numitor, in whose days Romulus built Rome: for Romulus was contemporary to Numitor, and after him Dionysius and others reckon six Kings more over Rome, to the beginning of the Consuls. Now these twenty and two reigns, at about eighteen years to a reign one with another, for so many of these Kings were slain, took up 396 years; which counted back from the Consulship of Junius Brutus and Valerius Poplicola, the two first Consuls, place the Trojan war about 78 years after the death of Solomon. Ant. Chr. 901.

VOL. I.

b

* When

S. I. N.
P. 125.
Vid. Dion.
P. 125.
L. 1. P. 49.
45.

When the Greeks and Latines were forming their Technical Chronology, there were great disputes about the antiquity of Rome: the Greeks made it much older than the Olympiads: some of them said it was built by Aeneas; others by Romulus, the son or grandson of Aeneas; others, by Romus, the son or grandson of Latinus King of the Aberigines; others, by Romus, the son of Ulysses, or of Ascanius, or of Italus: and some of the Latines at first fell in with the opinion of the Greeks, saying that it was built by Romulus the son or grandson of Aeneas. Timæus Siculus represented it built by Romulus, the grandson of Aeneas, above an hundred years before the Olympiads, and so did Nævius the poet, who was 20 years older than Ennius, and served in the first Punick war, and wrote the History of that war.

Hitherto nothing certain was agreed upon, but about 140 or 150 years after the death of Alexander the Great, they began to say, that Rome was built a second time by Romulus, in the fifteenth age after the destruction of Troy: by ages they meant reigns of the Kings of the Latines at Alba, and reckoned the first 14 reigns at about 432 years, and the following reigns of the seven Kings of Rome at 244 years, both which numbers made up the time of about 676 years from the taking of Troy, according to these Chronologers; but are much too long for the course of nature: and by this reckoning they placed the building of Rome upon the sixth or seventh Olympiad: Varro † placed it on the first year of the seventh Olympiad, and was therein generally followed by the Romans; but this can scarce be reconciled to the course of nature: For I do not meet with any instance in all history, since Chronology was certain, wherein seven Kings, most of whom were slain, reigned 244 years in continual succession.

The fourteen reigns of the Kings of the Latines, at twenty years a-piece one with another, amount unto 280 years, and these years counted from the taking of Troy end in the 38th Olympiad: and the seven reigns of the Kings of Rome, four or five of them being slain, and one deposed, may at a moderate reckoning amount to fifteen or sixteen years a piece one with another: let them be reckoned at seventeen years a-piece, and they will amount unto 119 years; which being counted backwards from the Regifuge, end also in the 38th Olympiad: and by Ant. Chr. these two reckonings Rome was built in the 38th Olympiad, or thereabout.

† If this be not an error of the press, yet doubtless Sir Iaac Newton meant to write Cato, not Varro. Varro placed the foundation of Rome in the third year of the 6th Olympiad [Ant. Chr. 753.] Cato in the 1st year of the 7th [Ant. Chr. 751.]

These two writers agreed in giving 244 years to the regal state of Rome, but, as they fixed the Æra of the city by reckoning backward, and counted the years of the republick by the annual magistracies, and as Varro, in this way of counting, gave to the republick two years more than Cato; he of course placed the building of Rome two years farther back than Cato had done.

There were three Dictatorships, to each of which Varro allotted a whole year, which Dictatorships Cato had considered as only superseding so many Consulships, and therefore reckoned each Consulship and the Dictatorship that superseded it as filling but one year. And this would have made Varro's reckoning, upon the whole, exceed Cato's by three years; but Varro by placing, in one and the same year, the third Decemvirate and the succeeding Consulship; to which Magistracies Cato allotted distinct years, the reckoning of Varro, upon the whole, exceeded that of Cato by two years only.

The Capitoline Marbles, with regard to the three Dictatorships and the third Decemvirate, reckon like Varro; but as they give only 243 years to the regal state of Rome, their Chronology, upon the whole, has a year less than Varro's, and a year more than Cato's.

See notes sur la Chron. Grecque-Rom. Selon D. Hal. by the French Translator of Dionysius, p. 34.

• The

* The 280 years and the 119 years together make up 399 years; and the same number of years arises by counting the twenty and one reigns at nineteen years a-piece: and this being the whole time between the taking of Troy and the Refuge, let these years be counted backward from the * Refuge An. 1, Olymp. * Ant. Chr: 68, and they will place the taking of Troy about 74 years after the death of 508. Solomon. [Which death of Solomon Sir Isaac Newton places 979 years before the Christian Æra; so that the fall of Troy, soon after which Æneas began his voyages, will be about 905 years before that Æra; and as Sir Isaac makes the flight of Dido from Tyre to be Ant. Chr. 892, there were, according to this computation, but about 13 years between these two last-mentioned events.] Vid. Supr. xiii.

Mr. WHISTON, in his Treatise, intitled A Confutation of Sir Isaac Newton's Chronology, observes, (p. 987) that " In England we have had " NINE successive Reigns, at almost 30 years a-piece, from Henry I. to " Edward III.

" And TWELVE at almost 28 years a-piece, from William the Conqueror to Richard II.

" And the French have had SIX Reigns together at almost 40 years a-piece from Robert to Philip II.

" And EIGHT Reigns at above 35 years a-piece, from Robert to " Lewis IX.

" And TEN Reigns at almost 33 years a-piece from Robert to Philip IV. all inclusive, as these Tables will shew.

KINGS of ENGLAND.

1.	William the Conqueror	—	21.
2.	William Rufus	— — —	13.
3.	Henry I.	— — —	35.
4.	Stephen	— — —	19.
5.	Henry II.	— — —	35.
6.	Richard I.	— — —	11.
7.	John	— — —	17.
8.	Henry III.	— — —	56.
9.	Edward I.	— — —	34.
10.	Edward II.	— — —	19.
11.	Edward III.	— — —	51.
12.	Richard II.	— — —	22.

12) 333 (27 $\frac{1}{4}$

KINGS of FRANCE.

1.	Rupert or Robert	—	45.
2.	Henry I.	— — —	28.
3.	Philip I.	— — —	48.
4.	Lewis VI.	— — —	29.
5.	Lewis VII.	— — —	43.
6.	Philip II.	— — —	43.

b 2

7. Lewis

Remarks on the History

7. Lewis VIII.	—	—	—	3.
8. Lewis IX.	—	—	—	44.
9. Philip III.	—	—	—	15.
10. Philip IV.	—	—	—	29.

10) 327 (32½)

From these examples Mr. Whiston infers, that we ought not to reject or alter the series of the reigns of the TWELVE Kings of Macedonia, from Caranus, of the Heracidæ, to Archelaus, which twelve reigns take up 415 years.

12) 415 (34½)
Nor the series of the reigns of the EIGHT last of the Latine Kings, from Amulius to Tarquin the Proud, which takes up 286 years 8) 286 (35½)
Which reigns of Macedonian and Latine Kings, he observes, are of all he had before marked (in several series of ancient long reigns) the longest in proportion, because they began after human life was reduced to its present standard.

Now I think it must be granted, that the examples, which Mr. Whiston has produced of long reigns in succession, both in England and in France, would be sufficient to make it credible, that the Seven Kings of Rome reigned as long as they are reported to have done, if there were no objection to this report, but its being uncommon to find, in authentick and undisputed history, Seven Kings reigning, in succession, 35 years a-piece one with another. But here it may be proper to consider,

I. That we have no better authority for the long reigns of the Seven Kings of Rome, than for the long reigns of the Fourteen Kings of Alba, their predecessors; and there is no instance, since Chronology was certain, of twenty-one Kings, in succession, reigning near thirty-two years a-piece, one with another, as the twenty-one Kings in question are represented to have done.

Mr. Whiston, as we see above, has given us Ten Kings of France in succession, who reigned 327 years, or 32½ a-piece.

I think he has stretched the reign of Robert 10 or 11 years beyond its true length. But, letting that pass, if to these Ten Kings we add the Five that preceded them, and the Six that followed them to make the number twenty-one, we shall find, that the twenty-one Kings reigned but about 21 years a-piece one with another.

For Raoul, the first of the 21, began to reign A. D. 923, and Jean II. the last of the 21, died in 1363, the whole space 440 years.

If to the Ten Kings we add the Eleven that preceded them, the reigns of the 21 will be still shorter.

Indeed, if to the Ten we add the Eleven that followed them, the 21 reigns amount to near 24 years a-piece one with another. But this is far short of 32 years a-piece, to which the 21 reigns of the Latine Kings amount, within a trifle, according to Bishop Lloyd's tables, cited by Mr. Whiston.

So

So likewise, though we have had in England Twelve successive reigns, at almost 28 years a piece, from William the Conqueror to Richard II. yet, if to those Twelve we add the Nine reigns which followed that of Richard II. we shall find that the 21 Kings did not reign quite 23 years a-piece one with another.

II. It may be further observed, that the old Chronology, which makes the reigns of 21 Latine Kings fill up a space of time so much longer than the reigns of the same number of Kings of any country have ever done since Chronology was certain, does in like manner, make the reigns of every series of Kings of the most ancient kingdoms exceed, in duration, what the common course of nature, as known by true history, admits; which universal excess affords a probable argument, that the old Chronology was wholly artificial, and not founded on authentick records or monuments.

When, I say, every series of Kings, it might perhaps be expected, that I should except the long successions of Kings in Egypt, (from the time of Mizraim the son of Ham) to which numerous Kings short reigns* are assigned by the old Chronology: But I consider those series of Egyptian monarchs as fabulous. For indeed the short reigns, assigned to them, are alone almost a demonstrative proof, that the greater number of the Kings, in those series, never existed, or at least, not in line of succession; as I shall shew hereafter.

III. That most of the Seven Kings of Rome being slain, and one deposed, there arises hence a great improbability of their reigning 35 years a-piece one with another.

IV. And lastly, that in the accounts given us of those Seven Kings, there are some particulars, by which the historians discover the uncertainty of their Chronology, and some that seem entirely to refute it, as the following Remarks will shew.

ROMULUS.

THE historians give 37 or 38 years to the reign of Romulus, yet if they had not expressly affirmed that he reigned so long, we should never

* Mr. Whiston (in p. 975.) makes the following observation.

“Manetho, when he speaks of the several Dynasties of Egypt, or of the several successions of collateral kingdoms, mentions the principal succession as extending to 113 generations in 3555 years: And implies, that the first 16, which were chiefly before the deluge, were more than equal to the other 97: Those 16 containing no fewer than 1985 years; and the 97 no more than 1570 years: the former allowing to each generation or succession 124 years; as the duration of human life before the deluge well admitted; (and the Chaldean succession at Babylon in Abydenus and Berosus equally admitted also) while the latter allows but a little above 16 years to such a succession, till the days of Alexander the Great: which last small number might yet well agree to those latter ages of the kingdom of Egypt, which might be subject to great disturbances and changes of government all along.”

have imagined, from any thing they relate of his life and death, that his government was of near so long a duration: We should rather have concluded from what they themselves have written concerning him, that he reigned little more than 17 years.

I. PLUTARCH having related how Romulus took Fidenæ, and sent thither a Roman colony on the Ides of April, goes on to tell us, that shortly after, a plague broke out, and that before the plague ceased, the Camerini invaded the Roman territory; that Romulus without delay marched against them, defeated them, took Camerinum their city, transplanted half its inhabitants to Reize, and, on the Kalends of August, sent from Rome double the number of Roman citizens to Camerium: So greatly (adds Plutarch) was the number of his citizens increased in Sixteen years time from the building of the city.

The same author proceeds immediately to relate, that the Veientes, alarmed at this increase of the Roman power, made Fidenæ the pretence for beginning a war with Rome. They demanded Fidenæ back as a city belonging to them; and their demand being scornfully rejected, they took the field, dividing their forces into two bodies: One attacked the Roman army of Fidenæ with success; the other marched against Romulus and was defeated by him. One battle more put an end to the war: Romulus obtained a decisive victory, for which he triumphed on the Ides of October.

Not only Plutarch, but Livy and Diomysius make Fidenæ the pretence for the war undertaken by the Veientes; and they speak of this war as begun presently after the reduction of that town by the Romans. It is not therefore without good reason that Pigbinus places the King's triumph over the Veientes in his 17th year.

II. It appears from Diomysius, Livy, and Plutarch, that the victory over the Veientes was the last military exploit of Romulus's life.

Diomysius having related the particulars of the war with Veii, the decisive victory gained by Romulus, and his triumph on that occasion, concludes with words to this effect: These are the most memorable wars of Romulus; an untimely death, when he was in the bloom of his military glory, hindered him from subduing any of the other neighbouring nations.*

Livy, when he has spoken of the same war, goes on much in the same manner with Diomysius†: These were almost all the achievements at home and abroad during the reign of Romulus; and then speaks of his death. And,

Plutarch says expressly, that this war [with the Veientes] was the last war that Romulus ever waged‡.

* Οὕτω συνίσταται πόλεμος Ῥωμῶν λόγῳ καὶ πράξει ἄλλῃ· τῷ δὲ κατὰ τὴν τῶν πολέμων ὁδὸν ἐκτελεσθέντι, τεχνῶν ἢ τακτικῶν τῷ βίῳ, συμβῆναι ἐπὶ ἀπαρχῇ αὐτοῦ τὰ πολέμους ἀφ᾽ ἑαυτοῦ, ἐν αὐτῷ γινώσκῃ ἰδίᾳ, p. 144.

† Hæc ferme Romulo regnante domi militæque gesta. L. 1. c. 15.

‡ Τέτοις ἰσχυρῶς πόλεμοις ὁ Ῥωμύλος ἐπολέμησεν, p. 33. Vit. Rom.

If then these two points be granted, that Romulus's war with Veii was his last war, and that this was finished about the 17th year of Rome, it will follow, that the 20 last years of his reign, if he reigned 37, were years of PEACE. But is it probable, that a Prince of so active and enterprising a spirit, should pass twenty years in peace with all his neighbours? Or if the Romans, when they sent an offer of the kingdom to Numa, had, of 37 years, (the whole period since the birth of their state,) been the last 20 in peace, how could he, with any propriety or truth, in his answer to the deputies, speak of the Romans as a people of a restless spirit, ever in war, and insatiably eager of conquest? Plutarch tells us, that the Romans, when Numa ascended the throne, were become hard as iron by war; and that this Prince thought religion the only means to soften such stubborn minds, and moderate their martial fury; and Livy calls them animos militiæ effertos. There is nothing in any of the historians to favour the supposition of Rome's continuing 20 years in peace in Romulus's time, except this only, that they fix his death to the 37th year of the city, and make his wars end about the 17th. See Hist. p. 51. & 60.

III. MAY it not be fairly collected from all the three historians before-mentioned, that Romulus's victory over the Veientes was not only the last military exploit of his life, but an exploit which did not long precede his death? It has been already observed, that Diomyfius and Livy pass immediately from the conclusion of the Veientan war to the King's assassination. Plutarch does the same; and it is farther to be remarked, that Plutarch and Diomyfius make the affront which Romulus put upon the Senators, when, without consulting them, he restored to the Veientes 50 hostages (which they had given him to secure the performance of their engagements by the treaty of peace) to be one of the chief provocations which incited the Senators to murder him. And this offence is mentioned as a thing recent at the time of his death: his sudden disappearing soon after this, says Plutarch, brought the Senate under suspicion and calumny. And the same historian mentions another recent offence given the Senate, That the King by his sole authority shared among the soldiers the lands acquired by the war. It is not indeed said, at what time the King gave the Senators these provocations; but we cannot easily suppose it to have been a great while after the war; and it will be very hard to suppose that it was 20 years after.

Plutarch is, I think, the only ancient writer who speaks of Romulus's moderation in not possessing himself of the kingdom of Alba, upon the death of his grandfather Numitor, to which kingdom he supposes Romulus to have had a right of inheritance. Now supposing Romulus to have been heir apparent to his grandfather, and yet never to have possessed Alba, it is much more probable that the grandfather outlived the grandson, than that the grandson declined a succession to which he had an hereditary right. This imagination which Plutarch had of the politick moderation of Romulus (for it was to regain the good-will of his people) seems wholly founded on the supposition that he reigned 37 years, in which case he probably outlived his grandfather: But if Romulus reigned but but 17 years, his grandfather may very well be supposed to have outlived him; for, according to Plutarch himself, Romulus was but 17 years old, when he began to reign.

N U M A.

THERE are several considerations, which make it seem very improbable, that Numa reigned 43 years. His reign is by all represented as a reign of uninterrupted peace; and the sole object of his government, to turn the minds of his subjects wholly from war to agriculture and other honest occupations, and to religious exercises. His people look upon him as the wisest man and best king in the world, and revere him as their common Father. Nevertheless this very people, of whom not a man, fit to bear arms, had ever drawn a sword, are after 43 years habit of industry and devotion, brought at once, as soon as Numa is dead, totally to neglect his religious institutions, pick quarrels with their neighbours, and go to fighting as readily, as if war had been their constant and only trade. Has this any appearance of probability? Is it not natural to believe rather, that Numa's reign did not last above 15 or 16 years, and that the army, which Tullus Hostilius led into the field, consisted chiefly of Romulus's soldiers, who had been early inured to robbery and plundering, and whom Numa's discipline had not cured of their first habits and dispositions?

But, as to Numa, there is another difficulty, with which Livy, Dionysius, and Plutarch, were much embarrassed, and which will be wholly removed by Sir Isaac Newton's calculations.

All those three historians take notice of a tradition which had universally prevailed among the Romans, That Numa was instructed by Pythagoras the Samian philosopher. This Tradition they all reject; and they imagine, it had no foundation but the conformity between the Tenets of Pythagoras and those of Numa. At the same time, they have no argument against the truth of the Fact, but what they draw from the received Chronology of the regal state of Rome.

L. 2. p.
116.

“Pythagoras, (says Dionysius) was posterior to Numa, not a few years, but 4 entire generations,” i. e. 4 reigns of Kings: For (as he goes on), “Numa began his reign in the middle of the 16th Olympiad, and Pythagoras taught in Italy after the 50th Olympiad, μετα την πεντηκστήν,” [in

in Numa. * Plutarch speaks of some writers who (probably to get rid of the difficulties arising from this old tradition, compared with the received chronology of the Kings of Rome) imagined, that a certain Pythagoras, a Spartan, who gained the prize at the races in the 16th Olympiad, might be Numa's instructor. Dionysius likewise mentions this Racer, but declares, that he knows of no good author, Greek or Roman, who speaks of him, as conversing with Numa.

* Cicero * says, That Pythagoras came into Italy in the reign of Tarquin the Proud; and that he was in Italy when Brutus freed Rome from tyranny, i. e. 206 years after the beginning of Numa's reign, and in the 68th Olympiad. He supposes, that posterity being ignorant of the remote times [cum ætatis & tempora ignorarent propter vetustatem] and comparing the wisdom of Numa with that of Pythagoras, imagined, from that comparison, the

* Tulc. Qu. L. 1. c. 16. Ibid. L. 4. c. 1.

In the 4th year * of which Olympiad he places the accession of Servius Tullius, the 5th King from Numa. The whole number of years between Numa's accession and that of Servius Tullius is 137.]

Now taking it for granted; that Dionysius means to say, that Pythagoras began to teach in Italy, soon after the 50th Olympiad, and that he is right in this particular, a strong presumption will arise, from the constant Tradition of his intercourse with Numa, that this King did not begin to reign in the 16th Olympiad, but much later.

According to Sir Isaac Newton's computations, Rome was not built till about the 38th Olympiad; on which supposition, if we allow about 17 years for the reign of Romulus, Numa's accession to the throne will have been about the middle of the 42d Olympiad. And if this computation be just, there will have been but about 34 years (not 137) between the accession of Numa to the throne, and the arrival of Pythagoras in Italy; even supposing that Pythagoras did not come into Italy till the 51st Olympiad, which however is not asserted by Dionysius.

St. Austin (says Mr. Bayle) would easily have believed, that Numa was a disciple of Pythagoras; for he says, that Thales lived during the reign of Romulus. Now we know, that Thales and Pherecydes were contemporaries, and that Pythagoras was a disciple of Pherecydes, and some pretend that Thales was so too. It is certain, at least, that Pythagoras and Anaximander, a disciple of Thales, lived at the same time.

That Pythagoras was contemporary with Thales, is no less certain, if Thales outlived Pherecydes, to whom Pythagoras was a disciple. And that Thales outlived Pherecydes, is manifest from a letter which Pherecydes, upon his death-bed, wrote to Thales.

The King to have been a disciple of the Philosopher. Now on this I observe,

That whatever reasons Cicero might have to place the coming of Pythagoras into Italy, in the reign of Tarquin the proud, it is plain, that Livy, Dionysius, and Pliny thought otherwise, and had no deference to his authority in this particular.

The most accurate chronology, says Mr. Stanley, teacheth (as Mr. Selden observes) that Pythagoras flourished betwixt the 50th and 52d Olympiad, p. 350.]

2. I observe, that Cicero supposes his countrymen, when they first entertained the notion of Numa's being instructed by Pythagoras, to have been extremely ignorant of the times of their Kings, and particularly of the time when Numa lived. For, as to the time of Pythagoras, Cicero, who believed that he was still living in Italy, in the first year of the Republic, could hardly suppose that the Romans made a mistake of 200 years in their reckonings; and especially after their conquest of that country where Pythagoras had resided. Yet the notion of his being contemporary with Numa prevailed after that conquest. It would seem therefore that the common opinion of the Roman state of Rome was long after framed long after the opinion concerning the intercourse between Numa and Pythagoras had been entertained; and if so, that the chronology ought rather to be rejected on account of the tradition, than the tradition rejected on account of the chronology, especially as the latter is not agreeable to the common course of nature, with regard to the reigns of Kings, and the former is entirely consistent with it.

When Dionysius places the accession of Servius to the throne in the 50th Olympiad, he goes upon the supposition, that Servius reigned 44 years. But I shall presently endeavour to shew that it is probable he did not reign above 20 years, nor come to the throne till about the 56th Olympiad, and yet that Pythagoras might be then living at Crotona, tho' he had been Numa's instructor.

It

Apollodo-rus apud Laert. Vit.
Thal.
Chron. P.
92.

It is generally admitted, that Thales was born in the first year of the 35th Olympiad. This opinion is adopted by Petavius, Mr. Bayle and Mr. Stanley; and Sir Isaac Newton seems to follow it, when he supposes, "That Thales in the 41st Olympiad applied himself to astronomical study, and predicted eclipses, being then a young man," [about 28 years of age.]

If then Sir Isaac Newton be right, in placing the foundation of Rome about the 38th Olympiad, St. Austin will not have erred in thinking, that Thales was contemporary with Romulus, tho' Mr. Bayle seems to smile at the Bishop's notion.

The ancient writers are of different opinions, concerning the times of Pythagoras's birth, and of his going into Aegypt, and into Italy, and of his death. But it seems to be universally agreed that he was contemporary with Thales, and the rest of the 7 wise men, who all flourished between the 40th and 55th Olympiads.

L. 2. c. 8. And, if we may believe Pliny, Pythagoras could not be much younger than Thales. For Pliny says, that "Pythagoras observed the nature of the star Venus, about the 42d Olympiad, year of Rome 142" [i. e. the 142d of Rome according to the reckoning of Cato.]

Now,

p. 268.

"Both these numbers (says Father Harduin, in his notes on Pliny) must be grossly corrupted, or Pliny must have grievously blundered, graviter hallucinatum." Why so? "Because Laertius says, that Pythagoras was in the 60th Olympiad, Clemens Alexandrinus and Tatian in the 62d Olympiad, and Eusebius writes, that he died in the 70th Olympiad: and Dionys. Halic. says that Pythagoras flourished after the 50th Olympiad; he seems indeed to speak without precision and at large," i. e. he does not say how long after.

I must here observe, that F. Harduin would have us understand the passage in Dionysius to mean certainly, that Pythagoras did not begin to flourish till after the 50th Olympiad. But this is not the clear import of the historian's words. He says nothing of the time when Pythagoras began to flourish, but says that he was posterior to Numa four entire generations [or four reigns of Kings] and that he lived or taught [there are two readings] in Italy after the 50th Olympiad, that is, so late as after that Olympiad, so late as in the reign of the 5th King from Numa. He does not say, at what time the philosopher came into Italy, and began to teach there. This might be long before the 50th Olympiad: but it was enough for Dionysius's purpose, that Pythagoras was living, after the 50th Olympiad: For if so, and if Numa came to the throne in the 16th Olympiad, the King could not have been a disciple of the Philosopher, which was all that Dionysius wanted to make out. His affirming that Pythagoras taught in Italy after the 50th Olympiad does in no wise clash with the passage above cited from Pliny.

But as to Pliny's blundering, why may not Laertius, Clemens, Tatian, and Eusebius be as easily supposed to blunder as he? It is not improbable, that they all four took Cicero for their guide, who, in the opinion of Livy and Dionysius, did grossly blunder with regard to the point in question.

And as to a corruption of Pliny's text by transcribers; since there are two Æras made use of, and the numbers in both ways of reckoning coincide in one and the same year, there is little ground to suppose a corruption, unless it can be shewn that Pliny has elsewhere said something that is repugnant to what is expressed in the passage before us: But the annotator having produced nothing of this sort, one may naturally conclude that he met with nothing in his author to the purpose.

Indeed there is in Pliny one passage, which as Sir Isaac Newton has happened (not according

Now, as I observed before, it was in this very Olympiad, that Numa came to the throne, according to Sir Isaac Newton's computations, if we allow but 17 years to the reign of Romulus.

LIVY

According to his usual exactness) to translate it, seems not to square with Pythagoras's making astronomical observations in the 42d Olympiad. Sir Isaac Newton's words are these: "Pliny, in reckoning up the inventors of things, tells us, that Phercydes Scyrius taught to compose discourses in prose in the reign of Cyrus." Now Cyrus did not found the Persian monarchy till the 4th year of the 62d Olympiad: and if Pythagoras was old enough in the 42d Olympiad to observe the nature of the star Venus, we must suppose that his master Phercydes was born as early, at least, as the 32d Olympiad, in which case he must have been 120 years old at the beginning of the Persian monarchy. But Pliny does not say, that Phercydes taught to compose discourses in prose in the reign of Cyrus, Cyro Rege regnante, but in the time, the age of Cyrus, Cyri Regis Aetate; L. 7. c. 26. and Cyrus was born in the 2d year of the 45th Olympiad, and was 63 years old when he came to the empire. So that supposing Phercydes born so early as about the 32d Olympiad, he was but 52 or 53 years old at the birth of Cyrus; and if he taught prose-writing in any part of Cyrus's life, the objection is removed.

Farther: that Phercydes did not teach in the 62d Olympiad is evident; because he died before Thales, who died in the 58th Olympiad, as is generally agreed.

There is another passage in Pliny, which, with regard to the point in question, deserves to be remarked. In L. 36. c. 9. he speaks of an Egyptian Obelisk, that was made by King Semnefer-teus, in whose reign (he says) Pythagoras was in Egypt. Is autem obeliscus excisus est à Rege Semnefer-teo, quo regnante Pythagoras in Aegypto fuit. F. Harduin, possessed with the opinion, that Pythagoras flourished not so early as Pliny represents him in L. 2. c. 8. and therefore that Pliny blundered in that part of his work, supposes, that he is right here, when he says that the philosopher was in Egypt in the reign of King Semnefer-teus. But who is King Semnefer-teus? According to F. Harduin, Pliny can mean no other than Psammitus the successor of Amasis. And why must Pliny, by Semnefer-teus, mean the successor of Amasis? Because Laertius and Tacitus say, that Pythagoras went into Egypt in the reign of Amasis [who reigned long, and died about the beginning of the 64th Olympiad.] So we are to understand, that Pliny knew this, and means to say, that Pythagoras was still in Egypt when Psammitus came to the throne. Now I observe,

1. That Gambyses was preparing to invade Egypt, before Amasis died, and in 6 months after his death, dispossessed his successor Psammitus, who therefore, it is highly probable, had no leisure to attend to the making Obelisks. See P. i. deaux, Part. I. B. 3. p. 169.

2. That it seems somewhat extraordinary, that Pliny should take occasion, from the mention of Psammitus, who can hardly be said to have reigned at all, to speak of his reign, as the time, when Pythagoras was in Egypt. If Pliny had believed that Pythagoras went into Egypt in the reign of Amasis, and during that reign continued there many years, as he is represented by other writers to have done, it is natural to think, he would have taken occasion, rather from the mention of Amasis, than from the mention of his successor, an half-year King, to speak of Pythagoras being in Egypt.

I rather conclude therefore, that, by Semnefer-teus, Pliny means Psammitichus, who courted the Greeks and encouraged strangers to settle in his country, and was the first King of Egypt who did so. He reigned long and died in the 3d year of the 40th Olympiad. Pythagoras, who is said to have gone very young into Egypt, may have studied there some years in the latter part of this King's reign; and this will suit with what Pliny says of his observing the nature of the star Venus in the 42d Olympiad. Diod. Sic. L. 1. c. 67. Herod. L. 2. c. 154.

N. B. When Sir Isaac Newton places the building of Rome about the 38th Olympiad, it is by a reckoning backward from the refuge (which was about the first year of the 68th Olympiad) and by allowing, to the 7 Kings, 17 years a-piece, one with another. Nevertheless, as four or five of these Kings were slain and one deposed, he thinks that at a moderate reckoning the 7 reigns may be computed at 15 or 16 years a-piece. Now, computing them at 15 years a-piece, we shall bring down the building of Rome to the 41st Olympiad, and of course the accession of

L. 1. c. 18. LIVY agrees with Dionysius, as to the time of Pythagoras being in Italy, and makes use of the same argument against the old tradition. "It is manifest (says he) that Pythagoras in the time of Servius Tullius kept a school of young students in the remotest coast of Italy in the neighbourhood of Metapontum, Heraclea, and Crotone." Be it so. It may nevertheless be true that Pythagoras was contemporary with Numa. For if the Reigns of Tullus Hostilius, Ancus Martius, and Tarquinius Priscus were very short, as from many particulars in the history there is great reason to believe they were, Pythagoras, who is said to have lived to the ages of 80, 90, 99, 104, may very well have been contemporary with both Numa and Servius Tullius.

See Bayle
Art. Py-
thag. (P.)

When Livy adds "That the School kept by Pythagoras was above* 100 years after Numa, centum amplius post annos," it is to conform himself to the received chronology of the Kings of Rome; of which chronology I shall presently shew, that in his own mind he made little account, notwithstanding any thing he says. And indeed, if one considers the reasons which he gives, why Pythagoras, supposing him contemporary with Numa, could not be his instructor, they must incline one to think that the historian is not serious in his opposing the common tradition. "How (says he) could the Fame of Pythagoras reach from the south-east coast of Italy, where Pythagoras kept school, into Sabinia? By an intercourse in what language, could Pythagoras excite in Numa a desire of learning? Under what protection could the one pass to the other through so many nations of different languages and manners? I am rather of opinion therefore, that Numa's mind was naturally virtuous, and was improved, not so much by science acquired from abroad, as by the severe doctrines and discipline of the ancient Sabines."

2. 40. a. 29. As to the want of a common language in which the King and the Philosopher might converse, it is to be observed, that Livy, when he relates (after the prior historians) the discovery of Numa's books under ground, does not object to that part of the story which said, that seven of those books were written in Greek, but to what Valerius Antias adds, namely, that those Greek books contained the doctrines of Pythagoras. "In this, (says Livy) Valerius suited his Faith to the common opinion, That Numa was a disciple of Pythagoras; a lie which has an appearance of truth: Vulgate opinioni qua creditur Pythagorae auditorum fuisse Numam Mendacio probabilis accommodata fide."

That this lie, if it be a lie, has an appearance of truth, must doubtless be admitted on account of the constancy of the tradition concerning the Numa allowing to Romulus 17 years) to the 45th Olympiad: and on this supposition Pythagoras may have been in Italy early enough to be Numa's instructor, before his accession to the throne.

* It is to be observed, that Livy affects no exactness in his reckoning. When he says above 100 years after, if he counts from the death of Numa to the accession of Servius, the space of time is but 94 years: if he counts from the beginning of Numa's reign, to the accession of Servius, the years are 137, by the old chronology.

inter-

intercourse between Numa and Pythagoras, and on account of the undisputed conformity of the King's tenets with those of the Philosopher. And there is one particular which gives this pretended lie so great an appearance of truth, that I should think we may admit it for a truth without being over credulous.

By Livy's report, Numa's books were discovered under ground in the consulship of Cornelius Cethegus and Bæbius Tampilus, which, according to the common reckoning, was in the year of Rome 571 or 573. Plutarch and Pliny place this discovery in the same consulship, and Pliny reckons 535 years from the beginning of Numa's reign to this discovery of his books, which reckoning places the latter in 573 of Rome, supposing Numa's reign to begin with the 39th of the city.

It being certain, as was before observed, that Numa's tenets resembled those of Pythagoras, they must without question have been contrary to the religion, which had been long established by law, at Rome, when his books were found; and accordingly these were, by order of the senate, burnt as heterodox: So Livy informs us; but at the same time tells us, that, before they were burnt, they had been read by so many persons, that they were in a manner publick: Now, though Livy cites no authority on this occasion but Kalerius Antias, we learn from Pliny, that the historians Lucius Piso Censorius, and Cassius Hemina (who adhered to the old Tradition) reported that Numa's books contained the tenets of Pythagoras. And these authorities are very considerable in this case: because Piso being a tribune of the people in the consulship of Manilius and Censorinus, about 33 years after finding the books; and Cassius Hemina flourishing in the consulship of Cornelius Lentulus and Mammius Achaicus, about 37 years after the same discovery; those two historians were near enough to the time of the discovery, to have very good means of informing themselves, concerning the contents of the books, from some of the many persons who had perused them.

Cic. in Brut. & L. xi. de Off. Censorinus Cap. xvii.

Ovid in his XVth book of Metamorphoses represents Numa as instructed by Pythagoras, which shews at least that this was still the popular and prevailing opinion in the time of Augustus.

The aim of all that has been said on the subject of Pythagoras, is to shew, that Sir Isaac Newton's computations, which bring down Numa to the time of Pythagoras, have the support of traditional and historical Facts.

TULLUS HOSTILIUS.

TO THIS Third King of Rome the historians allot a reign of 32 years, and he is represented to us as a prince of a more fierce, restless, enterprising spirit than even Romulus, and as seeking every-where pretences for war: Ferocior etiam Romulo fuit: Tum Ætas viresque, tum avita quoque gloria animum stimulabat—undique materiam excitandi belli querebat. Yet the reduction and demolition of Alba, in the beginning of his reign, and one victory which he soon after obtained over the Sabines, are the whole sum of his military exploits.

Livy, L. ii. c. 22.

Now

Remarks on the History

Not long after his Victory he is seized with some lingering distemper, his spirit sinks, he falls into superstition, and is killed by Jupiter for not performing a sacrifice in due form [that is to say, is privately murdered by Ancus Martius who succeeded him.]

If Livy after this account of him, had not told us that he reigned 32 years, we should hardly have imagined that he reigned 2.

ANCUS MARTIUS.

THOUGH MORE action be ascribed to this King, whose character is both martial and pacifick, than to his predecessor, it does not seem that all his performances could require a fourth part of the 24 years, that are given to his reign.

This remark however, and that, made on the history of Tullus Hostilius, are not offered as sufficient proofs, that these Kings did not reign 32 and 24 years respectively, but only as probable arguments, which, in conjunction with others, will have a degree of force. And thus much at least is certain, that the reigns of these two Kings may have been very short, notwithstanding any achievements ascribed to them.

TARQUINIUS PRISCUS.

THE Historians represent the elder Tarquin as very rich when he comes first from Etruria to Rome, as very prosperous in war after his ascending the throne, and as having a taste for magnificence. This taste and his ability to gratify it, carry him to design and begin several great works. He does not live to finish these, nor even to make any considerable progress in them: which affords some ground to conjecture that he did not reign 38 years. But without laying any greater stress on this argument than it will bear, I proceed to another of more force, with regard to the present purpose.

Whether this 5th King of Rome was the Father, or the Grandfather of Tarquinius Superbus, the 7th King, is a question considered, and with full confidence determined by Dionysius. He decides, contrary to the report of Fabius and all the other prior historians (except L. Piso) that Priscus was the Grandfather of Superbus. And he imputes the supposed error of the historians, from whom he differs, to their not being aware of the Absurdities in which their opinion involved them.

Those absurdities he thus exposes:

It is agreed that Priscus with his wife Tanaquil came to Rome in the time of Ancus Martius.

Gellius places the arrival of Priscus in the first year of King Ancus; Licinius in the eighth: But both agree, that he was employed as general of the horse to Ancus, in the ninth year of his reign: the arrival therefore of Priscus at Rome could not be later than the eighth of Ancus.

As Priscus, before he came to Rome, had aspired to dignities and high offices in his own country, he was doubtless 25 years old at least, when he

he arrived: And as, after his arrival, Ancus reigned 17 years and Priscus 38, Priscus was 80 when he died.

Tanaquil was probably 5 years younger than her husband; consequently 75 at the time of his death.

She cannot be supposed to have borne children after the age of 50^a.

Aruns, the brother of Superbus, was two years younger than he; consequently, if Superbus was the son of Tanaquil, she could not be more than 48 when she bore him. And if so, Superbus must have been at least 27, when his father died, his mother being then 75.

But if Superbus was 27, when his father Priscus died, then, as Servius Tullius, the successor of Priscus, reigned 44 years, Superbus must have been 71 at the time of his own accession to the Throne: And as he reigned 25 years, he must have been 96 at the time of his dethronement. And, as, after his dethronement, he maintained a war against the Romans 14 years, he must have lived to the age of 110.

Now, (says Dionysius) would Tanaquil (the wife of Priscus) had she been the mother of Superbus, have placed a stranger on the Throne preferably to her own son, if her own son had been of an age to govern? A stranger, who was but 3 years older than her son? (For Servius Tullius was then but 30.) Or would Superbus, a man of so much spirit, have quietly suffered it?

Can we believe that Superbus was 71 years old, when with so much strength and vigour he seized Servius Tullius by the waist, hurried him in his arms through the senate-house, and cast him headlong from the top of the steps at the entrance of it?

Or is it credible, that he was 96 years of age, when at the head of an army he perform'd all the functions of a General, as it is agreed he did, in the siege of Ardea, at the time of his dethronement?

Or, since it is agreed, that Superbus after his dethronement, maintained a war against the Romans 14 years, and was in every action of that war, can it be admitted that he was 96 when that war commenced? Could he possibly keep the field till he was 110?

These things, says Dionysius, are incredible: and hence he concludes, that the second Tarquin was the GRANDSON, and not the SON of the first.

But, notwithstanding all the force of this reasoning, we do not find that Plutarch was convinced by it. He only tells us, that Superbus was either the son or grandson of Priscus, without declaring for either opinion.

And Livy, who, being no stranger to the reasons which determined Dionysius, says, the matter is not clear, yet declares, that he adheres to the opinion, That Superbus was the SON of Priscus.

^a Mr. Bayle observes, that Dionysius, by making Brutus to be the son of Tarquinius a daughter of Tanaquil, has fallen into one of the absurdities he imputes to those who differ from him concerning the birth of Tarquin the proud: For by his own way of reasoning it will appear, that Tanaquil must have been 54, when she bore that daughter.

^b Hic L. Tarquinius Prisci Tarquinii Regis filius, neposque fuerit, parum liquet: pluribus tamen auctoribus Filium ostenditur. L. 1. c. 46.

Now which way can we account for Livy's rejecting the conclusion in Dionysius's argument, but by supposing that he did not believe what he himself, as well as Dionysius, relates, namely, that Priscus reigned 38 years, Servius Tullius 44, and Tarquin the Proud 25? Indeed, as Livy does not say in what year of King Ancus Martius, Priscus arrived at Rome, it is possible, he might, in his own mind, place that arrival some years later than Dionysius (following Licinius) has done; in which case, Superbus need not have been 27 years old when his father died. Yet, since Livy represents Priscus so great a favourite of Ancus, as to be by him left guardian of his children, the historian could not but allow a considerable time for Priscus to ingratiate himself with the King to that degree. Let us suppose, that Priscus came to Rome about 6 years only before the death of Ancus, the consequences will be, that Superbus was at least 17 when he lost his father, 86 when dethroned, and near 100, at the battle of the Regillus, in which battle (according to Livy) he rode briskly up to attack the Roman general hand to hand.

“ Is it not astonishing (says Mr. Bayle) that, considering the absurdities which attend the supposition, that Superbus was the SON of Priscus, Dionysius could find but one writer who makes him the GRAND-son? This writer, was Lacius Piso, whose opinion Dionysius has adopted. Livy had not the same discernment: he has chosen to follow the crowd of authorities, and thereby loaded himself with a heap of difficulties, that dishonour his memory.” Artic. Tanaquil. (F.)

This charge upon Livy of wanting discernment I apprehended to be entirely groundless. Supposing him to believe that the Roman chronology was true, he could not but be aware of the insuperable objections to his opinion concerning the birth of Superbus. But I take the case to be this. That Superbus was the son of Priscus, is a simple fact, which could easily be preserved by tradition; much more easily than the ages of successive Kings or the number of years they reigned. Tradition universally supported that simple fact; and there was nothing to bring the truth of it in question, but such reasonings as Dionysius has employed; founded on the received but uncertain chronology of the regal state of Rome. Livy believed the fact; and did not believe the chronology: Yet knowing that it would be unpopular and offensive, should he, in his history, lower the antiquity of the Roman state explicitly and expressly, he has avoided that, and at the same time, by declaring for the opinion, that Superbus was the son of Priscus, has discovered to his attentive readers his disbelief of the chronology commonly received.

Nor

² Virgil seems to have acted the like part in making Aeneas and Dido contemporary. Without giving offence, he has covertly insinuated, that the reckonings of the chronologers were very erroneous. Mr. Rollin (Hist.

Anc. vol. 1. p. 238, 242.) seems to admit that Carthage was built by Dido 883 years before the Christian Era, and 300 years after the fall of Troy, and the voyage of Aeneas: and he supposes Virgil to have known himself guilty of a great

Nor is it only by relating facts, inconsistent with the truth of the common chronology, that he discovers his disregard to it, but by one of his reckonings. For in L. i. c. 40. he speaks of the 38th year of Tarquinius Priscus as being ALMOST 100 years after the reign of Romulus; though, by the common chronology, it was 137 years after Romulus's death.

It is remarkable, that Livy does not tell us how long any one of the Roman Kings lived; nor does he mention the lengths either of the lives or reigns of the 14 Latine Kings who preceded them.

With regard to several of the Kings of Rome, I should conjecture, that the first Annalists, who pretended to fix the number of years which each of them reigned, did, either through mistake or design, give the lengths of their lives for the lengths of their reigns. What has been already remarked concerning Romulus and Tullus Hostilius affords some ground for this conjecture; and the history of Servius Tullius seems to favour it with regard to him; or at least to furnish a very good argument for shortening the duration of his government.

SERVIUS TULLIUS.

DIONYSIUS tells us in the very beginning of his history of Servius's reign, (and he plainly speaks of the beginning of this Prince's reign) That the Patricians being much dissatisfied to find, that Servius having taken the reins of government into his hands only as a Regent, intended to hold them as a King, came to this resolution; That the very first time he assembled the Senate, they would oblige him to lay down the fusces and all the other ensigns of royalty, and would chuse Inter-Kings, in order to proceed to a legal election of a successor to Tarquin: That Servius being apprized of their design, applied himself to gain the People, to support him; and, that to this end, having assembled the People, he promised, among other benefits, to ease them with regard to the publick taxes, by assessing every one in proportion to his substance, it being unreasonable (as he said) that the poor should contribute equally with the rich to the expences of the state. Servius in consequence of his PROMISE, when they had chosen him King, and he had made some previous regulations, instituted the Census, di-great Anachronism, in bringing Aeneas and Dido together; yet, with many others, he excuses the poet by the doctrine of poetick licence, "It being (he says) a great beauty, " in the Aeneid, to represent the implacable " enmity between Rome and Carthage as " taking its rise in the remotest origin of " the two states." But in reality, is Virgil more excuseable, than a modern poet would be, who should imagine a war between Constantine the first Christian Emperor, and Mahomet the founder of the Musulman Religion? Would any body pardon such a licence on account of any beauties whatsoever? Surely reason will carry us to believe, that Virgil knew he was not guilty of any considerable Anachronism with regard to Aeneas and Dido.

The Jesuits Catrou and Reuilli, who likewise take for granted, that Aeneas and Dido lived at a great distance of time from each other, and that Virgil knew it, yet observe, that none of the criticks who were contemporary with Virgil, or who lived after him, till Macrobias's time, [in the end of the 4th century] ever charged him with any Anachronism. And they farther observe that Cedrenus and several other historians have brought Aeneas and Dido under the same roof.

viding the Citizens into Classes and Centuries, &c. by which institution the burden of the taxes was thrown all upon the great and the rich.

As the Senate obstinately refused to confirm the People's choice of Servius to be King, and as Servius depended wholly on the People's affections for the preservation of his authority, is it reasonable to suppose, that he put 24 years distance between so important a promise and the performance? Now if the Census, which was to be renewed every 5 years, and to be always closed by a Lustrum, was instituted in the beginning of Servius Tullius's reign, How came it to pass that there were no more than four Lustra during the 44 years of this Prince's administration? That this was the number of Lustra in Servius's time, Pigbius (p. 48.) says, may be collected from the Capitoline Marbles; and we have also Val. Maximus's authority for it, B. 4. Would Servius neglect the observance of his own institution? An institution that was his master-piece of policy, and his chief glory? To have four Lustra in his reign required strictly but 16 years, the first Lustrum being at the time of the institution; and should we suppose that he was killed just before a new Census should have been taken, still the four Lustra could demand but 20 years. And this therefore is as long a space of time as can reasonably be allowed for his reign.

It must be confessed, that Livy, in his account of Servius Tullius, differs considerably from Dionysius, and, upon the whole, is more consistent, and more worthy of credit*. The Latins historian reports, that Servius took the crown with the consent of the Fathers. And if we consider, that;

M. de Beaufort.

* The ingenious author of The Dissertation on the Uncertainty of the Roman History, has with great judgment compared the differing accounts given by the two historians of Servius's reign; and has clearly shewn, that Livy's is the more credible, not only with regard to the disposition of the Senate toward the King at the time of his accession, but with regard to that plan of republican government, which the King had formed some time before he died. Dionysius would have us believe, that the Senators combined with Tarquin the Proud to destroy Servius, because this latter intended to change the government into a Democracy. Now it is manifest from the King's own establishments, that he preferred aristocratical government to democratical. And therefore what Livy reports is highly credible, that the meditated change regarded only the monarchy. Id ipsum tam mite ac tam moderatum imperium, tamen quia unus esset, deponere eum in animo habuisse quidam auctores sunt. (l. 1. c. 48.) The same historian relates, that when two annual Consuls were first created to govern the state, this creation was according to the plan of Servius Tullius. Duo Consules inde Comitibus Centuriatis à Præfecto urbis ex COMMENTARIIS Servii Tullii creati sunt. (l. 1. c. 60.) What was it then that induced the Senators to side with Tarquin, since Servius's new plan of government was so favourable to their ambition? Livy has answered this question. They were dissatisfied with the division which the King had made of the publick lands among the people. For though he did not think it expedient that the lower sort should govern, yet he thought it reasonable they should live free, and be made easy in their inferiority; whereas it was the constant policy of the nobles of Rome to keep the commons in indigence, and of course in a slavish dependence. Tarquin seized the favourable opportunity of the Senate's fit of anger, suddenly to perpetrate the murder of Servius and seat himself in the throne. Yet we find, that the usurper, when he had got power in his hands, and when the anger of the Senate against Servius was subdued, would not trust to their good-will to support him in possession: He would not put his crown that, by the institution of the Census, and the Centuriate Comitia, the King threw all the power of the general assemblies into the hands of the nobles, it is not very probable, that the nobles were his enemies. It seems more probable, that when he possessed himself of the throne, he did it in concert with the Senators, and that he engaged them to support him by letting them into the secret of his intentions.

Be this as it will, it was absolutely necessary that Servius, in order to a quiet possession, should conciliate to him by some speedy measures both Senate and People. And this we find he did by his new regulation of the government, pleasing the ambition of the Nobles, and relieving the indigence of the Plebeians. His situation, I say, required that his measures to gain the hearts of his subjects should be speedy; and therefore it is not to be questioned, but his institution of the Census, and his division of the citizens into classes and centuries, &c. were in the beginning of his reign. And, if so, I ask again, how came it to pass, that there were no more than four Lustra in 44 years? It is against all reason to suppose, that the King neglected an institution of his own invention, and which, giving satisfaction to both orders in the state, gained him their esteem and affection, and established his authority.

TARQUINIUS SUPERBUS.

As to the 25 years which this King is said to have reigned, I shall only observe, that if his reign was really of that length (which does not seem improbable, since he began and finished the temple of Jupiter Capitolinus, and the famous Common Sewers) it aids the argument against the long reign of Servius Tullius. For if Servius reigned 44 years, and Superbus 25, the latter, let him be the grandson of Priscus, as Dionysius will have it, could not be far from 90 years of age, at the battle near the lake Regillus, 14 years after his dethronement, since he was some years old at the death of Priscus: And, accordingly, the Greek historian gives him that age, and infers from it, that Gellius and Licinius (whom Livy has followed) and all the other historians, who say, that Superbus fought on horseback in that battle, are not to be credited, because a man 90 years old could not fight on horseback. Now surely the juster way of reasoning would have been crown to the hazard of an election. He did not seek to be elected King by the Senate, more than by the people. Supported by foreign troops he deprived both orders of their privileges, cruelly oppressed the Nobles, but soothed the Plebeians, (as more to be dreaded on account of their greater strength) by his liberalities, and by sharing among them the rich spoils acquired in war. See Hist. p. 178. The Nobles languished after that liberty and authority of which Servius had given them a taste; and the shocking atrocious deed of Sextus Tarquinius, which awakened the people, and made them thoroughly feel the slavery they were in, furnished the Nobles with an opportunity of drawing them at once into measures for recovering the common freedom. This seems to be the true state of things with regard to Tarquin and the Revolution. And the quick settlement of the new government, without any opposition, sufficiently indicates, that Brutus and his associates went upon a plan already formed, and to which the chief men of the Plebeians were no strangers, namely, that of Servius Tullius.

this: Tradition and History, uncontradicted, tell us that Superbus fought on horseback in the battle near the Regillus; therefore he could not be then 90 years of age: But, according to the common Chronology, which gives 44 years to the reign of Servius Tullius, and 25 to that of Superbus, the latter was 90 years old at that battle; consequently the common Chronology is false.

It appears, that Dionysius (a critick by profession) had laid it down as a fundamental principle, that the received Chronology of the regal state of Rome was true and exact; and therefore, let a fact be never so well attested, he rejects it, if he cannot make it square with that Chronology.

Tradition and History said, that Superbus was the son of Priscus; that Superbus fought on horseback at the battle of Regillus; that Collatinus (the husband of Lucretia) was the son of Egerius (nephew of the elder Tarquin.) No, says Dionysius, none of these things can be true; for they are not consistent with the long reigns of the Kings. He produces no authority against the facts; nor does he know who was the father of Superbus, or the father of Collatinus: But he reasons from the received Chronology, and concludes, contrary to all historical testimony, that Superbus was not the son, but the grandson of Priscus; that he did not fight on horseback at the abovementioned battle; and that Collatinus was not the son, but the grandson of Egerius.

Livy, on the other hand, though he durst not openly contradict the received Chronology, seems to have been fully persuaded, that it was not so well vouched, as many historical facts, that were incompatible with it. He therefore adheres to the facts, and leaves it to such notable criticks as Dionysius to reconcile them with the Chronology as well as they can.

AS I HAVE ventured thus far in an attempt to support Sir Isaac Newton's opinion concerning the duration of the regal state of Rome, it seems fit, that before I quit the subject, I should take some notice of what the learned Dr. Stuckford has said in answer to Sir Isaac Newton's arguments, and in defence of the old Chronology.

In the Preface to the second volume of his Sacred and Profane History of the world connected, he writes thus:

P. xix.

‘ Our great and learned author remarks, that the seven Kings of Rome
 ‘ who preceded the Consuls, reigned one with another 35 years a-piece.
 ‘ I am sensible that it may be observed, that the reigns of these Kings not ‘ falling within the times I am to treat of, I am not concerned to vindicate
 ‘ the accounts that are given of them; but I would not entirely ‘ omit mentioning them, because the lengths of their reigns may be ‘ thought an undeniable instance of the inaccuracy of the ancient computations, ‘ more especially because these Kings were all more modern ‘ than the times of David; for supposing Rome to be built by Romulus,
 ‘ A. M. 3256. [Usher's Annals] we must begin Romulus's reign 300 years ‘ after the death of David, and the lives of men in these times being reduced

duced to what has been esteemed the common standard ever since, it may perhaps be expected, that the reigns of those Kings should not be longer, one with another, than the reigns of our Kings of England, from William the Conqueror; or of the Kings of France, from Pharamond; or of any other series of Kings mentioned by our illustrious author: But here I would observe, that these seven Kings of Rome were not descendants of one another. Plutarch remarks of these Kings, that not one of them left his crown to his son. Two of them, namely, Ancus Martius and Tarquinius Superbus, were descendants from the sons of former Kings, but the other five were of different families.

The successors of Romulus were elected to the crown, and the Roman people did not confine their choice even to their own country, but chose such as were most likely to promote the publick good. It is evident therefore, that the lengths of these Kings reigns ought not to be estimated according to the common measure of successive monarchs, &c.

I might remark farther that there were Interregna between the reigns of several of them.—Each of these Interregna might perhaps take up some years. The historians allot no space of time to these Interregna, but it is known to be no unusual thing for writers to begin the reign of a succeeding King from the death of his predecessor, though he did not immediately succeed to his crown.

We see here that the learned writer, to get rid of the objection, drawn from the course of nature, against the long reigns of the seven Roman Kings, suggests two considerations by which we may account for them.

I. He observes that the Roman Kings were elected. Very true; but it is likewise true, that Reigns will naturally be shorter in elective monarchies, than in hereditary. And I observe, that this circumstance of election serves our learned writer to account for short reigns when he has occasion so to do. For when he would account for the short reigns of the first Kings of Aegypt, he has recourse to election.

The first twelve Kings of the Aegyptian kingdoms, according to Sir John Marsham's tables, did not reign full so long, [as the first twelve Kings of Affyria, i. e. not full 40 years a-piece] “But it must be remembered, that in the first times the Kings of Aegypt were frequently elected; and so, many times, sons did not succeed their fathers.”

According to Sir John Marsham's tables, the first twelve Kings of no one of the Aegyptian kingdoms reigned 34 years a-piece one with another. And yet these Aegyptian Kings are supposed to have reigned, when men lived to the ages of 400, 300, 200. But, as the learned writer supposes that the Romans were induced by the circumstances of their affairs to elect men, who were in the prime of life, to be their Kings, which accounts for the great length of their reigns; so doubtless he supposes, that the Aegyptians, on account of the circumstances of their affairs, elected old men to be their Kings, men of about 300, 200, or 180 years old, by which supposition the whole difficulty arising from the short reigns of the first Kings of Aegypt is removed.

I must

Vol. 2. p.
172.Gen.
xxvi.

I must here observe, that the learned writer thinks it very reasonable to believe, that the eight first Kings of Edom, who reigned between the times of Moses and Saul, might reign above 48 years a-piece, one with another, [as they are represented to have done] “because it suits very well with the length of men’s lives in these times.” Now in these times, the lives of men were not half so long as in the times of the first Egyptian Kings, who by the tables did not reign 34 years a-piece, one with another. And the difficulty which arises from the comparison will not be solved by the supposed election of the Egyptian Kings to the throne; because it is pretty evident, that the eight first Kings of Edom were elected, not one of them being the son or brother of his predecessor.

To return to the Kings of Rome: The learned writer observes,

II. That, “Between the reigns of several of the Roman Kings, there were Interregna, and that each of these Interregna might perhaps take up some years, and that the historians allot no space of time to these Interregna.”

Now Livy tells us expressly, that the Interregnum which followed the death of Romulus was of one year, and the reason he gives for its being then terminated, was the jealousy of the people, who apprehended an intension in the Senate to reduce the government to an aristocracy; a reason which would naturally operate with like force in all future Interregna.

Upon the death of Numa, the same historian^a relates that there was an Interregnum, and that when Tullus Hostilius was chosen King, but says nothing to make us think that the Interregnum lasted longer than was necessary for the ceremony of the election.

After the death of Tullus Hostilius it would seem by Livy’s^b words, that there was but one Interrex before a successor to the crown was chosen.

After the death of Ancus Martius we are told by the same^c historian, that Tarquin, who was left guardian to the sons of Ancus, brought on the election of a successor with all expedition, and got himself chosen King.

After the death of Tarquin there was no Interregnum. Nor after the death of Servius Tullius.

N. B. THE learned writer takes no notice, that most of the seven Kings of Rome were slain, and one deposed.

AS the learned writer, though the Roman Kings did not fall within the times he was to treat of, judged it proper nevertheless to take notice

^a Annuum intervallum sequi fuit. L. 1. c. 17.

^b Numa morte ad interregnum res rediit. Inde Tullum Hostiliam—Regem populus iussit. C. 22.

^c Mortuo Tullio, res, ut institutum jam inde ab initio erat, ad patres redierat, hiq; interregem nominaverant. Quo comitia ha-bente Ancum Martium regem populus creavit. C. 32.

^d Jam filii [Anci] prope puberem ætatem erant. Eo magis Tarquinus instare ut quam primum comitia regi creando fierent. Quibus indictis, sub tempus pueros venatum ablegavit. C. 35.

of what Sir Isaac Newton has remarked concerning those Kings, "Because P. xx.
 " the lengths of their reigns might be thought an undeniable instance of " the inaccuracy of the ancient computations," perhaps I may be excused, if, for a like prudential reason, I take notice of some things which the learned writer has said in support of the ancient computations, with regard to the kingdoms of Ægypt, Sicyon, and Argos. For though these computations may be true, and that concerning the duration of the regal state of Rome be nevertheless false; yet if it appears that the former cannot be supported with any shew of argument, this will certainly go a great way towards discrediting the latter, as it will give ground to suspect that the prophane Chronology regarding the most ancient times has been all conjectural and technical.

" The catalogues of Kings (says Dr. Shuckford) which our great and P. xvi.
 " learned author produces to confirm his opinion, are all of later date,
 " some of them many ages later than the times of David.

" It cannot be inferred from these reigns of Kings mentioned by Sir P. xvii.
 " Isaac Newton, that Kings did not reign, one with another; a much " longer space of time in the ages which I am concerned with, in which " men generally lived to a much greater age, than in the times out of " which Sir Isaac Newton has taken the catalogues of Kings which he " has produced.

" From Abraham down almost to David men lived, according to the " scripture accounts of the lengths of their lives, to I think at a medium
 " above 100 years, exceeding that time very much in the times near " Abraham, and seldom falling short of it, until within a generation or " two of David: But in David's time the length of human life was, at a " medium, but 70 years: Now any one that considers this difference, " must see, that the lengths of Kings reigns, as well as of generations, P. xviii.
 " must be considerably affected by it. Successions in both must come " on slower in the early ages according to the greater length of men's " lives.

" I am sensible I could produce many catalogues of successions from " father to son, to confirm what I have offered; but since there is one " which takes in almost the whole compass of the times which I am con" cerned in, and which has all the weight that the authority of the sacred
 " writers can give it, and which will bring the point in question to a clear " and indisputable conclusion, I shall for brevity's sake omit all others,
 " and offer only that to the reader's farther examination: From Abraham
 " to David (including both Abraham and David) were 14 generations:
 " Now from Abraham's birth A. M. 2008 * to David's death about A. M. * Ant. Ch.
 " 2986 † are 978 years, so that generations in these times took up one 1996.
 " with another near 70 years a piece; i. e. they were above double the † Ant. Ch.
 " length which Sir Isaac Newton computes them, and which they were (I be- 1018.
 " lieve) after the times of David. We must therefore suppose the reigns of " Kings in these ancient times to be longer than his computation in the " same proportion, and, if so, we must calculate them at above forty years
 " a-piece.

“ a-piece one with another; and so the prophane historians have recorded them to be: For according to the lists we have from Cæstor of the ancient Kings of Sicyon and Argos, the first twelve Kings of Sicyon reigned more that 44 years a-piece one with another, and the first eight Kings of Argos something above 46, as our great author has remarked.

“ But the reigns of the first twelve Kings of Sicyon extended * from A. M. 1920 to A. M. 2450, so that they began 88 years before the birth of Abraham, and ended in the times of Moses.

“ And the reigns of the first eight Kings of Argos began A. M. 2154, ended A. M. 2525, so that they reached from the latter end of Abraham's life to a few years after the exit of the Israelites out of Ægypt.

“ And let any one form a just computation of the length of mens lives in these times, and it will in no wise appear unreasonable to imagine, that the reigns of Kings were of this length in these days.

P. xix. “ I might observe, that the ancient accounts of the Kings of different kingdoms in these times agree to one another, as well as our great author's more modern catalogues, &c.”

I. W. E. see here, that the learned writer would have it granted him, and reasons all along upon the supposition that it will be granted him, that the first named Kings of Sicyon and Argos in the old catalogues, reigned in the times he is concerned with, that is, in the times of Longevity: And he seems not to be aware, that this is begging the very question in dispute, and that while he begs the question he furnishes reasons to reject his petition. He very justly advances, “ That the difference there has been in the common length of human life in the different ages of the world, must have had a considerable effect upon the length of both reigns and generations, both which must be longer or shorter in this or that age, in some measure, according to what is the common standard of the length of mens lives in the age they belong to.” But this undoubted truth furnishes an argument irresistible against the long reigns of the Kings in the catalogues abovementioned.

Sir Isaac Newton has never said, that twelve Kings of Sicyon, of whom the First began to reign in A. M. 1920 (Ant. Chr. 2084) might not reign 44 years a-piece one with another: or that eight Kings of Argos, of whom the first began to reign A. M. 2154 (Ant. Chr. 1850) might not reign 46 years a-piece: But all his reasonings tend to prove, that the kingdoms, said to have commenced at those periods, did not then commence; that Ægialeus did not begin to reign in A. M. 1920, nor Inachus in 2154, but many centuries after those dates, and in the times of short life.

F 169, 170. As to Ægialeus, Sir Isaac Newton has sufficiently shewn by authorities, that he was the son of Inachus and brother of Phoroneus, who is counted

* By this reckoning the reigns of the 12 Kings took up 530 years. But Dr. Stackford, Vol. II. p. 41. gives only 38 years a-piece to the first six Kings, the whole time 228 years: so that the second six must have reigned above 50 years a-piece one with another, the whole time 302 years.

† Mr. Whiston has made the same petition principally.

the second King of Argos; the beginning of which kingdom was consequently prior to that of Sicyon. And he has likewise shewn it to be highly probable, that Apis the 4th King of Sicyon, and Epopeus the 17th King in the catalogue, were one and the same person, and that the twelve Kings, inserted between those two names, were imaginary. The judicious Mr. Stanyan, in his Grecian History, seems much disposed to adopt this opinion. And even Mr. Whiston confesses (p. 983.) that “the series of Kings of Sicyon is more suspected by the learned, than almost any that pretends to be very ancient; and that there are not wanting some plausible arguments against it.”

I shall therefore take no further notice of the Sicyonian Kings, but apply Sir Isaac Newton's method of reasoning from the course of nature, to the succession of Kings at Argos, of whom the eight first are said to have reigned above 46 years a-piece one with another.

It is held by some learned men, that the life of man became reduced to the present standard in the time of Moses; others defer it to within a generation or two of David.

Moses at 80 years of age came out of Aegypt in the year Ant. Chr. 1491.

David dy'd, at about 70 years of age, A. M. 2986,

Ant. Chr. 1018. He was therefore born about——Ant. Chr. 1087.

The time between the Exodus and the birth of David is 404 years.

Let us take the middle number, 202, and add it to 1087, and this will carry us back to——Ant. Chr. 1289.

During these 1289 years, preceding the Christian Æra, we are authorized by Sir Isaac's catalogues to compute (when there is no certainty) the reigns of any considerable number of Kings in succession at about 20 years a-piece one with another.

Let us then accept Sir Isaac's allowance of 340 years (instead of 622) for the reigns of the 17 Kings, ending with Leonidas, who was slain in the year Ant. Chr. 480.

If to these 480 years we add the 340, this will carry us back to the year 820 Ant. Chr. the time of the return of the Heracrides into Peloponnesus, and the beginning of the reign of Eurysthenes the first of the 17 Kings of Sparta of that race.

It is generally admitted, that the beginning of the reign of Eurysthenes, (who ejected * Tisamenus, the son of Orestes and grandson of Agamemnon) was 80 years after the Fall of Troy. These 80 years being added to the 820, we are got to the year 900 before Christ, the year when Troy was taken.

Agamemnon King of Mycenæ (who was slain just upon his return from Troy) is given us for the 19th King in succession from Inachus, the first King of Argos, (Perseus the 15th King of Argos having removed the regal seat from Argos to Mycenæ.)

* N. B. Tisamenus was King of Argos, Mycenæ, and Sparta, when the Heracrides de-throned him.

Now supposing all these 19 Kings in succession to have really * existed, yet if we allow them but 20 years a-piece one with another (and there is no reason to allow them more, for we are not yet got to the times of Longevity) the sum will be 380, which being added to 900, carries us back to the year 1280 before Christ, about which time we have supposed the life of man to have been first reduced to the present standard. And this brings down the commencement of the kingdom of Argos 570 years later than where it is placed by the old Chronology.

BUT as we have here supposed, what perhaps many persons will not grant, that the life of man was brought to the present standard 202 years before the birth of David, let us fix the date of this abbreviation of human life at only 40 years before David's birth, and then it will be in the year before Christ 1127. This is I think as low a date as any body contends for; at least Dr. Stuckford will be content with it.

Of the 19 Kings it will require 11, at about 20½ years a-piece, to carry us up from the death of Agamemnon (which, by the foregoing computation, happened about the year before Christ 900) to the 40th year before David's birth, Ant. Chr. 1127: and consequently, if we will adhere to the pretended date of the commencement of the kingdom of Argos, viz. Ant. Chr. 1850 (or A. M. 2154) we must suppose the 8 first Kings to have reigned above 90 years a-piece one with another, and their reigns to have taken up 723 years; for this is the number that must be added to 1127 to make 1850.

But if the 8 first Kings of Argos reigned 90 years a-piece one with another, what the learned writer advances in the following passage concerning monuments, stone-pillars and inscriptions, can have no foundation.

* Mr. Stanyan mentions the following Kings of Argos, as said to have reigned in succession.

Inachus, Phoroneus, Apis, Argus, Criasus, Phorbas, Iafus, Crtepus. But as to Apis, he tells us (p. 19.) it is not generally assented to, that there was such a King of Argos. And in p. 22. he has these words: "As Iafus is not generally reckoned in the number of these Kings, so it is doubted whether Phorbas and his son Triopas ought not to be excluded, it being said that they fled from Argos to the island of Rhodes: And the same doubt has been raised concerning Crtepus, because he is likewise said to have left Argos and to have built a new city for himself in Megaris."

I observe that Sir Isaac Newton (p. 170.) by placing the beginning of the reign of Phoroneus, the second King of Argos, about the 12th of Samuel, or Ant. Chr. 1088, supposes, that at least eight or nine of the Kings in the Argive catalogue were fictitious. In p. 172. he has these words: "Acusilaus wrote, that Phoroneus was older than Ogyges, and that Ogyges flourished 1020 years before the first Olympiad.—But Acusilaus was an Argive, and feigned these things in honour of his country.—Inachus might be as old as Ogyges, but Acusilaus and his followers made them 700 years older than the truth; and Chronologers, to make out this reckoning, have lengthened the reces of the Kings of Argos and Sicyon, and changed several contemporary princes of Argos into successive Kings, and inserted many feigned Kings into the race of the Kings of Sicyon." If Sir Isaac Newton had not cut off eight or nine of the Kings of Argos, he could not have placed Phoroneus so late as 1088 by his own method of computation.

" As

“ As to our illustrious author’s arguments from the length of reigns : Pref. p. liv.
 “ I might have observed that it is introduced upon a supposition which “ can never be allowed, namely, that the ancient Chronologers did not “ give us the several reigns of their Kings as they took them from authentick “ records, but that they made the lengths of them by artificial computa- “ tions, calculated according to what they thought the reigns of such a “ number of Kings as they had to set down, would at a medium one “ with another amount to : this certainly never was fact ; but as Acusilaus, “ a most ancient historian mentioned by our most illustrious author, “ wrote his genealogies out of tables of brass, so it is by far most “ probable that all the other genealogists, who have given us the lengths “ of lives or reigns of their Kings or Heroes, took their accounts either “ from monuments, stone-pillars, or ancient inscriptions, or from other an- “ tiquaries of unsuspected fidelity, who had faithfully examined such origi- “ nals.”

To this I further answer,

I. If these genealogists were so faithful and had such good vouchers, whence came “ those repugnances in their chronological canons (men“ tioned by Plutarch) which hundreds of authors correcting have not “ been able to constitute any thing certain in which they could agree ?”
 For instance, how came Ægialeus, King of Sicyon, to be, according to some chronologers, 234 years, and, according to others, above 500 years older than Phoroneus King of Argos, when “ Acusilaus, Anticlides, and Plato See Sir I.
 “ accounted Phoroneus the oldest King in Greece ; and Apollodorus tells us, N. Chron.
 “ Ægialeus was the brother of Phoroneus ?” p. 169.

II. Dr. Shuckford, in another part of his work, seems to admit that the Ancients made use of an artificial chronology ; as appears by the following passage, vol. I. p. 207.

1. “ He [Sir John Marsham] observes from Diodorus, that Menes was “ succeeded by fifty-two Kings whose reigns all together took up the space “ of above 1400 years. In all which time the Ægyptians had done nothing “ worth the recording in history.

2. “ He supposes these 1400 years to end at Sesostris ; for Herodotus is “ express that the first illustrious actions were done in Ægypt in the time “ of Sesostris ; before Sesostris, says he, they had done nothing famous ;
 “ and Diodorus says that Sesostris performed the most illustrious actions far “ exceeding all before him.

3. “ He supposes, with Josephus, that this Sesostris was Sesac who besieg“ ed Jerusalem in the 5th year of Reboam, King of Judah, about A. M.
 “ 3033.

“ The only difficulty in this argumentation will be, that it places Me- “ nes or Mizraim, above a century earlier than his true age ; for if we “ reckon backward 1400 years, from the year before named [3033] in “ which Sesac besieged Jerusalem, we shall place Mizraim A. M. 1633, “ i. e. 23 years before the flood, and 139 years earlier than the true time “ of his reign, which began,—A. M. 1772 ; but this difficulty may be “ easily

Remarks on the History

“ easily cleared: The number 1400 years is a mistake: Diodorus says “ expressly, that there were but 52 Kings ^a from Menes to the time where “ Sesoftris’s reign is supposed to begin; and according to Sir John Marsham’s “ tables of the Theban Kings, from Menes to Sesoftris is but 1370 years, “ though we suppose Sesoftris the 55th King from Menes, and even this “ number is too great, if, as Diodorus computes, there were fifty-two “ Kings only.

“ The Ancients generally allowed about 36 years and a half to the reign “ of a King [when they made use of an artificial chronology] and therefore “ if we deduct 3 times 36 years and an half, or about 110 years from “ 1370 (the number of years between Menes and Sesoftris, according to “ Sir John Marsham’s tables) I say, if we deduct 3 times 36 years and “ an half, or about 110 years, (supposing those tables to have the names “ of 3 Kings too many, the number of Kings being, according to Dio- “ dorus, 52, and not 55) we shall then make the space of time between “ Menes and Sesoftris about 1260 years; and so it really is according to “ the Hebrew chronology, Menes beginning his Reign, as we before said, “ Anno mundi 1772; and Sesoftris or Sesac besieging Jerusalem in the 5th
 “ year of Rehoboam Anno mundi 3033.”

I cannot but observe here, that the learned writer, who in imitation of the Ancients, makes use of an artificial chronology, has in the present instance employed it somewhat unluckily; for supposing he might have allowed 110 years to 3 reigns in any other succession of ancient Kings, he has no right to make that allowance here, where the reigns of the 52 Kings filling only 1260 years, they could reign but about 24 years a-piece one with another. And indeed the shortness of these reigns furnishes a good argument against that Catalogue of fifty-two Kings, as well as Diodorus’s 80 Kings) and against the learned writer’s opinion concerning the ancient chronologers, That they took their successions of Kings, and the numbers of years which each of them reigned, from AUTHENTICK RECORDS.

For is it not highly incredible that 52 Egyptian Kings beginning with Mizraim, and reaching thro’ the times of longevity from A. M. 1772 to 3033, should reign but 3 or 4 years a-piece one with another longer than the like number of successive Kings in modern kingdoms? a consideration that seems sufficient to overthrow all imaginary tables of brass, stone-pillars, monuments, inscriptions, &c. recording the succession of those 52 Kings or 55 Kings between Mizraim and Sesoftris ^b.

Or, if it be credible that the reigns of 52 Kings of Egypt in succession from Mizraim took up but 1260 years, is it not improbable that the

^a “ According to Diodorus, Sesoftris was “ about 80 successions after Menes or Miz- “ raim. Diodorus must indeed have made a “ mistake in this computation, for from the “ death of Menes A. M. 1943, to Sesac about

“ A. M. 3033 are but 1090 years, and 55 “ successions may very well carry us down
 “ thus far, &c.” Pref. p. xxxi. Vol. II.
^b See in p. xlix. the citation from Mr: Whiston.

reigns of 39 * Kings in succession, from Inachus, took up 1370 years; that if the former Kings reigned but about 24 years a-piece one with another, the latter should reign 35: especially, if we consider that the reign of Mizraim is supposed to have begun 382 years before the reign of Inachus, and but 116 years after the flood?

Arphaxad was coeval with Mizraim. Now had Arphaxad established a kingdom A. M. 1772, and the crown had gone in lineal descent, it is probable, there would not have been more than 15 Kings in 1260 years, ^{Ant. Chr. 2232.} i. e. from the beginning of Arphaxad's reign to the time of Sesostris, who was contemporary with Solomon. For from Arphaxad to Solomon (both included) there were but 23 generations: and, during the first nine generations, there would have been but three Kings, Arphaxad, Salab, and Eber: For Eber outlived Abraham, the 7th in descent from him.

And it is to be observed, that these THREE reigns would have taken up 415 years, (there being from A. M. 1772 to A. M. 2187, the year when Eber died, exactly that number) whereas in no series of Egyptian reigns in Sir John Marsham's tables, do the TWELVE first take up more than 407 years.

And as to the 14 generations, beginning with Isaac and ending with Solomon, it is probable, they would not have furnished more than 12 Kings: For while the life of man was shortening from 180 years to 70, fathers would frequently outlive their sons, and the reigns would be fewer than the generations.

But supposing a King for each of the 14 generations from Isaac to Solomon, (both included) the whole number of Kings in 1260 years from Arphaxad to Solomon, would have been but 17.

That the reigns of 52 Kings in succession from Mizraim should take up no longer a space of time, than 23 generations from Arphaxad, has surely at first sight an appearance of improbability. How far the difficulty may be solved by the suppositions of Election, Rebellion, and King-killing, I shall leave to the reader to consider.

BUT, in the passage above cited (from pref. p. xix.) the learned writer, to support the credit of the old chronologers, observes farther, that "the ancient accounts of the Kings of different kingdoms agree to one another as well as Sir Isaac Newton's more modern catalogues."

Yes, in some instances, they agree so well, as by their agreement to discover their Technical original. For the 22 first Kings of Thebes, in Sir John Marsham's tables, take up but 676 years, and the 21 Kings of Alba and Rome take up just the same number, tho' the first are supposed to have reigned in the times when men lived to the ages of 400, 300, 200, 120, and the other when the life of man was shortened to 70 years.

* The 19 Kings ending with Agamemnon, ending with Leonidas make up the 39: They the 3 between Agamemnon and Eurysthenes, reign from Ant. Chr. 1850, to Ant. Chr. 480. and the 17 beginning with Eurysthenes and

So, in the times of SHORT LIFE, the twelve Kings of Macedonia, from Caranus to Archelaus, reign $34\frac{1}{2}$ years a-piece. And the eight last of the Latine Kings, from Amulius to Tarquin the proud, reign $35\frac{3}{4}$.

And in the times of LONG LIFE, the twelve first Kings of Assyria reign about 40 years a-piece one with another.

How can these things be made to square with that principle, laid down by the learned writer (Pref. p. xv.) that “the difference there has been “in the common length of human life, in the different ages of the world, “must have had a considerable effect upon the length of reigns, which “must be longer or shorter in this or that age in some measure, accord“ing to what is the common standard of the length of mens lives in the “age they belong to?”

I should think that the great mistake of the annalists who wrote of the first ages after the flood is not in allowing so many as 100 or 120 years to three reigns, but in not allowing more*. They seem to have known nothing of the fact, that mens lives extended to so great a length, during some centuries after the flood, as they are represented to do in Scripture: For had they known this, surely they would never have made their accounts of Kings reigns in the earlier and later ages agree so well together.

Pref. p.
xxii. to p.
liii.

p. lii.

As to the long argumentation which the learned writer has employed in support of Ctesias's chronolgy of the Assyrian monarchs, against Sir Isaac Newton's objections, I shall not enter into any consideration of it; because to my apprehension the learned writer does not seem to be quite satisfied with it himself; nor to have a very advantageous opinion of Ctesias. “We find (says he) from Scripture, that after Abraham's defeating his “armies” [the armies of Chedorlaomer] “the Assyrian Kings appear not “to have had any dominion over the nations between the Mediterranean
“and the Euphrates: This indeed seems to confine the Assyrian empire “within narrower bounds, than can well agree with the accounts which “the heathen writers give of it; but then it is remarkable, that these “enlarged accounts come from hands comparatively modern. Diodorus “informs us, that he took his from Ctesias; Ctesias might have the num“ber of his ancient Assyrian Kings from the Persian chronicles; but as all “writers have agreed to ascribe no great actions to any of them, from after “Ninus to Sardanapalus; so it appears most reasonable to imagine, that “the Persian registries made but a very short mention of them,” [probably none at all;] “for ancient registries afforded but little history, and “therefore I suspect, that Ctesias's estimate of the ancient Assyrian grandeur

* The fourteen first Egyptian Kings of Thebes are said to have reigned 414 years, i. e. from A. M. 1772 to 2186, or till three years after the death of Abraham, (who died at the age of 175) and tho' they lived in these times of longevity, yet they reigned but 29 years some months a-piece; they are not made to reign so long as the 14 Latine Kings, after the fall of Troy, which is supposed to have happened A. M. 2820, 634 years after the last of the fourteen Egyptian Kings.

“ was rather formed from what he knew to be true of the Persian empire, “ than taken from any authentick accounts of the ancient Affyrian.”

And Mr. Whiston says (p. 980.) “ I desire not to be misunderstood in “ this place as if I believed all the strange stories of Ctesias either as to the “ beginning or ending of this Affyrian kingdom. I do not depend upon “ such legendary relations.—I have not here set down the several years “ which each of these Kings [in all 32 from Belus to Sardanapalus out of “ Moses Chorenensis] reigned, because it must be acknowledged that the “ copies differ much about them; and I suspect several mistakes in those “ particular numbers of successions and of years, tho’ the general sum of
“ the years, within a little more than a century, is well attested by the “ ancients.”

NOR shall I meddle with Sir Isaac Newton’s astronomical argument for fixing the time of the Argonautick expedition, (and of course the time of the fall of Troy, which was only one generation later) from the position of the solstitial and equinoctial points on the sphere which Chiron made for the use of the Argonauts. I am too little acquainted with the science of Astronomy to speak pertinently on the subject. I shall only observe that Mr. Whiston does not agree with Dr. Stuckford concerning the grounds of the argument.

“ The fallacy of this argument (says Dr. Stuckford) cannot but appear Pref. p. iii.
“ very evident to any one that attends to it: for suppose we allow that “ Chiron did really place the solstices, as Sir Isaac Newton represents, (tho’
“ I should think it most probable that he did not so place them) yet it “ must be undeniably plain, that nothing can be certainly established “ from Chiron’s position of them, unless it appears, that Chiron knew how “ to give them their true place.

—“ If indeed it could be known what was the true place of the solstitial P. vi.
“ points in Chiron’s time, it might be known, by taking the distance of “ that place from the present position of them, how much time was elapsed “ from Chiron to our days.

“ But I answer, it cannot be accurately known from any schemes of “ Chiron what was the true place of the solstices in his days; because, “ tho’ it is said that he calculated the then position of them, yet he was “ so inaccurate an astronomer, that his calculation might err four or five “ degrees from their true position.”

Mr. Whiston (p. 991.) writes thus:

“ As to the first argument from the place of the two colures in Eudoxus
“ from Chiron the Argonaut, preserved by Hipparchus of Bithynia, I rea“ dily allow its foundations to be true, that Eudoxus’s sphere was the same with “ Chiron’s, and that it was first made and shewed Hercules and the rest of “ the Argonauts in order to guide them in their voyage to Colchis. And I “ take the discovery of this sure astronomical criterion of the true time of that “ Argonautick expedition (in the defect of eclipses) to be highly worthy
“ the uncommon sagacity of the great Sir Isaac Newton, and in its own “ nature a chronological character truly inestimable. Nor need we, I “ think.

“ think, any stronger argument in order to overturn Sir Isaac Newton's “ own chronology, than this position of the colures at the time of “ that expedition, which its proposer has very kindly furnished us “ withal.”

In p. 996: “ I now proceed to Eudoxus's accurate description of the “ position of the two colures, as they had been drawn on their celestial “ globes, ever since the days of Cleomedes, at the Argonautick expedition, “ and as Hipparchus has given us that description in the words of “ Eudoxus.”

Again (p. 1002.) “ Sir Isaac Newton betrays his consciousness how “ little Eudoxus's description or Cleomedes's colures agreed to his position of “ them, by pretending that these observations of the Ancients were coarse “ and inaccurate. This is true if compared with the observations of the “ Moderns which reach to minutes; and, since the application of Tele- “ scopick sights to Astronomical instruments, to ten or fewer seconds. But “ as to our present purpose this description in Eudoxus is very accurate, “ it both taking notice of every constellation, through which each of the “ colures passed, that were visible in Greece: and hardly admitting of an “ error of half a degree in angular measures, or 36 years in time. Which “ is justly exact.”

How far Mr. Whiston has succeeded in his argumentation about the Neck of the Swan and the Tail of the Bear, &c. I must leave to others to consider. I shall only observe, with regard to the last paragraph cited from his discourse, that when Sir Isaac Newton calls the observations of the ancient astronomers coarse, he cannot well be understood to use that word, but in a comparative sense, that sense in which Mr. Whiston admits it may be justly used. For otherwise Sir Isaac would not have inferred any thing, as CERTAIN, from those ancient observations. Now, in p. 95, after he has finished his argument from Chiron's sphere, he thus writes:

“ Hesiod tells us, that sixty days after the winter solstice, the star Arc- “ turus rose at sun-set: and thence it follows, that Hesiod flourished about “ 100 years after the death of Solomon, or in the generation or age next
 “ after the Trojan war, as Hesiod himself declares.

“ From all these circumstances, grounded upon the COARSE observa“ tions of the ancient astronomers, we may reckon it CERTAIN, that the “ Argonautick expedition was not earlier than the reign of Solomon: and if “ these astronomical arguments be added to the former arguments taken “ from the mean length of the reigns of Kings according to the course of “ nature; from them all we may safely conclude, that the Argonautick ex“ pedition was after the death of Solomon, and most probably that it was “ about 43 years after.

“ The Trojan war was one generation later than that expedition—— “ several captains of the Greeks in that war being sons of the Argonauts,
 “ &c.”

By

By the last words here cited, I am brought round again to the point, from whence I set out in this discourse, the Fall of Troy; the time of which event, if it be rightly settled, or pretty near the truth, by Sir Isaac Newton, the received chronology of the regal state of Rome is totally discredited and overturned. For then the whole space of time, between the taking of Troy and the expulsion of Tarquin the Proud, will not have been above 400 years; and of these no-body, I imagine, will be inclined to give 244 to the 7 Kings of Rome, most of whom were slain, and but 156 to the 14 Latine Kings their predecessors.

To the probable arguments brought by Sir Isaac for shortening the duration of the regal state, I have added another, taken from certain traditions which prevailed among the Romans, and of which the chronology, framed afterwards, was not able to destroy the belief, though the truth of those traditions was incompatible with the truth of that chronology.

And I have shewn, that in the Roman story there are other particulars repugnant to the received chronology, but perfectly consistent with Sir Isaac Newton's computations.

Tradition and the earliest Roman historians said,

1. That Numa was contemporary with Pythagoras.
2. That Tarquin the Proud was the son of Tarquin the Elder.
3. That Tarquin the Proud was at the head of his army, and fought on horseback in his last battle with the Romans [about 14 years after his expulsion.]
4. That Collatinus, the husband of Lucretia, and created Consul on the expulsion of Tarquin the Proud, was the son of Egerius, nephew of Tarquin the Elder.

Now all these Facts are inconsistent with the old chronology; and for this reason, and this alone, Dionysius rejects them. Livy, aware of the inconsistency, adheres nevertheless to the three last of these facts, and speaks of the first in such a manner as to make one think he really believed that too. So that he seems to have had little faith in the received chronology, though he durst not openly and expressly contradict it.

On the other hand, all those facts are consistent with Sir Isaac Newton's computations, which shorten the reigns of the Kings. And the same computations being admitted, we get rid of other difficulties.

1. We see plainly, why the historians could give no account of any thing done by Romulus after the 17th year of his reign, while they tell us that he reigned 37 years.
2. By shortening the duration of Numa's peaceful and religious reign, we can account for that martial disposition, which the Romans still retained, when Tullus Hostilius came to the throne.
3. If we shorten the reigns of Tullus Hostilius, Ancus Marcius, and Tarquinius Priscus, we are at no loss for a reason why three such ambitious and active Princes did so little.

4. By cutting off about 24 years of the 44 given to the reign of Scrvius Tullius we can explain, how it came to pass that there were no more than four lustra in his time; which otherwise seems very difficult to be accounted for.

It surely cannot be denied, that there is a great coincidence of circumstances to support Sir Isaac Newton's computations; and that his computations, if admitted, render credible many historical facts, which are incredible so long as we adhere to the old chronology.

A writer, not less distinguished for his depth of thought and logical exactness, than for his amiable, benevolent fairness in argument, observes, "That evidence arising from various coincidences, which confirm and support each other, is that kind of evidence upon which most questions of difficulty in common practice are determined.—And that probable proofs, by being added, not only increase the evidence, but multiply it."

Supposing it easy to shew, that in the present argument, (consisting of Sir Isaac Newton's reasons, and those I have added to them) this or that particular thing, offered in proof, is liable to objection, and of little weight in itself; yet the united force of all the particulars, in one view, may perhaps be irresistible; and certainly the conclusion we make from a view of the particulars, ought to be such as results from their united force.

THE

THE Roman History.
 FIRST BOOK.

THE REGAL STATE of ROME.

C H A P. I.

Of the Original of the Romans, and the Building of Rome.

SECT. I. The first Romans were of Trojan extraction. §. II. Æneas's voyage to Italy. §. III. The ancient inhabitants of that country. §. IV. Æneas's reception by Latinus, King of Latium. He marries Lavinia the daughter of Latinus, and builds Lavinium. §. V. He succeeds to the Kingdom of his father-in-law. §. VI. The death of Æneas, who is succeeded by his son Ascanius. §. VII. Ascanius founds Alba Longa, and yields Lavinium to Æneas Sylvius, the son of Æneas by Lavinia. §. VIII. The Latines upon the death of Ascanius unite Lavinium and Alba into one DOMINION, which they decree to Æneas Sylvius, but give the sovereign power in affairs of Religion to Iulus the son of Ascanius. §. IX. The succession of the Kings of Alba from Æneas Sylvius to Amulius, who dethrone his elder brother Numitor. §. X. The birth, education, and adventures of Romulus and Remus. They dethrone Amulius, and restore their Grandfather Numitor. §. XI. Numitor sends his two grandsons to plant a colony. They quarrel about the spot of ground where the new city shall stand. Remus is slain. §. XII. ROME is BUILT.

Bef. J. C.
753.

C H A P. II.

R O M U L U S.

§. I. Romulus is chosen King of Rome. §. II. He puts on a robe of distinction, and appoints 12 LICTORS to attend him. §. III. He divides his colony into 3 TRIBES, and these into 30 Curiae. §. IV. He distinguishes the people

Y. of R. 1.
TRIBES.
CURIAE.

“ as to our present purpose this assertion in itself is very accurate, “ it both taking notice of every consideration through which each of the “ columns sailed, that were visible in Ceylon and hardly admitting of an “ error of half a degree in angular measures, or 36 years in time. Which “ is perfectly exact.”

How far Mr. Whiston has succeeded in his argumentation about the Neck of the Swan and the Tail of the Bear, &c. I must leave to others to consider. I shall only observe, with regard to the last paragraph cited from his discourse, that when Sir Isaac Newton calls the observations of the ancient astronomers coarse, he cannot well be understood to use that word, but in a comparative sense, that sense in which Mr. Whiston admits it may be justly used. For otherwise Sir Isaac would not have inferred any thing, as CERTAIN, from those ancient observations. Now, in p. 95, after he has finished his argument from Chiron's sphere, he thus writes:

“ Hesiod tells us, that sixty days after the winter solstice, the star Arcturus rose at sun-set: and thence it follows, that Hesiod flourished about “ 100 years after the death of Solomon, or in the generation or age next
“ after the Trojan war, as Hesiod himself declares.

“ From all these circumstances, grounded upon the COARSE observa“ tions of the ancient astronomers, we may reckon it CERTAIN, that the “ Argonautick expedition was not earlier than the reign of Solomon: and if “ these astronomical arguments be added to the former arguments taken “ from the mean length of the reigns of Kings according to the course of “ nature; from them all we may scarcely conclude, that the Argonautick ex“ pedition was after the death of Solomon, and most probably that it was “ about 43 years after.

“ The Trojan war was one generation later than that expedition—“ several captains of the Greeks in that war being sons of the Argonauts,
“ &c.”

By

And I have shewn, that in the Roman story there are other particulars repugnant to the received chronology, but perfectly consistent with Sir Isaac Newton's computations.

Tradition and the earliest Roman historians said,

1. That Numa was contemporary with Pythagoras.
2. That Tarquin the Proud was the son of Tarquin the Elder.
3. That Tarquin the Proud was at the head of his army, and fought on horseback in his last battle with the Romans [about 14 years after his expulsion.]
4. That Collatinus, the husband of Lucretia, and created Consul on the expulsion of Tarquin the Proud, was the son of Egerius, nephew of Tarquin the Elder.

Now all these Facts are inconsistent with the old chronology; and for this reason, and this alone, Dionysius rejects them. Livy, aware of the inconsistency, adheres nevertheless to the three last of these facts, and speaks of the first in such a manner as to make one think he really believed that too. So that he seems to have had little faith in the received chronology, though he durst not openly and expressly contradict it.

On the other hand, all those facts are consistent with Sir Isaac Newton's computations, which shorten the reigns of the Kings. And the same computations being admitted, we get rid of other difficulties.

1. We see plainly, why the historians could give no account of any thing done by Romulus after the 17th year of his reign, while they tell us that he reigned 37 years.

2. By shortening the duration of Numa's peaceful and religious reign, we can account for that martial disposition, which the Romans still retained, when Tullus Hostilius came to the throne.

3. If we shorten the reigns of Tullus Hostilius, Ancus Marcius, and Tarquinius Priscus, we are at no loss for a reason why three such ambitious and active Princes did so little.

VOL. I.

f

4. By

4. By cutting off about 24 years of the 44 given to the reign of Servius Tullius we can explain, how it came to pass that there were no more than four lustra in his time; which otherwise seems very difficult to be accounted for.

It surely cannot be denied, that there is a great coincidence of circumstances to support Sir Izaak Newton's computations; and that his computations, if admitted, render credible many historical facts, which are incredible so long as we adhere to the old chronology.

A writer, not less distinguished for his depth of thought and logical exactness, than for his amiable, benevolent fairness in argument, observes, "That evidence arising from various coincidences, which confirm and support each other, is that kind of evidence upon which most questions of difficulty in common practice are determined.—And that probable proofs, by being added, not only increase the evidence, but multiply it."

Supposing it easy to shew, that in the present argument, (consisting of Sir Izaak Newton's reasons, and those I have added to them) this or that particular thing, offered in proof, is liable to objection, and of little weight in itself; yet the united force of all the particulars, in one view, may perhaps be irresistible; and certainly the conclusion we make from a view of the particulars, ought to be such as results from their united force.

THE

T H E

Roman History.

F I R S T B O O K.

T H E

REGAL STATE of ROME.

C H A P. I.

Of the Original of the Romans, and the Building of Rome.

SECT. I. The first Romans were of Trojan extraction. §. II. Æneas's voyage to Italy. §. III. The ancient inhabitants of that country. §. IV. Æneas's reception by Latinus, King of Latium. He marries Lavinia the daughter of Latinus, and builds Lavinium. §. V. He succeeds to the Kingdom of his father-in-law. §. VI. The death of Æneas, who is succeeded by his son Ascanius. §. VII. Ascanius founds Alba Longa, and yields Lavinium to Æneas Sylvius, the son of Æneas by Lavinia. §. VIII. The Latines upon the death of Ascanius unite Lavinium and Alba into one DOMINION, which they decree to Æneas Sylvius, but give the sovereign power in affairs of Religion to Iulus the son of Ascanius. §. IX. The succession of the Kings of Alba from Æneas Sylvius to Amulius, who dethrone his elder brother Numitor. §. X. The birth, education, and adventures of Romulus and Remus. They dethrone Amulius, and restore their Grandfather Numitor. §. XI. Numitor sends his two grandsons to plant a colony. They quarrel about the spot of ground where the new city shall stand. Remus is slain. §. XII. ROME is BUILT. Bef. J. C. 753.

C H A P. II.

R O M U L U S.

§. I. Romulus is chosen King of Rome. §. II. He puts on a robe of distinction, and appoints 12 LICTORS to attend him. §. III. He divides his colony into 3 TRIBES, and these into 30 Curiae. §. IV. He distinguishes the people Y. of R. 1. TRIBES. CURIAE.

- PATRONS. into PATRICIANS and PLEBEIANS, PATRONS and CLIENTS. §. V. He constitutes a SENATE. §. VI. He appoints himself a guard of 300 horsemen called Celeres. §. VII. He settles the respective prerogatives of the King, Senate, and People. §. VIII. The religious laws of Romulus. §. IX. His civil laws. §. X. To augment his colony, he opens an Asylum for fugitive slaves and out-laws. XI. The rape of the Sabine women. §. XII. The Sabines endeavour to recover their women by a treaty. In the mean time Romulus defeats the Cœninenſes, ſlays Acron their King in ſingle combat, and decrees himſelf a TRIUMPH for his victory. He reduces Crustuminiſm and Antemnæ, and gains other advantages. §. XIII. Romulus's war with the Sabines. §. XIV. He concludes a peace with them, and admits Titus Tatius, their King, to be his partner on the throne. The followers of Tatius are transported to Rome, and become one people with the Romans. §. XV. Tatius creates 100 new Senators choſen out of the Sabines. The creation of the firſt ROMAN KNIGHTS. The feſtival of the MATRONALIA inſtituted. §. XVI. The death of Tatius. §. XVII. Romulus defeats the Camerini, Fidenates, and Veientes. He renounces the kingdom of Alba upon the death of Numitor. §. XVIII. The murder of Romulus by the Senate, and the artifice of Julius Proculus to appeaſe the people.
- Y. of R. 16. 37. 55.

C H A P. III.

N U M A.

- Interreg- §. I. The death of Romulus is followed by an Interregnum. A de-
num. ſcription of that ſort of government. The people grow weary of it; whereupon it is unanimouſly reſolved to choſe a KING. §. II. The character of Numa
40. Pompilius, a Sabine philoſopher. §. III. He is elected to ſucceed Romulus; but is with difficulty perſuaded to accept of the kingdom. He conſults the will of the Gods by augury. §. IV. Numa is no ſooner upon the throne, than he applies himſelf to quiet the diſſentions at Rome, and to moderate the warlike order of the Romans by the impreſſions of Religion. §. V. He divides the mi- Ministers niſters of Religion into eight claſſes. The Curiones, Flamines, Celeres, Au-
of Reli- gurs. §. VI. Veſtals. §. VII. Salii. §. VIII. Feciales. §. IX. Pon- gion. tifices. §. X. He directs an eſpecial reverence to be paid to the God Janus; and makes a Goddeſs of Bona Fides. §. XI. He introduces a new ſort of Gods, called Terminii or Boundaries. §. XII. He amends ſome of Romulus's laws; and makes new ones. §. XIII. He ſends away the idle ſoldiery to cultivate the lands conquered by Romulus. §. XIV. He diſtributes the citizens into diſtinct companies, according to their trades. §. XV. He reforms the ca- 72. lendar. §. XVI. Numa dies, and his books are buried with him.

C H A P. IV.

TULLUS HOSTILIUS.

- 73. §. I. Tullus Hoſtilius, a man of a generous and martial diſpoſition, is elected by the Romans to ſucceed Numa. §. II. The rivalſhip between Rome and Alba

Alba for superiority. §. III. The dispute is decided by the famous combat between the three Horatii and the three Curiatii, in which the latter are all slain, and two of the former. §. IV. The surviving Horatius, returning to the city, in triumph, stabs his own sister, for reproaching him with the death of her lover. He is tried by the Duumviri, and condemned to die. He appeals to the People, and they mitigate the sentence. §. V. Tullus, in conjunction with the Albans, engages in a war against the Veientes, and defeats them. The treachery of the Albans. Tullus demolishes Alba, and transplants the inhabitants to Rome. §. VI. He vanquishes the Fidenates, Sabines, and Latines; and institutes the Saturnalia. §. VII. In his old age, he falls into superstition, and studies magick. He is assassinated in his own palace.

Horatii and Curi-atii.

APPEAL to the PEOPLE.

Alba destroyed.

113.

C H A P. V.

ANCUS MARCIUS.

§. I. Ancus Marcius, the grandson of Numa, is chosen to succeed Tullus Hostilius. He declares war against the Latines in all the forms prescribed by Numa. He vanquishes the enemy in several battles, and takes many of their towns. §. II. He strengthens Rome by new fortifications, and builds Ostia at the mouth of the Tiber. He defeats the Fidenates, Sabines, Veientes, and Volsci. §. III. He dies, leaving two sons under the tuition of Lucius Tarquinius, a foreigner from Hetruria, who had settled at Rome.

114.

Ostia
built.

139.

C H A P. VI.

TARQUINIUS PRISCUS.

§. I. The politick management of Tarquinius to obtain the kingdom. He is elected King, and adds to the Senate 100 new Senators chosen out of the Plebeians. §. II. The Latines renew the war against the Romans. Tarquin, by repeated victories over them, reduces them to sue for peace. At his return to Rome, he builds a Circus for the Roman games. §. III. He totally subdues the 12 Lucumonies of Hetruria. §. IV. He applies himself to cleanse and beautify Rome. §. V. He renews the war with the Sabines. He increases the number of the Roman Knights. The adventure of Navius the Augur. §. VI. Tarquin subdues the Sabines. §. VII. He marks out the area of a temple to Jupiter, Juno, and Minerva, on the hill Tarpeius, afterwards called the Capitol. §. VIII. The sons of Ancus conspire the death of Tarquin. He is assassinated in his own palace. The stratagem of Queen Tanaquil, to secure the kingdom to her son-in-law, who takes possession of it, without being legally elected to the throne.

100 Plebeians brought into the Senate.

Navius, Augur.

174.

C H A P. VII.

SERVIUS TULLIUS.

§. I. The birth and education of Servius Tullius. The honours he pays to the Goddess Fortune upon his elevation to the Throne. §. II. The Patricians conspire

- conspire to dispossess him. He gains the people to his interest, is legally elected King by the Curiae, and though the Senate refuses to confirm this election, keeps possession. §. III. Servius defeats the rebellious Hetrurians. He enlarges Rome, and adds a fourth Tribe to the three old ones. He institutes the Comitia in favour of slaves. He divides the Roman territory with its inhabitants into Tribes. He marries his two daughters to Lucius Tarquinius and Aruns, the grandsons of the late King. He subdues the Hetrurians. §. IV. Servius divides the Roman citizens into six CLASSES, and these into CENTURIES. He institutes the CENSUS and the LUSTRUM, and coins money. §. V. He gives the LIBERTI or Freedmen the privilege of Roman Citizens. §. VI. He reforms the Regal Power, and executes a scheme for securing to the Romans the safety and friendship of the Latines and Sabines. §. VII. The wicked intrigues of Tarquin and the younger Tullia. Tarquin accuses the King of usurpation before the Senate. Servius pleads his cause there, but appeals to the People, and is by them confirmed on the throne. §. VIII. Tarquin regains the King's favour by submissions, but soon after causes him to be murdered, and seizes the kingdom.

C H A P. VIII.

TARQUINIUS SUPERBUS.

- §. I. The tyranny of Tarquin, who gets the surname of the PROUD. His haughty treatment of the Latine Deputies and treacherous contrivance to destroy Turnus Herdonius. §. II. The Latine association, and the institution of the FERIAE LATINAE. Tarquin assisted by the Latines defeats the Volscians. He subdues the Sabines. He finishes the COMMON SEWERS and CIRCUS MAXIMUS at Rome. §. III. His war with the people of Gabii, and the cruel stratagem whereby he becomes master of that city. §. IV. The adventure of the woman with the SYBIL'S BOOKS. The rise of the written civil law. Tarquin builds the temple of JUPITER CAPITOLINUS. §. V. He sends two of his sons with Brutus to consult the oracle at Delphos. §. VI. The rape of LUCRETIA. The Tarquins are banished, and a COMMON-WEALTH established at Rome, under TWO CONSULS to be annually chosen.

243.

S E C O N D B O O K.

From the establishment of the ROMAN COMMONWEALTH in the year of Rome 243, to the re-building of the City in 365, after the burning of it by the Gauls.

C H A P. I.

- 244 S E C T. I. The state and condition of Rome on the abolition of the regal power. §. II. Tarquin prevails with the Magistrates of Tarquinii in Hetruria to send an Embassy to Rome in his favour, with a letter from him to the Roman People. §. III. A second Embassy from the Tarquinienſes to the Romans. The Ambaſſadors engage ſome of the young Patricians in a plot againſt the new government. It is diſcovered by Vindicius a ſlave. Brutus BRUTUS's ſervant. condemns his own ſons to death and ſees the execution. §. IV. Collatinus is forced to abdicate the Conſulſhip; and Valerius is choſen to ſucceed him. §. V. Tarquin having ſtirred up the Tarquinienſes and Veientes to take arms in his cauſe, they come to a battle with the Romans, in which Brutus is ſlain. §. VI. The people entertain a jealousy of Valerius's ambition, but ſoon after give him the name of Poplicola or Popular, on account of the laws he makes Lex Valeria. in their favour, to the diminution of the Conſular Authority. He creates QUÆSTORS. two treaſurers with the title of QUÆSTORS.

CHAP. II.

§. I. Poplicola is choſen Conſul a ſecond Time, and T. Lucretius appointed 245. to be his Collegue. Porſena, King of Cluſium in Hetruria, ſends a threaten- Porſena. 246. ing embaſſy to Rome. The Romans chuſe Poplicola Conſul a third time, and give him Horatius Pulvillus for a Collegue. §. II. Porſena in conjunction with ſome of the Latine ſtates, marches an army into the neighbourhood of Rome. The remarkable bravery of Horatius Cocles. §. III. The Horatius Cocles. deſperate enterprize and wonderful reſolution of Mucius Scævola. Porſena Mucius Scævola. intimidated by the courage of the Romans, deſiſts from his demand of having the baniſhed King reſtored. He makes a truce with the Romans, who refer it to his judgment, whether they ſhall reſtore to Tarquin his paternal eſtate or not. The adventure of Clælia during the pleadings. Porſena renounces the cauſe of Tarquin entirely, and makes a peace with the Romans. §. IV. The temple of Jupiter Capitolinus is conſecrated. Sp. Lartius and T. Herminius choſen Conſuls. The Romans ſhew their gratitude to Porſena. 247.

CHAP. III.

§. I. The Romans, in the Conſulſhip of M. Valerius, (brother of Popli- 248. cola,) and P. Poſthumius, make war againſt the Sabines, and twice defeat them. §. II. The Sabines unite in a national body againſt Rome, where 249. Poplicola is choſen Conſul a fourth time. Appius Claudius leaves the Sa- APPIUS CLAUDIUS. bines and comes over to the Romans, with all his followers and dependants. The Sabines are again defeated. §. III. Poplicola dies. The Sabines upon his death take courage, and renew the war, in the Conſulſhip of P. Poſthumius and Menenius Agrippa, who obtain a ſignal victory over them. §. IV. 250. An OVATION only is decreed to Poſthumius, but a Triumph to Menenius. OVATION. §. V. The Sabines are ſubdued in the ſucceeding Conſulſhip of Sp. Caſſius 251. and Opiter Virginus.

CHAP. IV.

§. I. The Latines (in the Conſulate of Poſthumius Cominius and T. 252. Lartius) declare for King Tarquin againſt the new Republick; but, before they take the field, ſend an Embaſſy to Rome with propoſals for an accommodation. 253. §. II.

- §. II. A conspiracy is there formed by some of Tarquin's Emissaries, who accompany the Latine Ambassadors. The plot is discovered and prevented, by the Consul's Servius Sulpitius and Manius Tullius; and the Ambassadors are disappointed with a refusal of their demands. §. III. The Latines dispatch a second Embassy to Rome with offers of peace, upon new conditions; these are also rejected by the Senate. The Romans prepare for war: but when the Consuls Titus Lartius, and Q. Clœlius, would make the necessary levies, the poorer citizens refuse to serve. §. IV. The cruelty of their creditors is the cause of this mutiny. The debtors demand an absolute remission of their debts. Great disputes arise in the Senate on this occasion. In so dangerous a situation of affairs the Senate judge it necessary to create a Dictator, (a sovereign uncontrollable Magistrate, and to this they get the People's consent. §. V. Titus Lartius is appointed to that supreme dignity. The levies for a war are now carried on without difficulty. After very little action in the field, a truce is made with the Latines for a year; during which the Roman women married into Latium, and the Latine women married at Rome, have leave to return to their respective countries. §. VI. The truce being expired, Posthumius one of the Consuls is named Dictator, and has the sole conduct of the war. He gives the Latines an entire overthrow in the battle of Regillus; after which the whole Nation submits. Tarquin being obliged to quit Latium, retires to Cumæ in Campania, and there, in a few months after, dies.

C H A P. V.

- §. I. The peace concluded with the Latines is followed by domestick broils at Rome; where the Senate get the Consulship for Appius Claudius and P. Servilius. §. II. The Volsci encouraged by the civil feuds among the Romans, prepare to fall upon them. The Plebeians at Rome refuse to list themselves for the war. Servilius with an army of volunteers, who follow him out of personal affection, enters the territory of the enemy, and terrifies them into a submission for the present; but he has no sooner led back his army, than they renew their preparations to attack the Republick. §. III. While the Senate are consulting about the levies to be made on this occasion, a sudden accident occasions an insurrection at Rome. Servilius appeases the tumult. News comes that the Volsci are approaching. Servilius by fair promises in relation to the debts engages the people to list themselves. §. IV. He defeats the enemy, and, tho' the Senate refuse him a triumph at his return, on account of his indulgence to the soldiers, he triumphs in spite of their opposition. §. V. After this he takes the field again, and defeats the AURUNCI. §. VI. The debtors at his return from the war claim the performance of his promises. Servilius, not having power to make them good, is treated by the people with contempt. He thereupon becomes their enemy, and the sedition increases.

C H A P. VI.

- §. I. The people refuse to obey the summons of the new Consuls (A. Virginus and T. Veturius,) to list themselves for a war against the Sabines, Æqui, and Volsci. The Senate, after some dispute among themselves, agree to create a Dictator, tator. Manius Valerius, a brother of Poplicola, is named to that dignity. §. II. Valerius prevails with the People to serve, by promising them full satisfaction in relation to their complaints when the war shall be over, and by suspending in the mean time all prosecutions for debt. Three armies are raised, to be commanded by the Dictator and the two Consuls. The enemy are defeated on all sides. §. III. The Dictator at his return home demands of the Senate to discharge his engagements to the debtors. His demand is rejected. He excuses himself to the People and resigns the Dictatorship.

C H A P. VII.

§. I. The discontent among the People augments. The consuls, to give the mutineers a diversion, lead their two armies, which they had not yet disbanded, ^{SECESSION.} again into the field. The soldiers desert their Generals, and by the advice of Sicinius Bellutus, retire to a hill three miles from Rome. §. II. The Senate ^{260.} dispatch a deputation to them to persuade them to return; but in vain. Posthumius Cominius and Spurius Cassius are chosen Consuls. Warm debates in the Senate. A second deputation is sent to the mutineers in spite of the remonstrances of Appius Claudius. §. III. The artful management of Sicinius Bellutus and Junius Brutus, the two heads of the sedition, in their conference with the Deputies. §. IV. Menenius Agrippa by soft words, and by his famous apologue, overcomes the obstinacy of the mutineers; but when they are just ready to go back to the city, Brutus puts a stop to their march till the Senate have agreed to the creation of some new officers chosen out of the Plebeians to be the future protectors of the People. These officers, stiled ^{TRIBUNES OF THE PEOPLE.} TRIBUNES OF THE PEOPLE, being elected, and their persons declared sacred, the mutineers return to Rome.

C H A P. VIII.

§. The TRIBUNES OF THE PEOPLE obtain of the Senate, that two officers ^{Pleb. A.} be annually elected (out of the Plebeians) to be their Ministers and Assistants; who are afterwards called ^{Ediles.} ÆDILES. §. II. The war is renewed against the Volsci. The Roman arms prevail. Caius Marcius Coriolanus signalizes his courage in this war. §. III. T. Geganius and P. Minucius ^{261.} are chosen Consuls. Rome suffers extremely by a famine, and this calamity revives the civil dissensions. The Senate, to disburthen the City, send away great numbers of the People to plant two Colonies. The Plebeians, who remain at Rome, grow more mutinous, in proportion as the famine increases. §. IV. The Tribunes give out, that the dearth of provisions is owing to the malice of the Senate. The Consuls convene the People to undeceive them. The Tribunes dispute with the Consuls the right of speaking in the Assembly. The next day, A LAW is passed by the People, Tribuno rogante, whereby it is made penal to interrupt the Tribunes when they are speaking in the Comitia. Coriolanus, at the head of some volunteers, takes the field and ravages the enemy's territory, sharing all the spoil among his soldiers.

C H A P. IX.

152.
CORIO-LANUS.

§. I. Plenty of corn being brought to Rome from Sicily (in the Consulate of M. Minucius and A. Sempronius) fresh disputes arise in the Senate about the distribution of it. Coriolanus is for taking advantage of the people's distress to get the Tribuneship abolished. The younger Senators applaud the motion. §. II. The Tribunes, who had been present at this debate, go away in a fury and stir up the People to revenge. They cite Coriolanus to appear before them. He refuses. They endeavour to seize him as he comes out of the Senate-house, but are repulsed by those who attend him. The Consuls appease the tumult. §. III. Early the next morning the Tribunes hold an Assembly of the People on this affair. Minucius the Consul by gentle words disposes the multitude to peace; but Coriolanus spoils all by a fresh declaration of the same sentiments which had before offended them. The Tribunes condemn him to death. The Patricians oppose the execution of this rash sentence, and the People seem not to approve it. The Tribunes therefore resolve to prosecute Coriolanus in a legal way, and to convene the People by Tribes for his trial. The assembly is adjourned.

C H A P. X.

§. I. The Consuls endeavour by remonstrances to allay the heat of the Tribunes, and bring them to conform to the ancient usages, which did not allow the People to take cognizance of any affair till it was referred to them by a decree of the Senate. The Tribunes consent to observe this rule, and desire they may be heard by the Fathers in relation to their charge against Coriolanus. §. II. The Tribune Decius makes a long Speech in the Senate, inveighing bitterly against the accused, and contending for the People's right to judge him. §. III. Appius Claudius in very strong terms opposes this pretension. §. IV. But Valerius, in terms no less strong, urges the expediency of the Senate's compliance. He exhorts Coriolanus in the most pathetic manner to submit himself to the People's judgment; and he adds a discourse in behalf of a balance of power between the Patricians and Plebeians. §. V. It is carried by a majority of votes that Coriolanus shall be tried by THE PEOPLE. Coriolanus having assurances given him, that the Accusers charge shall be confined to the single crime of Tyranny, consents to the drawing up of the decree.

C H A P. XI.

COMITIA
BY
TRIBES. §. I. The day being come for Coriolanus's trial, a dispute arises between the Consuls and Tribunes, whether the People shall give their suffrages by CENTURIES, according to the ancient custom, or by TRIBES, which had never yet been practised. The Tribunes, who are for the latter, prevail. §. II. Coriolanus's cause is heard. He is condemned to banishment, and leaves Rome.

C H A P.

C H A P. XII.

§. I. The Plebeians exult upon the victory they have gained over the Patricians in the affair of Coriolanus. The Romans having now no war abroad, nor squabble at home to employ them, turn their minds wholly to superstition, during the Consulate of Q. Sulpicius and Sp. Lartius. §. II. The Tribunes, from a political view, persuade the People at the next election of Consuls to chuse men of little spirit, and mean abilities for war. Their choice falls upon C. Julius and P. Pinarius Rufus. §. III. In the mean time, Coriolanus retires privately to Antium, one of the principal cities of the Volsci, discovers himself to Attius Tullus, General of that nation, offers him his service against Rome, and is nobly received by him. §. IV. These two Generals concert a stratagem to stir up the Volsci to renew the war with the Romans. Coriolanus is introduced by Tullus into the Assembly of the Volscian States, and there makes a speech, which is highly applauded. They resolve upon war, and to commit the conduct of it to Tullus and Coriolanus; but first, by the advice of the latter, send an embassy to Rome, to make such demands of the Republick, as they are sure will be rejected. The Volscian Ambassadors are dismissed by the Roman Senate with a haughty answer.

C H A P. XIII.

§. I. Coriolanus at the head of a Volscian army recovers from the Romans all the towns they had taken from the Volsci; carries several cities in Latium by assault, and then leads his troops within five miles of Rome; where new Consuls are chosen, Sp. Nautius and Sex. Furius. §. II. The People, terrified at his approach, cry out to have the sentence of his banishment reversed. The Patricians oppose it. He marches to Rome and invests it. The Senate and People agree to sue to him for peace. Three Deputations are sent to him successively, to persuade him to desist from his demands in favour of the Volsci; but all in vain. §. III. The Mother and Wife of Coriolanus go attended by all the Roman Ladies of distinction to make a fourth attempt upon his resolution. §. IV. The interview and conference between Coriolanus and his Mother, who prevails upon him to raise the siege of Rome; after which he is assassinated by the Volsci.

C H A P. XIV.

§. I. Two brave and able Captains, Aquilius Tuscus and Sicinius Sabinus, being promoted to the Consulate, they recover the reputation of the Roman arms by the victories they obtain over the Volsci and Hernici. §. II. They are succeeded by Sp. Cassius (now a third time Consul) and Proculus Virginius. Cassius concludes an alliance with the Hernici upon terms which displease the Senate. §. III. He aspires to make himself King of Rome; and, to gain the People, proposes for the first time the AGRARIAN LAW (or the law for dividing the conquered lands among the citizens of Rome) and that the La-

268. tines and the Hernici (newly become allies of Rome, and admitted to the rights of citizenship, may share with the Romans in that distribution. §. IV. The opposition of the Nobles to the passing of this law, with the reasons of that opposition. §. V. The Consul Virginius and even the Tribunes oppose it. §. VI. The artful conduct of the Tribune Rabuleius to draw an advantage to the People from the dispute between the Consuls. §. VII. Cassius, to get his law passed, brings great numbers of Latines and Hernici to Rome to vote for it. His Colleague orders them to leave the city. §. VIII. The Senate, to quiet the contention, decree a Partition of the conquered lands, but postpone the execution of their decree till the Consuls elect (Q. Fabius and Serv. Cornelius) shall have entered upon their office. §. IX. Cassius is arraigned before the People for treason, condemned and executed.

C H A P. XV.

269. §. I. The People regret the death of Cassius. The Senate find means to divert them a while from the affair of the AGRARIAN LAW. §. II. L. Æmilius with Cæso Fabius, and M. Fabius with L. Valerius are successively chosen Consuls. In the Consulship of the latter the war with the Volsci breaking out afresh, the Tribune Mænius protests against any levies for the service, till something effectual be done in relation to the Agrarian Law. The Consuls, by a stratagem, get the better of his opposition. §. III. The Senate at the next Assembly for choosing Consuls, endeavour to obtain that dignity for Appius Claudius (the son of the first Appius so often mentioned.) The Tribunes, to hinder it, excite such a tumult, that there is no possibility of proceeding in the election. The Republic falls into an Inter-regnum. Sp. Latinus being Interrex quiets the contention between the two parties. They agree to give the Fasces to C. Junius and Q. Fabius, the first a creature of the Tribunes, the second a man zealous for the Senate. These Consuls take the field against the Veientes; and for a while all is quiet at Rome. §. IV. The next election raises new disputes. Sp. Furius and Cæso Fabius (a second time) are chosen, each party having a Consul to its liking. The Tribune Icilius, in imitation of Mænius, opposes the necessary levies for a war with the Æqui and Veientes. Appius Claudius suggests a stratagem to the Senate by which they carry their point against Icilius. The Consuls take the field.

APPIUS
CLAU-DIUS II.

C H A P. XVI.

270. §. I. The Troops commanded by Cæso Fabius, not liking their General, will not suffer him to gain any honour in the campaign. §. II. M. Fabius (a second time) and Cn. Manlius Cincinnatus are elected to the Consulship. They obtain a signal victory over the Hetrurians, chiefly by the bravery of the Fabii, who from this time become popular. §. III. Cæso Fabius (a third time) and T. Virginius are chosen Consuls. Cæso defeats the Æqui and Veientes, §. IV. The Fabian family undertake alone to guard the frontiers against the Veientes. Cæso, as soon as he has resigned the Fasces (to L. Æmilius and C. Servilius) joins the rest of his family in quality of PROCONSUL, a new in-vented

274.
FABIUS FA-MILY

275.
PROCON-
SUL.

wanted dignity. §. V. The Romans carry on the war against the Æqui, Volsci, and Volcentes. Æmilius after a successful campaign against the last is refused a triumph. He seeks to revenge himself on the Senate. §. VI. In the succeeding Consulship (of C. Horatius and T. Menenius) all Hetruria declares war against Rome. The miserable fate of the Fabii. The Hetrurian arms prevail. But the next year's Consuls (A. Virginus and P. Servilius) give the enemy an entire overthrow.

C H A P. XVII.

§. I. The Tribunes not being able to carry their point in relation to the AGRARIAN LAW, turn their rage against some Consulars, who when in power had oppressed them. Menenius the last year's Consul, is accused before the People, and condemned in a fine. §. II. His successor Servilius is maliciously prosecuted as soon as he has resigned the Fasces to P. Valerius and C. Nautius, but he is honourably acquitted. In this and the following Consulship (of Aulus Manlius and L. Furius) war is carried on with success against several of the neighbouring States. §. III. The succeeding Consuls, L. Æmilius (a third time chosen) and Vopiscus Julius, are publicly called upon by the Tribune Genucius, to name the Commissioners for the Partition of the Lands. Finding that the Consuls shun meddling in that affair, he begins a criminal process against their predecessors Manlius and Furius, for having neglected the naming of those Commissioners. The trial is prevented by the sudden death of Genucius.

C H A P. XVIII.

§. I. The haughty and imprudent behaviour of the Consuls after the death of Genucius, in relation to P. VOLERO, whom, tho' he had been an Officer, they would oblige to list himself for a common soldier. The People rise, and the Consuls hide themselves. §. II. L. Pinarius and P. Furius succeed to the Consulate, and VOLERO is chosen a Tribune of the People. VOLERO proposes a Law for electing the Tribunes in the Comitia by Tribes. The Disputes on this head are interrupted by a plague. §. III. The Senate get the Consulship for Appius Claudius and T. Quinctius. The two Collegues differ about the means to defeat VOLERO's project. §. IV. VOLERO renews the proposal of his Law in an Assembly of the People. Quinctius, by soft words, disposes the People to reject it: But Appius, by a speech full of pride and heat, ruins the effect of what his Collegue had said. The Tribune Lætorius commands Appius to leave the Assembly, and even orders him to be led to prison. A scuffle ensues. Night puts an end to the Disorder. §. V. The tumult is renewed the next morning. Quinctius by prudent management quiets it, and prevails with the Senate to let VOLERO's Law pass.

C H A P. XIX.

§. I. The Consuls lead two armies into the field against the Æqui and Volsci. Appius's troops, that he may have no claim to a TRIUMPH, refuse to fight the enemy. He punishes them with the utmost severity, and returns to Rome. §. II. The affair of the Agrarian Law being revived in the Consulship of 203. of his successors (L. Valerius (a second time Consul) and T. Æmilius) he opposes the Tribunes with more heat than ever. They cite him before the People, as an enemy to the public liberty. He kills himself. §. III. The Tribunes resume the affair of the Conquered Lands, but drop it again till the close of the next Consulship (of A. Virginus and T. Numicius) when no Plebeian appears in the Curia, where T. Quinctius (a second time) and Q. Servilius are chosen to that dignity. These Consuls, to keep things quiet at home, busy the People in various wars. §. IV. The domestic dissensions begin afresh in the Consulship of T. Æmilius (a second time Consul) and Q. Fabius. Æmilius favours the People in relation to the Agrarian Law. Fabius, without promoting that affair, falls upon an expedient to stop their complaints. §. V. He then takes the field, and reduces the Æqui to ask peace; who nevertheless in the next Consulship of Sp. Posthumus and Q. Servilius (now a second time Consul) begin to stir again; and in the following year, when T. Quinctius (a third time) and Q. Fabius (a second time) are Consuls, the war breaks out anew; it is continued by their successors, A. Posthumus and Sp. Furius, to the advantage of the Romans. §. VI. In the succeeding Consulship of P. Servilius Priscus and L. Æbutius Elva, a most dreadful plague rages in the city. The Æqui and Volci appear before Rome, but soon retire; and the Romans the next year, under the command of the new Consuls (L. Lucretius and T. Veturius) give them an entire overthrow.

C H A P. XX.

- TERENTI-
AN LAW. §. I. During the absence of the Consuls from Rome, Terentius Arsa, one of the Tribunes, proposes to the People, that there should be an establishment of FIXED LAWS to be the RULE to the Magistrates in deciding causes between man and man. §. II. Q. Fabius, Governor of the City, warmly opposes it, and sends to the Consuls to return to Rome. Terentius on their arrival suspends the pursuit of his design. §. III. But the affair is revived in the succeeding Consulship of P. Volumnius and S. Sulpitius. Great contests about it. A stop put to it by prodigies and ill omens. §. IV. The Law is again proposed. The contending parties come to blows. Quinctius Cæso, the son of Quinctius Cincinnatus, is cited before the Commons for the violent part he had acted in these scuffles. §. V. He has not courage to appear on the day appointed for his trial. His uncle T. Quinctius appears for him. Cæso is falsely accused of murder. The decision of the cause is deferred to another day; before the coming of which Cæso banishes himself.

C H A P. XXI.

293.
C. Claudius. §. I. Notwithstanding the violent proceedings of the Tribunes against Cæso, the Patricians keep steady in their opposition to the Terentian Law; and the better to maintain their ground, they get C. Claudius (brother of that Appius Claudius, who killed himself) into the Consulship. (P. Valerius, now a second time Consul, is given him for a Collegue.) The Tribunes despairing of victory in a fair open contest, combine together to destroy the better part of the Senate; and in order thereto, pretend to have discovered a plot upon the public liberty. Claudius

Claudius exposes their malice and forgeries before the People, and thereby quashes their wicked design.

C H A P. XXII.

§. I. These civil broils among the Romans encourage one HERDONIUS, a private Sabine, to attempt the conquest of Rome. At the head of 4000 men he surprizes the CAPITOL. The Tribunes take advantage of this publick distress, and before they will consent to let the People arm, insist upon a promise from the Consuls, that they will not oppose the passing of the Terentian Law. Claudius rejects the condition, but Valerius makes the promise required, and prevails with the People to march against the enemy, and take an oath not to lay down their arms without the Consuls leave. Valerius is killed in the attack of the Capitol. Nevertheless the Romans carry the place, and Herdonius is slain.

C H A P. XXIII.

§. I. C. Claudius is cited by the Tribunes to perform the promise of his deceased Collegue. He defers it under various pretences; and at length refuses to do any thing in the affair, till a new Consul be elected in the room of Valerius. L. Quinctius Cincinnatus is chosen to that dignity in his absence, to the terror of the People who had so lately banished his son Cæso. The Deputies from the Senate who carry Quinctius the news of his election, find him driving the plough.

§. II. He comes to Rome. convenes a general Assembly, reproves both Senate and People for their past behaviour, and threatens the latter (whose oath of obedience to the Consuls was still binding) to lead them into the field, and make them pass the winter there. By this and other arts, which he employs, he makes the Tribunes desist from their pursuit of the Terentian Law.

§. III. Virginus Volscius, and the other Tribunes, get themselves continued in their employments for another year, notwithstanding a Decree of the Senate expressly made to bind any citizen from standing two years together for the same office. The Senate hereupon are for continuing Quinctius a second year in the Consulate, but he rejects the motion with indignation, and reprimands them for shewing so little regard to their own Decrees. The Fasces are transferred to Q. Fabius and L. Cornelius; and Quinctius returns to his plough. The Quæstors commence a prosecution against Volscius, for having borne false witness against Quinctius's son Cæso; but the Tribunes put a stop to it, and the Senate make this a pretext for continuing their opposition to the Terentian Law.

C H A P. XXIV.

§. I. The Consuls of the present year are successful in war against the Æqui and Volsci. But the next year, when C. Nautius and L. Minucius are Consuls, the latter having the conduct of the war against the Æqui, suffers himself to be so shut up by the enemy in a valley, that his whole army is in danger of perishing by hunger. His Collegue being employed against the Latines, and therefore unable to assist him, names Quinctius Cincinnatus Dictator. This great man being fetched again from his plough, puts himself at the head of a strong army, army, expeditiously marches against the Æqui, blocks them up in their camp as closely as they had closed up Minucius, and reduces them to surrender on his own terms. He then degrades Minucius from the Consulate, and refuses to let the soldiers, whom he had rescued from danger, have any part of the enemies' spoils. They nevertheless beg to be allowed to make him a present of a crown of gold. He has a triumph at his return to Rome; and the 16th day after his promotion to the Dictatorship, resigns that office, and retires once more into the country, his son Cæcilius being recalled from banishment. §. II. The Senate in the next Consulate (of C. Horatius, and Q. Minucius) recall Quinctius again to Rome to set him up against the Tribunes, who refuse the necessary levies for a war with the Æqui and Sabines, unless the Terentian Law be first passed. Quinctius addresses the Senate and the whole body of the Patricians to take arms: They accordingly repair all armed to the Forum, where Horatius convenes an Assembly of the People, and reproaches them with their baseness and cowardice. The Tribune Virginius seeing the multitude moved by the Consul's speech, consents to drop the affair of the Law, and to waive his opposition to the levies, provided the Senate will suffer the number of the Tribunes to be augmented to ten. C. Claudius opposes this motion, but Quinctius declaring that he thinks that it may turn to the Senate's advantage to comply with it, his opinion prevails, and the People are allowed to elect TEN TRIBUNES.

C H A P. V.

§. I. Icilius, chief of the Tribunes, proposes that mount Aventine may be yielded to the People. The Consuls M. Valerius and Sp. Virginius looking upon this new demand as a prelude to the revival of the Agrarian Law, and deferring therefore to convene the Senate for the hearing and debating it, Icilius sends an Officer to them, commanding them to assemble the Senate forthwith, and to repair to it themselves. The messenger, by order of the Consuls, is chastised for his insolence by one of their Lictors. The Tribunes cause the Lictor to be seized, and the Senate, to save his life, are obliged to yield to the People the ground they demand. §. II. The concessions of the Senate made the Tribunes still more presumptuous. T. Romilius and C. Veturius (Consuls for the next year), attempting to force the citizens to list themselves for a war in spite of the opposition of the Tribunes, the latter order the Ædiles to seize those supreme Magistrates and lead them to prison. The Patricians hinder by force the execution of this order. The Tribunes hereupon cite the Consuls to appear before an Assembly of the People. Their citation being disregarded, they apply to the Senate for a Decree, empowering the People to try the Consuls. Romilius answers them with reproaches and menaces, and nothing is determined that day. §. III. The Tribunes, without any further soliciting a Senatus consultum, resolve to get the Consuls condemned by the People in a fine; but when the day for the Assembly comes, they drop that design, and propose anew the Agrarian and Terentian Laws. Sicinius Dentatus, an old soldier, makes a notable speech in relation to the former. The Assembly is adjourned to the next day; and then the Patricians by violence hinder the suffrages from being collected.

lected. The following day the People being again assembled, empower their Tribunes to make enquiry after the Authors of the Tumult. The misdemeanor is charged upon three eminent Patrician families; and the Senate, to pacify the People, suffer the estates of the delinquents to be confiscated without opposition. §. IV. During these contentions, the Consuls are obliged to lead an army into the field against the Æqui. Sicinius Dentatus serves as volunteer in this war at the head of 800 Veterans. Romilius orders him with his company upon a desperate enterprize. Sicinius remonstrates against it, but nevertheless obeys; and he succeeds so well, as to occasion the total defeat of the enemy by the Consuls; afterwards he marches to Rome, complains to the People of the General's tyranny, and prevails with them to refuse him a triumph. And in the following Consulate (of Sp. Tarpeius and A. Æternius) Sicinius being chosen Tribune, Romilius and Veturius are accused before the People for misconduct during their Magistracy, and fined. A Law is also passed, empowering any Magistrate to impose a fine for disobedience.

CHAP. XXVI.

§. I. The Tribunes finding they cannot by any means bring the Consuls to hear of the AGRARIAN LAW, return to the pursuit of the Terentian. Romilius, whom the People had lately fined, takes part with them on this occasion. At his motion both Senate and People agree to send Deputies to Athens to copy out the Laws of Solon and of the other Law-givers of Greece, in order to form thereby a body of Roman Law, to be the future rule to the Magistrates in all the parts of their administration. The next year (when Sextus Quintilius and P. Horatius are Consuls) there is neither war abroad, nor contention at home, but Rome is dreadfully afflicted by a plague. §. II. In the following Consulate of P. Sestius and T. Menenius, the Deputies return from Greece. The People press the nomination of the ten Commissioners, or Decemvirs, who are to compile the new Laws. The Consuls, to avoid proceeding in this affair, insist upon a previous election of their successors, under whose administration it is to be settled. Appius Claudius (son of that Appius who killed himself, and grandson of the first Appius) is chosen with T. Genucius. After this Menenius pretends sickness. The Consuls elect, to please the People, offer to forego their pretensions to the Consulate, rather than hinder the immediate nomination of the Decemvirs. Sestius, the Collegue of Menenius, assembles the Senate, where it is carried by a majority, to create Decemvirs, and the Tribunes, after some struggle, consent to let them be all Patricians. §. III. The election is made in the Comitia by Centuries, where Appius is the first named. The Decemvirs, having entered upon their office, behave themselves much to the satisfaction of the People. They compose TEN TABLES OF LAWS, which are approved by the Centuries Assembled.

APPIUS
CLAUDI-
US III.

DECEM-VIRAL GO-VERNMENT
and Laws.

CHAP. XXVII.

Fragments of the TEN TABLES of Laws before-mentioned, as they have been collected and digested by the learned Jesuits Catrou and Rouillé, and also of the TWO TABLES of Laws soon after added to the TEN.

C H A P. XXVIII.

§. I. The People and Senate agree to have the same sort of government continued for another year, in order to the adding two tables of Laws to the ten already established. The Collegues of Appius suspecting him of ambitious views, declare him President of the Assembly where the second election of Decemvirs is to be made, thinking thereby to hinder him from being one of the candidates. But Appius, in spite of all decency, names himself the first, and not only gains the voices of the Assembly in his own favour, but in favour of nine men (three of them Plebeians) all devoted to his will; to the exclusion of all his late Collegues, and of the best men in the Republick.

303. §. II. The new Decemvirs privately agree to make their authority perpetual. They exercise an absolute and cruel tyranny. C. Claudius, the uncle of Appius, would reprove him for his conduct, but cannot get admittance to him. Two new tables of laws are

304. drawn up.

§. III. The year of the Decemvirs Government being expired, they continue themselves in office by their own authority. They convene the Senate in order to obtain a levy of troops to oppose the incursions of the Æqui and Sabines. Valerius, an avowed enemy of the Decemvirs, in the warmth of his zeal, rises up to speak before his turn. Appius commands him silence, and not being obeyed, threatens to punish him as an incendiary. Horatius answers the Decemvir in a bold speech, which makes him soften his tone and manner. Appius desires his uncle C. Claudius to give his opinion. The uncle with great frankness reproves his nephew for all his vices and tyranny, and exhorts him to divest himself of a power which he held only by usurpation, and which in the end would prove fatal to him. He concludes with declaring against any levies of troops till the Consulship be restored. The Quinctii and all the other eminent members of the Senate are of the same opinion. The majority is nevertheless for empowering the Decemvirs to raise troops, and to command them; which Appius perceiving, then calls upon Valerius to speak his opinion. Valerius declares for naming a Dictator, and moves to have the question put, and this motion is seconded; but the other party cry out, that the affair is already determined, and the care of the war given to the Decemvirs. A Decree to that effect is accordingly drawn up.

§. IV. Valerius and Horatius, to secure themselves from being insulted by the Decemvirs, keep guards about their persons. Many of the Senators, and other principal citizens, retire into the country. Appius confiscates their estates.

§. V. Fabius, with two other of the Decemvirs, leads an army against the Sabines. Five other Decemvirs lead five legions against the Æqui. Appius and Oppius stay with a body of troops in Rome. Nothing succeeds in the two camps, the soldiers being resolved not to conquer. Sicinnius Dentatus, that old soldier, who had been in 120 battles, publickly groes out at Rome, that the misfortunes of the campaign are owing to the incapacity of the Generals. Appius hereupon contrives, in concert with

305. the Decemvirs, who command against the Sabines, to get him treacherously murdered. The discovery and report of so detestable a villainy disposes the soldiers to a revolt.

C H A P.

C H A P. XXIX.

§. I. Appius (at Rome) falls in love with Virginia, the daughter of a Ple- VIRGINIA.
beian named Virginus, a centurion in the army employ'd against the Æqui.
To get her into his power, having in vain tried to corrupt her nurse, he conceals a stratagem with M. Claudius one of his clients. Claudius seizes the girl as a slave belonging to him, and leads her before the Decemvirs Tribunal, there to have his right legally confirmed to him. He pretends that Virginia was born of one of his slaves, and that Numitoria, the wife of Virginus, had (in concert with the mother of the girl) imposed her upon Virginus as her own child, she herself being barren. §. II. Numitoria, the uncle of Virginia, demands that the decision of the affair may be suspended, and his niece left under his care till her father can be fetched from the camp. The Decemvir finds reason for refusing this request: But Icilius, to whom Virginia had been promised in marriage, coming into court just in this instant, spirits up the People to such a pitch of fury, that Appius thinks fit to comply. Virginus is sent for, and arrives at Rome, notwithstanding the secret measures taken by Appius to intercept him on the road.
§. III. The cause is heard, and the imposture of Claudius made manifest to all present. Appius nevertheless making himself a witness in the affair, and pretending conscience, decrees Virginia to his client. The father hereupon, to hinder his daughter from being dishonoured, stabs her, and then hastens back to the army, leaving the city in a great commotion, which Valerius and Horatius take care to augment. §. IV. The soldiers upon hearing the tragical story from Virginus revolt from their Generals, return to Rome, and incamp on Mount Aven-tine. §. V. The Senate being convened by the Decemvir Oppius, dispatch three of their body to them, to question them upon their desertion. The soldiers unanimously cry out to have Valerius and Horatius sent to them, and they give no other answer. This army is soon after joined by all the soldiers of the other, who were equally incensed against the Decemvirs, by the complaints of Icilius.
The Senate is for sending Valerius and Horatius to the mutineers; but those two Senators refuse to go unless the Decemvirs depose themselves. The latter reject this condition, till they hear that the armies are marched to the Mons Sacer; they then promise to lay down their authority. §. VI. Valerius and Horatius repair to the Mons Sacer, and prevail with the army, upon a promise of the ancient Government's being restored, to return to Rome; but the soldiers before they separate chuse their Tribunes; and soon after Valerius and Horatius are named Consuls. §. VII. These popular Magistrates get several new laws passed in favour of the People. §. VIII. Virginus being now one of the Tribunes, impeaches Appius for his conduct as a Judge in relation to Virginia; and insists upon his making his defence immediately, or being imprisoned till the day of trial. Appius appeals to the People, but in vain. He is carried to prison. His uncle C. Claudius solicits for his enlargement without success. Appius dies in prison. His Collegue Oppius being tried and condemned dies also in prison the day of his commitment. The other Decemvirs all banish themselves. Claudius the client and minister of Appius is condemned to death,

death, yet suffers only banishment. The Tribune Duilius puts a stop to all farther prosecutions, relating to the tyranny of the Decemvirs.

C H A P. XXX.

§. I. The Consuls take the field. Valerius defeats the Æqui and Volsci, and Horatius the Sabines. Nevertheless the Senate, being dissatisfied with their too popular administration, and being especially moved by a speech of C. Claudius, who inveighs bitterly against them, reject their petition for a triumph. Hereupon they apply to the People, and obtain of them, by means of the Tribunes, what the Senate had refused. §. II. The Tribunes form a design of getting themselves perpetuated in the Tribuneship, and Horatius and Valerius in the Consulate. Duilius disliking this project of his Colleagues, contrives to defeat that part of it which related to the Consuls, by engaging these to declare publicly, that they will not hold over after their year is expired, though the People should desire it. He then holds the Assembly for electing Tribunes; and by his influence, joined with the Senate's, five new ones are chosen; after which finding that he cannot prevail with the Tribes to fill the other five places with new Magistrates, he dismisses the Assembly, referring the completion of the whole number of ten Tribunes to the five already elected. These five, among those they associate with them in their office, name two Patricians. (Lartius Herminius and T. Virginius are chosen Consuls.) TREBONIUS ASPER, one of the Plebeian Tribunes, shortly after gets a Law passed, forbidding the Tribunes the practice of Co-optation. §. III. The next year (when M. Geganius and C. Julius are Consuls) produces nothing remarkable. But in the succeeding Consulate (of T. Quinctius Capitolinus and Agrippa Furius) the old dissensions are renewed; insomuch that tho' the Æqui and Volsci, taking advantage of these disorders, ravage the country to the very gates of Rome, the Tribunes oppose the necessary levies of troops to repulse them: But Quinctius gets the better of this opposition, by a speech he makes to the People. The Consuls rout the enemy, and make a great slaughter of them. §. IV. The Roman People dishonour themselves by a judgment they give in a cause referred to their arbitration by the cities of Ardea and Aricia.

Co-optation.
305.
Trebonian Law.
306.
307.
Quinctius Capitolinus.
Unjust decree of the Roman people.

C H A P. XXXI.

308. §. I. The Commons of Rome (in the Consulate of M. Genucius and C. Curtius) demand that Plebeians may be admitted into the Consulship, and that the law prohibiting Patricians and Plebeians from inter-marrying may be repealed. Canuleius one of the Tribunes declares to the Senate in the most solemn manner, that he will constantly oppose all levies of troops, let the want of them be never so pressing, till these concessions are made to the People. §. II. C. Claudius in a private Assembly of the eldest Senators moves to have recourse to arms and violence, rather than yield to these demands. But T. Quinctius and the majority of the Assembly think it better to comply than come to a rupture with the People. Claudius hereupon, to hinder the debasing of the Consulship, makes this Canuleius.

new

new proposal, that instead of Consuls a certain number of MILITARY TRIBUNES be chosen partly out of the Senate, and partly from among the Commons; and that these new Magistrates be invested with Consular power. This project being approved, the Senate is assembled, and the Tribunes are called to it, to give their reasons in behalf of the new laws which they demand. Canuleius, instead of speaking to the matter in hand, inveighs against the Consuls for holding secret Assemblies, from which Horatius and Valerius are excluded. The Consul Genucius gives a satisfactory answer to this complaint. After Valerius and Horatius have spoken in favour of the People, and Claudius against them, the Consul's brother T. Genucius makes the proposal which had been suggested by C. Claudius. In conclusion it is approved by Senate and People, and six MILITARY TRIBUNES (three of each order) are to take the place of two Consuls. §. III. But when the day of election comes, the People will not give their voices to any but Patricians; and only three Military Tribunes are elected. These are obliged soon after to abdicate on account of some defect in their inauguration; and two Consuls (L. Papirius and L. Sempronius) are chosen to govern the Republick the remainder of the year. §. IV. Under the succeeding administration of T. Quinctius Capitolinus (a fifth time Consul) and M. Geganius (a second time) the CENSORSHIP is established.

MILITARY TRIBUNES.

303.

310.

CENSORS.

C H A P. XXXII.

§. I. The Romans put an end to the civil war among the Ardeates. §. II. The next year's Consuls, M. Fabius and Posthumius Æbutius, make the Ardeates some amends for the wrongs the Romans had done them on occasion of their contest with the Aricians. This year proves a year of peace, as does also the following year, when the Government is in the hands of C. Furius and M. Papirius. §. III. But in the succeeding Consulate of Proculus Geganius and L. Menenius, a Roman Knight named Sp. Mælius aspires to the sovereign power. Being a rich corn merchant, he during a dearth of provisions wins the meaner sort of people by a free distribution of corn, and some of their Tribunes by money. He causes great quantities of arms to be brought into his house by night. His designs are discovered by Minucius, Superintendant of provisions, in the Consulate of T. Quinctius Capitolinus (now a sixth time Consul) and Agrippa Menenius. Quinctius on this occasion names his brother Quinctius Cincinnatus Dictator, who appoints Servilius Ahala to be his General of the Horse. Mælius being summoned to appear before the Dictator's Tribunal, and not obeying, is slain by Servilius. Three of the Tribunes, provoked at this action, stir up the People to mutiny; and the Patricians, to pacify them, consent to the creation of Military Tribunes for the next year. None but Patricians are chosen to that office.

311.

312.

313.

Sp. Mælius, the corn-merchant.

314.

31.

C H A P. XXXIII.

§. I. Fidenæ revolts from the Romans, and puts itself under the protection of Tolumnius, King of the Veientes. The Romans prepare for war, and thinking it adviseable to have Consuls to conduct it, M. Geganius (a third time) and L. Ser-

316. L. Sergius are chosen; but these soon resign the care of the war to a Dictator, Mamercus Æmilius, who defeats the enemy in a pitched battle, wherein Cornelius Cossus a legicnary Tribune kills Tolumnius and strips him of his armour.
317. §. II. In the following Consulate of M. Cornelius and L. Papirius, a Tribune named Sp. Mælius commences a prosecution against Servilius and Minucius, for the death of Mælius the corn-merchant. The historians are not agreed about the issue of it. §. III. The Veientes and Fidenates renew the war during the
318. Consulate of Julius Iulus and L. Virginus, when the Romans are sorely distressed by a plague. Q. Servilius Priscus being named Dictator, routs the enemy and takes Fidenæ. It is uncertain what Magistrates were chosen to govern the
319. Republick, the next year, but whoever they were, they resigned their authority to Mamercus Æmilius, who is again named to the Dictatorship, upon a rumour that all Hetruria is preparing for war. This rumour proves groundless. Æmilius, thro' zeal for the publick liberty, gets a law passed restraining the office of Censor to 18 months duration. He then resigns the Dictatorship. C. Furius and M. Geganius, the Censors, in revenge deprive him of the Common privileges of a citizen. Æmilius nevertheless protects those his bitter enemies from the fury of the populace, who are ready to murder them. §. IV. The Senate are
320. obliged to humour the People, by suffering Military Tribunes to be created for the next year. However none but Patricians are chosen. Nothing memorable happens during their administration, but a plague, which ceases in the following year,
321. when the Republick is again governed by Military Tribunes all Patricians. The rich Plebeians complain of the poorer sort for their having constantly refused to elect any of them to that Magistracy. A Law is passed, forbidding those who stand for offices to wear garments of an extraordinary whiteness: The Senate, fearing lest some of the chief Plebeians should get into the Military Tribuneship, determine if possible to restore the Consulship (from which Plebeians are excluded.) A war with the Æqui favours this design. T. Quinctius (son of Lucius) and
322. C. Julius are chosen Consuls; but these disagreeing, through jealousy, the Senate judge it necessary to have a Dictator. The Consuls refuse to name one. The Senators provoked hereat, rashly apply to the Tribunes to interpose in the affair. The Tribunes threaten the Consuls to have them carried to prison if they don't comply. Posthumus Tubertus is named Dictator. He defeats the enemy, and 323. returns triumphant to Rome. §. V. The Æqui in the following Consulate of C. Papirius and L. Julius obtain a truce for eight years. (A regulation is made, 324. that fines shall for the future be paid in money instead of cattle.) The Romans continue in peace during this and the succeeding Consulate of L. Sergius (a second time Consul) and Hostus Lucretius. The next year, when T. Quinctius
325. (a second time) and A. Cornelius Cossus are Consuls, Rome is afflicted by a famine and a plague which occasions the People to have recourse to foreign supplications, but these are soon prohibited. §. VI. The Veientes in the following Consulate of L. Papirius (a second time Consul) and Servilius Ahala, make incursions on the Roman lands. Disputes arising between the Senate and People about the prerogative of proclaiming this war, the Romans do not take the field till
326. the next year, when the People prevail to have Military Tribunes in the Government, but they are all Patricians. These not acting in concert are defeated by by the enemy; whereupon Mamercus Æmilius (who had been degraded by the Censors) is a third time raised to the Dictatorship. He gives the Veientes a total overthrow, and takes their camp, as also Fidenæ, which had again revolted from the Romans.

C H A P. XXXIV.

§. I. Military Tribunes are chosen to the Government the two following years; 328.
but the choice falls only on Patricians. The Tribunes of the Commons use 329.
their utmost endeavours to dissuade the People from this preference of the Nobles to them, in the elections. The Senate to counterplot them, before the new elections come on, contrive to send away the principal of the Plebeians into the field against the Volsci. In their absence Appius Claudius (son of the Decemvir) one of the Appius Military Tribunes, holds an Assembly for electing Consuls, and C. Sempronius Claudius and Q. Fabius are chosen. §. II. Sempronius brings the whole Roman army IV.
into danger of being cut to pieces by the Volsci. An Officer of horse named Tem- 330.
panius, by his bravery and prudence, prevents the defeat of the Romans. He arrives at Rome before the Consul, and gives testimony in favour of his conduct. §. III. The People condemn Posthumius (one of those Military Tri- 331. bunes, who by their disunion had lost a battle in the year 327) in a fine. Tempanius is made one of the Tribunes of the Commons. His General Sempronius being prosecuted by the People for his misconduct, he takes his part, and engages the Tribune Hortensius, the accuser, to drop the prosecution.

C H A P. XXXV.

§. I. The next year, in the Consulate of T. Quinctius Capitolinus, and Nu- 332.
merius Fabius, new dissensions arise in the Republick, on occasion of a proposal to add two Quæstors to the two already established. The Tribunes insist 333. that of the four one half shall be always Plebeians. The Senate oppose this, ^{from Qua-} but are willing to leave the People free in their choice. The Tribunes not ^{estors.}
content, protest, by way of revenge, against holding the Comitia for electing Consuls. The two parties come at length to this compromise, that Military Tribunes shall be elected to the Government, and that the People shall be free to chuse Patricians or Plebeians to the Quæstorship. Notwithstanding all that the Tribunes of the Commons can do, the People chuse not only the Military Tribunes but the Quæstors too out of the Patricians only. The Tribunes 334. of the Commons, to vent their rage, renew the prosecution against Sempronius (whose kinsman A. Sempronius, one of the new Military Tribunes, had presided in the Assembly for chusing Quæstors) and they get him fined.
§. II. The following six years, to the year of Rome 340, the State is governed by Military Tribunes. In 334 a conspiracy of the slaves is discovered and 335.
prevented. In 335 the Romans have a war with the Labicani and Æqui united. The three Military Tribunes quarrel about the command of the army, one of the three being to stay in the city. Q. Servilius, formerly Dictator, the father of one of them, orders his son to remain at Rome. The other two take

- take the field, and command alternately. The Roman army is routed. Young Servilius names his father to the Dictatorship: This great man in eight days recovers the affairs of the Republick, and then resigns his office. The year 336 is a year of peace. In the year 337 the Tribunes revive the old quarrel about the distribution of the conquered lands. Appius's advice to the Senate, to raise a division among these Magistrates, is followed with success. Six of them side with the Patricians. The like good understanding is maintained the next year (338) between the Nobles and some of the Tribunes.
336.
337.
338.
339.
§. III. But in 339 the affair of the AGRARIAN LAW is revived. Posthumius, one of the Military Tribunes and General of the army, having promised the soldiers the plunder of Bola taken from the Æqui, afterwards breaks his word with them. Sextius, one of the Tribunes of the Commons, to make the soldiers amends, proposes that a colony of them shall be settled at Bola, and its territory divided among them. Posthumius (who had been called to Rome to oppose Sextius's proceedings) threatens that it shall be the worse for his men if any such step be made in their favour. The Tribune takes advantage of this proud and imprudent menace to incense the People against the General; and a report of it being made in the camp, the soldiers mutiny and wound one of the Quæstors; and Posthumius, at his return to the camp, attempting to punish the guilty, is stoned by the soldiers. The Senate, fearing lest the People, in order to screen the murderers, should abuse Plebeian Military Tribunes for the next year (340) use all their endeavours to get Consuls elected, and they prevail. The fasces are transferred to A. Cornelius Cossus and L. Furius Medullinus, who shew great moderation and prudence in the prosecution of the criminals. §. IV. Nothing very memorable, except a plague and famine, happens in the three following Consulates.
340.
341.
342.
343.
344.
345.
346.
347.
348.
349.
350.
351.
352.
353.
354.
355.
356.
357.
358.
359.
360.
361.
362.
363.
364.
365.
366.
367.
368.
369.
370.
371.
372.
373.
374.
375.
376.
377.
378.
379.
380.
381.
382.
383.
384.
385.
386.
387.
388.
389.
390.
391.
392.
393.
394.
395.
396.
397.
398.
399.
400.
- But in the year 344, when Cn. Cornelius and L. Furius (a second time) are Consuls, three Tribunes of the name of Icilius prevail with the People to abuse three of the four Quæstors out of the Plebeians. The Senate is likewise forced to consent to the abusing of Military Tribunes for the next year, but find means to disappoint the Icili in their expectation of being raised to that dignity. Three Patricians are chosen. These being ordered by the Senate to name a Dictator, on occasion of a war with the Volsci, two of them refuse. The Senate hereupon has recourse, as formerly, to the Tribunes; but these return a disdainful answer, and will not meddle in the dispute. Servilius Ahala, the third Military Tribune, names P. Cornelius Dictator, who quickly puts an end to the war. Servilius's two Collegues in anger against the Senate propose Military Tribunes at the next election: However Patricians are chosen, and so likewise the next year. The Tribunes of the Commons, provoked to the utmost, revenge themselves by opposing the levies for a war with the Veientes, who had insulted the Roman Ambassadors; and they make the old affair of the Agrarian Law their pretence. The Senate get the better of this opposition, by decreeing that the infantry shall hereafter have the better of this opposition, by decreeing that the infantry shall hereafter have
- PAY allowed to the INFAN-TRY.
- PAY out of the publick treasury during the service. The People joyfully confirm this Decree, and readily offer themselves to be enlisted.

C H A P. XXXVI.

§. I. The Romans invest Veii. In the two first years of the siege (which lasted ten) there is little action. The third year (350 of Rome) the Tribunes of the Commons made a stir about the hardship the soldiers suffer by being detained in the camp all the winter. Appius Claudius, Military Tribune, (grandson of the Decemvir) assembles the People and inveighs against their Tribunes for their seditious behaviour. His harangue has little effect; but a loss which the besiegers sustain before the place, animates the Plebeians with a zeal to push on the siege with vigour. The Senate for the first time allow PAY to the HORSE. §. II. The year following, Sergius and Virginus (two of the Military Tribunes) having the conduct of the siege, quarrel and divide the troops between them. The Falisci and Capenates (People of Hetruria) come to the assistance of the Veientes, and fall upon one side of Sergius's camp, while the besieged sally out and attack the other. Virginus refuses to assist his Colleague; the troops of the latter are routed. Hereupon the two Generals are both recalled. All the Military Tribunes of this year are obliged to abdicate, and new ones are chosen. The Tribunes of the Commons raise such disturbances at Rome about the levies, that in the election of those Magistrates the People cannot agree in the choice of more than eight. The majority of those eight name two more, in defiance of the Trebonian Law. C. Trebonius, one of the present Tribunes, draws the hatred of the People upon three of his Colleagues on this account, but they artfully divert it from themselves by turning it against Sergius and Virginus (the Generals of the last year) who are both fined for misconduct. §. III. The Tribunes renew the domestick broils: But all is quieted by the chusing some Plebeians into the Military Tribuneship. At the next elections the Comitia chuse five Plebeians to that dignity, and only one Patrician. The arms of the Republick prosper, but there happens a great mortality among men and cattle. To avert this evil the ceremony of the Lectisternium is observed. §. IV. The Senate take advantage of the People's fears and superstition, to get the Military Tribuneship for Patricians only; pretending that the Gods were angry at the choice, which had been made of Plebeians to that Magistracy. The lake of Alba overflows. This being looked upon as a prodigy, and an old Veientan soldier having delivered a prophecy, that Veii should not be taken before the water of that lake was all run out, Deputies are sent from Rome to consult the Oracle of Delphos. These return the next year with an answer agreeable to the old man's prophecy. Canals are made to drain the lake. Some defect being discovered in the inauguration of the present Military Tribunes, they all abdicate, and six new ones are chosen all Plebeians. Their administration not being prosperous, Camillus is named Dictator. §. V. He takes Veii by sap.

348.
350.
APPIUS
CLAUDI-
US V.
PAY allowed to the HORSE.
351.
352.
PLEBEIAN
MILITA-RY TRI-BUNES.
353.
354.
355.
356.
357.
Camillus
takes Veii.

C H A P. XXXVII.

§. I. The People are much displeased with Camillus on account of some singularities in the pomp of his triumph; but much more for demanding back from them

VOL. I. i a tenth

- a tenth part of the spoil of Veii, to discharge a vow which he had made to Apollo just before the assault, and which he had afterwards forgot. The Roman Ladies contribute their Jewels to make a golden vase for Apollo. §. II. The next year (the Republick being under the Government of six Military Tribunes, all Patricians) Sicinius Dentatus, a Tribune of the Commons, proposes that half of the Senators, Knights, and People of Rome should remove to Veii, and settle there. After much struggle Camillus and the other Senators bring this project to nothing. §. III. Camillus is chosen one of the six Military Tribunes for the year following, and to him is committed the conduct of the war against the Falisci. He besieges Falerii their capital city. A school-master to whom the sons of the chief inhabitants of the place are committed for education, betrays his trust, and puts all the children into the hands of Camillus. The Roman detesting both the treachery and the traitor, makes the boys whip him back again into the town. The Falisci moved by this generous action, submit to the Romans, who grant them peace on the condition only of paying the expences of the Campaign. During this transaction, two of Camillus's Collegues gain a victory over the Æqui. §. IV. The People, when the time comes for electing their Tribunes, chuse to the same office those of the old ones who had appeared for the proposal of removing half the People to Veii. On the other hand, the Patricians get Consular Government restored. L. Lucretius and Servius Sulpitius are elected Consuls. Sicinius the Tribune, Author of the project of going to Veii, gets two of his late Collegues fined for having opposed it. This project is debated in an Assembly of the People, and rejected by a majority of only one tribe. The Senate decree seven acres of the lands of Veii to every freeman of Rome. §. V. L. Valerius and M. Manlius are chosen Consuls for the next year. The Volturnenses, a People of Hettruria, take arms against Rome. The Consuls being seized with a contagious distemper, resign the Fasces. An Interregnum ensues. And then six Military Tribunes are elected to the Government.*

C H A P. XXXVIII.

- §. I. An accusation is brought against Camillus, for having taken to his own use some part of the spoil of Veii. To avoid the disgrace of a condemnation, he banishes himself. §. II. Shortly after, Clusium in Hettruria being besieged by the Gauls under King Brennus, the Inhabitants implore the assistance of the Romans. Three brothers of the name of Fabius are sent Ambassadors from Rome to mediate a peace between the contending powers. Brennus gives them a haughty reception. The Fabii young and indiscreet, having entered the town, put themselves at the head of the Clusians, and make a sally with them against the besiegers. Q. Fabius with his own hand kills one of their Captains. Brennus provoked at this breach of the law of nations, raises the siege, and marches strait towards Rome. He sends a Herald, and demands that the Ambassadors be delivered up to him. The Romans, instead of complying with this demand, chuse the Fabii to the Military Tribuneship, and place them at the head of the army which is to act against the Gauls. §. III. Brennus gives the Romans a total overthrow on the banks of the Allia. The third day after*

ter the Battle, he enters Rome, the gates of it being left open, most of the citizens fled, and the Senate, with all they were capable to bear away, retired into the Capitol. Brennus finds about 80 venerable old men, who had devoted themselves to death, sitting in the Forum in robes and chairs of state. They are all slain. The Capitol is invested, and the City burnt. §. IV. Camillus ^{Rome burnt.} (who in his exile resided at Ardea) puts himself at the head of the Ardeates, surprizes and cuts off some detachments of Gauls sent out to plunder the country. Upon the report of this action, the Romans, who were dispersed about the territory of Rome, assemble, and send a request to him to be their General. He declines it; till a young man, dispatched away to the Capitol for that purpose, brings him from the Senate a commission, which constitutes him Dictator. §. V. While Camillus is assembling an army, the Gauls attempt to scale the Capitol in the night. Their approach to the ramparts is discovered by the cackling of some geese. The assailants are repulsed, chiefly by the bravery of M. Manlius. Camillus hinders all provisions from coming to the enemy. §. VI. Both besiegers and besieged being distressed by famine, they enter upon a treaty. The Romans are to purchase a peace with 1000 lb. weight of gold. While the gold is weighing, Camillus arrives: He breaks off the treaty, and forces the Gauls to raise the siege and quit the country. §. VII. Rome being destroyed, the Tribunes ^{364.} renew the proposal of removing to Veii. Camillus (who is continued in the Dictatorship the whole year) opposes it with great zeal; but an accidental word of a centurion is what determines the People to stay and rebuild the city. Manlius is rewarded. Q. Fabius the Ambassador, who by his blameable conduct had provoked the Gauls against Rome, kills himself to avoid a publick condemnation. §. VIII. Before the end of the next year (during which the Commonwealth is governed by six Military Tribunes) the CITY is entirely REBUILT. ^{365.} Rome rebuilt.

T H I R D B O O K.

From the year of ROME 365, when the CITY was REBUILT, after the burning of it by the GAULS, to the year 489, when the ROMANS, having subdued ALL ITALY, began the first PUNICK or CARTHAGINIAN WAR.

C H A P. I.

§. I. The Nations bordering upon the Roman State resolve, if possible, to crush it before it can recover its former strength. The Military Tribunes march an army against the Volsci and Latines, but by ill conduct suffer it to be inclosed by the enemy. Camillus hereupon is, a third time, named Dictator; he raises new forces, rescues the army in distress, and forces the enemy's camp, after which he takes the capital city of the Æqui, subdues the Volsci, and recovers
 365. Sutrium from the Hetrurians. §. II. The next year (when the Commonwealth is again governed by Military Tribunes) the Roman arms prosper abroad. The Four new Tribes. year following is a year of peace. FOUR NEW TRIBES are added to the
 367. TWENTY-ONE. §. III. The expectation of a new war makes the Romans
 368. chuse Camillus to be one of the six Military Tribunes for the next year. He leads the Roman troops, first against the Volsci of Antium, and then against the Hetrurians; and has success in both expeditions. The Latines and Hernici submit.

C H A P. II.

369. §. I. The next year Military Tribunes being again chosen to the Government, M. Manlius (who saved the Capitol) uses such methods to make himself popular, as alarm the Senate. They name A. Cornelius Cossus Dictator. He summons Manlius to appear before him. Manlius not answering directly to the Dictator's question is committed to prison, Cossus soon after resigns the Dictatorship. The Senate fearing the rage of the People, who are devoted to Manlius, set him at liberty. §. II. Camillus is chosen one of the Military Tribunes for the next year. Two of the Tribunes of the Commons impeach
 370. Manlius of Treason, and, by sentence of the People, he is thrown headlong
 M. Manlius put to death. from the Tarpeian rock.

C H A P.

C H A P. III.

§. I. During the six following years, and the beginning of the seventh, Rome is almost intirely free from civil diffensions; but wars are carried on abroad against the Prænetini and Volsci, with very little interruption. Camillus being one of the Military Tribunes in the year 373, gives a remarkable proof of his moderation, when disrespectfully treated by one of his Collegues.

C H A P. IV.

§. I. The lower sort of the People of Rome are over-awed and oppress'd by the Great and the Rich; and the Commons in general lose that spirit and courage they formerly had in contending with the Nobles. 377.
 §. II. In the midst of this extreme dejection, the vanity of a woman sets three bold and enterprising men at work to raise the fortune of the Plebeians higher than ever, and to obtain even the dignity of the Consulship for persons of that order. The three who form this design are M. Fabius Ambustus, the Lady's Father, (a Patrician) C. Licinius Stolo, her Husband (a Plebeian) and L. Sextius, another Plebeian of great distinction. The two latter having obtained the office of Tribunes of the People, propose a law for the restraining of Usury, another to prohibit any citizen from possessing more than 500 acres of land, and a third to restore the Consulship, and make it an establish'd rule for the future, that of the two Consuls one shall indispensably be a Plebeian. The Senate and Patricians on this occasion gain over to them eight of the Tribunes, who pronouncing the word Veto when the affair is brought before the Tribes, quash the whole project for the present. LICINIAN LAWS.
 §. III. Licinius and Sextius in revenge, and to gain their point, being continued in the office of Tribunes of the Commons, oppose and hinder for four years successively any election of Military Tribunes; and the Republick falls into a kind of anarchy. But, in the fifth year, a new war breaking out obliges them to desist from their opposition; and then six Military Tribunes, all Patricians, are chosen to the government. The war continuing, Military Tribunes are again elected, and these too are six men of the Patrician order. Nevertheless, as Fabius Ambustus happens to be one of the number, Sextius and Licinius, having his countenance and assistance, take this opportunity to renew their proposal of the three Laws; to which they add a fourth, importing, that Ten Guardians, instead of Two, shall have the care of the Sybilline Books, and that of these ten, five shall be Plebeian. The determination of the whole affair is suspended on account of the absence of so many Citizens, as are employed in the war. 378.
 §. IV. The next year the Republick has again six Patrician Governors, but the Senate is obliged to have recourse to a Dictator, and Camillus is rais'd (a fourth time) to that dignity. He disperses by his authority an assembly of the Tribes, 382.
 which 383.

- which the Tribunes had conceived in order to get the Laws passed; and presently after resigns his post. §. V. P. Manlius is chosen Dictator in his Plebeian room. This Dictator names a Plebeian to be his General of the Horse, the first instance of such a nomination. The Tribunes having a supreme magistrate so favourable to them, think of passing their affair with fresh vigour; but the People themselves grow cold and indifferent as to that part of the project which relates to the Consulate. Sextius and Licinius, enraged heret, tell them plainly in a general assembly, that either that law, which qualifies Plebeians for the Consulate, shall pass, or none; and that if they persist in such ingratitude to their protectors, they will no longer serve in the office of the Tribuneship. Appius Claudius (grandson of the Decemvir) makes a speech, expatiating on the insolence shewn in such a declaration. The decision of the affair is put off. Soon after the Commons obtain the Law concerning the Sybil's Books, and then suffer new Military Tribunes to be chosen, all Patricians. §. VI. The contest relating to the other Laws is revived with great heat, but is again suspended by the approach of an army of Gauls. Camillus is appointed Dictator (a fifth time.)
 He defeats the enemy, and has a Triumph at his return to Rome. §. VII.
 The Tribunes Sextius and Licinius being resolved to carry their point, summon the Tribes and proceed immediately to take the voices. Upon the Dictator's opposing their measures, they send an officer to seize him and carry him to prison. This causes a great commotion and struggle. The Dictator and Senate retire to the Senate-house to consider what is best to be done, and they come to a resolution to concede that one of the Consuls may be a Plebeian.
 Hereupon the Centuries choose L. Æmilius and L. Sextius (the Tribune) to be Consuls. But now the Senate refuse to confirm the election of the latter, which occasions new and warm contentions. The Dictator, to quiet them, proposes, that the prerogative of judging in civil causes be taken from the Consulate, and Prætors be appointed to perform that function, and that these Prætors be always Patricians. Hereto both parties agree, and the Senate acquiesce in having a Plebeian Consul. §. VIII. The Curule Ædileship is establish'd in favour of the Patricians. The Tribunes soon after obtain, that Plebeians may be chosen to the Curule Ædileship. §. IX. The next year, L. Genucius and Q. Servilius being Consuls, a dreadful plague in Rome carries off many persons of distinction, among whom is the great Camillus.

C H A P. V.

- §. I. In the following Consulate (of C. Sulpicius and C. Licinius Stolo) the plague continuing, and the Romans, to remove it, having in vain tried the superstitious ceremony of the Lectisternium, they endeavour to appease the Gods by instituting to their honour the Scenic Shews. This expedient also failing, they try another the next year (L. Æmilius (the 2d time) and Cn.

Cn. Genucius being Consuls) which is to create a Dictator to drive a Nail into the wall of the Temple of Jupiter Capitolinus. The plague ceases; but L. Manlius Imperiosus the Dictator is unwilling to resign his authority, and uses violence to make the People list themselves for a war with the Hernici. The Tribunes however oblige him to abdicate; and in the following Consulate of Q. Servilius and L. Genucius (both Consuls a 2d time) he is cited by the Tribune Pomponius to answer for his misconduct during his Dictatorship, and particularly for his cruelty to his own son, named Titus. The son, who was in the country, hearing of what had pass'd, comes to Rome, surprizes Pomponius in his bed, and, by threatening to stab him, makes him swear to desist from the prosecution. The People, pleased with the filial piety of young Manlius, give him soon after the post of Legionary Tribune (or Colonel.) §. II. In this same year the earth opens on a sudden in the midst of the Forum, and continues open to the great terror of the City. M. Curtius, a young Patrician, moved by an obscure answer of the Augurs, who had been thereupon consulted, leaps into the gulph completely armed and on horseback. Some authors say, that the earth immediately closed. §. III. The Consul Genucius, the first Plebeian Rome had ever placed at the head of an Army, conducts the war against the Hernici. He falls into an ambush, his Legions are routed, and he himself slain. This disaster is imputed by the Patricians to the anger of the Gods on account of the profanation of the Augural Ceremonies, by inaugurating a Plebeian. The surviving Consul names Appius Claudius Dictator, who, carrying on the war, gains a victory, but with great loss. §. IV. The People, notwithstanding the clamours of the Patricians, chuse Licinius Stolo (that famous Plebeian) a 2d time to the Consulate. They give him for a Collegue C. Sulpicius Peticus. But the Tyburtes revolting soon after, and it being suspected that they were encouraged to this revolt by a secret promise of assistance from the Gauls, it is thought necessary to create a Dictator. T. Quinctius Pennas is named to that dignity. The Gauls advance within three miles of Rome, incamping on the banks of the Anio. The Romans pitch their camp on the opposite side, a bridge parts the two armies. On this bridge young Manlius in single combat slays the mightiest champion of the Gauls, a man of gigantick stature; which accident so discourages them, that they leave their camp in the night and in confusion. The next year (in the Consulate of M. Fabius Ambustus and C. Pœtelius Libo) the Gauls appear again in the neighbourhood of Rome; and the Romans (under the conduct of Servilius Ahala, created Dictator) once more defeat them. The two Consuls make war with success against the Tyburtes and the Hernici.

L. Manlius Imperi-ofus.

391.

CURTIUS.

PLEBEIAN
GENERAL.

392

T. Manlius Tor-quatus.

393.

408. cum, and burns it. The Secular Games are celebrated for the second time according to Fast. Cap. §. VI. The next year's Consuls, M. Fabius Dorso and S. Sulpicius Camerinus, name L. Furius Camillus to be Dictator (a second time) on occasion of a war with a new enemy, the Aurunci. Furius overthrows them in battle, and at his return builds a Temple, which he had vowed, during the action, to Juno Moneta. The year following, the Romans imagining that the Goddess, conformable to her name MONETA, admonish'd them by
409. Prodigies of the impending wrath of the Gods, C. Marcius Rutilus (now Consul a second time) and T. Manlius (Consul a second time) appoint P. Valerius to be Dictator, to order the Celebration of the Feræ Latinæ.

C H A P. VIII.

410. §. I. In the succeeding administration of M. Valerius Corvus (a third time Consul) and Cornelius Cossius Arvina, happens the FIRST RUPTURE between the ROMANS and SAMNITES, on occasion of a war which the latter had carried on with success against the people of Capua in Campania. The Campanians, to engage the Romans to succour them in their distress, make a surrender of themselves and their country to the Republick. Hereupon Valerius is directed to march an army into Campania, and Cornelius to carry the war into
- SAMNITE
WAR. §. II. Cornelius, on the other hand, by an imprudent march, brings his army into danger of being entirely cut off by the enemy; however, he is delivered out of his difficulty by a stratagem, suggested and executed by a Legionary Tribune named P. Decius Mus; and presently after, following the advice of the same Decius, he gains a victory over the Samnites, who lose 30,000 men in the action. Decius is rewarded with many honours. §. III. Valerius obtains a second victory over the Samnites in Campania. These successes make the Romans respected abroad.

C H A P. IX.

411. §. I. C. Martius Rutilus is elected (the fourth time) to the Consulate, and with him Q. Servilius Ahala. The former marches an army into Campania. He finds a general depravation of manners in some Cohorts of Roman soldiers, who had been left in Capua all the winter; and discovers that they had plotted to make that delightful City their own, and to settle there. To disappoint this scheme, he artfully contrives to send away the most mutinous and enterprizing, without treating them disgracefully, or letting his design appear. The soldiers at length suspecting it, are alarmed with the apprehension of punishment. All the soldiers of one Cohort desert. These having posted themselves advantageously near Anxur, are soon joined by great numbers of malecontents from the City and the Camp. They force one Quinticius, an old soldier, whom they find employed in husbandry, to be their leader to conduct them to Rome. Valerius Corvus is hereupon named Dictator, to march an army against the mutineers. He meets them eight miles from Rome, comes to a parley with them, and, being a man extremely beloved by the soldiers, prevails with them to submit; yet the Rebels, besides pardon, obtain some concessions from the Republick.

C H A P. X.

§. I. The Romans, by these condescensions to the Rebels, lose credit among their neighbours. Privernum revolts, but is quickly reduced by C. Plautius Hypsæus (now the 2d time Consul.) His Collegue L. Æmilius lays waste the country of the Samnites, who thereupon sue for peace, and an alliance with Rome. These being obtained, they turn their arms once more against the Sidicini, who being refused succour by the Senate at Rome, even upon the terms of being subject to the Republick, give themselves to the Latines, already in arms, to recover their independence. The Campanians join the Latines. An army, formed of these three nations, enters Samnium, but soon retires. §. II. The Samnites send an embassy to the Republick, to complain of her suffering the Latines and Campanians to commit hostilities in Samnium. They receive an answer unsatisfactory to them, offensive to the Campanians, and which, seeming to betray a sense of weakness in the Romans, elates the spirits of the Latines. Manlius Torquatus is promoted (a 3d time) to the Consulate with P. Decius Mus. Alexander King of Epirus, uncle of Alexander the Great, comes into Italy on the invitation of the Tarentines, to make war with the Bruttians, and concludes an alliance of friendship with Rome. §. III. The Romans summon ten of the Latine Chiefs to appear at Rome, and give account of their preparations for war. The Latine Council send L. Annius with nine more to Rome, to demand, as the condition of renewing the alliance between the two nations, that one of the Consuls and half of the Senate of Rome be for the future chosen out of the LATINES. This demand is rejeeted with indignation, and war is declared. §. IV. Manlius and Decius having marched two armies into the field, and incamped near the enemy, dream both of them the same dream concerning the event of the war. §. V. The Consul Manlius causes his own son to be beheaded, for having fought in single combat with one of the enemies officers, tho' he proved victorious; because he had fought without leave from his General. §. VI. The Romans come to a battle with the Latines. The wing where the Consul Decius commands beginning to lose ground, he, to recover the day to his party, and pursuant to the interpretation which had been given of his dream, devotes himself to death, rushing alone into the thickest of the enemy. His troops getting fresh courage and strength from superstition, and Manlius conducting the battle with great skill, the Latines are totally routed, and fly to Minturnæ. Manlius gives them a second overthrow, after which both they and the Campanians submit, and are most of them dispossess'd of their lands. §. VII. In the following Consulate of Q. Publilius and T. Æmilius some of the Latines rebel, and form two armies. Publilius succeeding in an expedition against one of them, is decreed a Triumph. Æmilius, not having equal success against the other, is refused that honour. Hereupon he inveighs against the Senate, and incites the People to sedition; and because the Senate, to prevent disturbances, order him to name a Dictator, he in revenge nominates to that dignity his Plebeian Collegue. The Dictator, during his whole administration, employs his

LATINE WAR.Severity of Manlius Torquatus.Devote-ment of DECIVS.

414.

power and influence for the advantage of the Plebeians and obtains some laws in their favour. The Senate to pique Æmilius, tender of his honour, enable the
 415. next year's Consuls, L. Furius Camillus and C. Mænius, to finish with glory the war which he had left unfinished. §. VIII. The Romans determine the LATINES fate of the several conquered Cities. The Latines, from being Allies, are subjected. made Subjects of Rome.

C H A P. XI.

416. §. I. In the following Consulate of C. Sulpicius Longus and P. Ælius PLEBEIAN Pœtus, PUBLILIUS, tho' a Plebeian, obtains the PRÆTORSHIP; so that all PRÆTOR. the great Dignities in the State, except those of the Priesthood, are now common to the two Orders. From this year 416, to the year 425, the most memorable events are, The invention of Moveable Towers and Cover'd Galleries, 418. by the Consul M. Valerius Corvus (in the year 418) at the siege of Cale, the chief City of the Ausones, allies of the Sidicini. The Republic's changing the custom of raising a new army upon every change of Consuls. The reduction of the Sidicini (probably in 420.) The addition of two new Tribes (in 421)
 Two new Tribes. to the 27 old ones. A plot formed (in 422) by some hundreds of Roman Wo-422. men to poison their Husbands. The revolt of Privernum (in 423) the reduc-Privernum. tion of that City (in 424) and the courageous and noble answer given by one of 424. the Citizens, when questioned by the Roman Senate concerning the conduct which the Privernates would observe for the future.

C H A P. XII.

425. §. I. The next year (in the consulate of C. Plautius Proculus and P. Cornelius Scapula) the Romans give umbrage to the Samnites, by planting a Colony in their neighbourhood. And the Palæpolitans make an irruption into the Roman Territory. §. II. A remarkable instance of the Romans abhorrence of Malice, in the prosecution of a criminal. §. III. The Fasces be-426. ing transferred to Q. Publilius (now a 2d time Consul) and L. Cornelius Lentulus, the former marches an army against the Palæpolitans. Cornelius incamps another near Capua, to keep in awe the Campanians, who are thought to be gain'd over by the Samnites, between whom and the Republic there is a 427. new rupture. §. IV. The next year's Consuls, C. Pœtelius Libo and L.
 Papirius Mugillanus, having their forces strengthened by the Lucanians, and Apulians, take some Towns from the Samnites. And Publilius (who with the Title of PROCONSUL is continued at the head of the same army he had commanded the last year when Consul) takes Palæpolis by means of a stratagem laid and executed by two of the Citizens. For this exploit Publilius, A Procon- tho' but a Proconsul, is decreed a TRIUMPH. §. V. The Tarentines havsul tri- ing left their protector King Alexander of Epirus, and being jealous of the umphs. growing power of Rome, by an artful stratagem deprive her of all assistance from the Lucanians, seducing them into a league with the Samnites. §. VI.
 A Law in About this time the infamous passion of a Roman, named Papirius, for one favour of of his insolvent Debtors, occasions the passing of a law at Rome, whereby Debtors. CREDITORS are disabled from seizing the Persons of their DEBTORS.

C H A P. XIII.

§. I. The Vestini, a People on the coast of the Adriatick sea, take arms against Rome, in the Consulate of L. Furius Camillus and D. Junius Brutus. Brutus defeats them in battle. §. II. Camillus, who was to act against the Samnites, falling sick, names to the Dictatorship L. Papirius Cursor, who appoints Quintus Fabius Rullianus to be his General of the Horse. The Dictator having taken the field against the Samnites, returns soon after to Rome on account of some Religious Scruple, but first forbids Fabius to hazard a battle with the enemy during his absence. Fabius nevertheless attacks the Samnites, and gains a notable victory; after which he burns all the spoil, that it may not do honour to the Dictator, by being carried in his Triumphal Procession. Papirius hastens back to the camp to punish his disobedient General of the Horse. Fabius is rescued out of the hands of the Lictors, and escapes to Rome. His father immediately gets the Senators together, in order to obtain a favourable decree for him. Papirius arrives on a sudden, takes his place in the Senate, and orders his Lictors to seize young Fabius. The father hereupon appeals to the People. Papirius, tho' the thing is unprecedented, does not dispute the legality of the appeal; but the People themselves, when the affair comes before them, are unwilling to interpose their Authority; they chuse rather to become intercessors with the Dictator, who at their request pardons the offender. §. II. Papirius returns to the camp with a new General of the Horse, and finding his army ill-affected to him, because of his severity in command, changes his manner on a sudden, becomes familiar with his soldiers, and in a little time gains their affections. After which he reduces the Samnites to sue for peace. §. IV. The Senate grant the Samnites only a year's truce, which the latter break so soon as they hear that Papirius has quitted the Dictatorship: They are joined by the Apulians. Little progress is made in the war this year, when C. Sulpicius Longus and Q. Aulius Cerretanus are Consuls. But their successors, Q. Fabius (who had been General of the Horse to Papirius) and L. Fulvius Curvus, by skilful conduct obtain a compleat victory over the enemy. §. V. The Samnites repenting of their breach of the Truce, endeavour to pacify the Romans by making restitution of what plunder they had taken contrary to the faith of the Treaty.

C H A P. XIV.

§. I. The Samnites being refused a Peace, notwithstanding the satisfaction they have made for the breach of the Truce, prepare to carry on the war with vigour: and they appoint one Pontius, an able officer, to be their General. At Rome T. Veturius and Sp. Posthumius are chosen Consuls. Pontius by a stratagem draws these Generals with their Legions into a dangerous pass (called afterwards the Caudine Forks) where they are surrounded by the Samnites, and have no possibility of forcing their way out of it. The Samnite General being undetermined in what manner to treat the Romans, is advised by his father, either in a friendly way to set them all free, or without mercy to cut them

- all off. The son, rejecting this advice, will spare the lives of the Romans, but demands as the condition, That they all pass unarm'd under the Yoke, Officers and Soldiers; that they engage to draw all their forces out of Samnium, and give hostages for the performance of this article. The Romans, after some demur, submit to the terms imposed, being exhorted to it by L. Lentulus, a considerable Officer in the army. The Consuls, at their return to Rome, being ashamed to appear in publick, instantly name a Dictator to hold the Comitia for electing new Consuls. This election however is not made till the Government falls into an Inter-regnum. §. II. And then the Fasces are given to Papirius Cursor (a 2d time) and to Publilius Philo (a 3d time.) The Treaty made with the Samnites being laid before the Senate, Posthumius (one of those Consuls who had been parties to it) declares that the Roman People are not bound by it, as not being made by their orders; that the honour of the Republick will be saved by surrendering him and the rest of the Officers concerned in that Treaty to the Samnites, which he moves may be forthwith done. This proposal is approved, and put in execution by a Fecialis appointed thereto; but Pontius, the Samnite General, reproaching the Romans with baseness and breach of faith, refuses to accept the prisoners in satisfaction of the Treaty. §. III. Satricum revolts from the Romans; and the Samnites surprize Fregellæ, a Roman Colony, and, after a promise of quarter, burn the inhabitants alive. C. Mænius, being appointed Dictator to take cognizance of treasonable practices, and alledging all canvassing for Officers to be Treason against the State, cites several Patricians to trial on accusations of that sort; but he is forced, by the clamour of the whole body of the Nobles, to desist; and being himself accused of the same crime, abdicates his office, stands a trial, and is acquitted.*

C H A P. XV.

- §. I. Cornelius Lentulus being created Dictator, leads an army against the Samnites incamped near Caudium, and gives them a great overthrow. Papirius Cursor, his General of the Horse, takes from them Luceria (in Apulia) and rescues the 600 Roman Knights, who had been given as Hostages upon the Treaty with Pontius. §. II. Papirius is chosen (a 3d time) and Q. Aulius Cerretannus (a 2d time) to the Consulate. The latter takes Ferentum, the former recovers Satricum from the Samnites. The Character of Papirius. §. III. In the Consulate of L. Plautius and M. Follus, a two years Truce is granted to some Cities of Samnium. The Roman arms prosper in Apulia. Campania is turned into a Roman Præfecture. Two new TRIBES are formed, which make the whole number 31. §. IV. The next year (Q. Æmilius and C. Junius being Consuls) all Apulia is subdued. Antium receives laws from Rome for its future government. The succeeding Consuls, Sp. Nautius and M. Popilius, name a Dictator, to begin the siege of Saticula, a Campanian City in alliance with the Samnites; and notwithstanding that those two great men, Papirius Cursor and Publilius Philo, are both chosen (the 4th time) to the Consulate for the year following, the carrying on of that siege is committed to another Dictator Q. Fabius, the enemy and rival of Papirius. Fabius having taken* taken Saticula, marches to besiege Sora (in the country of the Volsci) which had gone over to the Samnites. By an artful stratagem he defeats the Samnites in the field, but leaves the siege of Sora to be finished by the next year's Consuls, M. Pætilius, and C. Sulpicius (who is now chosen the third time.) 439.

These Generals take Sora by means of a stratagem suggested to them by a deserter from the place. §. V. The Romans surprize three Cities of the Ausones in one day. Luceria in Apulia rebels, and is again reduced. The Samnites are once more defeated in battle by the Romans. The next year, when L. Papirius Cursor (a fifth time) and C. Junius Brutus (a second time) are Consuls, C. Pætilius Libo is named Dictator to carry on the war. He recovers several Cities from the Samnites. The year following, when M. Valerius and P. Decius are in the Consulate, the Romans being alarmed with the apprehensions of a war with all Hetruria, appoint C. Sulpicius Longus Dictator to conduct it; but no hostilities ensue on either side. 440. 441.

C H A P. XVI.

§. I. Appius Claudius, one of the Censors of Rome, displeases the Senate, by admitting the SONS OF FREED MEN into that Body. The People reform this abuse the next year (when C. Junius (the third time) and Q. Æmilius (the second time) are Consuls) and make some new regulations. 442.
 §. II. Æmilius routs the Hetrurians. §. III. During the administration of Q. Fabius (a second time Consul) and C. Marcius, the Censor Appius obstinately refuses to quit his office, though his eighteen months (the legal time for its duration) are expired, presuming on the favour of the People, because he had made an Aqueduct to bring water to Rome, and a fine road between that City and Capua. He is prosecuted before the People; seven of the Tribunes are against him, but the other three taking him under their protection, he carries his point, and keeps his post. 443.
 APPIUS CLAUDIUS CENSOR.

C H A P. XVII.

§. I. The Consul Fabius defeats the Hetrurians in battle near Sutrium. He penetrates into the Ciminian Forest, deemed impervious; after which he gives the enemy a second overthrow. §. II. The Roman army, under the Consul Marcius, not having equal success against the Samnites, and the Consul falling sick, the Senate orders Fabius to name Papirius Cursor (the man he most hates) to be Dictator to carry on that war. Fabius, after some struggle with himself, complies. §. III. He continues (with the title of Proconsul) to conduct the war against the Hetrurians, and routs them once more, though the soldiers of their army had bound themselves by oaths to conquer or die. §. IV. The Dictator Papirius is no less successful against the Samnites, who, to raise the courage of their Troops, had given them finer arms than usual. He returns to Rome, and, being now very old, retires 444.

445. res for the rest of his life from publick business. §. V. Q. Fabius (a third time) and P. Decius Mus, (a second time), are chosen Consuls. Fabius conducts the war with success against the Samnites, assisted by the Marfi and Peligni. Decius reduces the Hetrurians to sue for an Alliance with Rome, but they obtain only a truce for one year. He subdues all Umbria. §. VI. Appius Claudius, the Censor, is chosen to the Consulate with L. Volumnius. Appius stays at Rome, while Fabius (in quality of Proconsul) carries on the war successfully in Samnium, and Volumnius leads an army with success against the Salentines. In the following Consulate of Q. Marcius and P. Cornelius the HERNICI rebel, and are subdued; and the SAMNITES are twice defeated. 446. The Fasces being transferred to Posthumius Megellus and Tib. Minucius, the Romans gain two more victories over the Samnites, but Minucius is slain in the second battle. 447. §. VII. In the succeeding Consulate of Sempronius Sophus and P. Sulpicius Saverrio, the Samnites request and obtain a renewal of their alliance with Rome. The ÆQUI, who had lately rebell'd, are totally subdued.

C H A P. XVIII.

450. §. I. The renowned Q. FABIVS being CENSOR this year, acquires the surname of MAXIMUS, for his reformation of an abuse introduced by APPIUS, who had dispersed great numbers of the Freed Men and meanest of the People into all the Rustick Tribes, thereby to influence the Elections according to his own humour. (One Flavius, who had been a Scribe, is by the strength of this base faction raised to the Curule Ædileship.) Fabius reconfines those mean fellows to the four City Tribes. §. II. The next year (when Cornelius Lentulus and L. Genucius are Consuls) is spent chiefly in sending Colonies to the Conquer'd Cities. In the succeeding Consulate of Livius Denter and Æmilius Paulus, the art of Painting is introduced at Rome by C. Fabius, surnamed PICTOR. Cleonymus, son of Cleomenes, King of Sparta, brings a fleet upon the coast of Italy, and makes two descents there without success. 451. §. III. All the following year the Republick is govern'd by two Dictators, successively created, Q. Fabius and Valerius Corvus. The former quells an insurrection of the Marfi; the latter obtains a signal victory over the Hetrurians, to whom afterwards a Truce is granted for two years.

C H A P. XIX.

453. *§. I. In the year of Rome 453, when Valerius Corvus is the fifth time Consul, and has Q. Apulius Pania for his Colleague, a LAW is passed at the motion of two Tribunes, of the name of Ogulnius, to qualify PLEBEIANS for the Pontificate and Augurate. §. II. The Lex Valeria is confirmed anew. PLEBEIAN
PONTIFI-
CES and AUGURS. §. III. Q. Fabius Maximus declines the Consulship, to which the People would again raise him, and at his own request obtains the Curule Ædileship, in which office he gains new glory.*

C H A P.

C H A P. XX.

§. I. The Hetrurians break the Truce with Rome, in the Consulate of M. Fulvius Pætinus and T. Manlius Torquatus. Picenum obtains an alliance with the Republick. The Consul Manlius, who was to act against the Hetrurians, being killed by a fall from his horse, Valerius Corvus is by every voice in the Comitia declared Consul (the 6th time) to succeed him. The very presence of so renowned a warrior strikes a terror into the enemy; they quit the field, and retire into their Towns. (This was the last Military expedition of that great man, who lived to an hundred years of age. 454.
 §. II. In the close of the following Consulate of Cn. Fulvius and L. Cornelius Scipio, a report being spread, that both the Hetrurians and the Samnites (which last had broke their alliance with Rome) were making mighty preparations to attack the Republick, the Romans cast their eyes on the great Fabius to be one of their Consuls for the new year, and they oblige him to accept the office contrary to his inclination; but, at his request, gave him P. Decius Mus (who had been Consul with him in the year 445) to be his Collegue. The Hetrurians, instead of taking the field, come to a resolution to ask peace; so that the Consuls march their two armies into Samnium, and make terrible devastations in that country. 455. 456.

C H A P. XXI.

§. I. Appius Claudius, who two years before had made a fruitless attempt to exclude the Plebeians from the Consulate, endeavours now with the same view to get the Consular Fasces for Fabius and himself. Fabius being president in the Comitia, opposes his own re-election; whereupon Volumnius Flamma, a Plebeian, is joined with Appius in the Consulship. Fabius and Decius (in quality of Proconsuls) are continued in the command of their respective armies for six months longer. Fabius binds the Lucanians from joining the Samnites. Decius gains great advantages over the latter, to compleat whose destruction Volumnius marches a new army into Samnium. 457.
 §. II. But he soon after leaves that country to go to the assistance of his Collegue Appius, much embarrassed with a war against the Hetrurians, strengthened by a body of Samnites and another of Gauls. Appius pretends to be displeased with his arrival, upon which Volumnius offers to lead back his army into Samnium: But the troops of Appius oppose this motion. The united armies of the two Consuls come to a battle with the enemy, and totally defeat them. Appius Claudius and Volumnius.
 §. III. After this Volumnius returns into his own province, and gains a new victory over the Samnites, who (after Fabius and Decius, whose Proconsulate was expired, were returned to Rome) had made an incursion into Campania.

C H A P. XXII.

§. I. The Republick being alarmed by accounts from Appius, of extraordinary preparations for war by the Hetrurians and their allies, (the Umbrians, Gauls, and Samnites) elect Fabius (the 5th time) to the Consulate, and, at his request, the Comitia grant him Decius again for a Collegue, tho' the first Centuries have already voted for Volumnius. Volumnius himself approves of the request. §. II. A rivalry happens at this time between the Patrician and Plebeian Ladies for the reputation of strict Chastity. §. III. When the time comes for the Consuls to take the field, the Senate decree the conduct of the war against the Hetrurians to Fabius. Decius (to comply with the humour of his party, the Plebeians) refuses to yield that command to his Patrician Collegue, unless it fall to him by lot; and he appeals from the Senate's decree to the People. The People having heard the pleas of the two competitors, and consider'd the present exigence, determine in favour of Fabius as the greater General. §. IV. Fabius in his way to the camp being informed that Appius has fortified it in such an extraordinary manner as betrays fear, sends orders before him immediately to level the fortifications: and after his arrival, instead of shutting up his soldiers within Lines, he keeps them in constant motion by frequent marches and counter-marches. Before he enters upon action, he returns to Rome, but for what reason is uncertain. The Senate that he may be able to contend with the enemy, judging it necessary to strengthen him by a second army, Fabius desires that his Collegue Decius may be the General to command it; which request is granted. The Consuls, having sent Volumnius with an army into Samnium, and leaving two other armies incamped near the city, to cover it on the side of Hetruria, take the field. The forces of the enemy are divided into two bodies, which incamp separately: One consists of Samnites (who had been driven out of their own country) and Gauls; the other of Hetrurians and Umbrians. Fabius ordering the two armies he had left near Rome to go and ravage a part of Hetruria, the Hetrurians and Umbrians march away to defend it, and in their absence the Consuls come to a battle with the united Gauls and Samnites. The left wing of the Romans, which Decius commands, being terrified and broken by the armed Chariots used by the Gauls, he, to recover the courage of his men, devotes himself to death in the same manner his father had done on the like occasion. After this Fabius obtains a compleat victory. §. V. Before the end of the year the Samnites raise two new armies, which are routed by the forces of Appius, now Prætor of Rome, and the Proconsul Volumnius. Rome is afflicted by a Plague, and terrified by Prodigies.

C H A P. XXIII.

§. I. L. Posthumius (the second time) and M. Atilius Regulus are chosen 459.
 Consuls. Posthumius falling sick, the war is carried on against the Samnites by Atilius at the head of only one Consular army. The Samnites have the advantage in this campaign, till Posthumius, being recovered, brings a second Roman army into the field; they then retire, and leave their country open to be pillaged. While Posthumius is employed in taking some of their Towns, Atilius marches to the relief of Luceria (in Apulia) besieged (as he was told) by the Samnites. He meets the enemy in his way, and comes to a battle with them, the success of which is such, that neither army cares to try a second engagement. Their situation however forces them to it; and then Atilius, by singular bravery and skill, obtains the victory. §. II. In the mean time Posthumius, without orders from the Senate, leaves Samnium, and marches into Hetruria, where he reduces three of the Lucumonies to sue for peace. Nevertheless, the Fathers, at his return to Rome, refuse him a Triumph, because of his irregular proceedings. He obtains it however by the favour of the People. §. III. In the new Consulate of L. Papirius Cursor (son of the famous Papirius) and Sp. Carvilius, the Samnite war is continued. 460.
 The Samnites make 16000 of their soldiers bind themselves by oaths and imprecations to conquer or die. Their whole army consists of 36000. While Carvilius lays siege to Cominium, in the eastern extremity of Samnium, Papirius leads his forces against the formidable army of the enemy, incamped near Aquilonia in Hirpinia. He gains the victory by the new stratagem of making the Muleteers and other servants of his army (whom he mounted upon Mules, and sent to some distance) appear in the heat of the action, like a new army come to his assistance. §. IV. Carvilius takes Cominium; after which the two Consuls join their forces to compleat the destruction of the Samnites. But the war breaking out afresh in Hetruria, Carvilius leads his army into that country, and reduces the enemy to buy a truce for a year. Both the Consuls have Triumphs. In this year a Sun-dial is the first time seen at Rome. Sun dial.
 §. V. A new regulation is made at Rome, relating to the Guardianship of Orphans, and another relating to the Publick Games.

C H A P. XXIV.

§. I. Q. Fabius Gurges (son of Fabius Maximus) is chosen to the Con- 461.
 sulate, though his father had opposed his promotion. The Collegue given him is Junius Brutus Scæva. Neither the one nor the other is well qualified to conduct an army. Junius however being well assisted by Carvilius, the late Consul, makes a successful expedition against the Falisci in Hetruria. But Gurges, through his ill conduct, is shamefully vanquished in a battle with the Samnites.

- Samnites. The People of Rome having resolved to punish him, old Fabius pacifies them, by offering to serve under his son the remainder of the Campaign. Gurgès, assisted by his Father's counsel, obtains a glorious victory over the enemy; and Pontius, the famous Samnite General, is taken prisoner. §. II. The Romans, to put a stop to the Plague, send Ambassadors to bring from Epidaurus the God Æsculapius, worshipp'd there under the form of a serpent. §. III. The God arrives on the beginning of the next Consulate of L. Posthumius (now the third time chosen) and Junius Brutus Bubulcus. Posthumius proudly assumes to himself the conduct of the war in Samnium, without drawing lots with his Colleague, or waiting for a decree of the Senate in his favour. When he comes into the field, he, contrary to the will of the Senate, obliges Fabius Gurgès, now Proconsul, to desist from the siege of Cominium (which had been retaken by the Samnites) and leave it to him. He takes that town and another. The Senate, nevertheless, to punish his disobedience, mortify him in several instances; and in the succeeding Consulate (of P. Cornelius Rufinus and Manius Curius Dentatus) he is fined by the People for a misdemeanour during his Magistracy. §. IV. The Consul CURIUS (a Hero famous for living in a voluntary poverty) reduces the Samnites to ask PEACE, which is now granted them the 4th time, on the conditions prescribed by Curius, whom they in vain endeavour to bribe. §. V. He reduces SABINIA to a state of subjection to the Republick, and has two Triumphs decreed him for his exploits in one year. He is afterwards accused of embezzling some of the spoil taken from the enemy, but is honourably acquitted. §. VI. In quality of Proconsul he carries the war into Lucania, the new Consuls, M. Valerius Corvinus and Q. Cœdicius Noctua, spending their whole year in works of peace, and in sending Colonies to the conquer'd Cities. To relieve the Prætor of Rome, three new judges are created to try Malefactors. The cruelty of a Creditor to his Debtor, for whom he had conceived an infamous passion, occasions great commotions in Rome in the second Consulates of Q. Marcius Tremulus and P. Cornelius Arvina, and a new Secession of the People in the following year, when M. Claudius Marcellus and C. Nautius Rutilus are Consuls. The Patricians, to effect a reconciliation, are obliged to make concessions. Fabius Maximus, in his old age, is made Dictator, to finish the accommodation; which done, he presides in the Comitia, where M. Valerius Potitus and C. Ælius Pœtus are chosen Consuls. He soon after dies. The year of the new Consuls, proves barren of great events.

C H A P. XXV.

- §. I. Nothing memorable happens the next year, when C. Claudius Canina and M. Æmilius Lepidus are Consuls. But in the following Consulate of C. Servilius Tucca and L. Cæcilius Metellus the Tarentines endeavour privately to stir up both old and new enemies against Rome. The Gauls, called Senones, Senones, murder some Roman Ambassadors, who had been sent to persuade them to desist from the siege of Aretium in Hetruria; and they soon after give the Roman army, under the conduct of Cæcilius, a terrible overthrow. Curius Dentatus revenges this defeat by leading an army into the country of the Gauls, and laying it waste. §. II. The next year the Romans, under the Consuls 470. P. Cornelius and Cn. Domitius, vanquish in battle the Senones, the Boii, and the Hetrurians. The Samnites revolt. In the succeeding Consulate of 471. C. Fabricius and Q. Æmilius Papus, almost all Italy rises in arms against the Republick. Fabricius defeats the confederate forces of the Lucanians, Bruttians, and Samnites. The Romans imagine that the God Mars had fought in person for them. §. III. The Tarentines, who had not yet openly appear'd against Rome, fall in a hostile manner upon a Roman fleet, which chanced to come into their port. The Romans send to demand satisfaction. The Tarentines insult the Ambassadors in the most outrageous manner, and then turn their thoughts to seek an alliance with Pyrrhus King of Epirus, and to invite him into Italy. [A short account of this Prince, and the state of his affairs at this time.] §. IV. The Senate of Rome having long debated, whether to begin a war immediately with the Tarentines, or to defer it, determine for the first, and the People confirm their Decree. L. Æmilius 472. (who, with Q. Marcius, is now in the Consulate) marches an army directly for Tarentum. The mad and ridiculous behaviour of the Citizens on his approach. They resolve to invite Pyrrhus to their assistance. Æmilius endeavours to make them lay aside this design, by generously releasing some Tarentine prisoners he had taken. §. V. Pyrrhus accepts the invitation, and sends before him to Tarentum the famous Cyneas with 3000 men, who take possession of the Citadel.

The Tarentines.

C H A P. XXVI.

§. I. P. Valerius Lævinus and Tib. Coruncanius are chosen Consuls at 473. Rome. Pyrrhus (whose Character is given) being arrived at Tarentum (after escaping shipwreck by a storm which dispersed his Fleet) takes measures to turn the Tarentines from the pursuit of Pleasures, to which they are entirely addicted; and he makes himself absolute master in the place. In the mean time the Romans send Fabricius to visit their Colonies and Allies, with whom they are fallen into some discredit, through the villainous behaviour of a Legion of Campanian Soldiers, which had been sent by the Republick to garrison Rhegium at the request of the inhabitants, and which had massacred the Citizens, and seized the City for themselves. §. II. Pyrrhus bearing at Tarentum that the Consul Lævinus has march'd an army into Lucania, takes the field. He sends a letter to the Consul, incamp'd near Heraclea, requiring him to submit the quarrel between Rome and Tarentum to his arbitration. Lævinus, in answer, returns a defiance. Pyrrhus takes a view of the Roman camp, and admires the order of it; and his confidence of success in the war being thereby abated, he resolves to wait for the junction of his allies before he hazards a battle; but the Romans force him to fight. He gains gains the victory by means of his Elephants. §. III. After this success Pyrrhus forms Designs upon Capua and Naples. Disappointed in these designs, he marches towards Rome with an intention to besiege it. But hearing that the Consul Coruncanius, who had subdued all HETRURIA, is coming with his victorious army against him, he marches back into Campania, where Lævinus having recruited his forces, offers him battle once more. The King declines it, and returns to Tarentum. §. IV. Thither Fabricius and two other Senators from Rome come to treat with him concerning the ransom of Prisoners. He has some private conversation with Fabricius. The King resolves to send Cyneas to Rome with proposals of Peace, one of the conditions of which is to be a release of the Roman prisoners without Ransom. Cyneas comes to Rome, and employs all his arts to effect his desires; but the Senate, moved chiefly by a spirited speech of Appius Claudius the Civilian, (now blind) unanimously refuse to enter into any treaty of Peace with the King while he continues in Italy. Cyneas returns to Tarentum, full of admiration of the Romans.

KING PYRRHUS arrives in Italy.

Garrison of Rhegium.

FABRICI-
US.APPIUS
CLAUDI-US, THE BLIND.

C H A P. XXVII.

§. I. The next year the Romans, under the conduct of their new Consuls, P. Sulpicius Saverrio and P. Decius Mus, come to a second battle with King Pyrrhus, near ASCULUM in Apulia. The circumstances and event of this action are not well known. Pyrrhus retires to Tarentum, and the Consuls into winter-quarters. §. II. The year following, when C. Fabricius and Q. Æmilius Papus (both a second time) are Consuls, the Carthaginians send a fleet to the assistance of the Romans against Pyrrhus, who, they fear, will invade their dominions in Sicily, if he should conclude a Peace with the Romans. (He had been invited thither by the Sicilians.) The Senate refuse the assistance offer'd, yet enter into a Treaty with Carthage. §. III. The Romans and Epirots having again taken the field, and the two armies lying in sight of each other in the territory of Tarentum, the Consuls send a letter to the King, giving him notice of the treachery of his Physician, who had offer'd to poison him for a reward. Pyrrhus, in return for their generosity, releases the Roman Prisoners, and once more sends Cyneas to Rome with proposals of peace, but to no effect. §. IV. Pyrrhus leaving a garrison in Tarentum, passes with his army into SICILY.

Pyrrhus goes into Sicily.

C H A P. XXVIII.

§. I. The state of Sicily at the time of Pyrrhus's arrival there. He makes rapid and extensive conquests in the island. §. II. In the mean time the Romans chuse Cornelius Ruffinus and C. Junius Brutus to the Consulate. These Generals lead their forces against the Samnites, advantageously posted in their mountains, and suffer a shameful defeat. After this, Ruffinus by a stratagem takes Croton from the Bruttians. Locris submits to the Romans, the inhabitants having just massacred the garrison which Pyrrhus had left there. §. III.

4-6.

§. III. The Romans (under their new Consuls Q. Fabius Gurges and C. Genucius) continuing the war with success against the Samnites, Lucanians, and Bruttians, these nations send to intreat Pyrrhus to return to their assistance. The King's affairs in Sicily being now in a bad way, he is glad of so honourable a pretext to leave the Island. His fleet, in its return to Italy, is dispersed and partly destroyed by the Carthaginian fleet. After his landing near Rhegium, he is attacked in his march to Tarentum, by a body of Mamertines (who had passed the Straights expressly) and suffers a considerable loss. He lays waste the territory of the Locrenses, and plunders the Temple of Proserpine. 477. Returns to Italy.

§. IV. Curius Dentatus (a 2d time) and L. Cornelius Lentulus are raised to the Consulate at Rome. The People, from some unaccountable caprice, being unwilling to enlist themselves for the war, Curius confiscates the goods of the first man who refuses, and sells the man himself for a slave, and by this example of severity gets the better of the People's obstinacy. Two armies are raised. While Lentulus leads one into Lucania, Curius leads the other into Samnium, where he comes to a battle with the Epirots in the Taurasian fields, and gives them a total overthrow. He takes their camp; and the Romans admiring the form of it, resolve to make it the future model of their own. 478.

§. V. Pyrrhus leaving a strong garrison in Tarentum, embarks for Epirus under pretence of going to fetch recruits. Embarks for Epirus.

C H A P. XXIX.

§. I. The Consul Curius has a pompous Triumph for his victory over King Pyrrhus, but he refuses what other rewards the Senate offer him. Ruffinus (who has been Consul and Dictator) is by the Censors struck out of the list of Senators for having too much Silver Plate. §. II. Curius is continued for another year in the Consulate, and has for his Colleague Cornelius Merenda. The Tarentines beginning to despise Pyrrhus, force the garrison he had left there to confine themselves in the Citadel. Curius forces the Samnites and Lucanians to retire for refuge to their mountains. But they appear again in the field the next year, when C. Fabius Dorso and C. Claudius Carina are the Roman Consuls. Claudius defeats them in a pitch'd battle. 479.

§. III. Ptolemy Philadelphus sends an Embassy to Rome, to ask an alliance with the Republick. The Romans send Ambassadors into Ægypt. §. IV. The new year's Consuls, L. Papirius Cursor and Sp. Carvilius (both promoted a 2d time) have scarce enter'd Samnium with two armies, when a certain account comes that Pyrrhus is dead. [The manner of his death is related.] This news throws the SAMNITES into despair; they put all to the hazard of a battle, are defeated, and thereby totally subdued by Papirius, after a war which had lasted 72 years. The BRUTTIANS and LUCANIANS submit soon after; and Papirius by negotiation prevails with Milo and the Tarentines to put their City and Citadel into the hands of the Romans; after which the Carthaginians, whose fleet lay before Tarentum, and who seem to have had a design upon it, sail away from the coast. 480.

§. V. The Consular Fasces are transferred to Quinctius Claudius and L. Genucius; and the Death of PYRRHUS. Samnites, Bruttians, &c. subjected to Rome. 481.

Romans

- Rhegium
taken. 483. Romans being now in a condition to punish the perfidious Campanian Legion, which had formerly seized RHEGIUM, besiege it, carry the place, restore it to those of the old inhabitants who had escaped the massacre, and put all who remain of the Legion to death. §. VI. The following Consulate of C. Genucius and Cn. Cornelius produces nothing of moment; and the most memorable thing that happens under the administration of their successors, Q. Ogulnius and C. Fabius Pictor, is the Coining of Silver Money at Rome for the first time. §. VII. The next year, when Appius Claudius (son of Appius the Blind) and P. Sempronius Sophus are Consuls, Picenum is totally subdued, and the SABINES are made entirely Roman, by being admitted to the right of suffrage in the Roman Comitia. §. VIII. The Consuls of the following year, L. Julius and M. Atilius Regulus, commence a war with the Salentines; and this nation, together with the Sarcinates in Umbria, being entirely subdued by the succeeding Consuls, Numerius Fabius and D. Junius Pera, Rome becomes thereby mistress of all the Countries in ITALY from the remotest part of Hetruria to the Ionian Sea, and from the Tyrrhenian Sea to the Adriatick. §. IX. The Republick is now courted by foreign States. The Ambassadors from Apollonia in Macedon being insulted by some of the Citizens of Rome, the offenders are deliver'd up to the Apollonians, and a law is passed to make the like practice general in like cases. In the Consulate of Q. Fabius Gurges and L. Mamilius Vitulus, the Romans regulate their Finances, and appoint four Provincial Quæstors for the four Provinces into which they divide Italy.
484.
485.
486.
487.
488.
- Silver Money coined.
Provincial Quæstors.

THE Roman History.

FIRST BOOK.

CHAP. I.

Of the Original of the Romans, and the Building of Rome.

Sect. I. The first Romans were of Trojan extraction. §. 2. Æneas's voyage to Italy. §. 3. The ancient inhabitants of that country. §. 4. Æneas's reception by Latinus, King of Latium. He marries Lavinia the daughter of Latinus, and builds Lavinium. §. 5. He succeeds to the Kingdom of his father-in-law. §. 6. The death of Æneas, who is succeeded by his son Ascanius. §. 7. Ascanius founds Alba Longa, and yields Lavinium to Æneas Sylvius, the son of Æneas by Lavinia. §. 8. The Latines upon the death of Ascanius unite Lavinium and Alba into one dominion, which they decree to Æneas Sylvius, but give the sovereign power in affairs of religion to Iulus the son of Ascanius. §. 9. The succession of the Kings of Alba from Æneas Sylvius to Amulius, who de-thrones his elder brother Numitor. §. 10. The birth, education, and adventures of Romulus and Remus. They dethrone Amulius, and restore their Grandfather Numitor. §. 11. Numitor sends his two grandsons to plant a colony. They quarrel about the spot of ground where the new city shall stand. Remus is slain. §. 12. ROME is built.

§. 1. THAT Æneas came into Italy after the destruction of Troy, and that the founders of Rome were descended from him and his followers, are points of history sufficiently authorized and established. All the Latine Historians either expressly relate these facts or suppose them; and many of the Greek, less zealous for the Roman glory, adhere to the same tradition. Dionysius indeed speaks of some ancient writers who will not allow Æneas to have travelled farther than Thrace; of others who make him settle in Arcadia; and again of others, who admitting that he passed into Italy, and there planted a colony, yet affirm, that he afterwards went back into his own country, where, they say, he was King of Troy, and at his death left the Kingdom to his son

Ascanius: But all these opinions are rejected by that critical antiquary, who, upon better authorities, has given us the following account of the adventures of the Trojan Prince.

D. Hal. B. §. II. WHEN the Greeks, by the treachery of the sons of Antenor, or
 1. p. 36, by whatever other means it happened, were become masters of Troy, & seq. * Aeneas with the forces under his command retired into the fortress of the city, and defended it bravely for some time; but yielding at length to necessity, he conveyed away his Gods, his father, wife, and children, with every thing he had that was valuable, and, follow'd by a numerous crowd of Trojans, fled to the strong places of Mount Ida. Hither all those of his countrymen who were more anxious than the rest to preserve their liberty flocked to him from the several towns of Troas. His army thus augmented and advantageously posted, he continued quiet, waiting for the departure of the Greeks, who, it was imagined, would return home as soon as they had pillaged the country. But these, after they had enriched themselves with the spoils of Troy and of the neighbouring towns, turn'd their arms against the fugitives, resolving to attack them in their strong holds upon the mountain. Aeneas, to avoid the hazard of being forced in his last refuge, had recourse to negotiation, and, by his heralds, intreated the enemy not to constrain him to a battle. Peace was granted him on condition that he, with his followers, quitted the Trojan territories; and the Greeks, on their part, promised not to molest him in his retreat, but to let him safely pass through any country within the extent of their domination.

Upon this assurance, Aeneas equipp'd a fleet, in order to seek a settlement in some foreign land. We are told, that at his departure he left his eldest son Ascanius with the Dascylites, a people of Bitynia, who desired to have him for their King; but that the young Prince did not remain long with them; for when Scamandrius (Astyanax) with the rest of the Hectoride whom Neoptolemus permitted to return home from Greece, repaired to him, he put himself at their head, and led them back to their native country.

The Trojan, having cross'd the Hellepont, arriv'd in the Peninsula of Pallene^b, where he built a city, called from him Aeneia, and left in it a part of that multitude which had follow'd him. From thence he sailed to Delos^c, and thence to Cythera, where he erected a temple to Venus.
 He

P. 38. ^a Though this account of Aeneas's conduct with respect to his country be what D. Hal. esteems the most probable, yet he owns that the Historians are of various opinions concerning it, and he particularly mentions a passage of Menecrates, importing, that Troy was taken through the treachery of Aeneas, and that he betrayed it to the Greeks, to be revenged on Paris, who had opposed his having a certain sacer-dotal dignity to which he aspired.

^b The Pallene here meant was probably that of Macedon, not that of Thrace; but being inhabited by Thracians, is by D. Hal.
 p. 39. spoken of as in Thrace. Livy, B. 1.
 c. 1. says, that Aeneas flying from his native country, came first into Macedon. C. & R.

^c Deles and Cythera are both Islands in the Archipelago or Aegean Sea, the first, near the Isle of Rhène, has with it at present the common name of Dili or Idilles. Cythera lies

He built another to the same Goddess in ^a Zacynthus, in which Island he likewise instituted games, called The Races of Æneas and Venus: the statues of both, says Dionysius, are standing to this day. In ^b Leucas, where the Trojans landed, was to be seen in the same author's time, a temple erected to Venus the mother of Æneas. Nor were ^c Altium and ^d Ambracia without monuments that testified his arrival in those places. At ^e Dodona were found brazen vases, upon which the name of the Trojan hero, who had made an offering of them to Jupiter, was engraven in old characters. Not far from ^f Butrotos, in Epirus, a Trojan camp, which had escaped the injuries of time, retained the name of Troja. All these antiquities, still subsisting in the reign of Augustus, were then look'd upon as indisputable proofs of Æneas's voyage to Epirus; “ and that he came into “ Italy, (adds the same Dionysius,) we have the concurrent testimony of all ^{p. 39.}
“ the Romans; the ceremonies they observe in their sacrifices and festivals “ bear witness to it, as also the Sibylline books, the Pythian oracles, and “ many other things which no body can reasonably reject as invented “ merely for ornament.”

The first land of Italy which Æneas made, after crossing the Ionian ^{p. 41.}
Sea, was Cape ^g Minerva, in Iapygia; and here he went on shore. Sailing afterwards from hence, and coasting along the south-east of Italy and the east and south sides of Sicily, he arrived with his fleet either by choice or stress of weather at the port of ^h Drepanum in that Island. Elymus and Ægestus who had escaped from Troy a little before him, had brought a Trojan colony to this place. Æneas augmented it by a good number of his followers, whom, pleas'd to have found a safe resting ^{p. 42.} place after many dangers and fatiguing voyages, he willingly left behind him at their request; though certain authors pretend that he was constrained to do it by the difficulty of transporting them, because some Trojan women, weary of the sea, had burnt a considerable part of his ships.

Æneas leaving Drepanum, steer'd his course for Italy across the ⁱ Tyrrhenian sea. To the cape, where he first landed, he gave the name ^k Palinurus, from one of his pilots who died there. The little Island of Leucasia, not far distant, whither he sailed next, got its name in like manner lies to the east of the Morea or Peloponnesus, and is now called Cerigo.

^a Now Zante.

^b Now Santa Maura.

^c A Promontary of Epirus, now Capo Figalo.

^d Formerly a city of Epirus, now only a Village, bearing the name of Ambrakia.

^e In the country of the Molossi in Epirus. There are no traces of it remaining.

^f Now Butranto.

^g A Promontory where there was a good summer haven. It was from this time call'd the port of Venus, now Castro.

^h Now Capo di Sant' Alessio. The town is call'd Trapani.

ⁱ The Tyrrhenian sea is a part of the Mediterranean. It washes the shores of Tuscany, the Pope's territories, and the Kingdom of Naples. It was called by the ancients Mare Inferum, to distinguish it from the Adriatick, which they named Mare Superum.

^k Now Capo di Palinuro in the Kingdom of Naples.

D. H. p. 43. from a daughter of Aeneas's sister, who there ended her days. The port of ^a Misenum, the Island of Prochyta, and the promontory of ^b Cajeta, where he successively arrived, were so called from being the burial places, the first of a noble Trojan his companion, the second of his kinswoman, and the third of his nurse. At length the Trojan Prince and his chosen band finished their tedious and painful voyages on the coast of the since famous Latium^c. This was a small territory on the east side of the river Tiber, containing a part of the present Campagna di Roma: Latinus was the King of it; his capital town, Laurentum^d; his subjects, a people who, till his time called Aborigines, had from him taken the name of Latines. Here, far removed from their implacable enemies the Greeks, Aeneas and his followers undertook to raise a second Troy: they fortified a camp near the mouth of the Tiber, gave it the name of Troy, and flattered themselves with the hopes of a quiet settlement, a period to all their unhappy adventures.

P. 2. P. 43. P. 27. §. III. ITALY^e, according to Dionysius, did not get that name till about the time of HERCULES: It was before called, by the Greeks, HESPERIA, and AUSONIA, but by the Inhabitants SATURNIA, from the God SATURN, whom they worshipped ^f universally. And, before it acquired this

^a Capo di Miseno in the same Kingdom.

^b Now Gaieta.

^c Latium at this time comprehended but a small part of what was afterwards called by that name.

^d It is difficult to fix the situation of the ancient city of Laurentum, of which there is no trace remaining. It was called by that name from the great number of laurels growing thereabouts. Farræ, B. 4. de lingua Latina, p. 36.

^e Italy did not anciently contain above one half of what now goes by that name, yet it comprehended many distinct Nations, the principal of which were, the Aborigines, Sabines, Hetruscans or Tuscans, Umbri, Samnites, Campani, Apulii, Calabrii, Lucanii, and Bruttii. The rest was chiefly possessed by the Gauls who had driven out the former inhabitants, and by the Ligures and Ventii.

^f D. Hal. tells us (B. 1. p. 27.) that This appears from some Sibylline Verses, and other Oracles of the Gods; and that, in his time, there were still, in Italy, many temples of SATURN; and that several cities and other places, especially rocks and very high hills had derived their names from that of the God; and particularly that the hill CAPITOLINUS was anciently called SATURNIUS. He mentions, as fabulous, a notion which prevailed very much among the people of Italy, That SATURN, in the GOLDEN AGE, was King of their country, and that it had been favoured, more than any other, with the plenty and pleasures, peculiar to those happy days.

Both this notion, and the worship universally paid, in Italy, to SATURN, are easy to be accounted for, if we suppose, with Sir Isaac Newton, (Chron. p. 152.) that the SATURN of the Latines was the Cretan ASTERIUS, father of MINOS, the Cretan JUPITER; and that (in true Chronology) the Golden Age falls in with the reign of ASTERIUS; and that when he fled from his son, he retired first into ATTICA, and afterwards into ITALY, where being well received by JANUS, he introduced many of the arts useful to life. Sir Isaac Newton, after citing some passages, from various authors, in support of his opinion, goes on thus: in (Chron. p. 153, 154.)

“ By SATURN's carrying letters into Italy,
“ and coining money, and teaching Agri“ culture, and making Instruments, and “ building a Town, you may know, that he “ fled from CRETE, after letters, and the “ coining of money, and manual arts were “ brought into EUROPE by the Phœnicians; “ and from ATTICA, after Agriculture was “ brought into Greece by CERES; and so “ could not be older than ASTERIUS, and “ EUROPA, and her brother CADMUS: and
“ by

this last name, it was called ÆNOTRIA, from ÆNOTRUS, LYCAON's youngest son, who led thither a colony of Arcadians. Dion. Hal. thinks p. 9. that these Arcadians were the same with the Aborigines, and the first Greeks who came into Italy; and that Italus, a conqueror, and one of p. 27, 28. the descendants of Ænotrus, gave it the name which to this day it retains.

“ by ITALY's being called ÆNOTRIA, before it was called SATURNIA, you may know that he came into Italy after ÆNOTRUS, and so was not older than the sons of LYCAON, [the son of PELAGUS.] ÆNOTRUS carried the first Colony of Greeks into ITALY, SATURN the second, and EVANDER the third; and the Latines know nothing older in Italy than JANUS and SATURN: and therefore ÆNOTRUS was the JANUS of the Latines. —

Macrobius, (Saturnal. l. i. c. 7.) tells us, that when SATURN was dead, JANUS erected an Altar to him, with sacred Rites, as to a God, and instituted the SATURNALIA, and that human Sacrifices were offered to him; till HERCULES, driving the cattle of Geryon through Italy, abolished that custom: By the human Sacrifices you may know, that JANUS was of the race of LYCAON; which character agrees to ÆNOTRUS.”

D. Hal. (B. i. p. 30.) says, that HERCULES, to prevent scruples in the people, about omitting a religious Rite, received from their forefathers, persuaded them to throw, instead of men, little images of men, dress'd up and adorn'd, into the Tiber, by way of sacrifice to the God; assuring them that SATURN would be as well pleased: And the historian adds, that even in his time the Romans annually, about the vernal Equinox, performed this ceremony; the High Priest, with great solemnity, throwing thirty Popets into the River.

It may be proper to observe, that according to Sir Isaac Newton's short Chronicle, the people of Latium could not have been long accustomed to human Sacrifices, if ÆNOTRUS introduced the practice; for between his coming into the country, and the arrival of HERCULES, who abolished the practice, there were but twenty years: Yet the expression of the Greek Historian, is quasi patria sacra neglexissent. (Hudf. Transl.)

Some Historians held the Aborigines to be natives of Italy, who had that name given them because they had been there ab origine

from the beginning, and did not derive their origin from any other Nation. Others pretend that the Aborigines were vagabonds and vagrants, who coming from different countries, met accidentally in Italy, and there lived by rapine; for which reason the same writers call them Aberrigines, that is to say, a wandering people, like those whom the ancients stiled Leleges, by which they meant such adventurers as have been described. D. Hal. B. i. p. 8.

But Dionysius, who was persuaded that the Aborigines came from Arcadia, says, that they were called by that name from their living upon mountains, in which the Arcadians much delighted; and if so, it must be derived from ἀπ' ὀρίων γένος, which imports as much as mountaineers, or natives of the mountains. D. Hal. B. i. p. 11.

That the Aborigines were from Arcadia, as Varro also believed, Sir Walt. Raleigh seems to think probable. This name of Aborigines, says he, (to omit other significations that are strained) imports as much as original or native of the place which they possessed; which title the Arcadians are known in a vaunting manner to have always usurp'd, fetching their antiquity from beyond the moon. But he is inclined to think, with Reynceus, from several passages in D. Hal. Strabo, Justin and Pliny, that Italy did not take that name from Italus the Oenotrian, but from Ætolus and a colony of Ætolians, which under him settled in that country. The word Italia, says he, differs in nothing from Aitolia, save that the first letter is cast away, which in the Greek words is common, and the letter o is changed into a, which change is found in the name of Æthalia, an Island near Italy peopled by the Ætholians; and the like changes are very familiar in the Æolic dialect, which dialect, (being almost proper to the Ætolians) the accent and pronunciation, together with many words little altered, were retained by the Latines, as Dionysius Halicarnassæus, Quintilian, and Priscian the Grammarian teach. Hist. of the World, p. 458, 459.

From whatever country the Aborigines came, they were obliged to maintain a long wars against the Siculi, (the first inhabitants of Italy) till, having received a considerable reinforcement by the arrival of a colony of Peloponnesians from Greece, they drove out their enemies, and seized upon their towns; after which they granted a large extent of land to the Pel^ogi, and borrowed from them many of the customs of Greece.

As for the Siculi, they being chased out of all the countries of Italy, took refuge in Sicily, which was at that time possessed by the Sicani, a people originally of Spain. And at length the Pel^ogi themselves, not being able to bear up against divers calamities with which they were afflicted, returned most of them into Greece, and retained there the name of Syraceni, which they had gained by their living in the neighbourhood of that nation during their stay in Italy.

About sixty years before the war of Troy, another colony, which came from Peloponnesus under the conduct of Evander the Arcadian, son of Carmen^o (or Tberis) a prophetess, arrived in a port of Latium. Jaunus then reigned over that petty Kingdom, and was a prince of humanity and prudence. He considered, that nothing was to be fear'd from a few unhappy men, who had been convey'd thither in only two vessels; and he therefore suffered Evander to settle on a small uncultivated hill near the Tiber, where the Arcadian built a little town and called it Pallantium, after the name of his native city in Arcadia, which a popular commotion had constrained him to leave. The hill itself was thence called the hill Palatinus, which in the time of Augustus stood in the center of Rome.

Evander established in this new settlement the worship of the Gods of his own country. Pan was the tutelar Deity of the Arcadians. They invoc'd him to preserve their flocks from the wolves. And as the temple which had been dedicated to him in Greece was called ^a Lyc^oum, so that which Evander built, or rather cut in a rock, in Italy, was named ⁱ Lupercal: The Arcadian ceremonies were retain'd in his worship, and only the Greek name of his temple changed into a Latin one.

Evander built altars likewise, in Pallantium, to ^a Victory and Ceres, and ^a The building of the temple of Pan under the name of Lyc^oum or Lupercal, answered to the idea which the Pagans had formed to themselves of Pan, whom they looked upon as the tutelar God of their flocks against the Wolves. Dien. Hal. Book 1. p. 25. says, that of all the Gods, the Arcadians worshipped Pan with the most devotion. Nay these people, according to Macrobius, called him τὸν τῶν ὀνῶν Κύριον, i. e. the Lord of all material substances. C. & R.

ⁱ The Lupercal was a cavern dug in a rock in a corner of mount Palatine. Some authors, and amongst them Ovid, pretend that Remulus and Remus consecrated this cave, because it had been the retreat of the wolf that suckled them.

Illa loco nomen fecit, locus ipse Lupercal, Fast. B. 2.

In commemoration of this, the Romans placed there a brazen statue, representing a wolf suckling the twins. Fulvius Urfinus thinks 'tis the same which may be seen at present on the Capitol, at the palace of the Conversators. C. & R.

^a The Latines adored Victory and Ceres before the other Gods Jupiter, Juno, &c. They represented Victory under the form of a young girl with wings painted white. Ceres was represented like the mother of a family, with a long training robe, and held in her hand some ears of corn, or poppies. C. & R.

instituted

instituted the festival ¹ of the Equestrian Neptune, so called, because, accord- Virg. Geo. l. 1. v. 12. Died. Sic. l. 5. p. 233. Pausan. l. 7. c. 21.
 ing to the Greek Fable, NEPTUNE, with a stroke of his Trident, raised the first horse out of the earth; or, because, according to Diodorus and Pausanias, he was the First man who found out the art of breaking horses.^m

During

¹ This festival, says D. Hal. was called by the Arcadians HIPPOCRATIA, but by the Romans CONSUALIA, from Consus, a name afterward given to Neptune, in the time of Romulus.

Before Romulus the subterraneous cavern made by order of Evander was dedicated only to the Equestrian Neptune; but Romulus, when he designed to carry off the Sabine women, took occasion from this altar, which he had found under ground, to celebrate those games at which he executed his design; and as this project was the effect of a long deliberation, he therefore called the Divinity, whose worship furnished him with the opportunity, Consus, that is, The God of counsel. These games consecrated to the Equestrian Neptune, or otherwise to Consus, were celebrated ever after at Rome, and called, by way of eminency, the Roman or great games. They consisted chiefly in chariot and horse races; at first they held only one day, but they were afterwards prolonged to two, then to three, and at length even to nine. They were celebrated in the great Circus, and called also, Ludi Circenses, or, the games of the Circus. C. & R.

^m This CHEVALIER NEPTUNE, to whom Diodorus and Pausanias give the honour of being, not only the first Riding Master, but the first Admiral of a Fleet, and the inventor of ships (on which account the mariners, after his death, worshipp'd him as God of the sea) was, according to Sir Is. Newton (Chron. p. 67. & 230.) the Brother and Admiral of SESOSTRIS King of Egypt, son of AMMON, (deify'd after his death by the name of JUPITER AMMON.) He conjectures (upon no weak grounds) that the several names, BACCHUS, OSIRIS, SIRIS, BUSIRIS, MARS, HERCULES and SESOSTRIS, were names of one and the same man; and that this man was no other than the SESAC or SHISHAK of the Old Testament, whose sister SOLOMON married, and who pillaged Jerusalem in the 5th year of REHOBOAM, (the son of Solomon, but not by his Egyptian Queen.)

The following particulars are part of Sir Isaac Newton's history of this mighty Conqueror:

“SESOSTRIS being brought up to hard Labour by his father AMMON, warred first “under his father, being the HERO or HER-“CULES of the Egyptians during his father's “reign, and afterward their KING.

“Under his father, whilst he was very “young, he invaded and conquered Tro- “glodytica, and thereby secured the harbour “of the Red sea, near Coptos in Egypt;

“And then he invaded Ethiopia, and car“ried on his conquest southward as far as to “the region bearing cinnamon:

“And, his father, by the assistance of the “Edomites, having built a fleet on the Red “sea, he put to sea, and coasted Arabia Fax- “lix, going to the Persian Gulph and be“yond, and in those countries set up co-“lums with inscriptions denoting his con“quests;—

“After these things he invaded LI-“BYA, and fought the Africans with Clubs, “and thence is painted with a club in his “hand:—

“And after the conquest of LYBIA, by “which Egypt was furnished with horses [in “greater abundance than ever before] and “furnished SOLOMON and his friends; he “prepared a fleet on the Mediterranean, and “went on westward upon the coast of Af- “ric, to search those countries, as far as to “the Ocean, and island Erythra or Gades in “Spain; as Macrobius (Saturn. l. 5: c. 21.)
 “informs us from Panyasis and Pherocydes:
 “[if Sesostris was their Hercules;] and there-
 “he conquered Geryon, and at the mouth of “the Straits set up the famous Pillars.

Venit ad occasum mundique extrema Sesostris. Lucan. l. 10.

“Then he returned through Spain, and “the southern coasts of France and Italy, “with the cattle of Geryon, his FLEET at“tending him by sea, and left in Sicily the “Sicani, a people which he had brought “from Spain.—&c. Chron. p. 214.

In this Expedition his ADMIRAL was his brother NEPTUNE, who, because the fleet, which he commanded, consisted of Three Chron. p. 215.
 squadrons, was represented by the ancients with a TRIDENT: And because he reigned over LIBYA, the country from which HORSES p. 16.
 originally came, he was called EQUESTRIAN
 NEPTUNE. 13

D. H. p. 26. During the celebration of this Festival, a cessation from labour was granted to all horses and mules, and they were crowned with flowers.

The mixture of this new colony of Arcadians with the Aborigines, did not a little contribute to improve and civilize the latter. Some say that the art of expressing their thoughts by literal characters ^a was first taught them by these Arcadians, who had themselves but lately learnt it. Evander likewise habituated their ears to the sounds of those musical instruments he had brought from his own country, and changed their oaten pipes into harmonious flutes and stringed instruments ^o.

p. 33. 34. In the mean time one of those Heroes, to whom the ancients gave Chron. p. 132. It is not possible, that NEPTUNE, who, whenever he lived, was doubtless a seaman, and probably the first who commanded a fleet of long ships with sail, might owe his Knighthood to his having, for the ensign of his ships, the figure of a horse? Sir Isaac Newton observes, that the fable of Jupiter's assuming the shape of a Bull, had its origin from a Bull's being the ensign of the ship in which EUROPA was carried away from Zidon. Now Pausanias (in B. 8. c. 25.) gives us a fable of NEPTUNE's changing himself into a Horse, and for the sake of a woman too. It seems, that while CERES was rambling about in quest of her stolen daughter, NEPTUNE saw her and fell in love with her. She, to avoid his importunities by a disguise, transformed herself into a Mare: But NEPTUNE, having discovered the cheat, served her as good a trick, by changing himself into a Horse; in which shape he pursued her and compassed his ends. Perhaps the meaning of this courtship of CERES by NEPTUNE, in the shape of a Horse, might be no more, than that NEPTUNE with a fleet of ships, which had, for their ensigns, or in their heads, the figure of a horse, pursued and took some vessels loaded with CORN; or perhaps sailed to SICILY, the country of CERES, for CORN; for thither, according to D. Hal. the great HERCULES (Sir Isaac's SESOSTRIS) sailed when he left Italy.

D. H. p. 32. 'Tis observable that the same Evander, who is said to have been the first who recognised HERCULES for a God, and to have erected an altar to him present, is also said to have instituted the Festival of the EQUESTRIAN NEPTUNE; who, according to Sir Isaac Newton, was the Admiral of the Egyptian HERCULES, that is, of SESOSTRIS.

Chron. p. 17. & 25. Sir Isaac Newton, in his short Chronicle, places EVANDER's going into Italy above sixty years later than the arrival of this Egyp-

sian Hercules there; but he assigns no reason any where for so placing it; and he observes (Chron. p. 182.) that Dionysius makes them contemporary. And this would seem more probable, if Sir Isaac has rightly placed the arrival of HERCULES in Italy. For Dionysius tells us, that EVANDER, who taught letters to the Aborigines, had himself but lately learnt them: consequently we should suppose, that he flourished soon after CADMUS brought letters into Greece. And from CADMUS's coming into Greece to the coming of HERCULES into Italy, there are little more than thirty years, by Sir Isaac's computation; and but seven years from the time that ASTERIUS, the SATURN of the Latines (who was the husband of EUROPA, the sister of CADMUS,) fled from Crete into Italy, and introduced letters there, to the arrival of HERCULES. But Sir Isaac says in his introduction (p. 8.) that he does not pretend to be exact to a year; there may be errors [in his calculations] of five or ten years, and sometimes twenty.

^a The Greek characters were the first the Latines made use of; there were some visible proofs of this remaining in the time of Augustus. The treaty which Tarquin the Proud made with the Gabini, was still to be seen in the time of Dion. Hal. in the temple of Jupiter Fidius. It was written in Greek letters, tho' in Latin words, upon a wooden shield cover'd with the skin of the ox, which had been sacrificed on that occasion. D. Hal. B. 4. p. 257.

^o The Latines, in consideration of the benefits they received from Evander and his mother Carmenta, (so called from the word carmen, she being a Prophetess who sung her oracles in verse) paid them divine honours after their deaths, and Rome continued to offer sacrifices to them when in her greatest splendor.

the

the name of HERCULES came from Spain into the country where FAUNUS and EVANDER had their settlements. The story of HERCULES being sent by Eurystheus to the Island Erythea (Gades) to bring from thence Geryon's cows to Argos; and likewise the story of Cacus the cow-stealer, Dionysius rejects as meer Fables. Those authors (says he) who have written historically of Hercules, seem to come nearer the truth, when they tell us, that he was the greatest captain of his time, and, at the head of a mighty army, over-ran the whole earth (quicquid terrarum oceanus cingit;) that he civilized the nations which he conquered, establishing among them legitimate government, and excellent laws, and using his endeavours to open a free and safe commerce, by land and sea, between all nations: so that he did not come into Italy, a single adventurer, driving cattle before him. For (adds the historian) it was no good road from Spain to Argos, and he would never have been so honour'd in Italy as he was, had he only passed through the country: But he came attended by numerous forces, to conquer it, and to subject all its inhabitants to his obedience. This, to the benefit of the conquered, he effected, though not without difficulty, from the vigorous opposition of some of the nations, and especially of the Ligurians, in his passage over the Alps. Cacus^p, who withstood HERCULES, seems to have been the chief of a people in the neighbourhood of Faunus and Evander: Because, after the reduction and death of this enemy, HERCULES disposed of his lands, partly to the subjects of those two princes, and partly to some of his own troops, which he left behind him in Italy. (For it was his custom to recruit his army with the people he subdued, and, when they had served him faithfully for some time, to reward them with lands, and easy settlements, in other countries which he had conquered by their assistance.) These troops of Hercules made themselves at first a separate republick; but at length, by social intercourse and a mutual communication of customs and manners they grew into one body with the Aborigines, and the Arcadians of Evander; and all distinction ceased.

EVANDER is said by some to have recognized HERCULES for a God, D. Hal. p. and to have been the first that did so, erecting an Altar^q, and sacrificing³² a bull to him, even present.

When the conqueror had settled every thing in Italy to his mind, p. 35.

^p One night when the troops of Hercules were asleep, Cacus came upon them by surprise and carried off their baggage and provisions; and hence the Fable of his stealing from Hercules, Geryon's cows.

^q This altar, called Ara Maxima, was remaining at Rome in the time of Augustus. It stood in the ox-market; but notwithstanding its fine name, it was very much neglected, and very poorly adorned. Hercules was invoked in all verbal bargains to be the voucher of the faith and sincerity of the parties, by this form of an oath, Me Deus Fidius, which comprehended all the energy of this, ita me Deus Fidius adjuret. According to several commentators, these monosyllables, me and è, had the same force amongst the Latines as the preposition per; so me Deus Fidius, and per Deum Fidium, è Castor, and per Castorem, signified the same things. This form of speech answered to these particles μὲν, ἐν, which the Greeks made use of before their oaths. C. & R.

and when his fleet was arrived from Spain, he embarked and passed into Sicily.

He had staid long enough in Italy to build Herculanum, and to have two sons, Pallas and Latinus, the first by Lavinia the daughter of Evan-der, the other by a north-country girl (Hyperborea Puella) whom, in his progress, he had received from her father as a hostage. 'Tis said that he had no private conversation with her till he came into Italy, but then took a liking to her, and she proved with child. The mother, at his departure from Italy, he graciously gave in marriage to Faunus; which occasioned an opinion, entertained by many, that Latinus was the son of Faunus, whereas in truth he was only his successor, and was the son of Hercules.

D. Hal. B. 1. 45. §. IV. IT was this Latinus who reign'd in Latium, when Aeneas arrived there. Being then in war with his neighbours the Rutulii, and fortune not favouring his arms, it greatly added to his perplexity to hear that a foreign Army had made a descent upon his coasts, pillaged the maritime part of his dominions, and were fortifying themselves in a camp at a little distance from the sea. Instantly he marched with all his forces, against these strangers, hoping to get rid of them at once: but when, drawing near them, he perceived that they were armed after the Greek manner, and that keeping exactly their ranks, they stood resolutely prepar'd for a battle, he began to doubt of the success, and, instead of fighting, desired a parly. Aeneas by the mention of Troy, the place of his nativity, utterly destroyed and reduced to ashes, and by the relation of his battles against the united power of Greece, fill'd Latinus at once with terror and compassion. The Dion. Hal. Trojan proceeded in words to this effect:

B. 1. p. 47. A place of refuge and a quiet settlement are what, by the direction of the Gods, we seek in this country. We are not come upon your coasts as enemies. We have indeed taken by force wherewith to supply our pressing wants; necessity compelled us to this unbecoming violence; but we intreat you not to be offended at what is past, nor to look upon it as an act of hostility. We are ready to repair by important services, the injuries we have done you against our inclination. Our strength and our courage, which have been often tried, shall be employed to defend your lands from invasion, and to invade those of your enemies. But if, rejecting our humble supplication, you determine for a war, it will neither be the first nor the greatest that we shall have sustained.

Latinus, struck with the magnanimity and boldness of the Trojan leader and his followers, and considering that these strangers might do him great service in his present wars, easily granted their request, enter'd into a league with them, and assigned them a tract of land for a settlement. They, in return, employed their arms, valour and experience in defence of Latinus,

* The Rutulii inhabited the sea coast of the Campagna di Roma, between Patrica and Nettuno. C. & R.

* The Trojans were then but 600. Solinus, c. 8.

who

who came at length to have so great a confidence in the Trojan Prince, p. 48, 49. that he gave him Lavinia his daughter and only child in marriage[†], and thereby secured to him the succession to the Latine throne.

Lavinia therefore could not but be dear to Aeneas, who in proof of it gave her name to the camp which he had pitched; and instead of Troy called it Lavinium. And as all the Trojans followed the example of their leader, and by marriages made alliances with Latine families, they and the Latines in a little time became one people.

§. V. THE prosperity of Aeneas proved the ruin of Turnus, a young Prince, the Queen's nephew, and educated in the palace under the eye of Latinus, and who had therefore entertained hopes of marrying Lavinia, and of succeeding to the throne. To revenge himself for this disappointment, he went over to the Rutuli, and soon after brought on a battle between them and the Latines, in which he and Latinus both[‡] perished; and p. 51. thus Aeneas by the death of his father-in-law, and by that of a dangerous rival, came into quiet possession of the Kingdom of Latium, which he governed wisely, and transmitted to his posterity.

ÆNEAS reigned three years, and applied himself no less to the regu- p. 52. lation of religion, than to the necessary measures for his defence and security. He establish'd in Latium the worship of the Gods of his own country. The two^{*} Palladiums, which had been the protectors of Troy before [†] Aeneas, according to Virgil, lost his first wife Creüsa in the dark, when he was making his escape from Troy.

[‡] According to Livy B. 1. c. 2. Turnus survived this battle.

^{*} These were two statues, whereof one was the original, and the other the copy: so that properly speaking, there was but one true Palladium.

Ovid speaks of this statue as an image of Pallas which fell down from Heaven upon one of the hills near Troy. According to Diodorus, it fell at Pessinus, a city of Phrygia; it was made of wood, and held a pike in its right hand, and a distaff and spindle in its left: To which he adds, that this miraculous image was put into the hands of Dardanus, who took all possible care to preserve the precious depositum, having been told by the Oracle of Apollo, that this new city of Ilion should subsist so long as he kept this present from Heaven in it, and no longer. And this tradition, fabulous as it is, was the foundation of that religious respect the Romans paid the Palladium. D. Hal. [B. 1. p. 54, 55, 56. and B. 2. p. 127.] frankly owns, that there were many secrets belonging to this piece of antiquity, which he was not let into; adding, that it was unlawful to discover them to the prophane vulgar. However, when the world came to be enlighten'd by Christianity, the cheat was soon discover'd, and even the keepers of this pretended divinity, made no scruple of undeceiving the credulous people. Arnobius and Clemens Alexandrinus, agree in their account of the Palladium, that it was made of the bones of Peleus, that antient King of Peloponnesus, and that the Pagans themselves had betray'd this secret.

Clemens Alexandrinus goes farther, and discovers the shameful rites of that mysterious worship, which the ancient Pagans paid to this and two other statues, on which the fate of cities and nations were supposed to depend. He seems to have thought them pieces of necromancy. He tells us, that Athenodorus discover'd the composition of which the statue of Serapis, the tutelar God of the Egyptians, was made. And he adds these words:

Sesostris having subdued many nations of Greece, brought away from thence all sorts of artificers, and he ordain'd one Briaxes to make a statue of Osiris, one of his ancestors, which the artificer did, using all sorts of metals and precious stones in it, to render his work the more perfect; and he took particular care to put into it a perfume, with which the bodies of Osiris and Apis had been embalmed; from their two before it was ruin'd, became the tutelar Deities of Lavinium, and in process of time, of the whole Roman Empire. They were shut up at Rome in the temple of Vesta, and to the Vestals only was permitted the sight of them.

Dionysius is of opinion, that Æneas brought into Italy, together with the Palladium, the statues of the Great Gods, honoured by the Greeks, and more especially by those of Samosbraces: And he tells us, he is supported in this opinion by the authority of Calisthratus, who wrote a history of Samosbraces; Strabo, who made a collection of ancient fables; and Aratius the most ancient poet known.

§. VI. BUT while Æneas was thus employ'd, the Rutulians enter'd into a league with the *Hebrurians*¹, against a stranger, whose good fortune they envied. Especially Mezentius, King of the *Tyrrhenians*², was alarm'd at the too frequent arrival in Italy of colonies from the eastern nations, their numerous settlements, and the encroachments they made upon the lands of the first inhabitants. Fear and jealousy therefore made him take the field.

While the confederate armies were advancing towards Lavinium, either to besiege it, or to draw the Trojan to an engagement, Æneas marched out, and gave them battle. The action lasted till night, and equal bravery was shewn on both sides: But Æneas being pushed to the banks of the *Numicus*³, and forced into that river, was there drown'd. The Trojans conceal'd his body, and to make him pass for a Deity in the minds of his credulous subjects, pretended that he had vanished away on a sudden; accordingly a temple was erected to him, with an inscription⁴ upon it, which declared him at least a demi-god. Such was the end of Æneas, therefore, the statue was called Oûrapiis, and afterward, by corruption, Serapis.

The same Clement Alexandrinus informs us, that the statue of Jupiter Olympius, the tutelar God of Greece, was made of the bones of an elephant. From all which we may conjecture, that the tutelar Gods of the several countries of the Pagan world were so many Talismans, made according to the rules of magick.

But to return to the Palladium, it may be asked whence it got that name? The common answer is, that it represented the Goddess Pallas, but there is some foundation to believe, that the Goddess owed both her name and origin to the statue. Dion. Hal. [B. 1. p. 55.] gives us the following story of the Palladium, upon the testimony of Calisthratus. Pallas, says he, was a King of Arcadia, and the father of Chryse, she was married to Dardanus, and had this statue for her portion, and called it Pallas's present, who in all probability made this Talisman. In after times, to gain it veneration, fable made it the statue of a Goddess, who bore the name of Arcadian Pallas. And what strengthens this conjecture is, that the Palladium represented a young man armed from head to foot. As it was easy to mistake the sex, the vulgar made it a warlike Goddess. C. & R.

¹ We are to understand here the people of that part of ancient Hebruria, which comprehended what is now called St. Peter's Patrimony, the duchy of Castro, and the territories of Orvieto and Perugia. C. & R.

² Mezentius had under his dominion that territory which depended on the ancient city Agylla, now Cerveteri, in the Ecclesiastical State. C. & R.

³ The Numicus, now Rio de Nimi, according to geographers, was formerly a river. It is now scarce more than a rivulet, it ran close by Lavinium. C. & R.

⁴ This inscription, according to Aurelius Victor, was in these words: Patri Deo Indigenti. The word Indiger, with the Latines, signified one of those Gods who had been of the race of men, and at length were deify'd. The same Æneas, according to Livy, B. 1. c. 2. had divine honours paid him, under the name of Jupiter Indiger. C. & R.

Æneas,

Aeneas, the Trojan Prince so much celebrated by the Greek and Latine poets, and who, because he was illegitimate, and born of a mother remarkable for her beauty, was, agreeable to the manner of speaking in those times, called the son of Venus.

The death of Aeneas caused no disorder in the affairs of the Latines. His colony and kingdom subsisted under the administration of his son Eurileon^a, who succeeded him. This Prince was born at Troy of Creüsa, the daughter of Priam, and had come with his father into Italy. He had changed his name, and at this time bore that of Ascanius, the name of his elder brother, who had been left in Bithynia. The young King did not think it advisable to engage immediately in a pitched battle with a formidable enemy, whose pride was elevated by the death of Aeneas: He had the prudence to confine himself within the walls of Lavinium, and to try what could be done by negotiation, before he had recourse to arms. The haughty Mezentius demanded of the Latines, as one of the conditions of a peace, that they should pay him yearly, by way of tribute, all the wine produced in the territory of Latium. Ascanius preferred an honourable war to a shameful dependence. To break off a treaty so injurious to his people, he caused all the vines throughout his dominions to be consecrated to Jupiter; and by thus transferring the demesne to the God, he made the estate unalienable. D. Hal. D.
1. p. 52.

The enemy had pitched their camp in the neighbourhood of Lavinium; and the flower of their youth, under the command of Lausus, the son of Mezentius, lay intrenched almost at the gates of the city. The Trojans, who had been accustomed, during a ten years siege, to make brisk sallies upon the besiegers, marched out in the night, and vigorously attack'd the post where Lausus commanded. His entrenchments were forced; and then the army in the plain, intimidated by the defeat of their advance-guard, immediately fled. The Latines pursued them, and in the pursuit Lausus was slain; which, with the check his troops had receiv'd, so discourag'd Mezentius, that he immediately sued for peace. It was agreed, that for the future, the Tiber should be the boundary both to the Latines and Hebrurians. p. 53.
Livy, B. 1.
c. 3.

§. VII. BUT now Lavinia, whom Aeneas at his death had left with child, entertain'd a strong jealousy of the ambition of her step-son, whom victory made absolute in his new dominions; and she feared to expose the infant, she was going to be delivered of, to the danger of his politicks. She fled therefore into the woods, trusting herself to the care of one Tyrrhenus, chief of her father Latinus's shepherds, and was there delivered of a son, who from the place of his birth took the surname of Sylvius. But the Queen's flight, who had disappear'd on a sudden, occasioning suspicions at Lavinium prejudicial to the reputation of Ascanius, he caused diligent search to be made after her, calm'd her fears, and engaged her to return to the town with her son, whom he ever after treated as a brother. And as Lavinium was in reality the patrimony of Lavinia, D. Hal. B.
1. p. 56.
Aur. Victor de Orig. Rom.
Livy, B. 1.
c. 3.

^a He had three names, Eurileon, Ascanius, and Ascanius.

and a demefn which ought therefore to defcend to Sylvius, it was, perhaps, for this reason, that Ascanius determined to yield it to them, and to build another city where to fix his residence. This new city he called

D. Hal. B. Alba Longa^b; Alba, as the historians tell us, from a white ſow which
 1. F. 53. Aeneas found in the place where it was built; and Longa, both to diſtin-and Livy, B. 1. c. 3. guish it from another town named Alba, and becauſe without having
 D. Hal. p. much breadth, it extended itſelf the whole length of a lake near which it
 53. was founded.

2. 56. It was thirty years after the building of Lavinium, that Ascanius removed to Alba; and there he died, after a reign of about thirty-eight years, twelve of which he had reſided at his new ſettlement. He left by a wife, whoſe name hiſtory has not tranſmitted to us, at leaſt one ſon, who was born in Alba, and called Iulus; ſo that there remained of the poſterity of Aeneas a ſon and a grandſon, the one Aeneas Sylvius, the other this Iulus; and between them lay the right of ſucceſſion to the ^c Latine throne.

Id. §. VIII. THE Latines not thinking it for their intereſt to continue divided under two governments, reſolved to unite Alba and Lavinium into one dominion: and as Sylvius, being the grandſon of Latinus, ſeem'd to have the beſt title to the whole, the people who were the judges decreed it to him. However, to prevent diviſions, and to make Iulus ſome amends, they conferr'd on him the ſovereign power in affairs of religion. It was, perhaps, from hence that the Julii conſtantly preſerved the prieſthood in their family, and that the Ceſars always aſſumed the quality of high-prieſts.

P. 57. §. IX. THE kingdom of Alba continued for near 400 years in an almoſt uninterrupted tranquillity under Aeneas Sylvius and his ſucceſſors, without being either conſiderably diminiſhed or increaſed. But as a ſtate^d which remained ſo long in peace afforded little matter for hiſtory, we have ſcarce any thing left us, beſides the names of its Kings, and the number of years which each of them reigned.

Aeneas Sylvius Poſtumus, died after a reign of 29 years, and was ſucceeded by his ſon.

Aeneas Sylvius, who governed Latium 31 years.

Latinus Sylvius, who ſucceeded him, held the ſceptre for the ſpace of 51 years.

Alba reign'd 39.

Capetus (or according to Livy, Atys) 26.

Capis 28. And Calpetus 13.

^b Alba was probably ſituated between Men-te Cove and the lake of Caſtelle Gandolfo.
 C. & R.

^c The Latine ſtate ſeems to have had no greater extent, than from Alba to the mouth of the Tiber, nor any other towns than Lavinium, Alba Longa and perhaps Laurentum, where Latinus kept his court at the time of Aeneas's arrival; if, after all, Lavinium and Laurentum were not the ſame town. C. & R.

^d This ſtate ſubſiſted, according to D. Hal. about 430 years, reckoning from Aeneas's arrival in Italy to the building of Rome.

Tiberinus, who succeeded him, being less peaceably inclined than his Predecessors, undertook a war which proved fatal to him. In an engagement upon the banks of the Tiber, which till then was called Albula, he was forced into the river, and being carried away by the current, was drown'd. This accident of Tiberinus, who reigned but eight years, caused the river's name to be changed, and ever since it has borne no other but that of Tiber.

Agrippa, successor to Tiberinus, after a reign of 41 years, left the throne to Alladius, who reign'd 19 years, and was succeeded by Aventinus, who reign'd 37 years, and left his name to the hill Aventinus, where he was interred.

Procas, who succeeded him, held the sceptre 23 years. He was the father of Numitor and Amulius, and at his death bequeathed the throne to his elder son Numitor.

* Amulius, who doubtless surpass'd his brother in understanding and courage, had no respect either to priority of birth, or to the last appointment of his father. He not only snatched the sceptre from Numitor, and Liv. B. 1. made him pass his days in retirement; but used all the cruel precautions C. 3. of a tyrant to secure the throne to himself, by extinguishing his brother's posterity. Numitor had an only son named Ægestus, and a daughter call- D. Hal. B. ed ' Rhea Sylvia. The tyrant caused the first to be slain at a hunting, 1. P. 62. and, to prevent the other from having children, consecrated her to the worship of Vesta, by which she was obliged to perpetual virginity. But this precaution proved ineffectual; for the vestal, either by her own fault, or by violence done to her, became the mother of twins. The story is related after the following manner.

§. X. RHEA SYLVIA was called to the performance of some religious service in the temple of Mars near the town. A spring of water glided thro' the sacred wood, with which the temple was inclosed; and the priests, in order to discharge one of her sacerdotal functions, went thither to take the necessary water for the sacrifice. Then and there a man disguised in a military habit, like that in which Mars was commonly represented, surprized and forced the Vestal. Amulius's ill reputation has made him suspected by some of doing this violence to his niece himself; not so much to gratify a brutal passion, as to have a pretence for condemning her to that punishment which the law had assign'd for Vestals who proved unchaste. Others are of opinion, that she met a young lover there by appointment. Be that as it will, Rhea Sylvia thence forward ab- p. 63. stain'd from her functions, and from entering the temple, under a pretence of an indisposition. Usurpers are ever suspicious. Amulius soon conjectured what kind of disorder it was that afflicted his niece, and therefore caused her to be watched. Nay he scrupled not to tax the father and mother of the Vestal as the contrivers of an intrigue, which might procure them grand-children. When Rhea could no longer conceal her shame, she charged the God Mars with being the cause of it. The circumstances of the temple, the sacred wood, and the pretended presence of that God, who was believed to make his residence in a sanctuary consecrated to him, gave a less odious colour to the matter, whether her crime, or her misfortune. But these things made no impression on the mind of Amulius. He not only placed some trusty women about her, but appointed a guard of armed men to watch her, which they did till she was delivered of two sons. The tyrant took all advantages of this accident, he laid open the Vestal's shame in an assembly of the people, exaggerated her fault, and urged both religion and the laws against her. Rhea was condemned to be first whipp'd, and then put to death; and the fruits of her criminal amour to be thrown into the Tiber. But most of the historians say, that Amulius, at the intercession of his daughter Anko, changed the sentence against Rhea into perpetual imprisonment, and that she was not releas'd from her confinement till the tyrant was dethroned. As to the twins the sentence against them was executed in this manner:

* Amulius being the younger brother, says Plutarch, had the gold and silver for his portion, and Numitor his father's crown. Amulius made use of his riches to dethrone his brother, in Rom. p. 19.

† Sometimes Ilia.

D. Hal. p. 64.

Plot. in Rom. p. 19.

Fabius Pictor, Porcius Cato, Calpurnius Piso, apud D. Hal. B. 1. p. 64. &c.

p. 71.

Plot. in Rom. p. 20.

D. Hal. B. 1. p. 66.

Ælius Tacitus, apud D. Hal. B. 1. p. 67.

A little wooden trough being prepared, and the two infants laid in it, they were carried to the bottom of Mount Palatine, and there turn'd a-drift upon the Tiber, which at that time overflow'd its banks and wash'd the foot of the mountain. The place where they were expos'd was about 120 furlongs from Alba. The little skiff floated a while without any accident, but at length being carried against a stone by the ebbing of the flood, it was over-set, and the two brothers turned out upon the strand. It has been the general tradition, that a she wolf hearing their cries came and suckled them; but it is more probable that Acca Laurentia, whose husband, Faustulus, found the two children, and who nursed them, was called by the nick name of Lupa, or wolf, for her disorderly life, and that this gave rise to the fabulous miracle.

Faustulus was the chief of the King's shepherds, and being probably well acquainted with the birth of the twins, was suitably careful of their education: he sent them to Gabii, a city of Latium, to learn the Greek literature. As they grew up, they appeared to have something great in their mein and air, which commanded respect, and they assumed a superiority over the other shepherds, and the country people. A quarrel happening between the herdsmen of Amulius and those of Numitor, the two brothers took the part of the former against the latter, of whom in the fray they slew some, wounded others, and put the rest to flight. The worsted party resolv'd to be reveng'd on Romulus and Remus (for so the twins were called) and the festival of the * Lupercalia yielded a favourable opportunity

* Valerius Maximus, B. 2. c. 2. §. 9. pretends, that the festival of the Lupercalia was not older than the foundation of Rome. Livy, L. 1. c. 5. Dion. Hal. B. 1. p. 25, 67. and Pistarch, (Rom. p. 31.) are of opinion that this festival was brought by Ewander out of Greece. The ceremonies observed in it were these. First, two goats and a dog were killed; then the foreheads of two young men of distinction were touch'd with the bloody knife, and they were to laugh when they were nity to put their design in execution. While the two brothers were scouring the plain with their whips in their hands, according to the ceremonies used in this festival, Remus was on a sudden surrounded, taken prisoner, and led away to Numitor, before whom he was accused of exercising a kind of tyranny in the forests. The deposed King for the most part led a private life in the country, in the utmost subjection to the Usurper's will. He durst not proceed against the person accused, without the consent of Amulius; but he had no sooner obtained it than he condemned the prisoner to death. The sentence was just going to be executed, when either out of instinct, compassion, or esteem for a young shepherd, whose person and courage spoke something superior to his condition, he found himself strongly inclined to save him. He therefore deferred the execution, and resolv'd to have a moment's conference with the criminal. He asked him in what part of Latium he was born, and who were his parents. Remus replied, that his family and the place of his nativity were equally unknown to him. All I could learn, said he, from the shepherd who brought up my brother Romulus and me, is, that we are twins, and that we were found exposed upon the bank of the river; an answer which immediately struck Numitor with a lively remembrance of his two grandsons: Their age, which was about eighteen years, agreed with the time when the two Princes were exposed upon the Tiber, and there needed no more to change his anger and threatnings into tenderness.

In the mean time Romulus, impatient of the detaining his brother, was eager to pursue and attack those who had carried him off; but Faustulus dissuaded him from it, and on this occasion disclosed to him his birth; a discovery which awakened in his breast sentiments worthy of his high extraction. He resolv'd at all hazards to attempt the delivering his grandfather and mother from the oppression they were under. And while he was assembling the country people, and disposing every thing for the execution of his design, Numitor made the same discovery to Remus, concerning his parents, and the injustice they suffered, pressed him to revenge it, and then bid him go and send Romulus to his house. Romulus came, and the shepherd Faustulus made haste to follow, taking with him the trough, or skiff, in which the twins had been exposed on the river, in order to shew it to Numitor. But as he entered the gate of the city, he was stopped by the guards, who perceiving an air of haste and confusion in his looks, imagined he was loaded with something of consequence. By chance there was one among them who had been at the exposing of the children, and employed in the office; he seeing the were thus touched. When this was done, the skins of the victims were cut into thongs and whips for the young men; who, armed in this manner, and covered only with a pair of drawers, ran about the city and the fields, striking all they met. The young married women suffered themselves to be struck by them, and believed those strokes were a help to fruitfulness. This festival was celebrated the 15th of February. The priests who presided at these sacrifices, were at first divided into two colleges, one whereof was for Remus, the other for Romulus; but afterwards there was a third added in honour to Julius Caesar. This festival was chiefly celebrated in the villages. C. & R.

Plutarch
in Rom. p.
22.

trough which Faustulus could not conceal, and knowing it by its make and inscription, guess'd at the business, and without farther delay, telling the King of it, brought in the man to be examined. The shepherd, without losing his presence of mind, confess'd what his business was, and own'd that the twins were living, but pretended that they were feeding flocks in a remote desert. This was gaining time, and the brothers made the best use of it. Remus undertook to raze the city, and Romulus to invest the King's palace. The country people came at the time appointed, and form'd themselves into companies of an hundred each. Their ensigns were bundles of hay, hanging upon poles, which the Latines at that time called Manipuli^a, and from thence came the name of Manipulares, which was originally given to troops rais'd in the country.

With this tumultuous army Romulus beset the avenues of the palace, forced the guard, slew the tyrant (who had reigned 42 years) and restored his grandfather to the throne.

Such was the adventure, according to the common tradition, by which the birth of Romulus and Remus came to be discover'd. Plutarch concludes his account of it with these words: "These are for the most part the relations of Fabius and Dicæus Pæparetbius (who, I think, is the first that writes of the building of Rome) which some suspect to be only fabulous, and invented stories; but they are not wholly to be rejected, if we consider, what strange things Fortune sometimes brings about, and also how improbable it is, that the Roman Empire could ever have arrived at such a pitch of greatness and power, if the Gods had not laid the foundation of it, and given it a miraculous beginning."

D. Hal. B. 1. p. 72. §. XI. NUMITOR, not long after his re-establishment on the throne, finding that Alba was overstock'd with inhabitants by the inundation of those rustick troops which Romulus had brought thither, propos'd to his grandsons, that they should make a settlement elsewhere. To this ^b Remus and Romulus very willingly consented, and the King gave them for their new settlement those lands near the Tiber, upon which they had been cast by the waves, and where they had been brought up. Numitor also supply'd them with all manner of instruments for breaking up ground, and with slaves, and beasts of burden, and granted to his subjects full liberty to join the two brothers. Upon which, some of the best families, and among the rest, several who were descended from the Trojans, chose to follow the fortune of Remus and Romulus; so that even in Augustus's time there were in Rome fifty great families sprung from Trojan ancestors, and which had subsisted there ever since its foundation.

load.

^a Hence came the word Manipulus, for a battalion, which at first consist'd of 100, afterwards 200, and in the decline of the empire of less than 100.

^b Plutarch (in Rom. p. 22.) thinks it very possible that Remus and Romulus resolv'd to seek another habitation, rather through necessity than choice, being probably discountenanced by the people of Alba, who had reason to fear every thing from such a troop of fugitive slaves and out-laws as attended the two brothers.

As that handful of people, who came from Alba, were of themselves in no condition to found a colony any thing considerable, the two brothers got together all the inhabitants of Pallantium and Saturnia, two small towns, and it was thought proper to divide those who were to be employ'd in building the new city into two companies, one under the command of Romulus, the other of Remus. But this division, which was made purely with a view to the publick welfare; and for the better carrying on the work, instead of answering the end proposed, gave birth to two rival factions, and produced a jealousy between the brothers, which broke out when they came to fix upon a place where to plant their colony. Romulus declared for mount Palatine, and Remus for mount Aventine. There was no law whereby they could decide their difference: nor could either of them pretend a superiority by years or merit. The matter was therefore referred to their grandfather. Numitor being very much prepossessed p. 73. in favour of Augury, with which the Hebrurians had infected Italy, declared it his opinion, that the contending parties ought to have recourse to the Gods, in order to put an end to a dispute which no man had a right authoritatively to decide; and accordingly they agreed, that it should be determined by the flights of birds*. When the day appointed for the ceremony came, some persons were deputed from both sides to be witnesses of the truth of the auguries, and the two brothers posted themselves each upon his mountain, Remus upon mount Aventine, and Romulus upon mount Palatine. Vulturs were to decide the affair; whoever should first see any of these birds, or see the greater number of them, was to gain his cause; for, said they, these birds are very scarce, and sent by the Gods from foreign countries to foretel extraordinary events. Besides, they remembered that Hercules used to judge of the success of his undertakings from the flights of vulturs. When the two rivals had a while gazed round the horizon, watching the appearance of a favourable augury, we are told, that Romulus, either to divert his brother's attention, or to secure to himself the publick voice by a fraud, sent to tell him that he had seen some vulturs. Whilst the messengers were yet on their way, Remus actually perceived six. He ran therefore to mount Palatine to examine the truth of his brother's augury; and he had no sooner got thither, than by an unexpected good fortune, twelve vulturs appeared to Romulus, who instantly cried out in a transport of joy, and pointing to them with his hand, be judge, be judge yourself, brother, of the truth of what my messengers have told you. Remus nevertheless discovered the cheat; he was informed that Romulus did not see the twelve vulturs, till after he himself had seen six: and then one insisted on the number of birds, the other on the time of seeing them. The people were divided, each man

Plut. in
Rom. p.
22, 23.

D. Hal. B.
1. p. 74.

* Augury, or the art of divination, and foretelling future events by the flight, cries, or motions of birds, came from the Chaldeans to the Greeks, from thence it was transmitted to the Hebrurians, and from them to the Latines and the Romans. Vid. *Cicero*n. de divin. and Orig. l. 4. contra Cels. C. & R.

taking the part of his leader; and the dispute growing warm, from words they came at length to blows.

The shepherd Faustulus throwing himself unarmed into the crowd to part the combatants, an unlucky blow laid him dead upon the ground; and some historians are of opinion, that Remus lost his life in the same skirmish; but the greater number place his death later, and say that he was slain by one Facrus, who in a passion struck him on the head with a mattock, for having, in derision, leap'd over the wall of the new city: and they add, that the murderer was, from this action, afterwards called Colat, i. e. hasty or passionate; but Livy says, the more common report was, that Remus died by his brother's own hand.

§. XII. ROMULUS being now head of the colony, by the advantage or more favourable auguries than those of his brother, or rather by having got the better in the late engagement, apply'd his thoughts wholly to build the city, which was to be call'd Roma, in allusion to his name. Mount Palatine was the place chosen for its situation: and the founder on this occasion perform'd all those ceremonies which the superstition of the Hebræans had introduc'd, and made customary at the building of towns. He offer'd sacrifices to the Gods, and order'd all the people to do the same, every man according to his abilities: and from that time decreed that eagles should be the auspices of his new colony. After this, great fires were kindled before their tents, and all the people leap'd through the flames to purify themselves. This ceremony over, they dug a trench round that spot where the Comitia or assemblies of the people were afterwards held, and into this trench they threw^e the first fruits of whatever they were allowed to make use of for food; besides which, every man of the colony cast in a handful of earth, brought either from his own, or some neighbouring country. This trench they called Mundus (the world) and made it the center round which the city was to be built. Then Romulus yoking a cow and a bull to a plough, the coulter whereof was brass,

^e Plutarch in his life of Romulus, (p. 17, 18.) says, that authors are not agreed by whom and for what reason the city of Rome was so called; that some are of opinion, the Pelasgians, who had over-run the greater part of the habitable world, fixed themselves there; and from their own military strength (in Greek Ρωμα, Roma) called the city by that name: that others say the city was built by some Trojans, who escaping from Troy, were driven upon the coasts of Tuscany, among whom was a woman of distinction named Roma, who engaged the Trojan women to burn the ships they came in, and that the city was called so from her: but that others say the Roma from whom the city had its name, was daughter of Italus and Lacaria, others of Telephus, Hercules's son, and that she was married to Æneas. Others make her the daughter of Ascanius Æneas's son. The same author speaks of Romulus the son of Ulysses and Circe, Remus the son of Emathion, whom Diomed sent from Troy, and of one Romus a King of the Latins, who drove out the Tuscans; to each of these the building of Rome has been ascribed. Solinus bestows the honour of it upon Evander, and says, that it was in old times called Valentia. Others say, that it was anciently called Febris, after the name of Februa, the mother of Mars, witness St. Aug. de Civit. Dei Lib. 3. But Livy and others will have the building of the city to be the work of Romulus, even from the foundation. C. & R.

^e The design of this ceremony, was to admonish the heads of the colony, that it ought to be their principal study to procure for their fellow citizens all the conveniencies of life, to maintain peace and union amongst a people come together from different parts of the world, and by this means to form themselves into one body, never to be dissolved. C. & R. mark'd

mark'd out, by a deep furrow^c, the whole compass of the city; and those two animals (the symbols of marriage by which towns are peopled) were afterwards slain upon the altars. All the people follow'd the plough, throwing inwards the clods of earth which the plough-share sometimes turned outwards: and when they came to those places where they intended to make the gates, they took up the plough and carried it. Hence the Latin word, Porta a gate, à portando aratrum. Plut. in Rom. Ibid.

The people's throwing inwards the clods of earth, was a significant ceremony, importing, that plenty in cities is owing to the fruitful lands about them; and withal, how careful the inhabitants ought to be to bring every thing from abroad, which may contribute to the publick welfare. The whole length of ground where the plough had pass'd, was by the ancients looked upon as sacred and inviolable. For this reason it was, that they thought themselves obliged to spend the last drop of their blood in defending their walls; and to break through them was a crime of the highest nature. But the gates were not sacred; otherwise, as Plutarch observes, the city could not have been supplied with the necessaries of life, without a breach of the law, nor could the filth, dead bodies, and other things which they reckoned unclean, have been carried away.

As mount Palatine stood by itself, and was not joined to any other hill, the whole was inclosed within the line made by the plough, which form'd almost the figure of a square, for which reason D. Hal. calls it Roma Quadrata. The walls were built upon this Line, which was therefore call'd Pomarium, according to Plutarch, from Pone mœnia: But Livy defines the Pomarium to be that space of ground both within and without the walls, which the Augurs at the first building of cities solemnly consecrated, and on which no edifices were suffered to be raised. B. 2. p. 125. & Plut. p. 22. Livy, B. 1. c. 44.

^a As to the exact year of the foundation of Rome, the historians differ about it. Varro places it in the third year^b of the sixth olympiad, that

^c The ancients oftentimes described the compass of their cities by a train of white earth. We read in Strabo, B. 17. p. 1142. that for want of this earth, Alexander mark'd out Alexandria with meal. C. & R.

^a Chronologists are not agreed about the exact year of the foundation of Rome. L. Cincius fixes it in the fourth year of the twelfth olympiad; Fabius Pictor, in the first year of the eighth. Polybius and Diodorus Siculus, in the second year of the seventh olympiad; Portius Cato and others, in the first year of the same olympiad; Marcus Terentius Flaccus, (the supposed author of the Capitoline tables;) and Livy, in the fourth year of the sixth olympiad. But the majority of the best Roman writers follow Varro's calculation, according to which the foundation of Rome is placed near the end of the third year of the sixth olympiad. Petavius contends, that Varro's opinion is the most agreeable to the rules of chronology, Lib. 1. de doct. temp. C. & R.

^b If Rome was built, as Varro believed, in the 3d year of the 6th olympiad, it must, as Petavius observes, have been in 3960 or 3961 of the Julian period. For the first olympiad beginning at the summer solstice in 3938, the third year of the 6th olympiad will begin in the summer of 3960, and end in the summer of 3961. And if, as Petavius thinks, Rome was founded in the end of the 3d year of the 6th olympiad, that will fall in 3961. Father Catron, in his Rom. Hist. p. 59. says it is incontestable, that Rome was founded 21 April, and yet, that it appears to have been founded in autumn, and that April was then a month in autumn, and was afterwards that is, 431 years after the destruction of Troy, and 753 before the beginning of the Christian Era. The Romans, (according to Plutarch, and others) began to build on the twenty-first of April. This day was then consecrated to Pales, Goddess of shepherds, so that the festival of Pales, and that of the foundation of the city, were afterwards jointly celebrated at Rome on the same day.

Year of
R O M E
I.
Vol. Max.
B. 4.

When Rome had received near the utmost perfection, which men rude and indigent were able to give it, it consisted only of about 1000 poor huts, which had no upper stories, nor any kind of ornament. The walls even of Romulus's palace were made of rushes, and it was covered with thatch. Every man having chosen his ground to build upon according to his fancy, without any regard to the regularity or beauty of the whole, the streets (if they might be called streets) were both crooked and narrow. Rome, properly speaking, was at first but a sorry village, whereof even the principal inhabitants followed their own ploughs: and until it was rebuilt after the burning of it by the Gauls, did not deserve the name of a city. Such were the beginnings of the capital of the world.

afterwards set back in the calendar. Upon this supposition, the date of the foundation of Rome, according to the Julian period, will be 3960. Yet father Rouillé, as we see in the preceding note, which is taken from him, tells us, that the majority of the best Roman writers following Varro's calculation, place the foundation of Rome in the end of the 3d year of the 6th olympiad, consequently, if it was in April, April must have been a month in the spring as it is now, and the year of the foundation of Rome will be 3961 of the Julian period. All the discussions of former writers to fix the exact year of the foundation of Rome seem very idle performances, since the publication of Sir Izaak Newton's book of Chronology.

C H A P. II.

R O M U L U S.

SECT. I. Romulus is chosen King of Rome. §. II. He puts on a robe of distinction, and appoints 12 LICTORS to attend him. §. III. He divides his colony into 3 TRIBES, and these into 30 Curiae. §. IV. He distinguishes the people into PATRICIANS and PLEBEIANS, PATRONS and CLIENTS. §. V. He constitutes a SENATE. §. VI. He appoints himself a guard of 300 horsemen called Celeres. §. VII. He settles the respective prerogatives of the King, Senate, and People. §. VIII. The religious laws of Romulus. §. IX. His civil laws. §. X. To augment his colony, he opens an asylum for fugitives, slaves, and outlaws. §. XI. The rape of the Sabine women. §. XII. The Sabines endeavour to recover their women by a treaty. In the mean time Romulus defeats the Cœninenfes, slays Acron their King in single combat, and decrees himself a TRIUMPH for his victory. He reduces Crustumium and Antemnæ, and gains other advantages. §. XIII. Romulus's war with the Sabines. §. XIV. He concludes a peace with them, and admits Titus Tatius, their King, to be his partner on the throne. The followers of Tatius are transplanted to Rome, and become one people with the Romans. §. XV. Tatius

Tatius creates 100 new senators chosen out of the Sabines. The creation of the first ROMAN KNIGHTS. The festival of the MATRONALIA instituted. §. XVI. The death of Tatius. §. XVII. Romulus defeats the Camerini, Fidenates, and Veientes. He renounces the Kingdom of Alba upon the death of Numitor. §. XVIII. The murder of Romulus by the Senate, and the artifice of Julius Proculus to appease the people.

§. I. AS Romulus had not taken upon him the chief command of the colony for any longer time than while the city was building, he, as soon as the work was finished, submitted the form of its future government to the choice of the people. He called the citizens together, and harangu'd them in words to this effect: If all the strength of cities lay in the height of their ramparts, or depth of their ditches, we should have great reason to be in fear for that which we have built. Are there in reality any walls too high to be scaled by a valiant enemy? And of what use are ramparts in intestine divisions? They may serve for a defence against sudden incursions from abroad; but it is by courage and prudence chiefly, that the invasions of foreign enemies are repell'd, and by unanimity, sobriety and justice, that domestic seditions are prevented. Cities fortified by the strongest bulwarks, have been often seen to yield to force from without, or to tumults from within. An exact military discipline, and a steady observance of civil policy, are the surest barriers against these evils. But there is still another point of great importance to be considered. The prosperity of some rising colonies, and the speedy ruin of others, have in a great measure been owing to their form of government. Were there but one manner of ruling states and cities that could make them happy, there would be no room for choice. But I have learnt that of the various forms of government among the Greeks and Barbarians, there are three which are highly extoll'd by those who have experienced them (Government by one, by a few, by the many;) and yet, that no one of these is in all respects perfect, but each of them has some innate and incurable defect. Chuse you then in what manner this city shall be governed; Shall it be by one man? Shall it be by a select number of the wisest among us? Or shall the legislative power be in the people? As for me, I shall submit to whatever form of administration you shall please to establish. As I think myself not unworthy to command, so neither am I unwilling to obey. Your having chosen me to be the leader of this colony, and your calling the city after my name, are honours sufficient to content me; honours of which living or dead I can never be deprived.

Thus spake the founder of Rome, by the advice of his grandfather Numitor; and the people, who had been accustomed to Kings, having lived easy under them, and having likewise experienced the courage and capacity of Romulus, unanimously chose him to be their King.

As the chief religion of those times lay in the regard paid to the prognosticks, which the Augurs and Haruspices drew from thunder, lightning,

¹ It may not be improper to say something here of the different offices of the Haruspices

Year of ROMAN
I.

ROMAN HISTORY
Book I.

ning, the wind, the flight of birds, or the entrails of beasts, the Prince elect, before he ascended the throne, would needs consult the will of the Gods and Augurs, of whom frequent mention will be made in the course of this history. The Roman Haruspices were all taken at first from Etruria, where their art had most credit. Afterwards young Romans were sent into Etruria, to be there brought up in the science. It consisted in foretelling future events, by attending to various circumstances of the victims. First, it was an ill omen, when the victim would not come to the altar without dragging, when it broke its rope, fled away, avoided the stroke, struggled much after it, made a great bellowing, was long a dying, or bled but little. Secondly, presages were drawn from inspecting the noble parts of the victim when opened, as the heart, lungs, spleen, and especially the liver. If all these were sound, if the top of the liver was large and well made, and if its fibres were strong, it presaged well for the affair in question. Thirdly, Knowledge was also drawn by the Haruspices from the manner in which the fire consumed the victim. If the flame brightened immediately, was pure and clear, rose up in a pyramid without noise, and did not go out till the victim was consumed; these were happy signs. Fourthly, The smoke likewise was considered; whether it whirled about in curls, or spread itself to the right or left, or gave a smell different from the common one of broil'd meat. Fifthly, It was a lucky omen, if the incense they burned melted all at once, and gave a most agreeable smell.

Of Augurs or Auspices (very different from the Haruspices) Romains, who was himself skilled in the augural science, established three, one to each Tribe. Servius Tullius, who added a fourth Tribe, is also said to have added a fourth Augur. But their college (for so it was called) was afterwards increased to 15, under a head, or Master of the Augurs. Their offices, comprized in the augural law, which we find in Tully's second book of Divination, were these. They were the interpreters of the will of the Gods, with respect to the making war and peace. And according to the divinity of that time, all were obliged to obey them, in so important an article. They drew their predictions from the different signs, which they said appeared in the air, and upon the earth. Thus what they pronounced to be contrary to the intentions of heaven, was deem'd unlawful; and it was capital to act contrary to their decisions. They likewise appointed the expiations they thought necessary, on account of the signs the Gods seemed to give of their anger. And from hence it appears how powerful they were in the Roman state; since by pronouncing any affair, any assembly of the Comitia, election of magistrates, war or peace, to be disagreeable to the Gods, they prevented it.

They pretended to make these discoveries of the will of the Gods several ways. First, By the flight or chirping of birds. Secondly, By thunder or lightning. Thirdly, By the setting of the wind. Fourthly, By the hunger and different postures of chickens which were bred up in cages on purpose for the Augur's use, and were carried about in the Roman armies.

When the Augur, in the execution of his office, was to observe the heavens, he went up upon some high place; took the augural staff (which was a sort of crozier, bent at one end) in his hand, and mark'd out the four quarters of the heavens with it. Then he turn'd to the east, having the west behind him, the south to his right, and north to his left; and this is what the Romans called, Stare de caelo. In this situation he waited for a sign, by thunder and lightning, birds, or the wind.

When thunder was heard to the left, when the lightning came from the east, and was driven back by the wind to the same point, without darting forward to the west; when it did not upon the falling strike into the earth, but rebound towards heaven: these were happy presages.

As to birds: ravens, owls, and such like, were thought to presage things by their croaking and screeching; but eagles, vulturs, and especially wood-peckers, by their flying, which they observed whether it was from the right to the left, or from the left to the right.

As to the wind; its changes were the matter of observation.

When these sorts of signs fail'd, recourse was had to the chickens. Betimes in the morning, the augur whose business it was to observe them, and who was thence called Pullarius, (if that name did not rather belong to the keeper of the chickens) having commanded

Gods by augury. 'Tis said, that when he had offered sacrifice in an open place, a flash of lightning gleamed from the left, a lucky omen, according to the augural divinity. Be that as it will, it became a custom established by an express law of Romulus, not to raise any person to the royal dignity, the priesthood, or any of the publick magistracies, nor to undertake any war, till the Auspices had been first consulted; and this practice lasted above 700 years. For though it owed its origin to nothing but the ignorance of those early ages, the priests and sacrificers persuading the people, that in the flights of birds, and the entrails of beasts, they could plainly read the destinies of men, yet in process of time, it became one of the chief mysteries of state policy, as there will be frequent occasion to observe in the course of this history.

§. IV. ROMULUS being thus declared King of Rome by the voices of the people, and with the approbation of the Gods, immediately put on a habit of distinction, to give himself a greater air of majesty. He also appointed twelve lictors or serjeants to attend him whenever he should appear in publick, each of them bearing a battle-ax stuck in a bundle of rods, which was then the usual symbol of sovereignty in the petty states of * Hetruria. But notwithstanding these ensigns of royalty, his power was confined within very narrow limits. For the form of government established by the Romans, was, as we shall presently see, a kind of mixt monarchy, the sovereignty being divided between a Head or Prince of the nation, a senate that was to be his council, and the assembly of the people.

Romulus having numbered the citizens of Rome, found them to be about 3000 foot, and 300 horse. He divided them into three equal parts, which were called Tribes or Thirds, each being commanded by its Præfect or Tribune.

These tribes he divided into ten Curie or companies of a 100¹ men, each company commanded by an officer, whom Dionysius calls Curio.

Again, the thirty Curie were subdivided each of them into ten Decurie: over which were appointed distinct officers, named Decuriones.

commanded a general silence, caused the pen to be opened, and threw down a handful of crumbs or corn. If the chickens did not immediately run fluttering to the meat; if they scattered it with their wings; if they went by without taking notice of it, or if they flew away, the omen was reckoned unfortunate, and to portend nothing but danger or mischance; but if they leapt presently out of the pen, and fell to so greedily as to let some of their meat drop out of their mouths upon the pavement, there was all the assurance in the world of happiness and success. This augury was called tripudium quasi terripavium, the old word pavire signifying as much as ferire. We meet with tripudium Solistimum and tripudium Sonivium in Festus, both derived from the crumbs falling to the ground.

The Augurs had several other ways of diving into futurity. C. & R. and Kennet.

* Livy (B. 1. c. 8.) thinks, that not only the lictors, and the number of them, were taken from the Hetrurians (who inhabited the country now called Tuscany) but also the Sella curialis, and the Toga Prætexta.

¹ Dionysius seems here to differ from Polybius and Varro. These tell us, that this division took place among the squadrons of horse called Turme; which has made Grævius say, p. 7. of the præf. to 1 vol. of Rom. Antiq. that D. Hal. is mistaken. Nevertheless we cannot draw thence a decisive proof against the Greek historian. What was done in later times with respect to the cavalry, does not contradict the order Romulus at first establish'd in the Curie. C. & R.

Year of
R O M E
I.

R O M U -
L U S First
King.
D. Hal. p.
80, 81.

Livy, B. 1.
c. 8.

D. Hal. B.
2, p. 78.
Plut. in
Rom. p.
24.

B. 2, p. 32.

Year of
R O M E
1.

R O M U L U S
1. r s First
King.

Strabo, B.
6. p. 352.

Dion. Hal.
B. 2. p. 82.

p. 83.

p. 84.

p. 85.

D. H. p.
84.

p. 85.

As Rome had at first no lands belonging to her, but what she got by cession from the city of Alba, her territory was very small, not above five or six miles in extent. Romulus nevertheless shared it into three parts, but not equal. One was allotted for the expences of religious worship; another reserved for the King's revenue and the uses of the state; and the third and most considerable was divided into thirty portions, to answer to the thirty Curiae.

The next thing done by Romulus, was the distinguishing those of the people who were better born, more rich or more eminent for virtue, from the poorer and more ignoble. The former he called Patricians, the latter Plebeians. All dignities, civil, military, and sacerdotal, were to be confined to the former. But to prevent the seditions which such a distinction might produce through the pride of the higher order, and the envy of the lower, he endeavoured to engage them to one another by reciprocal ties and obligations. Every Plebeian was allowed to chuse, out of the body of the Patricians, a Protector, who should be obliged to assist him with his interest and substance, and defend him from oppression. These Protectors were styled Patrons; the protected, Clients. It was the duty of the Patron to draw up the contracts of his Clients; to extricate them out of their difficulties and perplexities, and to guard their ignorance against the artfulness of the crafty. On the other hand, if the Patron were poor, his Clients were obliged to contribute to the portions of his daughters, the payment of his debts, and the ransom of him or his children, if they happen'd to be taken in war. The Client and Patron could neither accuse, nor bear witness against each other; and if either of them were convicted of having violated this law, the crime was equal to that of treason, and any one might with impunity slay the offender, as a victim devoted to Pluto and the infernal Gods. For more than 600 years, we find no dissensions nor jealousies between the Patrons and their Clients, not even in the times of the Republick, when the people frequently mutiny'd against the great and powerful.

* Dionysius (in this place) says Παῖδες, Fathers; but this title seems to have properly belonged to the senators only; he himself telling us (page 85.) that the senators were chosen out of the Patricians, which supposes the distinction of Patricians and Plebeians, before the election of the Senators or Patres. D. Hal. p. 83, 111.

* M. Vertot quoting only Dion. Hal. makes the Patrons to be chosen out of the body of the Senate, yet Dion. Hal. says, out of the Patricians, and he mentions the institution of the patronage before the creation of the Senate: and Plutarch (p. 25.) affirms, that the Patrons were taken from the wealthier sort, who were not of the Senate.

According to Plutarch (p. 24.) the word Patron comes originally from one Patro, an Arcadian, a companion of Evander. He was a man very assiduous to the defenceless, and a protector to the poor. Be that as it will, the inhabitants of Rome were not the only persons who had their Patrons. The colonies, and other cities allied to, or conquered by the Romans, had afterwards their Patrons also at Rome. The only alteration in the Patronage, as instituted by Romulus, was of the custom of the Clients sometimes parting with their goods in favour of their Patrons. The Romans thought it unworthy of them to sell their protection. Of this Plutarch assures us, p. 25.

§. V. THE establishment of a * SENATE to assist the King in the administration, succeeded the institution of the patronage. Romulus composed it of a hundred men chosen out of the Patricians; but the choice was not made by the King himself; * he named only the first, who was to be chief Governor of the city, whenever the King should be in the field; then each tribe elected three, after which each of the thirty Curie chose three, which completed the number of a hundred Senators. They were called Patres, [Fathers] either upon account of their age, or their pater- nal care of their fellow citizens. “ Those who anciently composed the “ council of the Republick (says Sallust) had indeed bodies enfeebled by “ years, but their minds were strengthen’d by wisdom and experience.”
 Their descendants, to whom alone some appropriate the name of Patri- cians, were the prime Nobility among the Romans.

§. VI. TO form a guard for his Person, the King made a draught, p. 86.
 from each Curie, of ten horsemen, the whole number amounting to three hundred. These were called Celeres, either from their first captain, whose name was Celer, or else upon account of the celerity with which they executed the orders they received. They fought on foot or on horseback, as the occasion required, or the ground would allow ¹.

§. VII.

* Plutarch says, (p. 24.) that Romulus stiled his hundred Counsellors, Patricians, and the whole body of them the Senate, which signifies properly (says he) a consistory of old men.
 He adds, some say the Patricians were so called, because they were the fathers of legiti-mate children; others, because they could tell who their fathers were, which every one of the rabble that poured into the city could not do; others from the word Patrocinium, Patronage, because they were the defenders of the poor and weak; but he seems to think it most probable, that they were so stiled from the people's calling them and esteem-ing them as Patres or Fathers, on account of their being so protected by them.

¹ Livy seems to ascribe the choice of all the Senators to the King, when he says (B. 1. c.
 8.) that ROMULUS created one hundred Senators: Nevertheless it is not clear, that by those words he meant, that the hundred Senators were created by the single authority of the King, and in virtue of his royal prerogative.
In whom resided the Power of creating Senators? is a question which neither Livy nor any of the Latine writers “ treat professedly, but “ touch it only incidentally; and it is natu“ ral to all, upon the slight and occasional “ mention of an Event, to ascribe it to the “ principal agent, concerned in its producti“ on; so as to impute the acts of popular as-“ semblies to the Prince or ruling Magistrate, “ who convened and presided in them, and “ had the chief influence perhaps in deter“ mining the transactions themselves. Thus “ when Livy tells us that the Præfēt of the “ city created the first Consuls [l. 1. c. 60;] and “ that Brutus, one of these Consuls, created P.

 “ Valerius, his colleague in that office [l. 2. c. 2.]
 “ or that the INTERREX, on other occasions, “ created the Consuls, [l. 9. c. 7.] or that the “ Pontifex Maximus was ordered by the Senate “ to create the first Tribunes, [l. 3. c. 54.] he “ means nothing more, than that those Ma“ gistrates called the people together, in or“ der to make such creations, in which they “ assisted and presided. Ibi exemplo, Ponti- “ fice Maximo comitia habente, Tribunos Ple- “ bis creaverunt. [ibid.] And as this is the “ usual stile of all writers, so it is peculiar“ ly of those, who write the History of their “ own country, and for the information of “ their own people; who have not the pa“ tience to treat minutely of things which “ they suppose to be known to their rea“ ders, as well as to themselves: and hence “ it sometimes happens, that the origin of “ Customs and Constitutions of the greatest “ importance are left dark and obscure, not “ only to strangers, but even to the natives “ of later ages.”

Dr. Middleton's treatise on the Roman Senate, p. 18.

² Thus far Dion. Hal. concerning the Ce- leres. M. Vertot adds, that the state found each of them a horse (Equus) from which they were called Equites, and that they were distinguished by a gold Ring, and thus he makes these

§. VII. THE respective powers and privileges of the King, Senate, and People, were thus settled:

The KING was to be in all religious affairs supreme; he was to be the guardian of the laws and customs, to take cognizance of the weightier causes between man and man, referring those of less moment to the Senate, upon whose decrees he had nevertheless a controul. It belonged to the King to convene the Senate and the assemblies of the people, propose affairs to them, give his own opinion first, and then do what was concluded upon by the majority. He was also to command the army in time of war with absolute authority; and he had the care of the publick money.

The SENATE were not only to be Judges in private causes, but to deliberate upon such publick affairs as the King proposed, and to determine by the plurality of voices.

To the ASSEMBLIES OF THE PEOPLE three things were committed ; to create magistrates, make laws, and determine concerning any war that was proposed by the King ; yet in all these things the Senate's approbation was necessary.

The people for many years gave their voices by Curia, in which every private man had his vote. The majority of votes in each Curia determined the sense of that Curia, and what the major part of the 30 Curie agreed to, was deemed the resolution of the whole assembly, which assembly was therefore called Comitia Curiata.

Such was the fundamental constitution of this state, neither purely monarchical, nor entirely republican; the King, the Senate and the People, were in a sort of mutual dependence on each other, from whence resulted a balance of power, whereby the Regal Prerogative was restrained, a useful authority preserved to the Nobles, and the liberty of the People secured.

§. VIII. ROMULUS considering that the happiness of states depended upon the favour of the Gods, which was only to be obtained by the piety and virtue of the people, proceeded to the establishment of religious and civil laws.

With respect to RELIGION, He did not give it all that form in Celeres or life-guards the first Roman Knights, and speaks of them as a kind of middle order, between the Patricians and the people. But Dion. Hal. tho' he mentions the forming of this Life-guard, immediately after the creation of the Senate, says nothing of the Ring, nor of any of those marks by which the Equestrian Order was afterwards distinguished from other Plebeians. And Livy does not mention the creation of any Knights till the union of the Romans and Sabines. He seems to think, that the Celeres or life-guard which Romulus kept in pay in time of peace as well as war, were not formed till towards the end of his reign, when he affected despotism and tyranny. Plutarch seems also of that opinion.

* M. Vertot says (p. 6. Tom. 1.) that he directed the disposal of the publick money, which was under the care of two treasurers, afterward called Quaestors; but I do not find this in the authors cited by him, and it seems not well to agree with what he himself says (p. 59) of the institution of two treasurers in the time of Poplicola; till then the Kings or Consuls seem to have had the keeping of the publick treasure. See the Consulship of Poplicola in this history.

which

which it afterwards appeared: he only regulated the worship of those Divinities which Evander had introduced, of those which Aeneas had brought from Phrygia, and of those which the Aborigines had honoured in their time. He neither introduced the infamous fables of the Greek Divinities into the publick faith, nor suffered any licentious ceremonies in the publick worship. He appointed that every Curia should have its own temple (which was itself called Curia) and its peculiar God and Priest; that the people should assemble on certain stated days, in Curia or publick halls built for that purpose, each of which was consecrated to its particular Deity, and that they should there feast in common upon the victims offered to the Gods. Romulus likewise established festivals, whereby religion became an ease and relief to a laborious people.

Year of
R O M E
I.

R O M U L U S
First King.

p. 93.

The ministers of the Gods were to be at least 50 years old, and none but their wives could perform the functions of priestesses. Their sons, to the age of puberty, were to wait at the altars, and their daughters so long as they continued virgins. The girls were called Camillæ, the boys Camilli. When a priest had no children of his own, he might chuse the handsomest children in his Curia to attend him in the sacrifices. To the sacerdotal families were granted distinguishing privileges. The laws exempted them from paying taxes, and from bearing arms. As the Priest's office was for life, it excited the ambition of many; but Romulus forbade all intriguing and caballing to obtain it, as also the purchasing it with money, and the trusting it to the hazard of lots. He left to the Curia the free choice of their Priests; and as these ministers of religion were laid under an obligation to acquaint themselves with the laws and customs of their country, and to record the principal events that happened in the state, they were its first historians and first lawyers.

§. IX. AS to the civil laws of Romulus, we have only some few fragments of them. The first relates to marriages; it decrees that the wife shall not leave her husband upon any pretence whatsoever, at the same time that it allows the husband to put away his wife*, and even to punish her with death (her relations concurring in the sentence) in case she be convicted of adultery, poisoning, making false keys, or only of drinking wine†. Romulus thought it necessary to be thus severe in the article of wine, in order to prevent adultery, which he looked upon as a

* Plutarch in his life of Romulus says, that if the husband put away his wife for any other cause, but for poisoning his children, counterfeiting his keys, or adultery, he was to give one moiety of his goods to his wife, and consecrate the other to Ceres.

† This law was so severely observed, that, according to Valerius Maximus, B. 6. de Severitate, Egnatius Metellus, who caught his wife drinking wine, and killed her upon the spot, was neither brought to a trial, nor censured for it: And Fabius Pictor mentions another woman whom her relations starved to death, for having broke open the chest in which were the keys of the cellar. Aulus Gellius and Pliny likewise assure us, that in consequence of this law, it was customary at Rome for the ladies to be saluted by their near relations whenever they met them, not so much out of civility and friendship, as to find out by their breath whether they had been drinking wine. But in process of time, the severity of this law was somewhat abated. Women who had drunk wine, were only condemned to lose their portions. C. & R.

second drunkenness, and a natural effect of that dangerous liquor. Each husband was confined to one wife, and their ^u goods were in common between them, but under the administration of the husband. The wife was declared universal heiress ^{*} to her husband, if he died intestate, and without children; but if he had children by her, they were to be equal sharers with her in the inheritance. It is very remarkable, that notwithstanding the power given to husbands to put away their wives, there was no instance of a divorce among the Romans for 530 years.

Nothing ever equalled the severity of the law which Romulus made in relation to children. He gave their fathers an absolute power over them. A father by his own private authority could imprison his children, put them to death, and even sell them for slaves three times over, of whatever age they were, or to whatever dignity they had arrived [†].

Plutarch observes it as a singular thing in Romulus, that, calling all murder parricide, he ordained no punishment for real parricide, believing it an impossible crime; and indeed for near 600 years, it was not once known in Rome.

By another law of Romulus, who knew that the power of a state consists not so much in the extent of its territory, as in the number of its people, it was made criminal to kill an enemy who yielded, or so much as to sell him. His chief view in making war, was to conquer men, being sure of not wanting lands, if he did not want troops.

^{*} This community of goods was thus expressed in the marriage ceremonies: The persons to be married came to a sacrifice, in presence of ten witnesses; and the priest, among other offerings presented a wheat loaf, and scattered pieces of it over the victim. This was to shew that bread, the symbol of all other goods, should for the future be in common between the husband and wife; and this rite was called confarreatio. Hence it is said in Romulus's law, Uxor farreatione viro juncta, in sacra & bona ejus venit. It appears likewise by the same law, that the wife, upon marriage, professed the same Gods, and the same worship with her husband; both as to the household Gods of each family, and the respective God of each Curia. The law adds, jus devorandi ne esto, i. e. let not the husband have an absolute and unlimited power of divorcing his wife. This is the strict meaning of devorandi; but it is also sometimes used to signify a power of refusing to accept the person who had only been betrothed. C. & R.

[†] This is what D. Hal. says of the wife's interest (in Romulus's time) in the husband's effects after his decease. But this law is not among those of Romulus, which now remain.

There were two sorts of marriages among the Romans: The first was to marry their wives without any other covenant, but that of keeping them in their houses. But these were not truly wives, till they had continued with their husbands a whole year, without three days interruption: And this was called a marriage by use, usu. The other way was, to marry a woman after marriage covenants had been made; and this was called a marriage by mutual sale, ex coemptione. In this case the woman gave her husband three pieces of money called Asses, to express that she purchased of him a right of sharing in his goods; and the husband gave the wife the keys of the house, to shew he committed to her the care of the family. These latter only were called mothers of families, matres-familias; and it is probable, that they only were sole heiresses to their husbands. C. & R.

[‡] In case a child was born with any monstrous deformity, the father might make away with it; but if it was a son, or an eldest daughter, he was first to advise with five of his neighbours; if he did not observe this rule, the half of his goods were confiscated to the publick use. Instit. (Juf-tin. B. 1.) C. & R.

As

As this Prince was of opinion, that the sedentary arts and occupations emasculate men's minds, and enervate their bodies, he permitted none but strangers or slaves to be employed in them. He confined the citizens to the two professions of war and agriculture; and considering the ill consequences that might arise from dividing the employments, he made every Roman of free condition exercise both.

Year of
R O M E.
I
R O M U -
L U S First
King.
p. 98.

§. X. THUS was the colony settled; and the form of its government, and the wisdom of its laws attracted strangers to Rome from all parts. But what contributed most to people the city, was an asylum or sanctuary of refuge, which Romulus opened for runaway slaves, homicides, out-laws, and persons plunged in debt. Nor was the appearance of religion wanting to cover the King's policy. This sanctuary was dedicated to a new sort of Divinity, called the Asylean God, under whose protection all sorts of criminals and discontented persons who fled from their own countries to Rome were to live securely. Romulus made them all soldiers, and Rome in a little time became formidable to her neighbours. The Romans wanted nothing but women to secure the duration of their state. The King therefore sent Deputies to the *Sabines*², and the other neighbouring nations, to propose alliances with them by marriages of their daughters with his Romans. He represented to them, that new colonies were not always contemptible, and that the Gods had hitherto shewn favour enough to Rome, to make it no dishonour to enter into alliances with her. But as the Sabines had begun to look upon Romulus's new settlement with a jealous eye, they absolutely rejected his proposal, and some of them added raillery to the refusal, asking the deputies why their Prince did not open an asylum for vagrant women, and slaves of that sex, as he had done for men: your people then, said they, will be well matched; a pack of vagabond and loose women will make the fittest wives for a crew of fugitives loaded with crimes or debts.

B. 2. p. 88.
Liv. B. 1.
c. 8.
Plut. in
Rom. p.
22.

Livy, B. 1.
c. 9.

§. XI. WHEN this insulting answer was brought to Rome, Romulus heard it with the quickest resentment, resolving to be revenged, and to take away the daughters of the Sabines by force. He communicated his design to the Senate, and had their approbation of it. The only question was, how to succeed in the enterprize. It happened, or so it was pretended, that as workmen were digging in a field near Rome, they found a subterraneous altar dedicated to the God Consus, or the God of council, who is the same with the *Equestrian Neptune*². The discovery of this altar furnished Romulus with a pretext to proclaim a festival and publick sports in honour of the God. He notified the day he had Ibid.

Plut. in
Rom. p.
25.

² The Sabines possessed that part of Italy which lies between the Tiber, the Teverone, and the Apennines. They inhabited divers little towns, some of which were governed by petty Princes, and others only by magistrates, and in form of a republick; but tho' their particular governments were different, they were all united by a kind of league and community which formed the several societies of that nation into one state. The Sabines were some of the nearest neighbours to Rome.

² See page 8.

fixed for these games to the neighbouring towns, and made all the pompous preparations for them, that the poverty of his colony would admit.

Those of the Sabines who lay nearest to Rome, flocked thither in crowds upon the day appointed for the solemnity, as Romulus had foreseen they would; so small numbers came also from the little towns of Coma, Cranium, and Artemne. The strangers were received by the Romans with great demonstrations of joy. Every citizen had his guest, whom, when he had treated him in the best manner he could, he conducted and placed where he might conveniently see the sports. The peace and harmony that continued for some days, lulled the strangers into security; but the Romans did not put their enterprize in execution till the last day of the festival. They had received orders to come armed that day, but to conceal their arms under their cloaths. When the multitude were most attentive to the show, Romulus, who presided at it in a striped robe called Trabea, rising from his seat, gathered up his robe, and threw it over his body. This was the signal agreed upon. Instantly the Romans drawing their swords, rushed in among the strangers, and seized their daughters. The men being unarmed and terrified, ran away, and the Romans who had no design of shedding blood, let the fathers and mothers depart in safety. In the hurry of the action, some Romans of distinction perceiving a body of their people carrying off a young woman of singular beauty, envied them so fine a prey, and attempting to take her from them, the latter cried out Thalasso, Thalasso, meaning that the young person was designed for Thalassus, a brave and worthy Roman, much esteemed in the colony; and

* As to the nature of these games, it is probable they chiefly consisted of races, wrestling, and the like, since this was the manner that afterwards prevailed of celebrating the Cerckia, which were perpetuated at Rome in memory of this first show given by Romulus, and according to Plutarch, annually observed on the 18th of August, because the rape of the Sabines was on that day. C. & R.

† The festival began in the beginning of the month Septilis, and did not end till the 20th. Reckoning from March, which was the first month of the year in Romulus's calendar, the 6th month was August, which was for that reason called Septilis, even after the regulations made by Numa Pompilius and Julius Caesar. C. & R.

‡ The learned have wearied themselves with enquiries about the habits of the ancient Romans, especially the Trabea. All things considered, Dion. Hal. and other ancient authors, incline one to believe it was very like the Toga; with this difference, that it was adorned with stripes of purple, at due distances, on a white ground. This was the ordinary habit of the Kings of Rome; and it will hereafter appear, that the chief magistrates of the republick, and the Roman Knights, appeared in it, on certain days of ceremony. But there was likewise another sort of Trabea worn only by the Augurs; of which more in its place. C. & R.

* This is the opinion of Livy and Plutarch. Varro, as quoted by Sex. Pompeius, differs from them. He thinks the word Thalasso anciently signified those little baskets in which the ladies put their work to this day. As the Sabine virgins would not afterwards give themselves voluntarily to the Romans, but on condition that they should only be obliged to work in wool, they carried little baskets to their husbands houses, on the day of marriage, to put their work in. Others say (Plut. p. 26.) Thalasso was the word Romulus had agreed to pronounce, when the Romans were to begin the rape. And indeed this cry suited very well with the God of the sea, whose festival they then celebrated: And therefore the poets always give him the surname of Thalassios. Aristophanes speaking of Neptune, calls him Θαλάσσιος. C. & R.

hence

hence it was, that the crying out Tbalaffio became customary at Rome in the marriage ceremony, as Hymen and Hymenæe prevailed among the Greeks.

As this violence had been dictated by publick necessity, rather than brutal passion, Romulus's orders are said to have been observed with great exactness; he had forbid any further attempts upon the women, till marriages should be solemnized in form. For this purpose he commanded the Sabine virgins (for they were all called Sabine, because the greater number was of that nation) to be brought into his presence the next day. They were by this time a little recovered from their fright, and the King comforted them under the loss of their relations by words to this effect.

“ The Romans have not used this violence with an intention to dishonour, but to marry you; such methods of procuring wives are ancient in Greece, and, to women, more honourable than any other. Soften therefore the fierceness of your anger, impute our offence to your own fathers, who scornfully rejected our civil requests, and surrender your hearts to those men to whom fortune has given possession of your persons. Wrongs and injuries are often the forerunners of love and friendship; you will find your husbands behave themselves with so tender an affection, as shall leave you no cause to regret the loss of either your parents or your country.” To these words of the King the young men added caresses and flatteries, pleading violent love in excuse of their fault; love, of all pleas, says Livy, the most easily admitted by woman-kind.

After this, Romulus without delay married the women to his Romans by the same form, which was ever after used in marriages, Partake ye of your husband's fire and water: and it was not long before they experienc'd the truth of what Romulus had foretold them. The merit and fondness of their husbands made them forget their native country and their father's houses.

As to the number of these Sabine women, some historians make them to have been 683, others 527, and others reduce them to 30, the number of the Curia, deriving the word Curia from Curcs, the name of the town of which the women were for the most part natives; but no eminent historian is of this opinion.

It is an ancient historical tradition, that the brides never stepped upon the threshold, when they went into their husband's houses. They were held up to prevent it.

Turritaque premens frontem matrona coronâ Translatâ vitat contingere limina plantâ.
Pharf. B. 2.

Varro indeed contends, that it was out of respect to this part of the house which was consecrated to Vesta: but Plutarch (p. 26.) says, it was to shew, that the first marriages were made by rapes. And from hence, say some authors, comes the custom of parting the Hair of the new married women with the point of a lance. This was intended to shew, that iron and violence gave the first Romans their wives: and the truth of this custom seems to be confirmed by Ovid, in these words, Comat virgines hasta recurva comas.

C. & R.
But

F

VOL. I.

D. Hal. B.
2. p. 96.
Year of
R O M E
I.

R O M U -
L U S First
King.

p. 100.

Livy, B. 1.
c. 9.

D. Hal. B.
2. p. 100.
Plut. p. 25.

D. Hal. B.
2. p. 110.

Plut. in
Rom. p.
26.

Year of
R O M E
I.

R O M U-
L U S First
King.

But whatever was their number, it is agreed, that among them all, there was only one married woman; whose name was Herfilia. She either was mistaken for a Virgin, or, as some say, would not leave her only Daughter. Zenodotus, a Greek historian, mentioned by Plutarch, says, that Romulus made her his wife, and had a daughter by her, named Prima, because she was his first child, and a son named Abilius. But other writers contend, that Herfilia was married to a noble Roman named Hostus, and that Tullus Hostilius the third King of Rome descended from her.

§. XII. THE Sabines are held by some to have been a colony of Lacedæmonians, transplanted into Italy; and it is not improbable. At least the moderation, wisdom, and frugality of these two nations, gave them a great resemblance to each other. Their state was a pretty extensive one, if compared with the little neighbouring sovereignties; but the people lived mostly in villages that were open on all sides, or only enclosed with palisades. And therefore, though their courage excited them to revenge the affront they had received in the persons of their daughters; yet their prudence made them seek to repair their honour by a treaty, before they would run the hazard of a war. They sent to demand the restoration of their daughters, promising on that condition to enter into a friendly and neighbourly alliance with the Romans. But Romulus was inflexible. He on his part demanded, that the Sabines should confirm the marriages of his Romans, which were made indeed by violence, but a violence that was become necessary. Whilst the treaty, which went on slowly, suspended hostilities on both sides, Acron, whom the historians call King of Canina, prevented the Sabines, and took the field before them. He was a man of valour, and had signalized himself in many battles. He thought the neighbourhood of the Romans, which had given him jealousy from their first establishment, was now indeed become formidable since the audacious Rape committed upon the Sabine women, and that it was necessary to crush, in its infancy, a colony which otherwise would increase in strength as it grew in age: And for this reason he solicited the Sabines, as also the inhabitants of Crustumerium and Antenna, to join their forces with his. Their slowness made him impatient. He imagined he could, without their help, subdue a handful of Men, got together in a city newly founded, and very little fortified: But the march of his army had more the air of an incursion of robbers, than of a regular expedition. The Caninenses having ravaged the lands of Rome, Romulus did not confine himself within his walls: He in-

¹ Canina was situated on the confines of Latium and Sabinia. Plutarch and Stephens make it a city of the Sabines; but the authority of Livy, Dion. Hal. and Festus, who think this a city of ancient Latium, is against them. Cluverius thinks, that Canina was on this side the Anio, four miles from Rome. Holsteius places it beyond that river, in the neighbourhood of Mancicelli. C. & R.

² Crustumerium and Antenna, were either subject to, or in the neighbourhood of Sabinia. Some geographers think the former was situated near the place where Marcigliano Vecchio now stands. They place the latter upon the Tiber, almost between the Tiburtine and Nemantine ways. But it is uncertain where they stood. Plutarch (p. 27.) says, that Fidenæ made a league with Crustumerium and Antenna, against the Romans. C. & R.

stantly

stantly marched out against the enemy, and joined battle with them in the open field, where the Romans fought for every thing that was dear to them, and even for the hopes of posterity. In the heroic times it had been a common custom, and it was not yet abolished, for the two commanders in the heat of an engagement mutually to provoke each other with their eyes and voices to single combat: Upon which the armies opened, and left a space where their leaders were to fight. Romulus and Acron challenged each other, and on this occasion the former made a vow to Jupiter, that if he came off conqueror, he would erect a trophy¹ to him of the spoils of the conquered. As impressions of religion frequently exalt a man's courage, the young King performed the hero so well, that he slew his enemy, an experienced warrior, and stripped him of his armour. The death of Acron was followed by the rout of the Cænineses; and Romulus pursued them to their town, which they had of late slightly fortified. The Romans entered it with the runaways, and took it without opposition. And then did the Conqueror give a signal proof both of his moderation and his good policy. He spared the blood of the conquered, and contented himself with * razing Cænina, and carrying the inhabitants to Rome, to augment his colony: And the establishment he gave them, upon the same foot with his first citizens, became a precedent to himself, which he ever after followed on the like occasions. And now, either out of ostentation, or to animate his people with an ardent love of glory, he celebrated his victory with a new kind of pomp. He decreed himself the honours of a triumph¹; for so was called the reception given to Generals at their return from successful expeditions. Nor is it improbable, that this example of Romulus's triumph excited the emulation of succeeding commanders, and contributed as much as any thing to the

Year of
R O M E
I.R O M U -
L U S First
King.Plut. in
Rom. p.
27.

¹ The use of trophies, especially among the Greeks, is immemorial. It was customary to erect them upon the field of battle. The ancient trophies consisted of a post, a stake, or a trunk of a tree dressed up with the spoils of the enemy. The figures of them are to be seen on several medals, which were struck after the gaining of great and important victories. In after-times, conquerors erected pillars of brass, or marble, or stone, and towers, and triumphal arches, with inscriptions to perpetuate the memory of their victories. But according to Plutarch in his Roman questions, those who first made use of marble and brass for trophies, were abhorred, because, says he, it seemed inhuman to transmit the shame and misfortunes of people to future ages: and he adds, that in consequence of this, they would not suffer the triumphal arches to be repaired. These monuments were generally dedicated to some divinity. C. & R.

* If we may believe Dionysius Halicarnas-

seus, Romulus preserved the city, and gave p. 103. the inhabitants their choice, either to stay at home or settle at Rome: and the same author adds, that the conqueror thought fit to send a colony of three hundred Romans to Cænina. C. & R.

¹ This was the first Roman triumph. The word comes originally from Θρίαμβος, one of the names of Bacchus, who conquered the Indies; and who, according to Pliny and Diodorus Siculus, first received the honours of a triumph. They who followed the conquerors, made the air resound with this name of Bacchus; whence the acclamation, Io Triumphe! which is thus expressed by Horace:

Tuque dum procedis, Io Triumphe!
Non semel dic meus Io Triumphe!
Civitas omnis.

The order, laws, and pomp of the ancient triumphs will be spoken of hereafter. C. & R.

Year of
R O M E
I.

R o m u - l u s First
King.

* a ferent-
do.

Plut. in
Rom. p.
27.
Livy, B. I.
c. 11.

conquest of the world : But the preparations for this ceremony were suitable to the poverty of the Romans in those days : Romulus did not ride in a chariot, but entered Rome on foot^m, with his troops marching some before and some after him. His long hair flowed upon his shoulders, and his head was crowned with lawrel. He had fixed the spoils of Acron to the trunk of a small oak, and covered it with them. This trophy represented a man armed, which the King carried in triumph on his right shoulder. All the people came out of the city to meet the conqueror, singing his praises ; and lined the road on both sides. As soon as he entered Rome, they presented him wine, and before the houses, spread tables for those of the soldiers who wanted to refresh themselves. Romulus proceeded in the same order he entered the city, to the hill Saturnius, where, after the procession was over, he erected a small temple of only ten feet long, and five broad ; and here the triumphant victor deposited his trophy, consecrating it to Jupiter * Feretrius *. This name was then given to Jupiter, because Romulus had himself carried thither the present he had vowed : And a name of distinction was likewise given to the spoils of the King of Cænina ; they were called ° opima Spolia, because they were more honourable than any other, being taken by the General of the Roman army, from the General of the enemy's army, after he had killed him with his own hand.

Not long after this, Romulus, with one ^p Legion, levied in haste, subdued the Antemnates and Crustumini, who had taken arms on the same account as the Cæninenses. Herfilia, who was of Antemna, interceded with him for her countrymen ; and as lenity suited best with the King's po-

* Dion. Hal. (p. 102.) represents Romulus as carried in a chariot drawn by four horses, ~~ἐκ τριῶν καρπυρίων~~, during the ceremony of his triumph ; but Plutarch (p. 27.) and Zonaras affirm, that the elder Tarquius was the first that triumphed, drawn in a chariot : and the former of those writers says, there were statues at Rome in his time representing Romulus on foot loaded with his trophy.

* Plutarch (p. 27.) derives the word Feretrius from ferire to strike ; and supports his conjecture by Romulus's prayer to Jupiter to strike Acron. But this interpretation does not very well agree with what he says in another place, that the Greek tongue was in use in the reign of Romulus. What he says in his life of Marcellus, is most probable, namely, that Feretrius came originally from φερίτης, which signifies any machine for carriage. C. & R.

° Festus derives the word Optima from Ops, which signifies the earth, and the riches it produces ; so that optima Spolia, according to him, signifies rich spoils. But Plutarch (p. 27.) derives it from Opus, as if one had said spolia difficult to be obtained. This name was given only to such spoils as the General of the Roman army had taken from the General of the enemy's troops ; at least this is Plutarch's opinion. Though Varro assures us, that not only a subaltern officer, but even a common soldier might make a trophy of the spoils he had taken from him who commanded in chief the enemy's army. In the space of about five hundred and thirty years after Romulus, only Cornelius Cossus and Cladius Marcellus are recorded to have had the glory of carrying off this sort of spoils. C. & R.

* The word Legion comes from legere, which signifies to choose. And indeed the Roman legions were all chosen men. The number of men in a legion, was different at different times, as will be occasionally observed in the course of this history. It is sufficient to observe here, that when Livy says, Romulus led one legion against the Antemnates, he must be understood to mean, that he led three thousand foot and three hundred horse against them ; which were then the best part of the Roman forces. Plutarch (p. 24.) says, that the Roman legion consisted at that time of three thousand foot and three hundred horse. C. & R.

licy,

licy, having first consulted with the Senate, he transplanted the inhabitants of both the conquered cities to Rome, where they were admitted to all the privileges of Roman citizenship; and he sent colonies from thence into their towns. By this conduct, the reputation of his clemency, as well as bravery, became so great, that several cities of Hetruria voluntarily submitted to him. Cælius an Hetrurian Leader brought to Rome all the troops under his command, and settled on a hill near the city, which from him took the name of Mount Cælius.

Year of
R O M E
I.

R O M U-
L U S First
King.
D. Hal. p.
104.

Romulus was now obliged to enlarge the bounds of Rome. The city had hitherto contained only the hill Palatinus, which was encompassed with a square wall: But upon this augmentation of inhabitants, it spread itself to the Capitol, then called the hill Saturnius; and on the top of that hill they built a citadel, which was committed to the government of a noble Roman named Tarpeius; it was surrounded on all sides with ramparts and towers, which equally commanded the city and the country. They likewise built a wall from the foot of the hill Saturnius to the Tiber, and opened a gate in it which they called Carmentalis.

§. XIII. BUT this increase of the Roman forces and fortifications did not terrify the Sabines. They sent a second deputation to Romulus, to demand back their daughters, and upon his refusal, they march'd towards Rome with an army of 25000 foot, and 1000 horse, under the command of their King Titus Tatius. The troops which Romulus led against them, are said to have been not much inferior in number, for he received supplies from his grandfather Numitor, and from Hetruria; the Hetrurians being commanded by one Lucumo a brave warrior, or rather by one of their 12 Lucumones or governors. Romulus posted his army on the hills Esquilinus and Quirinalis.

D. Hal. B.
2. P. 105.

The Sabines advanced in good order, and encamped at the foot of the hill Saturnius, in that plain since called the Campus Martius. Tatius seeing all the posts guarded, was extremely uneasy about the success of his enterprize: But an unforeseen adventure extricated him out of his difficulties. As the Sabines were roaming round the hill, to find a passage whereby they might get into the citadel, the Governor's daughter, named Tarpeia, who went accidentally to draw water for a sacrifice, was much taken with the bracelets and rings with which the enemies were adorned. She therefore privately sent one of her maids to desire a conference with the Sabine General; and at night Titus Tatius came to the Postern-Gate that had been shewn him, and agreed to give Tarpeia what the soldiers wore on their left arms, provided she would facilitate their entrance into the citadel, by that very gate. It is probable the young woman, whose eyes were at first so dazzled with the ornaments of the Sabines, repented of her treachery: And then, in order to turn the stratagem against the Sabines themselves, she sent to Romulus, desiring a strong body of troops to oppose Tatius, who expected to enter the Citadel the night following, by a gate that she was to open to him. But it unfortunately happened that the messenger proved a traitor, went to the camp of the Sabines, and informed.

Year of
R O M E
I.

R O M U -
L U S F I R -
M A G .

D. H. P.
107.

p. 103.

p. 107.

formed them of the ambush that was laying for them. Tatius did not fail or being at the gate at the time appointed, but with a greater body of men than Tarpeia expected. As soon as it was opened, he led in his troops and made himself master of the citadel: And then the Sabines are said to have crushed Tarpeia to death with their bucklers, which they threw upon her, thinking themselves to have discharged their promise by thus giving her what they wore on their left arms.

From her the hill Saturnius took the name of Tarpeius, which it retained till it got that of Capitolinus (from the head of one Tolus, which was found there when workmen were digging to lay the foundations of a temple to Jupiter.) And even then, the steepest part of it, down which criminals were thrown, continued to be called The Tarpeian Rock.

The Sabines, now masters of the Citadel, had the advantage of being able to continue the war with more security. For a long time, only light skirmishes past between the two parties without much advantage on either side. At length both armies resolved to come to a general engagement. The first action (which the night put an end to) determined nothing, the success being equal on both sides. In the second, the Romans at the beginning had the advantage, in both wings commanded by Romulus and the Lucano, till a brave Sabine, named Mucius Curtius, who commanded the main body of the Sabine army, turned the scale in favour of his countrymen. He broke into the center of the Roman army, and, with design to give the wings of the Sabines an opportunity of rallying, pursued it to the very gates of Rome. Romulus, seeing this, press'd no longer after that wing of the Sabines, which he had forc'd to give ground, but immediately faced about, and hasten'd to attack Curtius; who, making a gallant resistance, facilitated the retreat of his countrymen toward their camp. At length Romulus met him and engaged him in single combat. Curtius being now wounded in several places, and unable to maintain the fight, threw himself into a lake which was made by the inundation of the Tiber, because on all the other sides he was surrounded by enemies. This lake was very full of mud towards the banks, and the water was deep in the middle; so that Romulus, thinking his enemy could not escape perishing, returned to the pursuit of the Sabines. But Curtius, tho' encumber'd with his armour, got safe out of the water, and left his name to the place; it was ever after called Lacus Curtius, even when it was dried up, and almost in the center of the Roman Forum.

Romulus, upon his return to his army, pushed the enemy with such vigour, that they fled in confusion, and took refuge in the Citadel. The Romans followed them, and, flushed with their success, expected to have retaken it. But the Sabines rolling great stones from the top of the hill, one of them hit Romulus on the head, and stunn'd him, so that falling down senseless, he was carried out of the field into the city. This accident re-

^a Proculus says, that the Lacus Curtius was so called, from the famous Curtius, who leap'd into the gulph that opened in that place.

And others think that it received its name from Curtius the Consul (colleague to M. Genucius) who wall'd it in.

vived

vived the courage of the Sabines; the Romans were put to flight in their turn, and pursued to the very gates of Rome. However, Romulus having by this time recovered his senses, rallied his troops, put himself again at their head, and drove the enemy back to the Citadel.

We are told that in the most critical minute of the day, when the Romans were flying before the enemy, Romulus made a vow to Jupiter in order to obtain his favour for the speedy rallying of his troops, and that, as fortune would have it, they stopped at the sight of their General, upon his return to the field of battle. Out of a belief therefore, that this was a particular blessing of Heaven, he erected a temple to Jupiter, whom he called Stator, because the Romans recovering from their fright made a stand, and faced the enemy. Livy and Plutarch say, that in this very moment the Sabine women coming out of the city with their hair dishevelled, and their children in their arms, threw themselves between the two armies, and by their tears and intreaties put a check to the fury of their fathers and husbands. But Dionysius gives a different and more probable account of the part which those women had in the reconciling of the two nations.

§. XIV. NEITHER Romulus nor Tatius was very forward to hazard another engagement. The Sabines, who remained masters of the Citadel, debated whether they should content themselves with only ravaging the lands of the Romans, and then return home; or should send for new levies from Sabinia to continue the war, till it could be finished with more advantage. The Romans, on their side, were no less doubtful and undetermined what to do. Their enemies they knew to be a powerful nation, that could more easily repair its loss than they could theirs. But on the other hand, could the Romans with honour restore the women? Would not that be a confession of weakness which might render the Sabines more haughty and more difficult to treat with? Whilst both parties were thus deliberating and in suspense, the women for whose sake the war had been undertaken, met together without the knowledge of their husbands, and, at the persuasions of Herfília, formed a design of mediating between the two nations. Before they could put their project in execution it was necessary to get it approved by the King and Senate; this, in the present conjuncture of affairs they found no difficulty to effect. A decree was passed, permitting the women to go upon the negotiation they proposed, on condition however that they left their children behind them; yet those who had several were allowed to take one or more with them, as it might be a means to promote the success of their enterprize.

The women being thus authorized, laid aside their ornaments, put on mourning, took some of their children in their arms, and leaving the city, advanced towards the camp of the Sabines. They no sooner arrived there, but casting themselves at the feet of their relations and countrymen, they by their tears and lamentations excited a general compassion. King Tatius having assembled his chief officers in council, and ordered the women to declare the intention of their coming, Herfília, in the name of her companions, is said to have made a long and pathetic speech to this effect:

“ If

Year of
R O M E
I.

R O M U -
L U S First
King.
Aurel.
Victor,
&c.
Plut. p. 29.

B. I. c. 13.
Plut. p. 29.

D. Hal. B.
2. p. 109.

p. 110.

Y. of
R.OME
I.
Rom. v.
L. v. f. a.
Kings.

“ If it be love to us which has moved you to begin the war, the same love should now induce you to put an end to it. It is true, we were unjustly forced away from our parents by the men who are now our husbands; but you neglected so long to revenge the injury, that we became engaged, by the strictest ties of affection, to those whom at first we hated: we are full of anxiety for them when they are fighting, and we lament their deaths when they fall in battle. You do not now come to vindicate the honour of virgins, but to tear away wives from their husbands, and mothers from their children; this is not to rescue us, it is to make us a second time captives.”

When she had thus spoken, she begg'd a truce, that the chiefs of the two armies might have an opportunity to treat of an accommodation. As D. Hal. B. the Sabines wanted only a pretence to lay aside their resentments, they readily accepted the proposal, and soon after the two Kings had a conference, 2. p. 111. which ended to the satisfaction of both parties. A treaty of union was Plut. p. 30. made and confirmed by oath. It was agreed, that both the Kings should reside in Rome, and be equal in power; that as many of the Sabines as were willing might come hither and be incorporated in the Tribes and Clares; that their common city should continue to be called Rome, but that the Romans should take the name of Quirites, till then peculiar to the Sabines; and that the latter should be admitted to public offices both civil and religious. Three considerable Sabine families are particularly mentioned to have followed the example of their King, and settled at Rome. The in Popl. p. head of one of them was Valerius Volesus (to whom Plutarch gives the honour of negotiating the peace;) of another, Talus Tyrannus; and of the 97. third, that Mecius Curtius who had signalized himself so much in the last battle: and these brought with them a multitude of their relations and dependants.

§. XV. BY THIS TREATY, which so considerably increased the colony, Rome became formidable. D. Hal. B. Dien. Hal. tells us, that the number of the new inhabitants equalled that of the old. Tatius, that he might imitate and equal Romulus in all respects, formed a council of a hundred Senators of his own nation. They were stiled Fathers, and enjoyed the same privileges with those who had been instituted by the founder of Rome. The Roman and Sabine Senators held their first assemblies on affairs of state separately, at the houses of their respective Kings. But after-

¹ Dien. Hal. says, that each particular citizen was to be called Romanus, and the collective body of them Quirites; yet it appears by this ancient form of words used at funerals, Ollus Quiris letba datus est, that each private citizen was also called Quiris.

The origin of the word Quirites, which was at first peculiar to the Sabines, and became in Romulus's time, the general name of the inhabitants of Rome, has been much sought for; and the most probable account antiquity gives of them, is this. The word Quiris, according to Plutarch (p. 36.) and some others, signified in the Sabine language, both a dart, and a warlike Deity armed with a dart. 'Tis uncertain whether the God gave name to the dart, or the dart to to the God. But be that as it will, this Quiris or Quirinus, was either Mars, or some other God of war; and the worship of Quiris continued in Rome all Romulus's reign: but after his death, he was honoured with the name Quirinus, and took the place of the God Quiris. C. & R.

wards

wards they all met together, near the temple of Vulcan, in a place which, because the Sabines and Romans went thither to form one assembly, was called *Comitium, Place of Meeting.

And now, according to Livy, were formed the three centuries of Roman Knights, called " Ramnenses, Tatienses, and Luceres. The first had its name from Romulus; the second from the Sabine King; and the third from the Lucus or grove where the Asylum stood, and where the Knights of this century had formerly dwelt. These three bodies of horse were incorporated into the Roman legions, which, according to Plutarch, consisted from this time of * six thousand foot and six hundred horse each.

Year of
R O M E

R O M U -
L U S First
King.

Livy, B. 1
c. 13.
Plut. in
Rom. p.
But 30.

* A cocundo, quasi comeundo. The Comitium was part of the Forum at Rome; and was at the foot of the hill Palatinus, over against the Capitol. C. & R.

Originally the Knights alone formed the body of the Roman or legionary cavalry. They, who aspired to the honour of being admitted into this order on account of their fortunes or birth, often served in the army as volunteers; with this difference, that the state furnished the former with horses out of the publick treasury, whereas the latter were obliged to furnish themselves with horses at their own costs. This custom continued till the time of Marius. Then Rome had recourse to her allies, to supply the deficiency of the Roman Knights: And from that time, the provinces furnished as many horse, as were wanted to recruit the legions. Indeed the Equitrian Order never had any settled form, till after the Census appointed by Servius Tullus. They who had the honour of being joined to them, engaged themselves to be soldiers by profession. They fought equally on foot or on horseback, as occasion or the disposition of the ground required. They were sometimes posted in the advanced guard, sometimes in the center, but more frequently in the wings, of each legion. But in length of time this illustrious body degenerated, and the Roman Knighthood became a bare title of honour. Those who enjoyed it, were distinguished from the Plebeians, by a gold ring they wore on their fingers. In the latter times of the republick, the Roman Knights were no more confined to war, than any other citizens. On the contrary, they undertook to collect the publick taxes, under the name of publicans. C. & R.

* Varro, Plutarch, and Festus give the same names to the three tribes established by Romulus, which Livy gives to these three centuries of Knights drawn out of the tribes.

VOL. I.

They are easily reconciled, if we will suppose each century to bear the name of its respective tribe. Dion. Hal. dates the division of the colony into tribes, from the first year of Rome. Plutarch brings it down to the time of this union of the Romans with the Sabines. And what can we infer from these different accounts, but that Romulus instituted the tribes from the beginning of his reign, thereby to settle his form of government; and that each tribe had no particular name, till after the conclusion of his treaty with Tatius. What confirms this conjecture, is, that the second tribe was called Tatiensis, or Titiensis, from the name of Titus Tatius. Some authors indeed give all the three names, Ramnenses, Tatienses, and Luceres, an Utrurian derivation. But the generality of historians agree in calling the colony of the inhabitants of Alba that went to Rome with Romulus, Ramnenses; and so they do, in calling the second tribe, Tatienses. The others who fled into the Asylum, were called Luceres, if we may believe Festus, from Lucerus, King of Ardea, who, according to him, joined with Romulus against the Sabines. C. & R.

* The most learned criticks have observed, that Plutarch is mistaken, when he says (p. 30.) the Roman legion consisted of six thousand foot and six hundred horse, after the conclusion of the treaty between Romulus and Tatius. But it is probable, that Plutarch meant no more, than that Romulus formed two legions, of the two united nations, which consisted each of three thousand foot, and three hundred horse. Αἱ λαγαῖται ἐν τῷ αὐτῷ πεζοῦ καὶ ἱππικῶν δὲ ἑξακοσίαι. And by the help of the same interpretation, we may explain Dion. Hal.'s saying, that Romulus incorporated into his legion, or army, three thousand of the Cæninenses and Antemnates. Though it were true, as some authors conjecture, that each legion did consist of above

G

Year of
ROME

ROMULUS
First
KING.

PLUT. p. 30.

But the most common opinion is, that the Roman legion did not then consist of above four thousand men at the most.

Rome could not without ingratitude forget the services that had been done her by the Sabine women, who were become entirely Roman, by affection as well as marriage. Honourable privileges and marks of distinction were decreed them. Every body was to give way to them when they passed along; all immodest and too free discourse was forbidden in their presence: it was a law, that indecent objects should never be brought into their sight; they were exempted from the jurisdiction of the ordinary judges, in capital cases; and lastly, they were permitted to hang a ball² of gold about their children's necks, to distinguish them from the vulgar. A particular robe was also assigned these children, called² Prætecta, the use of which was forbidden to all others.

above three thousand three hundred men at this time; yet it is certain, that, ordinarily, it did not exceed four thousand foot; for which reason, Festus calls a legion square; though this denomination owed its origin to their order in battle. I say, ordinarily, because on some occasions, the legion did consist, if we may believe Vegetius, of five thousand foot, and two hundred, three hundred, four hundred, and sometimes seven hundred horse. Livy tells us, the legions which were appointed to go over into Africa with Scipio, consisted of six thousand two hundred foot, and three hundred horse. And therefore Festus is mistaken, when he says that Marius first made the Roman legion to consist of six thousand two hundred foot, and three hundred horse. The number of soldiers in a legion was different at different times. Nevertheless, it is probable, that from Marius's time, the legions did more commonly consist of six thousand foot, and three hundred horse. C. & R.

² It is difficult to find out exactly what was the form of this ornament, which the Sabine women had leave to hang about their children's necks. It was called Bulla. Plurarch says, that this Bulla was like the little bubbles which the drops of rain make, when they fall upon running water; and it is therefore probable, that these little golden balls were both hollow and light; and, that they were but half globes, with one side flat, and the other globular. Macrobins pretends, that Tarquin the Elder extended the right of wearing these ornaments to all the children of the Patricians, and began with his own. The young Romans, when they came to the age of manhood, quitted the Bulla, and made an offering of it to the Di Lares, which were then called Lares Bullati. Hence Perfius:

*Cum primum parvulo custos mibi purpura cessit,
Bullaque succinctis Laribus donata pependit.*

and this ornament was also sometimes consecrated to some other divinity, as appears by this inscription which Gruterus gives us from an ancient monument:

JUNONI. PLACIDÆ.
CONSERVATRICI. AUGUSTÆ.
CLAUDIA. SABBATIS.
BULLAM. D. D.

The Romans used also to inclose in these Bulle certain preservatives which paganism had consecrated, to secure their children against enchantments: and they perhaps attributed this virtue to certain hieroglyphicks, or other mysterious characters. Or it may be, the figures of the Deities and of animals were made use of for this purpose; as in that particular kind of preservatives, which the Latines called Amuleta, whose form was arbitrary. C. & R.

² These robes were laced at the bottom, and perhaps on the two lappets, if what Rubinius thinks be true, that they were open before. They were called Prætectæ, from this purple edging or lace. They were worn by girls till their marriage, and by boys till they were seventeen, and took the Toga Virilis, or Manly Robe. But what was in Romulus's time a mark of distinction for the children of the Sabine women, was afterwards very common. All even to the children of the Liberti, or men who were made free, wore robes bordered with purple in their youth: and at length, the gravest of the magistrates wore them likewise, not only at Rome, but in the colonies, and Municipia, or free cities. C. & R.

For

Year of
R O M ER O M U L U S
First
King.D. Hal. p.
115.

occasion of it was this. Some of Tatius's people having ravaged the territory of the Lavinians^d, the latter sent envoys to Rome to den and satisfaction. Romulus declared himself for delivering up the aggressors to the injured party; but Tatius interposed. He alledged, that it was not fit to deliver up Roman citizens into the hands of strangers, their cause, and that the complainants ought to come and plead their cause at Rome. Nor was his conduct hitherto greatly to be condemned. But some of the envoys, in their return home, being murdered by the very robbers they had complained of, Tatius still continued to skreen these assassins from punishment. However, when the Lavinians renewed their complaint, Romulus, of his own authority, surrendered up the murderers to the Lavinians. Tatius looking upon this as an insult offered him by his colleague, put himself at the head of some armed men, pursued the Lavinians, and rescued his people out of their hands. So excessive a partiality to his colleague, accompanied with such grievous injustice, cost him his life. For, going after, to Lavinium^e with Romulus, to offer certain sacrifices, as the Kings were obliged to do, to those tutelar Gods of their state, which had been brought from Troy, and still remained at Lavinium, the relations and friends of the envoys who had been murdered, fell upon him and slew him at the foot of the altar with the priest's knives and the spits for roasting the victims. To Romulus they did no violence, but conducted him out of the town with acclamations of praise and benediction. He conveyed the body of his colleague to Rome, and honourably buried it on mount Aventine.

Romulus, being now a second time sole King of Rome, and revered, not only by his subjects, but by strangers, the Latine nation sought his friendship and alliance, and by their ambassadors concluded a treaty with him. To clear himself entirely of the violence offered to the envoys of the Lavinians, he pronounced sentence of banishment against the murderers, who on the death of Tatius had immediately fled from the city. After this he summoned the Lavinians who had slain his colleague, (and who had been delivered up to him) to answer for their crime; but they alledging, that they had only taken a just revenge for the murder of their ambassadors, he allowed their plea to be good, and dismissed them with impunity^f: yet the Sabines express'd no disposition to a revolt.

Plut. p. 32.

D. Hal. p.
116.

§. XVII. ABOUT this time a plague, which a famine made more terrible, raged in Rome, and the people of Camerium took advantage of the heavy affliction the Romans laboured under, to shake off the yoke. Romulus conquered them a second time, and on this occasion had the honours of a second triumph. He entered Rome with the acclamations of the people, as after the defeat of Acron. He had slain 6000 of the Camerini in the battle; and of those who had escaped, he transported one half to Rome, ^d Plutarch (p. 32.) says, it was the Lavinians who were injured, and who slew Tatius at Lavinium.

^e According to Licinius apud D. Hal. Ta-

tius did not go to Lavinium with Romulus, nor to offer sacrifices, but went by himself to exhort the Lavinians to pardon the criminals.

^f Plutarch (p. 32.) says they were punished tending sending from thence to Camerium twice as many Roman Citizens; so prodigiously, says Plutarch, was the number of his people increased in 16 years from the building of the city.

P. 33.
Year of
R O M E
XVI.

After ^a this he vanquished the Fidenates, took their city, (which stood about 40 furlongs from Rome) and sent thither a colony of 2500 Romans. But now the Veientes ^b, grown jealous of their prosperous neighbour, demanded Fidenæ back, as a city in their dependance; and having received a contemptuous refusal, they laid siege to it. A second body of troops they marched against Romulus, who had an army in the field. He defeated them in two battles with great slaughter, and took a vast number of them prisoners, together with their commander, who had acted a very weak part. And what was now done at the sale of these slaves, laid the foundation of a custom which prevailed ever after. When the people offered sacrifices to the Gods, in thanksgiving for any victory, they dressed up an old man in a purple robe, with a child's bullæ about his neck, and cried all around him, Sardians to sell. By which cries and ceremony, they originally alluded to these two things: That the old governor of the Veientes had ruled his state like a child: And that the Veientes, an Ettrurian people, were a colony of Lydians, whose capital city was Sardis.

R O M U -
L U S First
King.
Plutarch,
p. 32, 33.
D. H. p.
116, 117.

Romulus, being intent upon making the best advantage of his victory, passed the Tiber, and pursued the Veientes to the gates of their city; whose situation preserved it. Veii was built upon a steep rock, and Romulus had then neither the troops, nor the provisions necessary to besiege it. He therefore retired; yet with a full purpose of returning in a little time, and reducing to ashes a city, which had no motive to conspire against Rome, except jealousy or ambition. But two defeats had taught the Veientes wisdom; and they prevented their total ruin by their submission. They sent a deputation to Rome to sue for peace; and Romulus granted them a truce for 100 years, upon their surrendering seven small towns on the Tiber, with some salt-pits at the mouth of that river, and their sending 50 of their principal citizens to Rome, as securities for their fidelity. A war so advantageously ended obtained him a third triumph.

p. 118.
Liv. B. 1.
c. 15.

This was the last military exploit of Romulus. It is surprising, and not easy to be accounted for, that this Prince, who seemed so eagerly bent upon extending his domination over his neighbours, should, after the death of his grandfather Numitor, leave Alba in possession of her laws and li-

Plut. p
34.

^a Plutarch and Dionysius speak of Fidenæ as taken before Camerium.

^b Veii, the city of the Veientes, stood about 200 furlongs from Rome. D. Hal. compares it to Athens for extent and riches.

^c This account is taken from Plutarch. But Sinius Capito gives the custom a later date. He says, that when Tiberius Sempronius

Gracchus the Consul had conquered Sardinia, he brought so great a number of slaves from thence, that for a great while together, nothing was to be seen in the markets but Sardinians, or Sardi, to be sold. Which gave rise to the proverb, Sardi venales, alius alio nequior. That is, Sardinians to sell, every one worse than his fellow. C. & R.

Year of
ROME

Rome
1st & 2nd
K. 67.

p. 34.
D. H.
p. 113,
119.

Levy. The sovereignty of that state devolved upon him, and he might have subjected it to the Roman laws; yet he reserved to himself no other power over it, than that of naming annually a magistrate, with the title of Dictator, to govern it, in form of a republick.

§. XVIII. SO great an instance of moderation in the first King of Rome is the more extraordinary, as the historians all agree, that being elated with his continual prosperity, he now affected an absolute tyranny. He paid no longer any deference to his great council; the Senators were assembled merely for form sake, he made himself the sole arbiter in all affairs. Having erected a judgment-seat in the Forum, he there administered justice, or rather exercised cruelty, attended by his 300 * Celeres, and his 12 Lictors, the ministers of his despotic will. But that which more than all things else provoked the Fathers was, that, of his own authority, and without consulting them, he shared the conquered lands among the soldiers, as he pleased; and, even against their opinion, restored the Veientes their hostages. The Senators not able to endure that the government should be thus changed into an absolute monarchy, conspired his destruction; and it was not long before they effected it.

Year of
ROME
XXXVII.

Plutarch,
Rom. p.
121. and
Num. p.
60. Livy.
B. i. c. 16.

On the seventh of July, in the thirty-seventh year of Rome, Romulus (now sixty years old, or, as some say, only 55) appointed a review of his troops in a plain, without the city; and the Senate for the greater state attended him thither. Whilst the King was haranguing his army, near a pond, called Goats-pond, a sudden storm of hail and thunder came upon them. The storm dispersed the soldiers; and the Senators remaining alone with the King, thought this a favourable opportunity of executing their design. The King was * slain, and his body conveyed out of sight in an instant. Some pretend, that, the better to conceal the fact, the Senators cut him into pieces, and that every Senator carried away one under his robe. Be that as it will, the circumstance of the storm gave occasion to the fable which the assassins spread among the people, that the King was all on a sudden surrounded with flame, and snatched up in it from earth to heaven. The credulous were contented with a story which made the founder of their colony a God; but the more penetrating

* The three hundred horse which Romulus had for his guard, were the first Corps of the Roman soldiery. They were chosen by the thirty Curiae, each furnishing ten men; and Romulus divided them into three companies, under the command of a general officer called Tribunus Celerum. The particular captain of each company was stiled Præfectus Celerum. The Tribunus Celerum had great authority in Rome, and may be said to have been the second person in the state next the King. He had a right of assembling the people on pressing occasions. C. & R.

¹ This adventure, according to Plutarch,

(p. 36.) gave rise to the Caprotine Nones, or Populi fugium, a festival in the Roman calendar on the Nones of July. But other authors give another origin to this festival.

^m The historians are not agreed about the manner in which Romulus was assassinated. Some say it was done by the people, who were enraged at the King for shewing more favour to those who were newly come to Rome from the conquered cities, than to the old inhabitants: whilst others pretend, that Senators stabbed him in full Senate, and having cut his body in pieces, every one took a part of it, and carried it away under his robe.

conceived just suspicions against the murderers; insomuch that the Senate became odious to all the better sort in Rome. This made it necessary to find out some secret to stop the complaints, and appease the anger of the multitude: And Julius Proculus, a considerable man among the Fathers, was the person whom the Senate suborned to impose upon the people. He was esteemed a man of probity, and his word had the more credit, as he had always been thought a friend to Romulus, having come from Alba with him, and preferred the doubtful fortune of his unsettled colony to the certain advantages he possessed in his own country. When the Curie were assembled, he told them the following story, and swore to the truth of it. That as he was travelling along, Romulus suddenly appeared to him: his stature was taller than that of mortals, and his armour cast a dazzling brightness: The apparition filled him with a religious dread, and he addressed himself to it in these words: Wherefore, O King, and for what crime of ours have you thus exposed us to the most unjust and grievous suspicions? Why have you so suddenly forsaken a city, which by your absence is universally plunged in the deepest sorrow? To which Romulus answered: It pleased the Gods, O Proculus! that I should continue among mortals till I had put Rome into a condition of rising to the highest pitch of power and glory, and that I should then return to Heaven from whence I originally came. Go therefore and admonish my Romans to love temperance and warlike exercises; for it is by these that they will one day become masters of the world.

Year of
R O M E
XXXVII.

R O M U -
L U S First
King.

Plut. p.
35.

This fable, averred for truth by a man who was thought sincere and honest, removed all suspicions; the people were transported with joy; divine honours^a were decreed to the new Deity; and the Senate concurred to make a God of him whom they could not endure for a King.

Such was the end of Romulus, the founder of Rome: A Prince, as we have seen, of uncertain birth, brought up by shepherds, and whose first empire was over a promiscuous, undisciplined rabble: Who, when he had built a city, peopled it chiefly with robbers, out-laws, runaway slaves, and fellows of desperate fortunes, from all quarters, men, who though restrained by laws from injuring one another, yet subsisted by rapine, and got every thing by violence, not even their wives excepted: A Prince, who by his policy and courage, in a reign of 37 years, brought a colony from such beginnings to be formidable to all the states around it, having before his death increased his subjects from 3300 men to 47000, all stout soldiers, and all actuated by the same views of preserving their own liberty, and invading that of their neighbours: To conclude; a Prince, who of a gang of slaves and profligates formed a people which in time became masters of the world, and, what is worthy to be remarked, more illustrious by their virtue, than by the number of their victories, or the extent of their empire.

^a A festival was instituted to Romulus, called Quirinalia. It was celebrated on the 17th of February.

Year of
R O M E
A C X V I I .
R O M U -
L U S first
King.

In the relation here given of the first settlement of the Roman government, the acts and institutions of Romulus, &c. D. Hal. has been chiefly, though not entirely followed, with respect to the order in which those events are placed. As the accounts left us by that author, Livy and Plutarch, of the beginnings of the Roman state, do not perfectly agree, either as to matter, or time, it may perhaps be a satisfaction to the reader to let him see by a summary of each, in what particulars they differ.

D I O N Y S I U S,

after the building of Rome, and a formal election of Romulus to be King of it, mentions

1. The division of the colony into Tribes, Curie and Decurie.
2. The distinction of the people into Patricians and Plebeians.
3. The institution of the Patronage.
4. The constituting a Senate. Of 100 Senators, the King chuses but one, the Tribes and Curie the rest.
5. The appointment of the 300 Celeres for the King's life-guard.
6. The settling of the respective powers and privileges of the King, Senate, and assemblies of the People.
7. The opening of the Ajylum, or sanctuary of refuge.
8. Romulus's religious and civil laws.
9. The erecting a judgment-seat in the Forum, where the King administer'd justice, attended by his 300 Celeres and 12 Lictors, with their fasces and axes.
10. The rape of the Sabine women, the union of the Sabines and Romans, and the creation of 100 new Senators by Tatius.

N. B. D. Hal. makes no mention of the 3 centuries of Knights, elected, according to Livy, in the time of Romulus and Tatius, nor of any other horsemen, but the 300 Celeres, till the reign of Tarquin the Elder, when he says, this King would have created 3 new tribes of Horsemen, and was opposed by Navius the Augur. He afterwards tells us, that Servius Tullius composed the Equites or Knights of those citizens who were most eminent by birth and riches, and divided them into 18 centuries.

L I V Y

speaks of Romulus and Remus, as being both saluted Kings, by their respective followers, before the building of Rome. After the building of the city and the death of Remus, he relates,

1. Romulus's making religious and civil laws.
2. His putting on a habit of distinction, and being attended by 12 Lictors.
3. His opening an Ajylum.
4. His constituting a Senate of 100 men, who were stiled Patres, and their posterity Patricians.
5. The rape of the Sabine women, and the union of the two nations; after which,
6. The division of the citizens into 30 Curie.
7. The institution of three centuries of Knights, the Tatenses, Ramenfes, and Luceres.
8. Livy does not mention the Celeres till the close of Romulus's reign.

N. B. Livy says nothing of TRIBES, till he comes to the 4 tribes of Servius Tullius; nor ever mentions the 100 new Senators created by Tatius.

He says, B. 1. c. 36. that Tarquin the Elder, without increasing the number of Romulus's Centuries of Knights, increased the number of the Knights to 1800, which were still called three Centuries: And B. 1. c. 43. he tells us, that Servius Tullius made six Centuries of the three instituted by Romulus, but that they retained the old names; and that these six with 12 other Centuries of Horsemen made a part of the first and richest of Servius's classes.

P L U T A R C H

does not speak of any formal election of Romulus to be King, but he being supposed such,

1. Opens the Ajylum, soon after the first foundations of the city were laid, and thereby greatly augments his colony.
2. Lists all who were fit to bear arms into military companies, each company consisting of 3000 foot, and 300 horse. These companies were called Legions, from the word Legere, to chuse, because they were select and chosen men. The rest of the multitude were called Populus (People.)
3. Chuses 100 Senators, whom he stiles Patricians and Patres.
4. Distinguishes the rest of the wealthier sort from the common people, by making the former Patrons to the latter, who are called Clients.
5. Then follows the rape of the Sabine women, and the union of the two nations. After which,

6. The

6. The people are divided into 3 Tribes, called Ramenses, Tatenses, and Luceres, (the names Livy gives to his 3 Centuries of Knights.)

7. Then the religious and civil laws are mentioned; and

8. Plutarch speaks for the first time of Romulus's robes of state, his Celeres and Lictors, just before his death, and as proofs of that haughtiness of spirit which provoked the Senators to murder him.

Year of
R O M E
XXXVII.

C H A P. III.

N U M A.

§. I. The death of Romulus is followed by an interregnum. A description of that sort of government. The people grow weary of it; whereupon it is unanimously resolved to chuse a King. §. II. The character of Numa Pompilius, a Sabine philosopher. §. III. He is elected to succeed Romulus; but is with difficulty persuaded to accept of the kingdom. He consults the will of the Gods by augury. §. IV. Numa is no sooner upon the throne, than he applies himself to quiet the dissensions at Rome, and to moderate the warlike ardor of the Romans by the impressions of religion. §. V. He divides the ministers of religion into eight classes. The Curiones, Flamines, Celeres, Augurs. §. VI. Vestals. §. VII. Salii. §. VIII. Feciales. §. IX. Pontifices. §. X. He directs an especial reverence to be paid to the God Janus; and makes a Goddess of Bona Fides. §. XI. He introduces a new sort of Gods, called Termini or Boundaries. §. XII. He amends some of Romulus's laws; and makes new ones. §. XIII. He sends away the idle soldiery to cultivate the lands conquered by Romulus. §. XIV. He distributes the citizens into distinct companies, according to their trades. §. XV. He reforms the calendar. §. XVI. Numa dies, and his books are buried with him.

§. I. ROMULUS dying without issue, the kingdom, which, had he left a son, might perhaps have proved hereditary, as that of Alba had been, continued elective; and Rome was greatly divided about the choice of another King. The minds of the first Romans, and of the new inhabitants, were not at present in so perfect an union as formerly; there were diversities of factions among the commonalty, and jealousies and emulations among the Senators. All agreed, that it was necessary to have a King; but what person, or of what nation, was the dispute. Those who had been builders of the city with Romulus, though they had yielded a share of the lands and dwellings to the Sabines, thought it by no means adviseable to resign to them the regal authority. On the other hand, the Sabines alledged, that they, after the decease of Tatius, having peaceably submitted to Romulus's government, it was but just, that the King should be chosen out of their nation: nor did they esteem themselves inferior to the Romans, or to have contributed less to raise Rome to that pitch of wealth and power to which she was arrived.

Year of
R O M E
XXXVII.

Plut. Numa, p. 60.

Year of
R O M E
XXXVIII.

Liv. B. 1.
Plut. P.
...

During these disputes, the Senators^a, to prevent anarchy and confusion, took the sovereign power into their own hands. They divided themselves into decuries or tens, and each ten in their turn (as lots decided) possessed the supreme authority five days^b, yet so as one person only of the governing ten had the badges of sovereignty at one time, and when he had been honoured with them twelve hours, he resigned them to another. This sort of government, which was called Interregnum, lasted little more than a year^c; for the people grew weary of such a frequent change of masters, who had not all the same views and inclinations; and they were likewise jealous of certain of the Fathers, who seemed to aim at the establishing themselves in the supreme power. The Senate therefore finding it necessary to proceed to the election of a King, the Inter-rex for the time being summoned the people, and addressed himself to them, in these words: Good, fortunate and happy may it be! Elect yourselves a King, O Romans. The Senate give their consent, and, if you pitch upon a Prince worthy to succeed Romulus, will confirm your choice^d.

Liv. ibid. The Senate having thus recognized the people's right to chuse a King, the people, in compliment, remitted the choice to the Senate. But the old difficulty still remained, whether the Sovereign to be elected should be a Sabine, or a Roman. At length they came to this conclusion: That the Romans should chuse the King, but should be obliged to chuse a Sabine.

Plut. p. 61. §. II. THERE was at this time in Sabinia a man of distinguished birth and virtue, who led a retired life, and had no thoughts of empire, but ever his own passions. His name was Numa Pompilius. He was the fourth son of Pompilius Pompo, a Sabine Noble, and had married the

^a Plutarch reduces the number of the Senators who divided the regal power between them to 150. and Livy to 100, but Dick. Hal. makes them 200; which seems to come nearer the truth, if it be certain, that Titus Tatius added 100 Senators to the 100 created by Romulus.

^b D. Hal. (B. 2. p. 119.) makes each man of each Decury to reign 5 days, and consequently each Decury 50, in which case, only seven Decuries could have the administration in the whole year of the Interregnum.

^c Father Cesari (B. 2. p. 133.) has followed Plutarch, in fixing Romulus's death to the 37th year of Rome, and (p. 144.) he has followed the same author, in fixing Numa's birth to the very day that Rome was founded, and in making him about 40 when he was offered the kingdom: (by the words about 40, he means, that he was in his 40th year, as appears by the date in the margin; and so Plutarch, ἔτι τὴν ὁμολογίαν τῷ Νύμῳ παρατίθει) Nevertheless, as the learned Father allows with Dionysius, but about a year to the Interregnum; these things are incompatible. Father Reuilié therefore in his note (B. 2. p. 144.) agrees with Petavius, in saying that Romulus reigned above 38 years. They follow Narré's calculation in placing the foundation of Rome in April in the 3d year of the sixth olympiad, and the death of Romulus in July in the 1st year of the 16th olympiad. The difference between these two dates is 38 years and some months. Numa was therefore in his 39th year, when his predecessor died, and the Interregnum lasting about a year, he was in his 40th year when he was chose King.

If the reader has perused the Preliminary Discourse to this Work, he is probably inclined to think, that Romulus reigned neither 38 nor 37 years, nor even 20, and consequently that Numa must have been born long before the building of Rome.

^d Quod bonum, faustum, felixque sit, Quirites, Regem create, ut a Patribus visum est. Patres deinde, si dignum qui secundus ab Remulo numeretur creaveritis, duces fient. Liv. B. 1. c. 17.

daughter.

daughter of King Tatius, but had not followed his father-in-law to Rome. Tatius having the same inclinations with her husband, had preferred the tranquillity of a private life to the embarrassing honours and distinctions of a Court. She lived with him thirteen years, at Cures; and after her death, he gave himself up entirely to the service of the Gods, and the contemplation of their nature and power. He left the city, and in a solitary manner frequented those groves and fountains which religion had made sacred. And hence doubtless came the fable, which was very early received among the Sabines, that Numa lived in familiarity with the Nymph Egeria^a. It is certain that when he was upon the throne he took advantage of this general persuasion to give credit to his laws, and bring about a reformation at Rome.

§. III. THE Romans having pitched upon this man to be King, two Senators, Julius Proculus and Valerius Volesus, the first of Alban, the other of Sabine extraction, were deputed to go to him with an offer of the kingdom: They addressed him in few words, imagining there needed no long arguments to persuade him to accept it: But, upon trial, they found themselves obliged to use many reasons and intreaties to allure him from his quiet and retired life. In presence of his father and of his kinsman Martius, he returned the deputies an answer to this effect:

“ Since in every alteration of a man’s life the success is doubtful, it “ would be madness for one who is easy, and provided with all things “ necessary and convenient, to endeavour after any change of his con“ dition, or even to consent to it. For what is this but to prefer an “ uncertain satisfaction to an assured tranquillity? It is not difficult to “ form a judgment concerning the temper of the Roman people, by “ what happened to the late King, who did not escape the suspicion of “ having plotted against the life of his Colleague, Tatius; nor is the “ Senate free from the accusation of having treacherously murdered “ their Prince Romulus. And yet Romulus had the advantage to be “ thought of divine race, and to be preserved in a miraculous man“ ner in his infancy: Whereas my descent is merely human, and, if “ I have gained any reputation, it is for such qualities as are in no “ wise proper to make me shine upon a throne; a love of peace, re“ tirement, study, and divine worship. As Rome is envied by her “ neighbours, and threatened with foreign wars (for which Romulus

^a Some persons not favourable to Numa’s reputation, have thought that under his affected passion for woods and caves, was concealed another which was more real and less chaste. Hence Juvenal speaking of the grove called Lucus Egeriæ, says,

Hic ubi nocturnæ Numa constituebat amicæ.

Sat. 3.

But St. Austin, building upon a passage taken out of Varro’s book of antiquities, gives an allegorical interpretation to these frequent meetings between Numa and Egeria. He says, that this King being versed in hydro-mancy, saw several Demons in the water whom he consulted, and from whom he received the laws he proposed to his people; and that because Numa drew water for his magical Operations, ex quod aquam egerit; this gave occasion to the fiction, that he had married the Nymph Egeria, who took her name from the Latin word Egerere. C. & R.

“ perhaps gave no provocation) she has need of an active and warlike “ Prince to govern her. What benefit could you receive in these circum“ stances from a King who would be wholly employed in establishing peace, “ justice, and the neglected worship of the Gods; such a Prince must needs “ appear despicable to a people entirely actuated by views of ambition,
“ and the insatiate desire of conquest.”

The deputies perceiving by these words, that he refused the kingdom, became now more urgent with him, intreating him not to suffer them to relapse again into their former seditions and civil discord, which they must unavoidably do, if he continued to reject their offer, there being no other person on whom both parties could agree to fix their choice. His father, likewise, and Martius, taking him aside, endeavoured to persuade him to accept the kingdom, as conferred on him rather by Heaven than by men. “ Though you are contented, said they, with your own fortune, and court “ neither riches nor power, ought you therefore to pay no regard to “ the appointment of the Gods, who have chosen you to fill a throne?
“ Have they indued your heart with so great a love of equity, only to “ lie useless in a desert? The throne is an eminent place, from whence “ virtue shews itself to advantage, and exercises a power which subdues “ and captivates the hearts of men. Tatius, though a foreigner, was “ highly esteemed by the Romans; and the memory of Romulus was so “ precious to them, that after his death they voted him divine honours.
“ And who knows but Rome, influenced by the royal example, may mo“ derate her pride and fury, and the love of arms be succeeded by a re“ spect for religion?”

This discourse made some impression upon the philosopher, and when his own countrymen, the people of Cures, understood what message the Roman ambassadors had brought him, they earnestly pressed him to accept the offer, as the only means to appease all civil dissensions, and effectually incorporate both nations into one body. Numa yielded at length to these reasons and persuasions, and, having first offered sacrifices to Heaven, set
D. Hal. B. out for Rome. He was met in the way by the Senate and people, who
2. p. 121
& 122. with an impatient desire came forth to receive him; and the women also welcomed him with acclamations of joy. The Inter-rex for the day, Spurius Vettius, for form sake, which he thought should not be neglected, called an *Assembly of the people, that they might proceed to an Election. Numa was there chosen King, and his choice was unanimously confirmed by the Senate.

But when the royal robes were brought to the new Sovereign, he refused to be clothed with them, till (like Romulus) he had first consulted the will

* By an Assembly of the people is to be understood a convention not only of the Plebeians, but of the Senators, Patricians, Knights, and all the Roman citizens without exception, who had right of suffrage, of what rank or condition soever. Nevertheless, what was done in these Assemblies, was properly said to be the act of the Plebes, or Commons, because they being here more numerous than all the rest, had in reality the decision of all affairs: Their decrees however in these early times were of no effect, unless they were afterwards approved by the Senate.

of the Gods by augury. Conducted therefore to the top of the hill Tarpeius, he was there seated upon a stone, with his face to the south, and his head covered with a veil. The chief of the augurs stood behind him, and, stretching his right hand over the King's head, turned himself to the east and pray'd for him. Then gazing around to discover a favourable omen, he saw some birds, which were presumed to be fortunate; and this was sufficient. The King came down from the hill, the people renewed their shouts and acclamations; and, what seldom happens to a state that receives a new master, the joy was universal and sincere.

§. IV. THE reader is not here to expect the history of a reign memorable for battles and conquests. Numa's particular glory was his quieting all contentions at home, reforming the manners of the Romans, and establishing good polity among them.

At the time of his accession to the throne, there were some disputes and heart-burnings between the Senators of Romulus's election and those which Tatius had added to them; the former claiming certain honours and pre-eminences, which destroyed that perfect equality for which the latter contended. Many of the new-comers among the Plebeians were also greatly dissatisfied. Romulus had left them utterly unprovided for; and the want of a necessary subsistence made them ready to join in any sedition by which they might hope to better their fortune. Numa had no sooner taken into his hands the reins of government, than he silenced the complaints of these poor Plebeians, by distributing some of the conquered lands among them: nor was he less successful in his endeavours to quiet the animosities among the Patricians: And when the citizens of Rome were all brought to a perfect concord and harmony among themselves, so as to have no view but the public good, and when he had enlarged the city, by inclosing within its walls the hill Quirinalis, he applied himself to form such regulations as might preserve peace, and make justice flourish among his subjects.

He began his reformatations with himself, dismissing the three hundred Celeres, whom Romulus had made his guards; for he said, it would ill become him to reign over a people he distrusted, and as ill to distrust a people that compell'd him to reign over them. And being sensible, that the chief source of the disorders in the state had been the too passionate love of arms, he laid a scheme for moderating the warlike ardor of the Romans, by the impressions of religion.

Plutarch tells us, that Numa acknowledged a first principle of all things, who is impassible, invisible, incorruptible, and purely intelligible; and for this reason forbade the Romans to represent God in the form of man or beast; and he adds, that there was no painted or graven image in their temples and sanctuaries, for the first 160 years. Numa likewise prohibited all bloody sacrifices; and appointed loaves and meal to be presented to the Gods, with Libations of wine and milk. And because Pythagoras, the Samian, brought the like ceremonies from Greece, Numa has been thought by some to have learned them from him; but Livy, Dion. Hal. and Plutarch

Year of
R O M E
XL.

Plut. p. 64.

Year of
R O M E
From XLI. to LXXXII.

N U M A Second
King.
D. H.
2. p.

Plut. p. 67.

p. 65.

Year of ROME 711—LXXIII. Pythagoras are all against this opinion, and assert, that Pythagoras did not live till long after Numa's time.

But notwithstanding the right notions which this Prince had of the Deity, he did not introduce the worship of him; he authorized both the Latin and Etruscan ceremonies of religion, and contented himself with establishing order and decency in the performance of them.

§. V. THE ministers of religion he divided into eight classes.

FIRST, the CURIONES, those Priests of whom each Curia or Parish had one, proper to itself. Their whole number was 30, there being just so many Curie in Rome.

THE SECOND CLASS were the *FLAMINES, who took their names, as some say, from the flame-coloured tufts upon their caps: But Plutarch tells us, that these Priests were first called Pilamines, from the Latin word Pileus, which signified such a Picked bonnet as they wore, and that Flamines was only a corruption of Pilamines. In Romulus's time there was a Flamen called Dialis†, because he presided in the worship of Jupiter; and another

* The Flamines were chosen by the people: after which, they received an inauguration, or rather a sort of consecration, at the hands of the Pontifex Maximus, to whom they were absolutely subject. Their ministry was confined to one particular God, whose name they took. All other priestly officers were incompatible with that of Flamen; a dignity from which they could not, but for very great reasons, be deposed. In this case they were degraded, which the Romans called Flaminis abire. It was a crime for the Flamines to appear in public uncovered, or to offer sacrifice bare-headed. Val. Maximus speaks of one Supplicius, who was deprived of the office of Flamen, for having let his bonnet fall off whilst he was sacrificing. The body of the Flamines did not form a society or particular college, as the Augurs and Pontifices did: but they were summoned, and took their seats as judges, whenever an affair was to be determined, the cognizance of which belonged to the College of the Pontifices. Tully pro lege Julia, addresses himself to his judges thus: Discrete orationem Pontifices & res Flamines. In civil life, the Flamines were tied up to several trifling practices, which the extravagance of paganism had made sacred. Their wives, who were called Flaminicæ, partook of the Priesthood of their husbands, and shared with them the care of the sacrifices: as we learn from A. Gellius, and some of Gruter's ancient inscriptions: and a Flaminica could not be divorced on any account whatsoever. Death alone could separate a Flamen from his wife; and upon her death he lost his sacerdotal dignity. They had under their care some young girls and boys, to assist in the sacrifices. These sorts of Acolythes, whose fathers and mothers must be living, were called Flaminii and Flaminicæ. The number of the Flamines was at first but three; afterwards they increased to twelve, and to fifteen. C. & R.

† The Flamen Dialis was the most distinguished of any, both by the pre-eminence of his rank, and the God he served. The engagements he entered into, as Priest of Jupiter, were inconsistent with his bearing civil offices, which he could neither solicit, nor accept. But to make him amends, he had the privilege of being guarded by a Lictor, and wearing a magnificent robe: to which were added the honours of the Curule Chair. He was generally of a Patrician family, as also the Flamen Martialis, and the Flamen Quirinalis: and therefore these were called Flamines Majores, to distinguish them from the Flamines Minores, who were Plebeians. The Flamen Dialis was subject to very troublesome laws, the particulars of which we have in A. Gellius. Among other things, he was forbidden to ride on horseback, or cast his eyes upon an army drawn up in battalia. It was unlawful for him to swear, and therefore his taking the oaths appointed by the laws, was dispensed with. His word alone was a sufficient testimony, according to that form of words used by the Prætor, which had the force of a perpetual edict, Sacerdotem Vestalem, & Flaminem another called Martialis^a, because consecrated to the worship of Mars. To these Numa added a third, in honour of Romulus, who had been deified under the name of Quirinus.

Year of
R O M E
XLI—LXXXII.

THE THIRD CLASS consisted of those three hundred CELERES who had been Romulus's guards. Numa changed this military body into a company of Sacrificers.

N U M A
Second.
King.

THE^b AUGURS composed the FOURTH CLASS; their functions extended farther than the name seems to imply. They did not only foretel future events by the flying or singing of birds; all sorts of divination were within their province. They interpreted dreams; drew presages from several Phænomena both in the Heavens, and on the Earth, such as monsters, earthquakes, &c. and their ministry was equally made use of by the public, and by private persons.

§. VI. THE Vestals made the FIFTH CLASS: Though Numa was not the first institutor of these, yet he was the first who erected a particular temple to Vesta, and caused a fire to be kept always burning in it. This fire the Romans looked upon as sacred in itself, and the extinction of it fatal to the Republic. The King committed the care of supply-

D. H. p.
125, 126,
127.

Flaminem Dialem, in omni mea jurisdictione jurare non cegari. He could not attend funeral solemnities, but with the utmost precautions. To be absent but one night from Rome, to touch a dead body, and a thousand other actions, which were in themselves indifferent, were thought to be so many considerable faults in the Flamen Dialis. But in order to lighten this heavy yoke, great marks of distinction were annexed to his office. He wore a hollow or pierced ring on his finger; he had the privilege of wearing the Prætecta, and sitting in a Curule Chair in the Senate; and only a freeman could cut his hair. In some cases, the respect shewn him was carried to extravagant superstition. Witness this law: Unguium Dialis, & capille Segmina subter Arborem felicem, terra integunto. C. & R.

^a The Flamen Martialis was the second in rank among the Flamines. It was not lawful for him to go out of Italy, at least in the first ages of Rome. We learn from Livy and Val. Maximus, that Aulus Posthumus, Consul and Flamen Martialis, could not get leave of Cæcilius Metellus, the Pontifex Maximus, to command the Roman army in Africa. The Flamen Quirinalis was also subject to the same law. Liv. B. 39. gives us an instance of it in the person of Q. Fabius Pictor. C. & R.

^b See what is said of the Augurs, page 24. Numa allowing of no bloody sacrifices instituted no Huruspices.

^c It is probable, that the ancient understood by the Vesta, whole world, or the universe to which they attributed a soul, and which they looked upon as the only Divinity, sometimes under the name of τὸ πᾶν, and sometimes under that of μῶναι, that is to say, Unity. This was the mystical signification of Vesta, though the vulgar worshipped her as the Goddess of the Earth and of Fire. And with a view to represent the universe under the name of Vesta, Numa Pompilius built a round temple in honour of this Goddess: under which form, the temples of this Goddess are still represented in medals. In the midst of the temple Numa placed the altar of the sacred fire, which was ever burning, out of a persuasion, that the proper region of fire was the center of the world. In all probability, this King did not think the earth immoveable, but fancied it was always rolling round the fire; that is, the sun, which he thought placed in the center of the universe. And Plato embraced this opinion towards the end of his life; as did Pythagoras, and his disciples. So that, if we believe Plutarch, who relates all these facts, we must acknowledge, that the system which has since been adopted by Copernicus, was known in Italy, so early as in the days of Numa Pompilius. C. & R.

^d The keeping up of a sacred fire had always been a part of religion, in different nations. The fire shall ever be burning upon the altar, saith the Lord, it shall never go out, Lev. vi. 13. Such a fire was preserved in the temples of Ceres at Mustina, of Aphile at D. H. p.

Year of ROME LXXVII. ing and preserving it to four * virgins, whose names were Gegania, Vere- Numa second King. nia, Coruicia, and Tarpeia. Thus Numa a Sabine, seems to have had
 D. Hal. p. 1-5. more regard for the remains of the Trojan religion, than his predecessor, though descended from Aeneas. But Remulus for a particular reason, as some think, would not suffer at Rome any of these consecrated Virgins. He fear'd lest the faults of the Vestals should call to remembrance what had happened to Rhea Silvia, his mother.

All conversation with men was not forbidden these Virgins; they were permitted to receive visits from them by day; by night, none but persons of their own sex were suffered to come into their apartments. They were obliged to strict continence for thirty years; of which they employed the first ten in learning the ceremonies of religion, the next ten in the performance of them, and the ten last in teaching them to the younger Vestals. After this they were permitted to quit the functions of Priestesses, and marry. But as these late marriages were observed not to be very happy, few of them left their old profession, even after the time of their ministry was expired. And indeed the restraints of their condition were in some measure compensated by the honours that were annexed to it. If they chanced to meet a criminal going to execution, they had the privilege of pardoning him provided they affirmed, that their meeting him was purely accidental. It was a capital crime to enter with them into the litters in which they were carried. At what age soever they were admitted Vestals, they became immediately mistresses of their own fortunes. And lastly, they had a right of making their wills, even in their father's life-time^b.

But then, as the honours done them were great, so were the punishments of their faults. The least levity in their behaviour, the smallest neglect in the discharge of their office, was, after proof made of it before the Pontifex, punished, at their command, with severity. The penalty, inflicted on them for prostituting their honour, had something in it inexpressibly terrible. The offender, placed in a litter, shut up so close that her cries could not be heard, was carried cross the Forum, and thence through the Colline Gate, to the place where she was to be buried alive. Her friends and relations walked before her in tears, in the same order as in a funeral procession, till they came near the vault, in which she was to end her days. In this vault was a little bed, a lamp burning, and a small quantity of provisions. The Pontifex read some prayers over her,

Delphos and Atbens, and in that of Diana at Ecbatan among the Perhans. Setinus committed the care of the sacred fire in the temple of Minerva, and of the statue of Pallas to a society of young women. The Magi had the charge of keeping a fire always burning on altars erected in the middle of those little temples which Strabo calls magia. A lamp was always burning in the temple of Jupiter Anxus. And, if we may believe Diod. Si- culus, this custom came from the Egyptians to the Greeks, and from them to the Romans, who made it a principal point of their religion. C. & R.

* Tarquin the Elder added two more, and this number was never increased. The Vestals were chosen from six to ten years of age. None beyond that age were admitted.

^b Dio Cassius says this privilege was granted them by Augustus, l. 56.

with

with a low voice; but without the lustrations and other expiatory ceremonies used for the dead. This done, they let her down into the vault, and bricking up the entrance, covered it with earth. It is not certain that this custom of burying the Vestals was so early as Numa. Some authors say, they were burnt; and others, that they were stoned. As for the partner in the crime, he was whipped to death.

To suffer the sacred fire to go out, was also an unpardonable negligence in the Vestals. Being thought to forbode approaching ruin, it alarmed the whole city. Fresh fire, kindled, according to Festus, by rubbing two pieces of wood together, or, according to Plutarch, by the rays of the sun, was brought into the temple of Vesta, after many purifications; and the Pontifices examined into the causes of this wicked neglect, that it might be punished with severity. Festus says, that the Pontifex whipped the offender through a veil.

§. VII. THE SIXTH CLASS, established by Numa, were the SALII. For their origin we must go up as high as Evander, who brought from Arcadia into Italy a company of musicians, the chief of whom was named Salius. Their office at first was only to sing at the sacrifices: But it was afterwards changed to dancing to the sound of the flute, in honour of those Genii, on whose favour success in war depended. Numa Pompilius laid hold of an opportunity that offered to revive this order, and make it a religious one. In the eighth year of his reign, a pestilence which ravaged Italy was severely felt in Rome. Fear increasing the superstition of the people, Numa took advantage of it for the promoting of his views, with respect to religion. He made them believe, that a shield of an extraordinary make fell down from Heaven to him, and that the Nymph Egeria and the Muses had told him, the health and prosperity of Rome depended upon the preservation of that shield. For fear therefore lest so precious a Depositum should be stolen, and that it might be the more difficult to distinguish it, he ordered a skilful workman, named Mamurius, to make eleven more, exactly like it. He pretended, that the Nymph Egeria and the Muses had directed this, and also that the fountain where he used to converse with them, and the fields about it, should be consecrated; and that the Vestals should from that fountain draw all the water with which they sprinkled their sanctuary. The twelve shields, called Ancilia, he hung up in the temple of Mars, and appointed twelve young Romans, taken out of good families, to be the keepers of them. Their name of Salii was agreeable to their ministerial office: for the descent of the miraculous shield was annually celebrated by them on the first of March, with public *dancings.

§. VIII.

* In this festival, the twelve Salii marched out of the temple in good order, each carrying one of the sacred shields on his left arm, and a javelin in his right hand. They were dressed in habits striped with purple, and girded with broad belts, clasped with brass buckles; on their heads they wore helmets, or high bonnets, which terminated in a point. As they marched, sometimes they sung in concert, and sometimes they danced, to the sound of instruments, martial entries, which they diversified agreeably enough. Sometimes one only

VOL. I.

I

Year of
R O M E
XLI. to LXXXII.

N U M A
Second
King.
D. Hal. B.
128.

P. 129,
130.
Plut. p. 68.

Year of
R O M E
XLI. to LXXXII.
N U M A
Second
B. C.
D. Hal. B.
2. 1. 132,
132.

§. VIII. THE SEVENTH CLASS of Ministers dedicated to religion, were the FECIALES; whose employment being of importance to the state, and their authority great, and for life, care was taken to chuse them out of the best families. It is probable, that a war, with which this pacifick King was threatened by the Fidenæ, occasioned his thinking of this establishment. Notwithstanding the revolt of Fidene, and the depredations committed by its inhabitants, on the Roman lands, Numa thought himself obliged to attempt an accommodation by treaty, before he had recourse to arms. The better therefore to ascertain the equity of this war, if he should undertake it, and of all such as Rome should for the future engage in, he established a sacred college of 20 persons, who were to be in some measure the arbiters of war and peace: It was not lawful to commit any hostilities on the lands of the neighbouring nations, till all means of an amicable accommodation had been first tried, without success. In case the Republick had suffered any injury from a foreign state, two of these Feciales, or Heralds, were dispatched to demand satisfaction; and the manner was this. One of them, chosen by the college, under the name of * Pater Patratus, to be the chief actor, was cloathed in a magnificent habit, and in his hand was put a sort of sceptre, or caduceus, which distinguished him from his colleague. Thus accoutred he went out of the city: And when he arrived at the enemy's frontiers, he called Jupiter and the other Gods to witness, that he came only to demand justice in behalf of the Roman people. Then he advanced into the country of the aggressors, and took a second oath, that he would say nothing at the place whither he was deputed to go, but what was true, and require nothing but what was equitable. He told the first stranger he met, that he had taken these oaths, and then went on towards the city, of which he was to demand satisfaction. As he entered it, he repeated the same oaths at the gate, in presence of the officer who was upon guard, or at least of some of the inhabitants. From thence he went on to the place of publick concourse, and there declared the reasons of his coming. This done, he desired a conference with the magistrates: And if only danced, who was called Præsul, he was the head of the company, and both led the dances, and regulated them. Sometimes they all joined together, and diverted the spectators with their martial attitudes, and their quick and lively motions. They were particularly expert in beating just time, which they did with their javelins upon their shields. In the choice of the Salii, Numa would have these two rules observed: 1st, That they should be natives of Rome, and free-born. 2^d, That their fathers and mothers should be alive. By this means he made sure of their fidelity, their parents being their security. The festival lasted several days. During which, the first Romans were scrupulous of undertaking any serious and important affair. It was not then lawful for them to marry, or undertake a journey, or any military expedition. In the latter ages, they shook off the yoke of this superstition, and became less scrupulous. The Salii ended all these days of ceremony with repasts, in which no cost was spared. Hence Tully uses the words, Saliarum in modum cenare, to signify a splendid entertainment. C. & R.

* No persons were ever deputed to treat of peace or war, but such, whose fathers were living, and who were themselves the fathers of several children. And from hence comes the name of Patres Patrati, i. e. Fathers in reality, [or perhaps, Fathers who had Fathers] according to Plutarch; who adds, that this law was a political invention of Numa. This King thought, that a man who had a father and children alive, would be the more inclined to be faithful to his country, and promote its interests. C. & R.

they

they submitted to reason, and delivered up to him the persons who had been guilty of the insult offered to Rome, he carried them away with him. If the magistrates asked time to deliberate, he gave them ten days; and, when these were expired, ten more; and so on to thirty. But if, after the 30 days, they still continued to refuse him justice, he called the Gods of Heaven and Hell to witness against them; and forthwith declared, that he was going to make his report at Rome, where it would be considered of at leisure. Upon his return to the Senate, he reported, that he had performed all the duties of his office, and that nothing hindered the Romans from declaring war^a; and then was the time for the Senate to come to a resolution. But before these formalities had been observed, it was not lawful for either King, or Senate, military tribunes, or subaltern officers, to attempt any thing against the enemy. In this manner did Numa, perhaps a little at the expence of his own authority, put a check to the precipitate sallies of the Romans, who attended more to the suggestions of their ambition, than the rules of equity, in making war: And it was probably owing to these regulations, that the Fidenates escaped the resentment of the Romans; for the latter undertook no war in Numa's time.

§. IX. THE EIGHTH, and most venerable of all the different bodies D. Hal. 2. consecrated to religion, was the PONTIFICES^b; the origin of which name is uncertain. 2. P. 132, 133.

^a If the Senate determined to declare war, the Feciales returned to the enemy's country, and, in the presence of three witnesses, who were arrived at the age of Puberty, declared the cause of the war. After which he committed the first act of hostility, by throwing a bloody javelin: and at the same time uttered this form of words, which A. Gellius has preserved: The Hermondulian people, and those of this country, have offered violence to the Roman people, who for that reason declare war against them. The name Hermondulian is of no determinate signification, and was then universally applied to all nations. C. & R.

^b Most of those who have written of the Roman antiquities, (and particularly D. Hal. p. 132. and Varro de ling. Lat. l. 4.) derive the word Pontifices, from Pons and facere, the repairs of the bridges being committed to their care. Bridges were then thought sacred. The most solemn sacrifices were performed upon them. The bridge Sublucius is said to have been built, pursuant to the directions of an oracle, which forbid the use of iron in the framing it, and commanded that the parts of it should be joined together with wooden pins. But Plutarch finds fault with the abovementioned etymology of the word Pontifex. He says, this word was in use at Rome before there were any bridges there. That wooden bridge itself, which was the first that was built at Rome, and called Sublucius, was of so late date, as to be the work of King Ancus Martins, Numa's grandson; whereas the word Pontifex was in use so early as in Numa's time. Plutarch (p. 65.) therefore gives another derivation of the word Pontifex; he derives it from Potnis, which, in old Latin, signified powerful or absolute master: some authors derive it from the two words, potis and facere, understanding by the word facere, to sacrifice.

From Numa's time, to the middle of the fifth century, after the foundation of Rome, the college of Pontifices consisted but of four. Afterwards, at the request of the people, who were desirous of sharing the honours of the priesthood with the Patricians, four Pontifices, of Plebeian families, were added. To these eight Sylla added seven more. The first eight were, according to some, styled Pontifices majores, and the rest Pontifices minores. According to others, these titles distinguished the Patrician Pontifices from the Plebeian.

It will appear in the latter ages of the republick, that the people claimed the right of choosing the inferior Pontifices: for as to the Pontifex Maximus, he seems to have been always chosen by the people, assembled in their Comitia. At least, we find instances of this kind in Livy, especially in B. 25. at the very

Year of
R. O. M. E
XLI. to LXXXII.

NUMA
Second
King.

uncertain. Their office was, to give judgment in all causes relating to religion; to enquire into the lives and manners of the inferior priests, and to punish them if they saw occasion; to prescribe rules for publick worship; to regulate the feasts, sacrifices, and all other sacred institutions; to determine what works should be deemed lawful, and what unlawful, on festival days. Their President had the title of Pontifex Maximus; and his office was one of the most honourable in the commonwealth. Some say, the King reserved this eminent dignity to himself; and others, that he conferred it on his kinsman Numa Marcius.

§. X. SUCH were the eight classes into which Numa divided the priests and ministers of sacred things, multiplying the ceremonies and amusements of religion, in order the more effectually to divert the Romans from the pursuits of ambition, and the violence of arms. It was with the same view, or at least to give a check to the hasty proceedings of this fierce and rugged people, ever ready, upon the slightest occasions, to begin a war, that he caused a particular reverence to be paid to Janus, whose two faces being the symbol of prudence, which looks backwards and forwards, and considers the causes and consequences of things, were to be a memento to them, to recollect themselves, before they gave way to their fury. He ordered the temple of that God to be kept shut in time of peace, and open in time of war.

D. H. . p.
144
Plut. p. 79.
I. na
Fides.

But there is no part of Numa's management, which Diomysius admires so much, as his contrivance to make the Romans honest, by turning Good Faith into a Goddess, and appointing her a divine worship. It was a new invention unknown both to Greeks and Barbarians, and contributed greatly, as that historian observes, to bring the republick to be faithful to her treaties, and the private citizens to their contracts with one another, into which they entered without witnesses. A scrupulous regard to truth became in time so universal among them, that the magistrates frequently determined doubtful causes between man and man by the bare affirmation, ex fide, as it was called, of the plaintiff or defendant. This veracity and this strictness in the performance of covenants were virtues still subsisting among the Romans in the time of Polybius, who gives them the glorious testimony, that they inviolably kept their word, making witnesses and securities needless; whereas ten securities, twenty promises, and as many witnesses, were no fence against the knaveries of the Greeks.

Polyb. B.
4. c. 54.

time when the inferior Pontifices were chosen by the pontifical college. The Pontifex Maximus was also generally taken out of the other Pontifices. The Emperors assumed this dignity from Octavius's time; and the Christian Emperors continued to bear this title, to the time of Gratian, who (as we learn from Zozimus) absolutely refus'd it. C. & R.

^a Tully, in his oration, pro domo sua, tells the Pontifices, that the honour and safety of the commonwealth, the liberty of the people, the houses and fortunes of the citizens, and the very Gods themselves, were all committed to their care.

^b Livy leaves it uncertain, whether Numa built the temple of Janus, or not. Dion. Hal. and Plutarch say nothing of it. Varro, as quoted by St. Austin, says, that Romulus caused the first temple of Janus, in Rome, to be erected, after the treaty made between him and Titus Tatius; and that he gave this God two faces, to shew, that at Rome two Kings reigned at the same time, and two nations were united, and become one. C. & R.

§. XL

§. XI. THE same spirit of equity in Numa made him likewise introduce other Deities, under the name of Termini or Boundaries. In Romulus's time, neither the Roman territory in general, nor the estates of private persons had any fixed limits. That ambitious Prince would have betrayed his own cause; and his encroachments on his neighbour's lands would have been too manifest, had he set bounds to his own. But Numa, having no views of enlarging his dominion, ordered stones, dedicated to Jupiter Terminalis, to be placed on the borders of the Roman state, to mark the just extent of it. The same was done with regard to the lands of private property, and these land-marks became themselves a kind of Deities. To remove them was deemed a sacrilege of so heinous a nature, that any man might with impunity slay the transgressor. And, in order to render the law yet more inviolable, Numa instituted a festival, called Terminalia, in honour to the *Dii * Termini*: It was celebrated the 22d or 23d of the month of February. The owners of lands met on the confines of their estates, and there made their offerings of loaves, and the first gatherings of their fruits and harvests. Thus did this wise King make a great variety of superstitions serviceable to the purposes of equity.

These following laws of Numa, concerning religion, subsisted in Rome ever after: Let none appear in the presence of the Gods, but with a pure heart, and sincere piety. Let none there make a vain shew and ostentation of their riches, but fear lest they should thereby bring on themselves the vengeance of Heaven. Let no one have particular Gods of his own, or bring new ones into his house, or receive strange ones, unless allowed by edict. Let every one preserve in his own house the Oratories established by his Fathers, and pay his domestick Gods the worship that has always been paid them. Let all honour the ancient Gods of Heaven, and the heroes whose exploits have carried them thither, such as Bacchus, Hercules, Castor, Pollux and Quirinus. Let altars be erected to the virtues which carry us up to Heaven; but never to vices.

§. XII. THOUGH religion was Numa's chief care, the explaining and amending the Civil Laws took up a great part of his attention: particularly, he reformed that law of Romulus which gave fathers an unlimited power over their children; he would not suffer them to sell their sons after marriage, because it was very unjust, that a woman who had married a freeman should be constrained to live with a slave.

This King in his regulations had an especial regard to the preserving modesty in women. He excluded them from all publick affairs, insomuch, that a woman having appeared in a court of justice to plead her own cause, it was looked upon as one of those prodigies which foreboded danger to the state, and as an ill omen which ought to be averted by expiations. He also forbid prostitutes to enter into the temple of Juno. Nevertheless,

* The Dii Termini invented by Numa, were in his time nothing more than square stones, or posts, to which a religious honour was paid. Afterwards they were adorned with statues representing human figures, were crowned with flowers, and rubbed with perfumes. C. & R.

D. Hal. B.
2. P. 133,
134.
Plut. p. 71.
Year of
R O M E
XLI. to LXXXII.
N U M A
Second
King.

Cic. de
Leg. B. 2.
c. 8.

Plut. p. 72.

A. Gel.
B. 4. c. 3.

Year of
R O M E
XLI. to LXXXII.

NUMA
Second
King

he permitted husbands to lend out their wives, when these had borne them children. It was a sort of temporary divorce, in favour of those men whose wives were barren, but the lender continued to have the power of a husband over his wife, and could call her home, or lend her to others, as he pleased.

Numa, observing that the expences in mourning habits and funeral ceremonies were carried to excess, put a restraint upon that kind of extravagance. Nor would he suffer the dead to be buried or burnt within the walls of Rome. He forbade the mourners at funerals to make loud lamentations, and abolished the mad custom of the women's tearing their faces upon the death of their children or husbands; and lastly, he limited the time of mourning to ten months.

§. XIII. NOR were these the only reformatations made by Numa. Remulus having employed his people in continual wars, his successor was much embarrassed with a soldiery, who had been accustomed to plunder, and who were now without business. He shared therefore among them those lands which the late king had obtained by conquest, and had left uncultivated. And the better to keep them constantly attentive to the improvement of their farms, he distributed them into Pagi, or villages, over each of which he appointed a Chief or Super-intendant. The business of the Super-intendant was, to have a watchful eye over the husbandmen to encourage them when diligent, and to punish them when slothful. He was also to make a report of the progress of agriculture in his district to the King, who, judging of every man's capacity for publick affairs by his prudence and oeconomy in the management of his farm, frequently advanced the industrious husbandman to the first dignities in the state. Plutarch observes another great advantage arising from this manner of employing the idle soldiery; that hereby they were not only inured to fatigue, as in time of war, but became accustomed to a peaceable and regular way of living; for there is nothing which so reconciles the minds of men to peace, as husbandry and a country life; it makes them abhor all violence, at the same time that it gives them courage and resolution to defend their arable lands and pastures from the encroachments of their neighbours.

§. XIV. BUT the master piece of Numa's policy, according to Plutarch, was his distribution of the tradesmen of Rome into distinct corporations. The city had been long divided into two factions, occasioned by the mixture of the Sabines with the first Romans. Hence arose the dissensions of the Interregnum; and it was an inexhaustible source of discord.

* The dead were anciently carried on funeral beds, which were adorned with flowers and coronets. And when luxury prevailed, the Romans took a pride in multiplying these beds, adorning them in a costly manner, and exposing the images of the ancestors of the dead upon them, to make the procession the more stately and magnificent. C. & R.

† This regulation of Numa's is not mentioned by Livy, or Dion. Hal. and indeed it seems inconsistent with what the latter says, B. 2. p. 95. That only two sorts of employment, War and Agriculture, were permitted to the freemen by Remulus, and that all other occupations were for a long time looked upon by the native Romans as dishonourable, and left to slaves and strangers.

Numa

Numa therefore to remedy this evil, and to abolish the very names of Tatian and Romulist, made all the artists and tradesmen of Rome, of whatever nation they originally were, enter into separate companies, according to their respective professions. The Musicians, Goldsmiths, Carpenters, Curriers, Dyers, Tailors, &c. formed distinct communities. He ordained particular statutes for each of them, and granted them peculiar privileges, and a power of making by-laws. Every corporation was permitted to hold lands, have a common treasury, and to celebrate festivals and sacrifices proper to itself; in a word, to become a sort of a petty republic. By this means, says Plutarch, the Sabines and Romans forgetting all their old partialities and party names were brought to an entire union.

Year of
R O M E
XLI. to LXXXII.

N U M A
Second
King.

§. XV. THE last reformation which this second King of Rome undertook, was that of the calendar: And if he did not bring it to its utmost perfection, he at least purged it of its grossest faults.

The year is said to have consisted, before his time, of but 304 days; which is neither agreeable to the solar nor lunar year. Numa therefore did his utmost to make it agree with the courses both of the sun and moon: And he took this method in order to it. He knew the lunar year consisted of 354 days, and he made his to consist of 355: The additional day was given to it out of superstition; Numa being persuaded, that the Gods were pleased with odd numbers. And upon the same principle, when he added ^a January and February to the old year, which consisted only of ten months, he appointed that the months which before contained, some of them more than 35 days, others fewer than 20, should now have each 29 days, or 31. February only consisted of 28; and it was therefore looked upon as a fatal month, and consecrated to the infernal Gods, who were thought to be pleased with even numbers. Numa appointed likewise, that the year, which before begun with the month of March, should henceforwards begin with that of January. And after he had in some measure regulated his year by the course of the moon, he turned his thoughts to make it agree with that of the sun. He was not ignorant that the course of the sun took up about eleven days more than that of the moon: And therefore he appointed that every two years an intercalary month of twenty-two days should be added to Vairo.

Macroh.
Sat. B. 1.
c. 14.

^a This whimsical notion was built on the most chimerical foundation. The Pagans looked on an even number, as the symbol of division, because it could be divided into two equal parts: whereas an odd number was, for the contrary reason, the symbol of concord. This prejudice gave birth to a thousand superstitious practices, some of which are continued even among those whom reason, enlightened by religion, ought to have undeceived. 'Twas a notion that came originally from the Egyptians. C. & R.

^b January had its name from Janus. February was so called from the expiations signified by the word Februa, which were in this month performed. March had its name from Mars, the supposed father of Romulus, which upon that account had been placed first. April from Apbrodite or Venus, because of the superstitious worship then paid to her. May from Maia, the mother of Mercury, to whom this month was made sacred. June, from Juno, or some will have it, from Juventus, because the season is warm, or as it were juvenile. The rest had their names from their order, as Quintilis, Sextilis, September, October, November and December. Only Quintilis and Sextilis were afterwards turned into July and August, by the senate in the time of Julius Cæsar and Augustus.

Year of
R O M E
XLI. to LXXXII.

N U M A
Second
King.

the rest; which month the Romans called ^a Mercedinus. And as he was sensible that the solar year consisted of three hundred sixty-five days and six hours, and that these six hours made a whole day, in four years; he therefore commanded that the month Mercedinus, after every four years, should consist of twenty-three days. Thus did this learned Prince remedy the disorders of the calendar, as far as he could, and put it into a condition of more easily admitting of new corrections.

§. XVI. NUMA had now filled the throne near 43 years; and was about 82 years old when he died of some chronical distemper, which gradually wore him away, without lessening the vigour of his mind. During his whole reign no declaration of war had obliged the Romans to open the temple of Janus. He became the arbiter of all the differences among his neighbours; and his virtues seem to have communicated themselves to all the nations round about Rome. As to the Romans themselves, it might be literally said, that their weapons of war were changed into instruments of husbandry. No intestine seditions, no ambitious desires of the throne, nor attempts upon it, nor so much as any murmurs against the person, or administration of the King, appeared among them. When he died, they lamented him as sincerely, as if every man had lost his own father; and the concourse of strangers to Rome, to celebrate his obsequies, was exceedingly great. Numa had forbidden the Romans to burn his body; they therefore put it into a stone coffin, and, pursuant to his own orders, buried the greatest part of the ^b books he had written, in the same sepulchre with him. In consequence of the law he had made, that no dead body should be interred within the city, he himself had chosen a burial-place beyond the Tiber, at the foot of the Janiculum: And thither he was carried on the shoulders of his Senators, and followed by all the People, who bewailed their loss with tears. He left no children, except a daughter, named Pompilia, who was married to Numa Marcius (the

^a Pistarch, in the life of Julius Cæsar, calls this month Mercedonius. And Festus tells us of certain days, which he calls Mercedonius Dies, because they were the time appointed for the payment of workmen and domesticks. The intercalary month began the day after the Terminalia. A little astronomy was sufficient to shew, that Numa's year could not agree with the courses of the sun and moon. The exact periods of the revolutions of the sun and moon were not then known. Lucy writes, that Numa first instituted the days the Romans called Fasti and Nefasti. Macrobius, B. 1. distinguishes three sorts of days, which he calls Festi, Profesti, and Interfesi. The first were consecrated to the worship of the Gods; the second set apart for publick and private business; the last were divided between both. C. & P.

^b These books, when dug up some time after, were burnt by a decree of the Senate. He had therein explained his reasons for the novelties he had introduced into the Roman worship. We are indebted to Varro for this account. He tells us, that one Terentius had a piece of ground near the Janiculum: and that a husbandman of his, one day accidentally running his plough over Numa's tomb, turned up some of that Legislator's books; wherein he gave his reasons for establishing the religion of the Romans upon the foot on which he left it. The husbandman carried these books to the Prætor of Rome, and the Prætor to the Senate; who, when they had read the frivolous reasons he assigned for his religious establishments, agreed, that the books should be destroyed according to Numa's intentions: and it was accordingly decreed,

(the son of his kinsman Marcus, who had persuaded him to accept of the government) and was the mother of Lucus Marcius, fourth King of Rome.

Year of
R O M E
XLI. to LXXXII.

creed, that the Prætor should throw them into the fire. Varro, apud S. Aug. lib. 7. de Civit. Dei, cap. 24. St. Austin thinks there were some footsteps of magick in these books; of which Numa had in his life-time been suspected. C. & R.

CHAP. IV.

TULLIUS HOSTILIUS.

§. I. Tullius Hostilius a man of a generous and martial disposition is elected by the Romans to succeed Numa. §. II. The rivalryship between Rome and Alba for superiority. §. III. The dispute is decided by the famous combat between the three Horatii and the three Curiatii, in which the latter are all slain, and two of the former. §. IV. The surviving Horatius in his return to the city, in triumph, stabs his own sister, for reproaching him with the death of her Lover. He is tried by the Duumviri, and condemned to die. He appeals to the People, and they mitigate the sentence. §. V. Tullius, in conjunction with the Albans, engages in a war against the Veientes, and defeats them. The treachery of the Albans. Tullus demolishes Alba, and transplants the inhabitants to Rome. §. VI. He vanquishes the Fidenates, Sabines, and Latines; and institutes the Saturnalia. §. VII. In his old age, he falls into superstition, and studies magick. He is assassinated in his own palace.

§. I. THE two factions of the Romulists and Tatians, whose quarrels suspended for so long a time the election of a successor to Romulus, being now no more, the Interregnum which followed the death of Numa proved very short. Tullus Hostilius, a man of a warlike genius, was unanimously chosen King by the People, and accepted by the Senate. He was grandson to a noble Roman, named Hostus Hostilius, who is said to have signalized his courage in Romulus's time in the second battle with the Sabines, and to have married either the famous Herfilia or her daughter.

Year of
R O M E
LXXXIII.
TULLUS
HOSTILI-
US Third
King.
Livy, B. 1.
c. 22.

Tullus having riches enough in his own patrimony, both for the maintenance of his household, and the expences of the publick worship, was no sooner upon the throne, than he distributed among such of the citizens as remained unprovided for, those portions of the conquered lands which his predecessor had reserved for the royal demesnes, or set apart for the uses of religion: And thus he began his reign by a shining act of generosity, which gained him immediately the universal affection of his people.

This Prince being not only generous and brave, but of an enterprising genius, found in himself a greater inclination to tread in the steps of Romulus than those of Numa: But the laws established by his pacifick predecessor laying such restraints upon his martial ardor, as he could not instantly break through, he waited till fortune should be so favourable, as to set him free: And it was not long before she furnished him with a pretext to open the temple of Janus.

Year of
R O M E
LXXXIII.

TULLUS
HOSTILI-
US Third
King.

D. Hal. B.
p. 137.

p. 138.

§. II. THE Albans, upon the death of Romulus, seeing the race of their ancient Kings extinct, had resumed their independence upon Rome; and they chose their own Governors. Caelus or (according to Livy) Cluilius was now at the head of affairs in Alba. He is sometimes styled King, by the historians, and sometimes Dictator. His jealousy of the growing greatness of Rome, which by the conquests of Romulus, and the wise administration of Numa, was already become equal to any city in Italy, made him impatient to put a stop to its growth; and having no plausible reason at present to give his people for engaging them in a war with the Romans, he made use of the following stratagem to bring them into his sentiments and measures. He privately commissioned some of the vilest and most indigent of his subjects to go and ravage the Roman lands, not doubting but Rome would immediately fly to arms to revenge herself, and thereby give him a fair opportunity to make her pass, in the minds of the Albans, for the first aggressor, and the beginner of the war. Nor was Cluilius disappointed in his expectation. A Roman army entered the territories of Alba, attacked the robbers, slew many of them, and took abundance of prisoners. Cluilius being now sufficiently provided with matter for his purpose, convened an assembly of the people, inveighed against the Romans, produced a great many of the wounded, as also the relations of those who had been killed or taken, and, by exaggerating the losses which Alba had sustained, at length brought the Assembly to this conclusion: That an embassy should be sent to the Romans to demand satisfaction of them, and, in case they refused it, that war should be declared.

When the Ambassadors arrived at Rome, Tullus, guessing at their errand, resolved to prevent them, and be the first in demanding satisfaction; that so he might throw upon the Albans all the odium of the breach between the mother-city and the colony: For it had formerly been agreed between them, that they should never make war against one another, till a reparation of the damages sustained on either side had been previously asked in a friendly manner. It was for this reason that Cluilius had hastened the departure of his deputies; but Tullus, no less artful than he, made use of various pretences to defer giving them audience; and he contrived to have them so agreeably entertained in the houses where they were lodged, that they neither cared to stir abroad, nor had any uneasiness about these delays. In the mean time, the Roman King sent an embassy to Alba, with orders to require satisfaction on the part of Rome, and to press the conclusion of the affair. A Fecialis was at the head of the Ambassadors, who, setting out before sun-rising, reached Alba the same morning. They found Cluilius in the midst of the publick Forum, and there discharged their commission, putting him in mind to conform himself to the old treaty of alliance: To which Cluilius briskly answered, It is you alone who violate the treaty, my part has been already performed; I have sent Ambassadors to your King, but to no effect; and I therefore declare war against you. The Fecialis then asked him, whether that King, of the two, who first refused to hear the other's complaints, ought not to be deem'd guilty of the first breach of.

p. 139.

of the alliance? and, upon Cluilius's answering, Without doubt, the other invoked the Gods to attest, that the Alban King was the first violator of it. After which he and the Ambassadors instantly took their leave, and set out for Rome.

Year of
R O M E
LXXXIII.

TULLUS
HOSTILI-
us Third
King.
* Livy, B.
1. c. 22.

They were no sooner returned thither, but Tullus * sent for the Alban Deputies, received them in an obliging manner, and then enquired into the design of their embassy. These civilly made long excuses for the disagreeable commission with which they were charged; protesting, that they had accepted it contrary to their inclinations, and were very sorry to find themselves under a necessity to demand satisfaction of him, and to declare war, in case of a refusal. To which Tullus replied, Go, tell your King, that the King of Rome calls the Gods to witness, which of the two nations did first refuse the other satisfaction, that upon that nation they may heap all the miseries of this war.

The Roman Fecialis had given Cluilius but thirty days to consider of the means to prevent hostilities. This time was employ'd on both sides, in making preparations for the war, and getting succours from their allies. At length, both armies took the field; Cluilius pitched his camp five miles from Rome, and fortified it with a good ditch, (which continued long after, and was called Fossa Cluilia.) King Tullus posted his Romans on an advantageous ground, within view of the enemy.

D. Hal. B.
3. P. 139.

But now, whatever was the cause of it, the two armies were no sooner in sight of each other, than their ardor for fighting cooled, and they both kept close within their intrenchments. This inaction made the Albans begin to murmur at their Commander as the Author of a fruitless war; so that, to free himself from their reproaches, he resolved at length to offer the enemy battle; but the next morning, he was found dead in his tent with all his guard about him, and without any signs of violence.

Upon the death of Cluilius, the army saluted Metius Fuffetius Dictator. He was a man of the same turbulent character, and in the same views with his predecessor; but, receiving advice that the Fidenates and Veientes intended to fall upon both armies when they should be weakened by a battle, he, instead of pursuing the war, desired a conference with the King of Rome, in order to a reconciliation. Tullus having received the same information, listen'd readily to the proposal. When the two commanders came to a parley, both of them expressed a willingness to have a union formed between the Albans and Romans. Tullus proposed, as the best means to make it durable and perfect, that all, or the chief of the Alban families should remove to Rome; or, in case they were unwilling to leave their native city, that one common senate should be established to govern both cities, of which the more worthy should have the dominion over the other. The Albans who attended Fuffetius, and whom he took aside to consult with them upon these expedients, would by no means consent that Alba should be deserted by its inhabitants; but they approved of the motion for a common senate, and giving one city the command over the other. The only difficulty now was to settle which

D. Hal. B.
3. P. 142,
& seq.

Year of
R O M E
LXXXIII.

TULLUS
HOSTILI-
US Third
King.
D. Hal. B.
p. 150.
A. 100.

city should have the preference. Fuffetius spoke in favour of Alba, making this his chief plea, that she was the mother-city, from which Rome was but a colony; and Tullus urged, in behalf of Rome, her superiority of strength and grandeur. In the close of his speech, he offered to terminate the dispute by a single combat between himself and Fuffetius. The Alban General not being brave, or perhaps not thinking himself a match for Tullus, brought several prudential reasons, to prove that it would be better to choose three champions out of each camp, whose swords should terminate the contest, than to hazard the lives of the Generals. This proposal Tullus accepted; and the Chiefs retired into their entrenchments.

§. III. AS soon as the conditions of the union of Alba and Rome were known in the two armies, there was in both of them a strong emulation among the young warriors, for the honour of being chosen to this important combat. Fuffetius cast his eyes on three brothers, whom he imagined the Gods themselves had pointed out to be the champions for Alba; believing also, that three brothers who were then in the Roman camp, were under the like destiny of being the champions for Rome. It was the extraordinary circumstances of their birth, which made Fuffetius entertain this notion. Sequimius, an illustrious Alban, had two daughters; one he married to Curatius, a citizen of Alba, the other to Horatius, a citizen of Rome: and these two women were brought to bed on the same day, each of three male children. The Horatian and Curatian brothers were now in the flower of their age, and all six remarkable for their strength and dexterity in fighting. The Alban General having fix'd his choice on the three Curatii, and gained their consent, communicated his thought to the King of Rome, and exhorted him to pitch upon the three Horatii. Fate, said he, appears to have brought three champions on each side into the world, on purpose to decide by their swords the fortune of their countries. Tullus proposed the matter to the Horatian family, but would lay no injunction upon them. Old Horatius, the father of the three brothers, left them free to act as they would do, if he were not living; and, when he understood, that they, following the example of the Curatii, preferred a glorious death, or important victory, to an inglorious life, he lifted up his eyes to heaven, and embracing them, cried out, I am a happy Father; and then commanded them to declare his consent to the King.

Livy, B. 1.
c. 24.

When the Day appointed for the combat came, Tullus led the Horatii, and Fuffetius the Curatii, into the plain between the camps: where the two Kings, attended by their Feciales, met in the middle of it, and, before the engagement, concluded a * treaty in form.

D. Hal. p.
154.

And now the Alban and Roman champions advanced with a slow pace, each

* The form of this treaty escaped the injuries of time, till Livy's days: he (B. 1. c. 24.) gives us the following account of it; and it served as a pattern for the greater part of the treaties which were afterwards made by the Romans.

First, one of the college of the Feciales, named Marcus Valerius, demanded of King Tullus, Whether he gave him orders to conclude a peace with the Pater Patratus of the Albans? The King answered, He did. Give me then, replied the herald, some Vervein, [the sign each to meet his adversary. But in the instant, when the people expected to see them in a fierce encounter, they quitted their arms, and, with tears in their eyes, flew to embrace each other. The spectators, greatly moved at this sight, began to murmur at their Kings, who had engaged such tender and generous friends in a cruel rivalry for glory. A new scene quickly put an end to their pity, captivated all their attention, and employed all their hopes and fears. The triple combat began; and fortune, for a long time, held an even balance. At length, the eldest of the Horatii received a mortal wound, and fell; a second of the Roman champions had the same fate, and expired upon the body of his brother. The Alban army, hereupon, gave a great shout, while consternation and despair spread themselves through the Roman camp. The Roman cause however was not yet desperate; for * all the Alban champions were wounded, and the remaining Horatius unhurt, and undaunted. Nevertheless, he did not think himself able to sustain the attack of the three brothers at once, and therefore made use of a stratagem to separate them: He pretended fear, and fled before them. The Curatii pursued him, but at unequal distances, and as their strength would permit. Horatius turned short upon the nimblest and slew him. He then flew to the next, and, at one stroke, cut off his arm; after which he ran him through the body. The third was in no condition to fight. Being desperately wounded he could hardly support himself on his buckler. Horatius cried out, To the glory of Rome I sacrifice thee, struck him on the throat, and, big with victory, seized the spoils of the vanquished. Thus ended this famous combat, which gave Rome the superiority over her mother Alba. Fuffetius immediately saluting King Tullus as his master, asked him, what were his commands? I command you nothing, said Tullus, but to keep the Alban youth in readiness to march at my orders, in case I make war with the Veientes. He likewise endeavoured to comfort the Albans, who were

Year of
R O M E
LXXXIII.

TULLUS
HOSTILI-
US Third
King.

P. 155.
Livy, c. 25.

Livy, B. 1.
c. 26.

sign of his commission.] Yes, answered the King, bring me some that is pure. At those words, the Fecialis went and gathered some Vervein on a little hill, brought it, and went on thus: Do you then appoint me to be Fecialis and Plenipotentiary of Rome to the Albans, and engage to protect my equipage and retinue? Yes, replied the King, as far as is consistent with my interest, and those of the Roman people: and then Valerius the Fecialis appointed Spurius Fufus to be Pater Patratus of the treaty, by crowning him with Vervein. His office was to pronounce aloud the words of the oath in the name of the Roman King and people, and to repeat the whole form of the treaty.

After this ceremonial, which passed only among the Romans, the Pater Patratus read the articles of the convention in the presence of the Albans; and then expressed himself thus: Hear, O Jupiter, hear, O Pater Patratus of the Alban people, hear, O Alban people: Of these articles as I have just now read them out of these waxed tablets, without fraud or deceit, and as they have been from one end to the other clearly understood, the Roman people will never be the first violators. If they should violate them by publick authority and by fraud, may Jupiter at that instant strike them, as I shall now strike this hog! May thy stroke, great Jupiter! be as much heavier as thy power is greater. At which words he killed the hog, [that was to be offered up in sacrifice, in confirmation of the treaty,] by a blow on the head with a flint. The heralds of the Albans took the like oaths, and also offered their sacrifices.

* Dionysius says, that there remained only two of the Curatii, and that one was killed in the beginning of the fight, after the first of the Horatii.

grievously.

D. Hal. B. grievously cast down, by assuring them, that he would change nothing in 2 P. 152. their laws or form of government.

§. IV. BUT now, in the height of young Horatius's joy, when his glory seems to have dazzled his own eyes, and to have made him forget that he was a man, he fell into a crime, that obscured the lustre of his exploit, brought disgrace upon him, and even merited, in strictness of justice, a much severer punishment. As he was returning to the city in a sort of Triumph, his temples encircled with a crown the King had put upon his head, and his shoulders loaded with the spoils of the three Curatii, he, to his great surprize, beheld his sister, unaccompanied by her mother, and without any attendance, hurrying forward in the promiscuous crowd to meet him. However, in his own mind, he excused the uncommon indecency, by imputing it to an impatient desire of seeing and congratulating her victorious brother. But, alas! the zeal which had brought her from home was of another kind: One of the Alban champions had been her lover, and was to have been her husband. Upon the first report of his being slain, she had stolen from her mother, and was come, running like a distracted creature, to learn the certainty of his fate: And, when she saw the conqueror bearing in triumph her lover's military robe (a robe which she had wrought with her own hands) all stained with his blood, she tore her hair, beat her breast, and reviled her brother in the bitterest expressions. Thou monster of wickedness, she cried, how couldst thou dip thy hands in the blood of thy relations, whom thou hast so often called thy brothers? How couldst thou murder the man thy sister should have married? Horatius, still warm with slaughter, and enraged at these reproaches, and the untimely grief of his sister, Go then to thy lover, with thy unseasonable passion, Thou, who forgettest thy dead brothers, thy living brother, and thy country. Thus, let every Roman perish, who laments the death of an enemy to Rome! As he uttered these last words, he stabbed her with his sword; and, without longer stay, without sign of pity or remorse, went strait on to his father's house. The father approved of the cruel deed, and refused to let his daughter be buried in the sepulchre of her family.

D. Hal. B. Nevertheless when King Tullius returned to Rome, Horatius was arraigned 2 P. 159. before him upon an accusation of murder; and some of the most eminent of the citizens concerned themselves in the prosecution. They thought it of dangerous consequence to slacken the rigour of the laws in favour of any man, merely on account of his bravery or success in battle; and the law expressly forbid to kill any person whatsoever who had not been first condemned. This affair threw the King into some perplexity, being divided between his regard for the laws, especially in the case of murder, and the desire he had to save the young warrior, who had done him such important service. To avoid the odium he might bring upon himself by either acquitting or condemning the criminal, he, as Livy tells us, turned the affair into a state crime, and, having called the people together, named two commissioners or Duumviri to try him as a traitor. This was conformable to the law, in cases of treason. The law ran thus: Let two Com-

p. 156,
157.
Liv. 2. 25.
Year of
ROME
LXXXIII.
Tullius
Hostilius
the third
King.

Liv. B. 1.
c. 25.

Commissioners be appointed to try state crimes. If the criminal appeal from the sentence of these judges, let his appeal be received. If their sentence be confirmed, let him be hood-winked and hanged with a rope upon a cursed tree, having been first scourged either within or without the pomarium. The fact of which Horatius was accused being notorious, and not disowned by the prisoner, the Duumviri, without delay, pronounced sentence against him in these words: Horatius, we judge you to be guilty of treason. Go, Lictor, tie his hands. The executioner had already laid hold of him, when Horatius, by the King's advice, appealed to an Assembly of the People; and this shews that the authority of the people was superior to that of the King. Horatius appeared there with the same undaunted resolution that he had shewn in his combat with the champions of Alba; and his father pleading for him, and even justifying the fact, the Assembly, through admiration of his courage, rather than for the justice of his cause, revoked the sentence that had been passed against him. However, that the crime might not go wholly unpunished, they condemned Horatius to pass under the yoke, an ignominy to which they usually subjected prisoners of war who had cowardly surrendered their arms. (The yoke was a kind of gallows, in form of a door-case.) The King likewise appointed expiations to pacify the Anger of the Gods; and the Pontifices erected two altars, one to Juno, the protectress of women, and another to Janus (deemed perhaps one of the guardian Genii of men) now stiled Curatian Janus, from the name of Horatius's cousins, whom he had slain. An annual commemoration of the thing was likewise ordered to be observed, with sacrifices on those altars; which altars, with the yoke under which Horatius passed, were still remaining in the time of Augustus. All the honour done to Horatius for his victory was erecting a square column in the middle of the Forum, and hanging thereon the spoils of the Curatii.

Year of
R O M E
TULLUS
HOSTILI-
us Third
King.

D. H. p.
159, 160

§. V. TULLUS did not forget the treacherous designs of the Fidenates, during his war with the Albans, and he at length resolved to take his revenge. But, to proceed regularly, he first cited them to appear before the Senate of Rome, and answer for their conduct. They, being conscious of guilt, and in secret intelligence with Fuffetius, who hoped to free himself from the Roman power, refused to obey, and in conjunction with the Vcientes, took the field. Fuffetius, in obedience to Tullus's orders, joined him with the Alban troops; but the day before the battle, he imparted to his chief officers his secret intention, which they approved. It was to stand neuter till fortune had decided the day, and then to fall upon that side which should be routed. Accordingly, just before the action began, he retired with his men to a hill. Tullus had notice of his desertion; and, in this distress, privately made a vow to add twelve priests to the college of the Salii, and to build a temple to Fear and Paleness. Then telling his men, in the hearing of the enemy, that the motion Fuffetius had made was by his order, he confidently attacked the Fidenates, who being disheartened by the apprehension of treachery in the Albans, were easily routed; and then Fuffetius poured down from his hill upon the runaways.

D. Hal. B.
3. p. 160,
& seq.

Livy, B. 1.
c. 27, 28,
29.

Tullus.

Year of
R O M E

TULLUS
HOSPILI-
US Third
King.

† D. H. p.
167.

p. 172.

Livy, c. 30.

D. Hal. B.
5. P. 172.

p. 173.

Tullus concealed his knowledge of Fuffetius's treachery, went privately in the night to Rome, consulted the Senate, and returned to the camp before break of day. Instantly he detached Horatius † with a chosen band of horse and foot to go and demolish Alba; and while these orders were executing, he commanded both the Roman and Alban troops to attend him unarmed, but with private instructions to the Romans to bring their swords under their clothes. When they were all assembled, he made a speech to them, in which he laid open the perfidiousness of Fuffetius; and in the conclusion ordered him to be fastened to two chariots, and torn asunder, by driving the horses contrary ways. His chief accomplices were also put to the sword; but the King transplanted the rest of the Alban soldiers and citizens to Rome, and even admitted the principal of them into the Roman Senate. Of these the historians particularly mention six families; the Julii, Quintii, Servilii, Gegamii, Curatii, and Clalii: Others were promoted to the dignity of Knights, and all without exception enjoyed the privileges of Roman citizens.

This new increase of inhabitants obliged Tullus to enlarge the limits of the city; he took in mount Caelius, and allotted it for the Albans to settle upon (without excluding them from other parts of the city) and built his own palace there.

§. VI. THE Fidenates persevered in their revolt, and Tullus spent the winter in making preparations to attack them early in the spring. He then took the field, defeated them under the walls of Fidene, and obliged them to retire into the city; where by cutting off all succours and provisions from it, he reduced them to such extremities that they surrendered at discretion. He punished the heads of the revolt, but suffered the rest to continue in their city, under their own form of government, only in dependance upon Rome. This compleat victory procured him the honours of a triumph, in which the spoils of the enemy were carried as trophies.

And now the Romans, flushed with success, and strengthened by their union with the Albans, demanded satisfaction of the Sabines for the insults which some Roman citizens had formerly suffered from them at the temple of the Goddess Feronia, i. e. (Flora, or Proserpina) which stood at the foot of mount Soracte, upon the banks of the Tiber, and was frequented by both Sabines and Romans. The Sabines not being able to get succours, kept themselves for some time on the defensive only. At length they came to so bloody a battle with the Romans, that both armies, terrified with the numbers of their slain, retired into their own countries, and attempted nothing more that campaign. The next year the war was renewed with greater fury. The two armies met near Eretum, a town about 13 miles from Rome, and the battle continued long in suspense; till Tullus by making a vow to Saturn * and Ops, to institute a festival to their honour, so raised the

* These festivals of Saturn and Ops, or one and the same solemnity, continued for Rhea, were kept at Rome, in the month of several days together. The festival appropriated to Saturn, was fixed to the 16th of the calends of January; and that of Ops, which the courage of his men, that he obtained a complete victory. The Sabines p. 174. submitted, and the Senate prescribed the conditions of a treaty with them; ^{Year of} ROMA which, when concluded, was written on pillars erected in holy places, that ^{Tullus} those pillars might be lasting monuments of the superiority of Rome. ^{Hospital- us Third}

So much success carried the Romans to make new pretensions. They summoned all the Latine towns, which had been dependent on Alba, to submit to the Roman laws. Upon this an assembly of the Latine nation was¹⁷⁵ held at Ferentinum, where it was resolved not to bow under the yoke of Rome; and two Generals were chosen to command their forces. The Romans did not make war upon them in a regular way, but after the old manner of incursions and incursions, destroying their harvest. Medusa, which had submitted to Romulus, and since revolted, was the only town taken by King Tullus, in this war.

The Sabines some years after, thinking themselves in a condition to take¹⁷⁴ revenge upon Rome, invaded the Roman territory, and in small parties, ¹⁷⁵ spread themselves all over it, to pillage; and the little opposition they met with, encouraged them to think of besieging Rome. But Tullus marched against them, and once more entirely defeated them near the Malefactor's Forest.

§. VII. IT is related, that King Tullus, when grown old, fell into super- Plut. Num- perdition and credulity, and was much imposed upon by stories of prod- ^{ma, p. 75.} igies, and voices from heaven, upon which occasion he ordered expiatory Liv. B. 1. sacrifices for nine days, the time usually employed afterwards in expia- ^{c. 31.} tions, when the people were terrified with prodigies. He is said also by some to have studied magick, and to have hid himself in a private place to perform a magical sacrifice, in order to raise Jupiter's Elicius; but that, omitting some part of the necessary ceremonies, the God in a rage set his palace on fire by lightning, so that the King, his wife and CXIII. children all perished in the flames. But others are of opinion, that Tullus died by the hands of Ancus Marcius, his successor; who, when the D. Hal. p. 176.

which was likewise a part of the Saturnalia, to the 14th. D. Hal. attributes the origin of them to Tullus Hostilius's vow. Because all the fruits of the earth were gathered in in December, the Romans therefore fixed the festival of these Deities in that month, one of which represented the Heavens, and the other the Earth, to whose united influences and power all fruits owe their production. These festivals were celebrated with mutual entertainments; the slaves themselves eat at their masters tables. Which was not only to reward them for their labours in cultivating the earth, and gathering the fruits of it, but likewise to renew the remembrance of the golden age, in which all men were equal. Servants had at this time a right of being served by their masters, wearing their clothes, and reproving them for their faults. In this sense we are to understand Horace's applying himself to his servant,

— Age, libertate Decembri, (Quando ita majores voluerunt) utere: narra.
Sat. 7. B. 2. C. & R.

^a The Ferentinum here spoken of, was in Latium near Monte Albano, in the same place where Marino now stands. C. & R.

^b The art of raising some Dæmon, under the name of Jupiter Elicius, was pretended to in Italy, from the times of the old Kings of the Aborigines. We are told, that Fauns and Picus practised it in their time; and that, by their enchantments, they forced this pretended Divinity to appear to them by the side of a spring in Italy, and were by him enabled to raise a storm of thunder and lightning, when they pleased. Arnob. B. 5. C. & R.

Year of
ROME
CXIV.

King and his whole family were met to perform a domestick sacrifice, first slew them, and then set fire to the palace, to conceal his crime.

Tullus had been more inclined to fighting, than to legislation. No law is mentioned to have been made by him but this, That whenever three male children should be born at a birth, they should, in memory of the Heratii, be brought up at the publick expence. Generosity and personal courage were his chief merit. As for his rekindling in the Romans that love of war, and ambition of conquest, which his predecessor Numa had, during his long reign, so industriously extinguished, it conduced indeed much to the aggrandising the Roman state, and getting it a name, but not much to the real happiness of its people.

CHAP. V.

ANCUS MARCIUS.

§. I. Ancus Marcius, the grandson of Numa, is chosen to succeed Tullus Hostilius. He declares war against the Latines in all the forms prescribed by Numa. He vanquishes the enemy in several battles, and takes many of their towns. §. II. He strengthens Rome by new fortifications, and builds Ostia at the mouth of the Tiber. He defeats the Fidenates, Sabines, Veientes and Volsci. §. III. He dies, leaving two sons under the tuition of Lucius Tarquinius, a foreigner from Hetruria, who had settled at Rome.

ANCUS
MARCUS
Fourth
King.
D. Hal. p.
160.

D. Hal. B.
3. p. 177,
178.

§. I. THE deceased King being looked upon as a man struck by the Gods, no honours were done to his ashes. After a short Interregnum, the People and Senate unanimously chose ^a Ancus Marcius (son of Pompilia, the daughter of Numa) to succeed Tullus. The new King began his reign, by endeavouring to restore Rome to the condition in which Numa had left it; to revive husbandry, and the neglected worship of the Gods. He was ambitious of imitating his grandfather: But he soon found, that his devoting himself wholly to works of peace drew upon him the contempt of the neighbouring nations.

The Latines pretending that their treaty with the Romans was no longer binding, than while King Tullus lived, had committed hostilities in the territory of Rome. Ancus determined to revenge it; nevertheless out of respect to the laws of Numa, he previously observed all the ^b forms appointed by him to be used in declaring war. He then raised an entirely new army, marched to Politorium, a Latina city, and surprized it. He shed

^a Every Roman had ordinarily three, and sometimes four names. The first was called Prænomen, the second Nomen, the third Cognomen, and the fourth Agnumen. The Nomen shewed the family from which he was descended; the Prænomen and Cognomen were often nick-names, taken from the circumstances of the person's birth, or his defects, or his bodily qualities. And the last names were, to some, titles of honour, as those of Africanus, Germanicus, &c. Valerius assures us, that Ancus Marcius had his name of Ancus from the Greek word ἀγκυς, because he had a crooked arm. C. & R.

^b These forms were as follow. A Fecialis was deputed to go to the Latines: he no sooner shed no blood, nor destroyed the city, but transplanted the inhabitants to Rome; and these, with the inhabitants of Tellena and Ficana, two other cities of Latium, which he likewise took, he settled on the hill *Aventinus, which he inclosed, and made a part of Rome, but without consecrating the boundaries.

The next year the Latines repeopled Politorium, which obliged Ancus to besiege it again; and, upon the second reduction of it, he demolished it entirely. After this he led his troops four years successively to the siege of Medulia, which he at length took and plundered. Ficana, which he had neglected to demolish, he reduced a second time, and now destroyed it. The Latines, not discouraged, appeared in the field, but being defeated in one pitched battle, they durst not venture another. They divided their troops into small parties, and contented themselves with making incursions into the Roman territory; and Ancus, to oppose them, made a like division of his army, which he left to the conduct of Tarquinius, (a foreigner lately come from Hebruria) and full of glory returned to his Capital.

§. II. ROME was exceedingly enlarged in this Prince's time, for, not content with carrying its walls round the Aventine hill, he likewise encompassed the hill Janiculum, which stood on the other side of the Tiber)

sooner arrived on the borders of that people; but he cried out, Hear, great Jupiter, hear, ye confines of the Latine nation, let justice bear. I am a publick messenger from the Roman people, I come justly and religiously commissioned; let credit therefore be given to what I say. After which he laid open his demands; and then, having called Jupiter to witness, he added these words: If I have unjustly, and impiously made these demands; [which were of persons or goods to be delivered up to him] may'st thou never suffer me to return to my own country. He repeated these words at his entering the Latine territory, then to the first person he met, then at the gate of the city, then in the market-place. If in about thirty days his demands were not satisfied, he said, O Jupiter, Juno, thou Romulus, and all ye Gods of Heaven, of Earth, and of Hell; hearken! I call you all to witness, that the Latines are unjust. We will therefore enter into deliberations at Rome, on the proper means of obliging them to give us just satisfaction.

No sooner was the Fecialis returned, but the King referred the affair to the Senate: which he did in the form prescribed by Numa, addressing himself to every particular Senator, in these very words: Say, what think you of the refusal which the Pater Patratus, and whole nation of the Latines have given the Pater Patratus of the Romans, of restoring and granting us what we demanded of them? To which every Senator gave this answer: Let us again demand our rights by just and lawful war: This is the opinion for which I declare myself. And when the greater part of the Senators had declared their opinions in this manner, the war was considered as unanimously concluded on. Then the Fecialis went to the confines of the enemy's country, carrying in his hand a javelin, which was either headed with iron, or burnt at the the end, and dipped in blood. When he came to the territory of the Latines, he pronounced the following prescribed form of words, in the presence of at least three persons, not under 14 years of age: On account of the damages which the ancient Latines have done the Roman people, and in obedience to a decree made by the Senate and People of Rome, importing, that war be declared against the ancient Latines; I, and the Roman People declare it and begin it. At which words he threw a dart upon the enemy's lands. (Livy, B. 1. c. 32.) All this ceremonial had been instituted by Numa; though that Prince having never engaged in any war, had never put it in practice: and Tullus, who was of an active spirit, had not confined himself to these tedious formalities. But Ancus Marcius established the use of them; and from his time they were always practised. And it ought here to be observed, that at this time, no use was made of the King's name or authority in treaties: only the Senate and the People are mentioned.

Year of
R O M E

ANCUS
MARCIUS
Fourth
King.

* D. Hal.

P. 182.

P. 179.

P. 183.

Liv. B. 1. with a wall, and made it a sort of citadel for Rome; and in order to have a communication between the city and the new citadel, he built the bridge, called Sublicus, (the first perhaps known in Italy) over the Tiber, in that place where it washes the foot of the hill Aventinus. To suppress the licentiousness of the people, he next built a prison in the Roman Forum.
 And lastly, observing that Rome lay open to surprizes from an enemy, in those places where the country about it was low and flat, he caused a wide ditch to be dug there, which was ever after called Fossa Quiritium, because all the people were employed to make it.

When Anus had finished these works of peace, the first enemies that felt the return of his martial disposition were the Fidenates, who being rebels, he did not send a Fedius to them, but marched straight to Fidena, which he besieged and took by Sap; this being the first instance we meet with in Roman story of that kind of attack.

He next marched against the Sabines, who, since the death of King Tulus, believing themselves discharged from the engagements they had entered into with Rome, had renewed hostilities. He quickly forced them to sue for peace, and they obtained it on easy terms.

The four following years Anus employed in enlarging the temple of Jupiter Feretrius, in building the port and city of Ostia, and in digging salt-pits on the sea-shore. The distribution of salt which he made among his subjects at this time gave rise to those publick liberalities, called Con-giaria, from the word Congius, a measure in use among the ancient Romans, containing about a gallon.

After this he twice defeated the Veientes, and was decreed a triumph by the Senate; and to reward the merit of Tarquinius, who had distinguished himself at the head of the Roman cavalry, the King promoted him to the rank of a Patrician, and Senator. The Veii were next attacked, and Veii, their capital, besieged by Anus; but the inhabitants, being reduced to extremity, and sending out their old men as suplicants, obtained first a truce, and afterwards a peace. The King of Rome then turned his arms against those of the Sabines, who had not yet been conquered. Success attended his expedition, and he returned triumphant to Rome, where he passed some time in tranquillity.

§. III. ANCUS, after a reign of 23 or 24 years, (in which, according to Livy, he shewed himself not inferior to any of his predecessors, either in civil or military government) is said by Plutarch to have died by violence; but other writers speak of his death as altogether natural. He left two sons, one an infant, the other near fifteen years of age, and both under the guardianship of Tarquinius, an able politician, who had found the secret to make himself equally the favourite of his master and of the people.

CHAP. VI.

TARQUINIUS PRISCUS.

§. I. The politick management of Tarquinius to obtain the kingdom. He is elected King, and adds to the Senate 100 new Senators chosen out of the Plebeians.

beians. §. II. The Latines renew the war against the Romans. Tarquin, by repeated victories over them, reduces them to sue for peace. At his return to Rome, he builds a Circus for the Roman games. §. III. He totally subdues the 12 Lucumonies of Hetruria. §. IV. He applies himself to cleanse and beautify Rome. §. V. He renews the war with the Sabines. He increases the number of the Roman Knights. The adventure of Navius the Augur. §. VI. Tarquin subdues the Sabines. §. VII. He marks out the area of a temple to Jupiter, Juno, and Minerva, on the hill Tarpeius, afterwards called the Capitol. He marries one of his daughters to Servius Tullius. §. VIII. The sons of Ancus conspire the death of Tarquin. He is assassinated in his own palace. The stratagem of Queen Tanaquil, to secure the kingdom to her son-in-law, who takes possession of it, without being legally elected to the throne.

§. I. TARQUINIUS was the son of Damaratus, a merchant of Corinth, who, to secure his great wealth from Cypselus, the Tyrant of that place, had retired with it to Tarquinii, one of the most considerable cities of Hetruria. The Greek merchant married there a woman of distinction, by whom he had two sons, Arux and Lucumo. The elder died before his father; and tho' he left his wife with child, yet his father not knowing it, and dying soon after him, left all his wealth to Lucumo: So that the posthumous son of Arux, disinherited before he was born, took the melancholy name of Egerius, from egere TO WANT. Lucumo, now in possession of all his father's immense riches, aspired to the highest dignities in Tarquinii; and his wife Tanaquil, an Hetrurian, was no less ambitious than he of his advancement: But he being looked upon as a stranger, this hindered him from rising to any considerable post. At the instigation of his wife therefore he resolved to remove, with all his effects, to Rome, where merit never failed of being rewarded with honours. No sooner was he admitted a citizen there, but he endeavoured to appear entirely Roman. He changed his names of Lucumo Damaratus, for those of Lucius Tarquinius; artfully insinuated himself into the King's favour; became popular by his liberalities and polite address; and, lest his great wealth should create suspicions of him, offered to deposite it in the publick treasury, to supply the wants of the city. Besides all this, he distinguished himself by his military exploits, (the surest steps to greatness,) and appeared to be no less able in council, than formidable in arms.

Tarquin, as soon as the throne was vacant, turned his thoughts to bring on the election of a new King with the utmost expedition, before the elder of the late King's sons should be full fifteen; and, to keep him out of the sight of the people during the Comitia, he sent him a hunting in the country. This aspiring Greek was the first who introduced into Rome the custom of soliciting for offices, and openly making interest to obtain them. Nay, he did not scruple to extol his own merit in a publick harangue, and to propose himself to the people for a successor to Ancus. As he had already gained them by money and caresses, he was chosen

D. Hal. B.
3. P. 184.
Liv. B. 1.
c. 34.
Year of
ROME
CXXXIX.

TARQUIN
I.
Fifth King.

D. Hal. p.
187.

p. 185.

p. 186.

Liv. B. 1.
c. 35.

Year of
R O M E
CXXIX.

TARQUIN
I.
P. 186.

chosen by a majority of votes; and the Roman people commanded him (for that was the term then used) to sit down at the helm of affairs. And then to strengthen his party in the Senate, he created an hundred new Senators, who were called Senatores Minorum Gentium, because chosen out of Plebeian families. But this name was never authorized by any publick act. They had the same authority in the Senate as the other Senators, and their children were deemed Patricians.

§. II. ALMOST all the nations subdued by the Romans, pretending that their treaties with them were no longer binding than during the lives of those Princes by whom they had been subdued, Tarquin had inevitable wars to sustain. The Latines were the first who attacked him, but not the whole nation of them jointly. Tarquin besieged Apiolæ, took it by stratagem, and sold the inhabitants for slaves. The Crustumini, who had revolted, repented and submitted; the King treated them mildly, but settled a Roman colony among them. Nomentum likewise experienced the clemency of Tarquin upon its submission. Collatia being more obstinate, the King, after its reduction, disarmed, and taxed the inhabitants, and placed a garrison there to keep it in subjection. He gave the sovereignty of this city to Egerius, his brother Arunx's son, who from thence took the name of Collatinus, which he transmitted to his posterity. Corniculum was besieged next, and after a brave resistance, was carried by assault, and reduced to ashes.

The fate of these cities induced several others to unite their forces to oppose the King's progress: But he defeated these forces in a bloody battle near Fidene; and then, taking advantage of the terror his victories occasioned, solicited those cities to enter into alliance with him; to which some of them consented, chusing rather to submit to a sort of dependance upon Rome, than to run the hazard of being reduced to a state of slavery. This submission so alarmed the rest of Latium, that, in a national assembly held at Ferentinum, they came to a resolution to employ their whole strength to oppose the torrent that threatened them; and they engaged all Sabinia, and a part of Hetruria to join with them. In two actions the King vanquished these confederate armies; and then those Latine cities which had refused his alliance, sued for it and obtained it.

Tarquin at his return to Rome after so many victories, had the honour of a triumph, and he applied the wealth he had brought from the conquered cities to the building a Circus * for the Roman Games, otherwise

* Tarquin was of a Greek family: and this led him to think of building a Circus at Rome, in imitation of the chief cities of Greece. The first Circus which was ever built, and was a pattern to all the rest, was in Elis, where the Olympick games were celebrated.

It is certain the Roman games were also called, The great Games: Livy (B. i. c. 35.) assures us of it. Nevertheless, we must not from thence conclude, that all the sports which were celebrated in the Circus, and which were called Circenses, were the great games. Some were celebrated in the Circus, to Ceres, Apollo, &c. which were different from the great or Roman games: Nor were those called Megalenæ, the same with the great games. The former were celebrated before the Nones of April, and the latter on the eve of the Nones of September. Besides, the Roman games were instituted in honour of the great Gods, whence they were called wife called the Great Games. The place chosen for this Circus, was in the valley which reached from the Aventine to the Palatine hill.

Year of
R O M E

§. III. THE long war which this King waged with the Hetrurians, and the signal victories he gained over them, greatly advanced his glory, and both enabled and inclined him to introduce magnificence into his Court. Hetruria was a very large country, extending itself from the Tyrrhenian sea to the Apennine hills, and from Liguria to the Tiber. The Latines called the inhabitants of it sometimes Tuscans, and sometimes Hetrurians; but the Greeks more frequently, Tyrrhenians; who, possessing so much of the south coast of Italy, gave their name to the sea, which washes it. This great state was divided into twelve cantons called Lucumonies^b, which were subject to twelve heads, who governed them with a sort of sovereign authority, under the name of Lucumonies. Sometimes one Lucumony made war by itself; at other times the Hetrurians all joined in a national body, in defence of their common interests.

TARQUIN
I.
Fifth King.

Strabo,
Pliny, Mela.

Tarquin having gained some advantages over certain of the Hetrurian Lucumonies, this awakened the jealousy of the whole nation. Besides, they had reason to complain of a want of justice in the King of Rome, who had not only refused audience to the Ambassadors they had sent to him with a reasonable demand, but had detained them as so many hostages for the obedience of the Hetrurians. The twelve Lucumonies, therefore, came to a resolution to make war upon the Romans; and it was decreed, that if any city of Hetruria stood neuter, it should be for ever cut off from the general alliance. They took the field, made themselves masters

D. Hal. B.
3. P. 192.
193.

called the great games; and the Megalenses only in honour of Cybele. Lastly, the great games were instituted by the elder Tarquin; and the Megalenses, not till Junius Brutus's time, who appointed them to the honour of Cybele, then called μεγαλῶν, or the Great Goddess.

At one end of the Circus stood the posts round which the chariots were obliged to turn; at the opposite end the chariots started, and on each side of the Circus the spectators sat in two great galleries. It is certain, that the end where the turning-posts stood, described a portion of a circle: and it is probable the opposite end where the chariots started, was semi-circular: But this is not absolutely certain.

Dion. Hal. plainly tells us, that this Circus was three Stadia and a half long and four Jugera broad: and that 150000 men could sit in it at their ease: but Pliny makes it only three Stadia long. He probably omitted the half Stadium, mentioned by the Greek historian, for the sake of a round number. Nothing therefore remains, but to compute how long and wide the Circus was, according to our measures. Now Pliny tells us, B. 1. c. 3. the length both of the Roman Stadium and Juge-

rum. The former, according to him, contained six hundred twenty-five Roman feet, each of which feet contained twelve inches, or sixteen fingers-breadths: so that consequently the Circus, as it was three Stadia and an half, must have been two thousand one hundred and eighty-seven Roman feet long. And it being four Jugera broad, each of which Jugera contained, according to him, two hundred and forty Roman feet; it is from thence easy to infer, that the Circus was nine hundred sixty Roman feet broad, and consequently was above twice as long as it was wide. So that the length of the Circus was somewhat more than three English furlongs, very near half an Italian mile, or about a quarter of a French league. C. & R.

^b The names of the capital cities of the twelve Lucumonies were, according to Cluverius and Helfius, Clusium, Perusia, Cortona, Arritium, Volaterra, Vetulonium, Rufella, Tarquinius, Volturni, Cære, Falerii, and Veii. Hetruria was long the mother of all the learning and politeness of the Romans: they sent their children thither to cultivate their minds, till the conquest of Greece furnished them with a better school. C. & R.

of

of Latium by the treachery of some of the inhabitants, and ravaged the Roman territory. Tarquin, not being prepared, suffered them to go on without opposition till the next year, when he had put himself into a better condition to engage with them. He then divided his army into two bodies; the Romans he commanded himself, and gave the command of the other to his son Collatinus. The latter by his ill conduct suffered a defeat: But the King routed the Latians, first near Veii, and then under the walls of Cere.

Latium being a key to the dominions of Rome, the conquest of it was of the utmost importance to her. The Romans therefore bent their forces that way, and after defeating the Enemy in a sharp engagement besieged the place, and took it. All those of the Latians who had been concerned in betraying it to the enemy, were first whipped and then beheaded; the rest were sent into banishment, and their lands distributed by lot among the Roman soldiers. Then Tarquin hastened to attack the Hebrurians once more, before the whole strength of the new army they were raising could be got together. He came up with them near Erutum, a small city of the Salines, and gave them an entire overthrow; for which the Senate decreed him a triumph. And now the Lacemonians despairing of any future success against the Romans, sent an humble deputation to ask peace; which Tarquin granted without insisting on any other condition, than their owning his sovereignty over them. To this they readily agreed, and sent him all the ensigns of authority they had among them: a crown of gold; a throne of ivory; a scepter with an eagle on the top of it; a tunick embroidered with gold and adorned with the figures of palm branches; and a purple robe enriched with flowers of various colours. But the King deferred the making use of these stately ornaments, till the People and Senate had consented to it by an express decree: He then employed them in the decoration of his triumph, and never after laid them aside. In this triumph he rode in a gilt chariot drawn by four horses.

§. IV. HAVING now an interval of rest from his wars, he turned his thoughts to the fortifying, cleansing, and beautifying the city. He undertook to build the walls of Rome of hewn stone, and drained the low grounds about

* This the Latins called Tunica palmata. It is true, authors sometimes confound it with what they call Toga picta: but these were two different ornaments, worn by those who triumphed; and it is necessary to show here the difference between them. The Tunica palmata was not, properly speaking, a long hanging robe, but rather a vest, which was partly hid under the robe. It at first had no sleeves, and afterwards but very short ones. As all the Romans wore Tunicks, they shewed the difference of their rank, by that of their Tunicks. Some sewed upon theirs purple flowers, which were stuck on like the heads of nails; and hence comes the word Laticlavium. Only the chief Magistrates and Senators, and general officers of the army, could wear these. The inferior Magistrates, the Roman Knights, and some other officers in the army, wore indeed Tunicks with purple flowers; but these flowers were smaller than the others: and from hence comes the name Angusticlavium. As for those who triumphed, of whom we are now speaking, they, instead of embroidered flowers, wore purple Palm Branches upon their tunicks, thence called Tunica Palmata. The Toga picta, some think, was a robe common among the Romans, only about the Forum, and between the hills, in order to the making those common-sewers^c, which when made by the second Tarquin, were among the wonders of the world. He likewise adorned the Forum, surrounded it with galleries, made shops in it for bankers and money-changers, erected temples, schools for the youth of both sexes, and halls for the administration of publick justice.

Romans in the Toga.

P. 200,
201.
Year of
R O M E
TARQUIN
I.
Fifth King.

§. V. TARQUIN after some time spent in these works of peace, entered into a new war with the Sabines, on pretence of their having assisted the Hetrurians; and he came to a battle with them, which lasted the whole day. The advantage was so equal on both sides, that the two armies stood in awe of each other, and retired into their respective countries, without committing any further hostilities the rest of the campaign. During this cessation of arms, Tarquin, considering that he had often been hindered from sufficiently pursuing the advantages of a victory, for want of horse, resolved to add some new bodies of Knights to those of the first institution: But as the first division of the horse into three corps, had been determined by Auguries, Attius Navius, the most famous Augur of that time, opposed the King's design as irreligious. Tarquin could not persuade himself that the Augur was serious in this opposition, and therefore sent for the diviner into his presence, being resolved to confound and discredit, in him, that divining art, which superstition maintained to the diminution of the Royal Authority.

As soon as Navius appeared before Tarquin, in the midst of the Forum, and in the sight of all the people, the King said to him, Diviner, canst thou discover by thy art, whether what I am thinking of can be done, or not? Go and consult thy birds. The Augur did as he was ordered, and returning quickly, answered, Yes, Tarquin, my art tells me, that what you are thinking of may be done. Upon which Tarquin, pulling out a razor from under his robe, and taking a flint in his hand, replied with a contemptuous smile, I was thinking whether it were possible to cut this flint with this razor. I have taken thee in thy own craft; the introducing the Gods

Livy, B. 1.
c. 36.
D. Hal. B.
3. p. 203.
and Florm.

of a purple colour: And as to the robe in general, it was nothing but a sort of very long mantle, which hung in great folds quite down to the ground, and which they put on upon their right shoulders, throwing one lappet of it over the left. The robes of the Senators were adorned with great purple flowers, as well as the Tunicks; and those of the Knights with smaller. And the Robes of those who triumphed were likewise probably adorned with palm-branches, as their Tunicks were. At least, it is certain they were made of rich stuffs, and had some gold in them; and they were called Togæ pictæ. Only two persons ever had the privilege of wearing them out of a triumph, and in common, Paulus Æmilius and Pompey. C. & R.

^c All the arches of these common-sewers were of hard stone, and neither expence

nor labour was spared to make the work durable. Their height and breadth were so considerable, that a cart loaded with hay could easily pass thro' them. But the greatest difficulty of the work was, to convey the waters (which through these sewers were to carry off the filth) into the Tiber. It was necessary to cut through hills, and under the city, through rocks, a channel large enough for a navigable stream, and covered with arches strong enough to bear the weight of houses, which were often built upon them, and stood as firm as on the most solid foundations. The expence of this incomparable work was never so well understood as when it came to be repaired. The Censors gave no less than a thousand Talents to him who undertook to cleanse these sewers. C. & R.

Year of
R O M E
T A R Q U I N
I.
Fifth King.
into thy decisions is all cheat and imposture. If thou canst perform what is impossible, do. At these words the people burst out into laughter, whilst Navius alone discovered no emotion. He addressed himself to the King with an air of assurance, and said, ^a Put the razor to the flint, and try; I readily submit to any punishment, if what you thought of be not done. Upon trial, the razor passed through the flint so easily and so suddenly, that, Tarquin having given more force to it than was necessary, it wounded and drew blood from his hand. The people hereupon gave a great shout, the King's contempt for the Augur turned into admiration, and, from this time, the augural science had a higher degree of credit in Rome than ever before. (D. Hal. p. 204. Tarquin afterwards erected a statue of brass to the memory of Navius, in the place called Comitium, where the publick assemblies were held; and there it continued till the time of Augustus. The razor and flint, kept as monuments of the miracle, were deposited near the statue^b, under an altar, at which they swore witnesses in civil causes.)

But tho' Tarquin laid aside his project of increasing the number of the Corps of horse, he increased the number of the Knights in each Corps; making the Roman cavalry amount in all to 1800 men.

§. VI. WITH this reinforcement the King marched out to renew the war with the Sabines, who had got succours from Heltruria, and were encamped near Fidene, by the place where the Anio joins the Tiber. The Heltrurians, posted on one bank of the Tiber, and the Sabines, on the other, had a communication by a bridge of boats. Tarquin, who had pitched his camp upon the Anio, at a little distance from the place where it discharges itself into the Tiber, perceived, that the current of that little river would carry into the Tiber any thing, which was sent down it; and that if the same wind, which then blew, continued, it would, with a little help, carry barks up the Tiber against the stream, and bring them to the enemy's bridge. With this view, he built flat-bottom boats, like rafts, and loaded them with dry wood, sulphur and rosin: and in the night, while the wind continued favourable to his design, he sent these fire-ships some down the Anio, and others up the Tiber, at the same time; so that the bridge, being thus invested on both sides with fire, was quickly all in a flame. The Sabines ran instantly to extinguish it; and, as is very frequent on such unforeseen and sudden accidents, left their camp unguarded. Tarquin, who, to attack it, had, with the best part of his forces, marched out of his intrenchments while it was yet dark, was by break of day master of it. On the other bank, a detachment, which by his order had passed the Tiber in the night, fell suddenly upon the

^a Livy says, Navius took the flint into his own hands, and cut it, in Tarquin's presence.

^b The reader will no doubt think it strange, that an event related with so many circumstances, reported by all the writers of the Roman History, and adopted even by some of the Fathers of the church, who without questioning it, imputed it to magick, should be a mere fabulous invention: and yet this is the judgment which Tully himself formed of it, tho' an Augur. Look with contempt, says he to his brother Quintus, look with contempt on the razor and flint of the famous Attius; when we reason as philosophers, we ought to lay no stress upon fables. Cic. B. 1. de Div. C. & R.

camp of the Hetrurians, in the instant that the bridge of boats took fire, which was the signal the King had given. The enemy, disconcerted and routed on both sides of the river, perished, some of them by the flames, others by the sword, and others by leaping into the Tiber, to save themselves; and their arms which floated down the stream, carried the news of the victory to Rome, before the couriers, dispatched by the King, arrived there.

Year of
R O M E
TARQUIN
I.
Fifth King.

After this, Tarquin would give his enemies no rest, but immediately entered the territory of the Sabines; whose misfortunes had not yet abated their courage. They ventured to face the Romans, with an army tumultuously assembled. Being once more routed, they sued for peace, but the King did not think fit to grant them more than a truce.

This truce was no sooner expired, than the Sabines passed the Anio, and made incursions on the territory of Rome; but tho' they were equal in numbers and bravery to the Romans, Tarquin, in a pitched battle, defeated them by the stratagem of detaching a body of horse, which fetched a compass and came upon their rear during the action. The Sabines imputing their ill success to the incapacity of their General, chose a more experienced Commander for the next campaign. The King of Rome appeared early in the field, and shewed himself to the enemy: and when he found that their new General, not having got together all his troops, avoided a battle, and kept within his camp, he blockaded him there, and reduced him to the utmost extremity for want of provisions: however, the latter, taking the advantage of a dark stormy night, marched his army secretly out of his intrenchments, and stole off; and thus the campaign ended.

The next year, the Sabines, pleased with the conduct of their General, took courage again, enlisted all their youth capable of bearing arms, and formed a numerous army, which they divided into two bodies. Tarquin on the other side augmented his forces with troops from Latium, Hetruria, and all his allies, and divided them into three armies, which were always to encamp near each other. He commanded the Romans himself, put his nephew Collatinus at the head of the Hetrurians, and gave the command of the Latines and other allies to Servius Tullius, a foreigner who had been a slave, and had since obtained the privileges of a Roman citizen. The battle lasted the whole day; and Tarquin obtained the victory; but not till he had inspired his men with fresh courage, by making a vow to Jupiter, Juno, and Minerva, to build them a magnificent temple. While he was marching afterwards to besiege the Sabine cities, they sent Deputies to him to sue for peace, offering to give him possession of their fortified places, and of all their country, if he would grant them tolerable conditions. He treated them favourably, as he had done the Hetrurians; and then returning to Rome, entered it in triumph, and with the same pomp as after the conquest of Hetruria.

§. VII. THE victorious King did not forget his vow to build a temple to Jupiter, Juno, and Minerva. He levelled the top of the hill Tarpeius (formerly Saturnius) marked out the plan of the temple, and laid the foundations

Year of
R O M E

TARQUIN

I.

Fifth King.

p. 202.

dations of it. Navius the Augur, having been consulted about what part of Rome Jupiter would like best to be placed in, had declared for the hill Tarpeius: but then a difficulty arose about removing the Gods, who had already got possession of this hill, without giving them offence. By the help of Augury, it was discovered, that they were all willing to be removed, except the God ^a Terminus, and the Goddess Youth, who having no mind to go, were afterwards inclosed within the walls of the temple, the Area of which was now dedicated by Navius.

This famous Augur soon after disappeared. He was supposed to be murdered; and the people were very inquisitive after the authors of his death. The sons of Ancus Marcius endeavoured to fix the calumny upon the King, and accused him publickly. Tarquin attempted in vain to appease the tumult which they excited; Servius Tullius, the King's son-in-law, and the most popular man in Rome, was obliged to employ all his credit to quiet the rage of the people. At length the falseness of the accusation being known, the sons of Ancus were detested for having raised the slander. However, Tarquin pardoned them, in consideration of the favours he had received from their father.

p. 200.

He was more severe to Pinaria, a prostitute Vestal. He caused her to be buried alive, and the man who had dishonoured her, to be whipped to death. Nevertheless, he did not lose his esteem for the class of Vestals; on the contrary, he added two to their number, augmenting it to six.

p. 204.

Livy, B. 1.

c. 42.

§. VIII. TARQUIN being now eighty years old (of which he had reigned 37) and drawing near his end, the ambition of the sons of Ancus grew more active. They always remembered with indignation the arts by which their guardian had secured to himself their father's kingdom, nor could they brook to see a foreigner sit upon the Roman throne to their prejudice: But when they perceived that the kingdom was not likely to pass to them, even after the death of Tarquin, but that Servius Tullius would probably succeed his father-in-law, they no longer set any bounds to their resentment. What! said they, while we the sons of Ancus Marcius, are living, shall the Roman throne lie open, not only to strangers, but even to slaves? Nevertheless, they bent their fury rather against the life of Tarquin than of Servius, both because the revenge of a King was more to be dreaded than that of a private man, and because, should they destroy Servius, Tarquin might provide himself another son-in-law to succeed him. The method they took to compass the death of the old King was this: They hired two young men who dressed themselves like peasants, with hatchets on their shoulders, as if they were wood-cleavers: These going near the King's palace pretended to have a quarrel about some goats. The noise they made reaching the inmost rooms of the palace brought the officers of the Court about them, who carried them before the King, to whom they both appealed. At first they began to bawl and rail at each other till they were restrained by a Lictor, and ordered to speak by turns. Then one of them began to tell his story, and while the King was wholly

D. Hal. p.
205, 206.

^a Livy, B. 1. c. 55. places this Fact of the unwillingness of TERMINUS to remove, in the reign of Tarquin the proud.

attentive

attentive to it, the other lifting up his hatchet gave him a great cut in the head; after which, leaving his weapon in the wound, he instantly ran out of doors with his fellow. But, while some of the company hastened to assist the wounded King, others pursued the ruffians and seized them; and being put to the torture, they confessed by whom they had been employed. By this time there was a great concourse of people at the palace wondering at the attempt, and curious to know the event.

Year of
R O M E
CLXXIV.
TARQUIN
I.
Fifth King.

Queen Tanaquil did not lose her presence of mind on this occasion. She cleared the palace of the crowd, shut herself up in the apartment of the expiring King, with only her son-in-law, Servius Tullius, his wife, and Ocrisia his mother, and pressed him to ascend the throne, that Tarquin's two grandsons^a might be safe under his protection: Servius, if thou art a man, the kingdom is thine, and not theirs who have committed the greatest villainy by the hands of other men. Take courage then, and follow the Gods thy conduitors, who foretold thy future glory by the divine^b fire which shone round thy head. Let that celestial flame now warm thee. Rouze thyself in earnest. We who were strangers have reigned here. Think who thou art, not of whom thou wast born; and if thy counsels are at a stand by reason of this unexpected accident, follow mine. She then opened the window which looked upon the street, and bid the people be in no concern; she told them that the wound was not deep, that the King was stunned with the sudden blow, but was come to himself again, and she hoped they would see him very shortly; that in the mean time he ordered them to obey Servius Tullius, who would administer justice to them, and perform all other Kingly Offices. This stratagem succeeded. The report, that the King would soon be well again, and appear in publick, being spread and believed, this so terrified the sons of Ancus, that they went of their own accord into banishment to Suessa Pomelia.

D. Hal. B.
4. P. 209,
& seq.
Livy, B. 1.
c. 41.

The second day after the murder of Tarquin, Servius Tullius, attended by the Liſtors, sat on the throne in the royal robes, and heard causes; some he decided, and upon others he pretended he would consult the King. As it became him to revenge the attempt against the person of his Sovereign, he accordingly cited the sons of Ancus to appear before his tribunal; and upon their non-appearance, they were declared infamous, and their estates confiscated. The Regent continued for some time to act this part, and so managed his affairs as to gain the hearts of the Romans, by his prudent administration. At length, when he thought his authority sufficiently established, the death of Tarquin was proclaimed as a thing recent, with loud lamentations, and Servius performed magnificent obsequies for him: after which, without being legally elected King, either by^c Senate or People, he continued to hold the reins of Government, appearing in publick with a strong guard, and with all the ensigns of royalty.

^a It is much contested whether the children here spoken of, Lucius Tarquinius and Arunx, were the sons or grandsons of Tarquinius Priscus. Dion. Hal. contends warmly for the latter opinion.

^b A report had been carefully propagated, that when Servius was a child, and asleep, a sudden light or flame, in form of a crown, encompassed and rested upon his head.

^c Livy says, that Servius Tullius took possession of the kingdom with the consent of the Fathers.

C H A P. VII.

SERVIUS TULLIUS.

§. I. The Birth and Education of Servius Tullius. The Honours he pays to the Goddess Fortune upon his elevation to the Throne. §. II. The Patricians conspire to dispossess him. He gains the people to his interest, is legally elected King by the Curiae, and though the Senate refuses to confirm this election, keeps possession. §. III. Servius defeats the rebellious Hetrurians. He enlarges Rome, and adds a fourth Tribe to the three old ones. He institutes the Compitalia in honour of slaves. He divides the Roman territory with its inhabitants into TRIBES. He marries his two daughters to Lucius Tarquinius and Aruns, the grandsons of the late King. He subdues the Hetrurians. §. IV. Servius divides the Roman citizens into six CLASSES, and these into CENTURIES. He institutes the CENSUS and the LUSTRUM, and coins money. §. V. He gives the LIBERTI or Freed-men the privilege of Roman Citizens. §. VI. He reforms the Regal Power, and executes a scheme for securing to the Romans the fidelity and friendship of the Latines and Sabines. §. VII. The wicked intrigues of Tarquin and the younger Tullia. Tarquin accuses the King of usurpation before the Senate. Servius pleads his cause there, but appeals to the People, and is by them confirmed on the throne. §. VIII. Tarquin regains the King's favour by submissions, but soon after causes him to be murdered, and usurps the kingdom.

Year of
R O M E
CLXXV
to CCXIX.

SERVIVS
TULLIVS
Sixth
King.
D. Hal. B.
4. p. 205.

Plut. de Fort.
Rom. p.
323.
D. Hal. B.
4. p. 207.

§. I. SERVIVS Tullius, the sixth King of Rome, was the son of Ocrisia, a woman of extraordinary beauty and distinguished virtue, taken captive at the sacking of Corniculum: but who his father was is uncertain. Dionysius reports that one Tullius, a warrior of royal extraction, and killed in the defence of that city, was the husband of Ocrisia, and at his death left his wife with child of this son. Tarquin made a present of the fair captive to Queen Tanaquil, who being soon after apprized of her quality and merit, conceived a particular esteem for her and restored her to freedom. Nevertheless, Ocrisia's son, being born while she was yet in a state of servitude, had thence the name of Servius. This is Dionysius's account. But Plutarch will have Ocrisia to have been a virgin at the time of her falling into captivity, and to have afterwards married one of the King's clients, by whom she had Servius Tullius. Nor have there been wanting writers who have given this Prince a divine origin; and made him the son of Vulcan, a fable which probably owed its rise to another fable, reported for truth by Tanaquil and Ocrisia, of a sudden flame, in form of a crown, which surrounded the head of Servius when he was a child and asleep.

From such different accounts, as also from the silence of the Capitoline marbles on this head, 'tis pretty certain that nothing was less known to the historians historians than the true ^a descent of Servius. In these things however they all agree, That King Tarquin and his Queen had the same tenderness for the son of Ocrisia as if he had been their own offspring, and took the same care of his education; and that, nevertheless, it was chiefly to his own wife, noble, and uniform conduct that he owed his gradual elevation to the highest step of honour.

Servius Tullius distinguished himself by his military achievements, even before he was arrived to the age of manhood. The reputation of a brave warrior, which he then acquired, increased as he advanced in years; and this, with his amiable polite manners, his eloquence, and his extraordinary ability in council, so gained him the esteem and affection of the people, that with unanimous approbation he was raised to the rank of a Patrician and to a place in the Senate. The King and Queen nevertheless did not originally intend him the honour of an alliance with the Royal Family. They married him to Gegania a Roman lady of illustrious birth; and it was only after her death that they first thought of giving him their daughter Tarquinius: but after this alliance the King reposed an entire confidence in him for the management both of his domestick concerns, and the affairs of the publick; in which latter Servius acquitted himself so well, that the people were quite indifferent whether they were governed by him or Tarquin; and this it was that made it so easy for him to seat himself on the throne upon the death of his father-in-law.

As Servius, notwithstanding his superior merit, looked upon himself to be wholly indebted to Fortune for his grandeur, the first homage he paid after he was King, was to this Goddess; and he erected an incredible number of altars and temples to her, stiling her by various epithets: And being resolved to make the peaceful Numa his pattern, and aspire to fame by establishing as much order in the civil polity of Rome as that wise Prince had done in the religious, he, like him, pretended to have private conversations with a Goddess, and Fortune was his Egeria.

§. II. BUT how much soever Servius had been favoured by his Goddess in possessing himself of the government, the beginning of his reign was not without disturbances. The Patricians especially were much dissatisfied with the little respect he had shewn to the ancient usages, upon the demise of a King. He had ascended the throne without being elected to it, and only as a Regent; there had been no Interregnum as formerly. Complaints of these things were first dropp'd in private assemblies, but soon improved into almost a general conspiracy; and the Senators agreed among themselves, that the first time they met, they would force the King to lay aside his royalty. Servius, in this emergency, applied himself to gain the people, and employ their power against that of the Patricians. Among his other natural endowments, he had a ready and lively eloquence, proper to make impressions on a multitude. When therefore he had convened

^a Father Catrou thinks it strange that none of the historians have made Tarquin himself the Father of Servius; but would it not have been more strange if any of them had, since Tarquin thought fit to marry him to one of his daughters?

Year of
R O M E

SERVIVS
TULLIVS
S P Q R

the People, having with him the two grandsons of the late King, one on each hand, he made a speech to the assembly to this effect: See here, illustrious Romans, the tender offspring of one of your greatest Kings. The bare sight of them will bring to your remembrance the virtues and victories of their grandfather. A melancholy death and cruel parricide robbed you of him, and left his posterity exposed to the artifices and fury of his assassins. I alone received a charge from the dying King to protect these helpless children in their infancy: and to this I found myself pre engaged, both by the alliance I had made in Tarquin's family, and by the favours heaped on me by that generous Prince. Be you, Romans, their joint guardians with me; and whatever gratitude you owe me for the services I have formerly done you, which I need not remind you of, let it all be transferred to these my pupils. But why should I employ many words with you in their favour? You know what is fit to be done, and will do it. I shall now only tell you the benefits I have resolved to procure for you; and it was for this reason I called you together. You shall no longer be the slaves of your creditors, nor bear the chief burthen of the publick taxes. I will provide remedies for both these evils. It is not just, that the lands which are conquered at the expence of your toils and blood, should be distributed only among the most audacious of the great; whilst you continue without a foot of land of your own, and are obliged to cultivate the estates of others for hire. You have long enough borne the contemptuous usage of the Patricians who hardly look upon you as freemen, because you are poor. I will never rest till I have established you in perfect liberty. Nor was this harangue of the King mere empty words: for a few days after he commanded all the insolvent debtors to send him an account of their debts, and the names of their creditors; and then causing compting-houses to be opened in the Roman Forum, he there paid all with his own money. He likewise published an edict, commanding all such as had usurped any lands belonging to the publick, to quit them at an appointed time; and ordered those of the citizens, who had no land of their own, to petition for them. And, lastly, he made some new laws, which retrenched certain pretended privileges, made use of by the Patricians, in their law-suits with the Plebeians, to vex and oppress them.

D. Hal. B.
4 P. 216.

P. 245.

But though the inclinations of Servius Tullius led him more to works of peace, and civil government, than to military exploits, he found himself obliged to embark in a war. It proved a very long one, but brought much glory both to the Roman people, and to their King. The Veientes, whom Tarquin had often subdued, refused now to recognize the Sovereignty of Rome, and had lately treated with scorn some ambassadors sent from thence to claim their submission. We entered, said they, into no treaty with the son of a slave; nor will we ever submit to Servius's dominion. Tarquin is dead, and our obligations to be subject to the Romans are dead with him.

This confidence of the Veientes proceeded partly from the hopes they had of profiting by the dissensions between the King and Senate of Rome. They therefore prepared for war, and drew two other Lucumonies, viz.

C. Plan of Rome containing its Several Additions from the time of Servius Tullius to that of its being taken by the Gauls.

1. The Forum Romanum.
2. The Via Sacra.
3. The Carine.
4. The Great Circus.
5. The Ox-market.
6. The Velabrum Tuscan Street.
7. The Vena Street.
8. The Temple of Vesta.
9. The Curia Hostilia.
10. The Temple of Jupiter Stator.
11. The Temple of Quirinus.
12. The Temple dedicated to Fortune.
13. The Temple of Fortunatissima.
14. The Temple of Jupiter Capitolinus.
15. The Temple of Fides.
16. The Temple of Laurinus.
17. The Temple of Health.
18. The Temple of Saturn.
19. Hostilius's Palace.
20. The Temple of Juno Lucina.
21. Marcus Tullius's Palace.
22. The Temple of Peace.
23. The Temple of Jupiter Stator.
24. The Temple of Diana.
25. The Temple of Victory.
26. The Temple of Queen Juno.

27. The Campus Martius.
28. The Temple of Venus Erycin.
29. The Temple of Apollo.
30. The Temple of Ceres.
31. Bacchus, and Proserpine.
32. The Temple of Castor & Pollux.
33. The Temple of Faith.
34. The Temple of Good Fortune.
35. The Temple of St. Fortune.
36. The Temple of Hercules.
37. The Temple of Janus.
38. The Temple of Jupiter Stator.
39. The Temple of Libitina.
40. The Temple of Mars.
41. The Temple of Mercury.
42. The Temple of Minerva.
43. The Temple of Nymphs & Eques.
44. The Comitium.
45. The Temple of Venus Cloacina.
46. The Temple of Vulcan.
47. The Temple of Larentia.
48. The Temple of Ceres.
49. The Temple of Concord.
50. The Fountain of Mercur.
51. The Palatine Tribe.
52. The Tarpeian Rock.

those of Cere and Tarquinius, into their party. But Servius, by his courage and conduct subdued these confederates, and, judging it proper to make them examples of severity, because they had been the aggressors, he deprived them of their lands, and transferred the property of them to such of the new citizens of Rome, as had yet no lands of their own: After which, supported by his own glory and the favour of the people, he obtained the honours of a Triumph, in spite of the hatred of the Senate.

The Senators now finding the People entirely well affected to the King, suppressed their complaints, lest if they insisted on an Interregnum, it should occasion a legal election of Servius by the Curia. This Prince had too much penetration not to see into the mystery of their policy, and therefore resolved to make advantage of the present favour of the multitude, to render his title to the throne less disputable. He assembled the citizens, and, in a moving speech, which drew tears from their eyes, complained of a design formed by the Patricians to take away his life, and to bring back the sons of Ancus. And this, said he, for no other reason but the kindness I have shewn to the Plebeians. In the conclusion of this harangue, he left the kingdom absolutely to their disposal, and begged them to determine between him and his pupils on one side, and their competitors on the other. If you give sentence against us, these children, with the rest of Tarquin's family and blood, shall immediately leave the city. As for me, I have lived long enough for the views of virtue and glory: nor when I have once lost the hearts of you, my people, which I value above all things else, will I consent to drag on an ignominious life among strangers. Take then these fasces, and if you so think fit, give them to the Patricians; I will trouble you no more with my presence. As he ended these words he stepped down hastily from the Tribunal, in order to leave the assembly; but they called to him to stay, intreated him to be their King, and even used violence to stop him. Some cried out, Let the Curia be assembled, that we may elect Servius without delay. Accordingly a day was appointed; and, when the day came, he was chosen King. However the Senate could never be brought to confirm this election; and their faction was so formidable, that Servius deliberated with himself, whether he should not renounce the dignity conferred on him by the people: but imparting his perplexities to Tanaquil, she encouraged him, and even took an oath of him, whereby he engaged himself not to resign the kingdom. This magnanimous Queen died soon after; and the King, to immortalize her domestick virtues, the true glory of a woman, hung up her distaff in the temple of Hercules.

§. III. AS Servius was now resolved to continue on the throne, the Hebrurians furnished him with an opportunity to augment his glory. His victory over them obtained him the honour of a second Triumph. An interval of rest after this war he dedicated to the enlarging and adorning the city. Romulus had inclosed at first only the hill Palatinus, and afterwards added the hill Tarpeius; to these Numa joined the Quirinalis; Tullus Hostilius took in the hill Cælius; Ancus Marcius inclosed mount

Year of
ROME

SERVIVS
TULLIVS
Sixth
King.

* D. Hal.

B. 4 P.
218.

P. 220.

Aventine and joined the Janiculum to the city by a wooden bridge; Tarquinius Priscus only built the walls of Rome of hewn stone, without enlarging its bounds; but Servius * inclosed within its limits the hills Esquilinus and Viminalis, on the first of which he fixed his own palace, in order to draw inhabitants thither; and he added a fourth tribe to the ^a three of Romulus's division, and called it Tribus Esquilina.

This King, in order to have an exact register of the inhabitants of Rome, obliged every one to stay in the Tribe wherein he was born; and he likewise made a law, That a piece of money should, upon every death, be paid into the temple of the Goddess Libitina, who presided over funerals; another into the temple of Juno Licina, upon every birth; and another into the temple of Teuth, as soon as any person was past the state of childhood. By this means it became easy to know the number of the Roman citizens, and who of them were able to bear arms.

P. 219.

It was partly perhaps to do honour to his first condition, that Servius made an institution in favour of slaves. He erected little wooden oratories in all the cross-ways, dedicated to the Dii Compitales, or Gods of the cross-ways, and commanded that slaves only should be priests to these Gods. They had their particular festival, on which masters gave the slaves rest from all labour.

P. 220.

To establish equal order throughout the Roman state, Servius disposed into distinct ^b tribes all the citizens that dwelt in the country; and he ordered, that in each of these country tribes there should be one place of refuge situated on a steep hill to secure the effects of the peasants upon sudden alarms. These strong holds he called Pagi, which signifies villages or boroughs; and he appointed a festival, called Paganalia, to be held every year in each of these Pagi. All the peasants of the several tribes were to be present at the yearly sacrifices offered to the tutelary Gods of their respective villages, and every person was to bring a piece of money, the men a piece of one kind, the women of another, and the children of a third sort, to be paid into the hands of those who presided at the sacrifices. By counting these pieces of money they learnt the exact number, age, and sex of the persons belonging to each tribe.

* The three tribes of Romulus's division were called the tribe of the Rhamneses or Tribus Palatina; the tribe of the Tatienfes or Tribus Suburana, and the tribe of the Luceres or Tribus Collina.

As taxes were raised by laying a certain sum on each Tribe, it was hence, as Varro tells us, that those taxes were called Tributes and Contributions; though Livy says that the Roman Tribes were so called from the Tributes levied on them.

^b What the number of these tribes was, into which Servius divided the freemen of Rome who lived in the country, seems to be uncertain. The learned Jesuits, Fathera Carreu and Rouillé, make it to be just 15, but they give no reason for their conjecture. They offer good reasons why the number could not be 31, as Dionysius (following Veneni an ancient author) believed. For according to the same Dionysius there were in all, including the 4 city tribes, but 21 who voted at Coriolanus's trial many years after. Livy and Florus speak of an augmentation of the tribes in the year 258, after which augmentation the number was but 21; and Livy afterwards speaks of another addition of tribes. Now the whole number of Roman tribes never exceeded 35, which number would have been complete in Servius's time, according to Veneni's account.

In the midst of his cares for the publick safety, this provident King did not forget his own. His two wards Lucius Tarquinius and Arans being now sufficiently advanced in years to be capable of disturbing his government, should they prove ill affected to him, he the better to secure their fidelity, married them to his two daughters : And though the elder of these daughters, being of a mild and virtuous disposition, resembled in character the younger of his pupils, as the elder of his pupils did the younger of his daughters who was violent and vicious, yet he thought it most advisable to match them according to priority of birth, that so the mildness and discretion of the elder Tullia might restrain the dangerous impetuosity of Lucius, and the vivacity of the younger Tullia quicken the unambitious indolence of Arans.

Year of
R O M E

SERVIUS
TULLIUS
Sixth
King

During the publick rejoicings for this double marriage, the Hebrurians were preparing to make war upon the Romans in a national body. The historians have not been particular in their accounts of this war ; they only tell us that Servius, by repeated victories over them, reduced them to ask peace, and to submit to him upon the same conditions on which they had submitted to his predecessor : and that for this success he was honoured with a third triumph.

D. Hal. p.
231.

§. IV. AFTER this the King returned to the pursuit of his political schemes. Taxes had been hitherto levied upon the people at so much a head, without distinction of rich and poor ; and as both sorts were equally obliged to serve in the field at their own expence, it was often very hard upon the poorer sort. There was likewise this farther inconvenience in the present government of affairs, that, as war and peace, the creation of magistrates and the making and abrogating of laws were determined by a majority of the Curie assembled, and as in these Curie the Rich and the Poor, the Patrician and the Plebeian were mingled without any distinction, and every man's voice was of equal value, the indigent and ignoble, tho' less qualified to judge, and more easily corrupted, yet being vastly the more numerous, had in these assemblies a greater share in all decrees than the noble and wealthy. Servius formed a project to remedy these evils. He ordered all the Roman citizens under the severest penalties to give an account in writing of their names and ages, with those of their fathers, wives, and children. He further obliged all the heads of families to deliver in upon oath a just estimate of their effects, and to mention the places of their residence, whether in town or country. Having got information of these things, he undertook to ease the poor, by burthening the rich, and yet to please the latter, by augmenting their power.

p. 221;
222.

To this end, he divided the Roman citizens into six Classes : and as all the soldiery was to be raised out of these, he appointed them offensive and defensive arms, according to their dignity and pre-eminence. The first Class consisted of those, whose estates in land and effects were worth at least a hundred thousand Asses of brass, according to the Latin way of computing, or ten thousand Drachmæ, according to the Greek. This first Class was subdivided into fourscore Centuries, or companies of foot,

Livy, B. 1.
c. 43.
322 l. 18 s.
4d.
Arbuth.

Year of
R O M E

SERVILIUS
TULLIUS
Sixth
King.

forty of which companies were made up of young men; that is, of such as were from seventeen to forty-five years of age, and these alone were obliged to take the field: the other forty companies of the same class were old men; that is, such as were past forty-five, whose only duty was to defend the city. Every soldier of this first and most honourable body of the Roman infantry was defensively armed with a small oval shield after the Greek fashion, an helmet of brass, a cuirass, and *cuisse*s of the same metal; and their weapons were a pike, a javelin and a sword. To these fourscore Centuries of foot, Servilius joined eighteen Centuries of Roman Knights, who fought on horse-back. Hitherto there had been but three Centuries of Knight. What number of men they contained is uncertain. Livy tells us, that of these three Centuries, Servilius made six, and added twelve new Centuries to them, and ordained that this considerable body of horsemen should be at the head of the rich Class: because, doubtless, the estates of these Knights exceeded the sum necessary for being admitted into this first Class. But though they were rich, yet the publick supplied them with horses; and a tax was laid on widows, who were exempt from all other contributions, for maintaining their horses. This first Class, including infantry and cavalry, consisted of ninety-eight Centuries.

Livy, B. 1.
c. 43.

The second Class comprehended those Romans, whose estates were worth at least 75000 Asses of brass, or 7500 Drachmæ. It was divided into twenty Centuries of soldiers, all foot: Ten of young men, and ten of old. And to these twenty were joined two other Centuries of carpenters, smiths, and other artificers for the engines of war; so that the second Class contained in all twenty-two Centuries. The soldiers of this Class were armed like those of the former; with this only difference, that they had no cuirass, and instead of the small oval shield had a buckler of the figure of an oblong square, which almost covering their whole body made the cuirass needless.

D. H. E.
4. p. 221.
242 l. 35.
9 d.

In the third Class were those, who were esteemed worth 50000 Asses, or (which amounts to the same) 5000 Drachmæ. These wore no defensive armour but the helmet and square buckler; but they fought as the others did, with the pike, javelin and sword. These were also divided into twenty Centuries.

161 l. 98.
2 d.

The fourth Class consisted of such as were worth 25000 Asses, or 2500 Drachmæ, and this likewise contained twenty Centuries, ten of old men, and ten of young; and to these were added two other Centuries of trumpets and blowers of the horn, who supplied the whole army with this martial musick. The soldiers of this Class had no defensive arms but a square buckler; their offensive ones were the same with those of the former.

201. 143.
7 d.

161. p.
222.

In the fifth Class were included those whose whole substance did not amount to more than 12500 Asses, or 1250 Drachmæ. They were divided into thirty Centuries, fifteen old, and fifteen young. They were not suffered to wear any defensive armour, and their only weapons were slings and darts.

431 78.
1 d. 1/2
A. Gell.
B. 16.

The

The sixth Class comprehended all those who either had no estates or were not worth so much as the soldiers of the fifth Class. The number of them was so great, as to exceed that of any of the other Classes, yet they were reckoned but as one Century.

By this enumeration we see that the Roman people were, in Servius's time, divided into one hundred and ninety-three Centuries^a, reckoning the

Year of
R O M E
SERVIUS
TULLIUS
Sixth
King.

^a It may be proper here to explain, once for all, the difference between the three sorts of Comitia successively established in the Roman government, with the manner in which the people gave their votes in these assemblies.

The Comitia, according to Sigonius's definition, were general assemblies of the people lawfully called by some magistrate, for the enjoinment or prohibition of any thing by their votes^{*}.

The proper Comitia were of three sorts; Curiate, Centuriate, and Tribute; with reference to the three grand divisions of the city and people into Curia, Centuries, and Tribes: For by Comitia Calata, which we sometimes meet with in authors, in elder times were meant all the Comitia in general; the word Calata, from calare or calo, being their common epithet; tho' 'twas at last restrained to two sorts of assemblies, those for the creation of priests, and those for the inspection and regulation of last wills and testaments†.

The COMITIA CURIATA owe their original to the division which Romulus made of the people into thirty Curia; ten being contained under every Tribu. They answered, in most respects, to the parishes in our cities, being not only separated by proper bounds and limits, but distinguish'd too by their different places set apart for the celebration of divine service, which was perform'd by particular priests (one to every Curia;) with the name of Curiones.

Before the institution of the Comitia Centuriata, all the grand concerns of the state were transacted in the assembly of the Curia's; as, the election of Kings, and other chief officers, the making and abrogating of laws, and the judging of capital causes. After the expulsion of the Kings, when the commons had obtained the privilege to have Tribunes and Aediles, they elected them for some time at these assemblies: But that ceremony being at length transferr'd to the Comitia Tributa, the Curia were never convened to give their votes, except now and then upon account of making some particular law, relating to adoptions, wills, and testaments, or the creation of officers for an expedition; or for the electing of some of the priests, as the Flamines, and the Curio Maximus, or superintendant of the Curiones, who themselves were chose by every particular Curia.

The power of calling these assemblies, belonged at first only to the Kings; but upon the establishment of the Democracy, the same privilege was allowed to most of the chief magistrates, and sometimes to the Pontifices.

The persons who had the liberty of voting here, were such Roman citizens as belonged to the Curia; or such as actually lived in the city, and conformed to the customs and rites of their proper Curia; all those being excluded who dwelt without the bounds of the city, retaining the ceremonies of their own country, though they had been honoured with the Jus Civitatis, or admitted free citizens of Rome‡.

The place where the Curia met was the Comitium, a part of the Forum, as has been already mentioned§.

No set time was allotted for the holding of these or any of the other Comitia, but only as business required.

The people being met together, and confirmed by the report of good omens from the Augurs (which was necessary in all the assemblies) the Rogatio, or business to be propos'd to them, was publickly read. After this (if none of the magistrates interposed,) upon the order of him that presided in the Comitia, the people divided into their proper Curia's and consulted of the matter; and then the Curia's being called out, as it happened by lot, gave their votes, man by man, in ancient times vivâ voce, and afterwards by Tablets||; the most votes in every Curia going for the voice of the whole Curia, and the most Curia for the general consent of the people‡‡.

In the time of Cicero, the Comitia Curiate were so much out of fashion, that they were formed only by thirty Lictors representing ^{*} Sigon. de Antiq. Jur. Civ. Rom. l. 1. c. 17.

Prev. l. 3. c. 1. § See Part II. l. 1. c. 5.

† A. Gell. l. 15. c. 27. ‡ Sigon. de Antiq. Jur.
|| Tabellæ. †‡ Rosin. l. 7. c. 7.

Year of
ROME

82 100 82 100 the whole sixth Class as but one Century: And after a full enquiry, it appeared the thirty Centuries; whence in his second oration against Rullus, he calls them Comitia admodum.

THE Comitia Centuriata were instituted by Servius Tullius, who obliging everyone to give a true account of what he was worth, according to those accounts divided the people into six Ranks or Classes, which he subdivided into 193 Centuries. The first Classis containing the Equites and richest citizens, consisted of ninety-eight Centuries. The second, taking in the tradesmen and mechanics, made up two and twenty Centuries. The third, twenty. The fourth, twenty-two. The fifth, thirty. And the last, filled up with the poorer sort, but one century*.

And this, though it had the same name with the rest, yet was seldom regarded, or allowed any power in publick matters. Hence 'tis a common thing with the Roman authors, when they speak of the Classes, to reckon no more than five, the sixth not being worth their notice. This last Classis was divided into two parts, or orders, the Prelerarii, and the Capite Cens. The former, as their name implies, were designed purely to stock the commonwealth with men, since they could supply it with so little money. And the latter, who paid the lowest tax of all, were rather counted and marshalled by their heads, than their estates†.

Persons of the first rank, by reason of their pre-eminence, had the name of Classees; whence came the phrase of Classici Auctores, for the most approved writers. All others, of what Classis soever, were said to be infra Classes‡.

The assembly of the people by Centuries, were held for the electing of Consuls, Censors, and Prætors; as also for the judging of persons accused of what they called Crimen Perduellionis, or actions by which the party had show'd himself an enemy to the state; and for the confirmation of all such laws as were proposed by the chief magistrates, who had the privilege of calling these assemblies.

The place appointed for their meeting was the Campus Martius; because in the primitive times of the commonwealth, when they were under continual apprehensions of enemies, the people, to prevent any sudden assault, went armed, in martial order, to hold these assemblies; and were for that reason forbid by the laws to meet in the city, because an army was upon no account to be marshalled within the walls: Yet in latter ages, 'twas thought sufficient to place a body of soldiers as a guard in the Janiculum, where an imperial standard was erected, the taking down of which, denoted the conclusion of the Centuria.

Though the time of holding these Comitia for other matters was undetermined; yet the magistrates, after the year of the city 601, when they began to enter on their place on the kalends of January, were constantly design'd about the end of July, and the beginning of August.

All the time between their election and confirmation, they continued as private persons, that inquisition might be made into the election, and the other candidates might have time to enter objections, if they met with any suspicion of foul dealing. Yet at the election of the Censors, this custom did not hold; but as soon as they were pronounced elected, they were immediately invested with the honour§.

By the institution of these Comitia, Servius Tullius secretly conveyed the whole power from the commons: For the Centuries of the first and richest class being called out first, who were three more in number than all the rest put together, if they all agreed, as generally they did, the business was already decided, and the other Classes were needless and insignificant. However the three last scarce ever came to vote||.

The commons, in the time of the free state, to rectify this disadvantage, obtained, that before they proceeded to voting any matter at these Comitia, that Century should give their suffrages first, upon whom it fell by lot, with the name of Centuria Prærogativa; the rest being to follow according to the order of their Classes. After the constitution of the five and thirty Tribes, into which the Classes and their Centuries were divided, in the first place, the Tribes cast lots, which should be the Prærogative-Tribe; and then the Centuries of the Tribe, for the honour of being the Prærogative-Century. All the other Tribes and Centuries had the appellation of Jure vocata, because they

* See Dionys. l. 4.
† Dionys. l. 4.

† A. Gell. l. 7. c. 13.

† Vid. A. Gell. l. 16. c. 10.

§ Liv. l. 40.

were

peared that the number of freemen, who were capable of bearing arms, amounted to eighty-four thousand, seven hundred.

D. Hal. B.

4. p. 225.

Year of

These R O M E

SERVIVS

TULLIVS

SIXTH

King.

were called out according to their proper places.

The Prerogative-Century being chose by lot, the chief magistrate sitting in a * Tent in the middle of the Campus Martius, ordered that Century to come out and give their voices; upon which they presently separated from the rest of the multitude, and came into an inclosed apartment, which they termed Septa, or Ovilia, passing over the pontes, or narrow boards, laid there for the occasion; on which account, de ponte dejici is to be denied the privilege of voting, and persons thus dealt with, are called Depontani.

At the hither end of the Pontes, stood the Diribitores (a sort of under officers, called so from dividing or marshalling the people) and delivered to every man, in the election of magistrates, as many † Tablets as there appeared Candidates, one of whose names was written upon every Tablet.

A fit number of great chests were set ready in the Septa, and every body threw in which Tablet he pleas'd.

By the chests were placed some of the publick servants, who taking out the Tablets of every Century, for every Tablet made a prick, or a point in another Tablet, which they kept by them. Thus the business being decided by most points, gave occasion to the phrase of omne tulit punctum ‡, and the like.

The same method was observed in the judiciary processes at these Comitia, and in the confirmation of laws; except that in both these cases only two Tablets were offer'd to every person, on one of which was written U. R. and on the other A. in capital letters; the two first standing for Uti Rogas, or, Be it as you desire, relating to the magistrate who proposed the question; and the last for Antiquo, or I forbid it.

'Tis remarkable, that though in the election of magistrates, and in the ratification of laws, the votes of that Century whose Tablets were equally divided, signified nothing; yet in trials of life and death, if the Tablets pro and con were the same in number, the person was actually acquitted §.

THE division of the people into Tribes, was an invention of Romulus, after he had admitted the Sabines into Rome; and tho' he constituted at that time only three, yet as the state increased in power, and the city in number of inhabitants, they rose by degrees to five and thirty. For a long time after this institution, a Tribe signified no more than such a space of ground with its inhabitants. But at last the matter was quite altered, and a Tribe was no longer pars urbis but civitatis; not a quarter of the city, but a company of citizens living where they pleased. This change was chiefly occasioned by the original difference between the Tribes in point of honour. For Romulus having committed all sordid and mechanick arts to the care of strangers, slaves, and libertines, and reserved the more honest labour of agriculture to the free-men and citizens, who by this active course of life might be prepared for martial service; the Tribus Rusticae were for this reason esteemed more honourable than the Urbanæ: And now all persons being desirous of getting into the more creditable division, and there being several ways of accomplishing their wishes, as by adoption, by the power of the Censors and the like; that Rustick Tribe which had most worthy names in its roll, had the preference to all others, tho' of the same general denomination. Hence all of the same great family, bringing themselves by degrees into the same Tribe, gave the name of their family to the Tribe they honoured; whereas at first, the generality of the Tribes did not borrow their names from persons but from places ||.

The first assembly of the Tribes we meet with, is about the year of Rome 263, conven'd by Sp. Sicinius, Tribune of the commons, upon account of the trial of Coriolanus. Soon after the Tribunes of the commons were ordered to be elected here: and at last all the inferior magistrates and the collegiate priests. The same Comitia served for the enacting of laws relating to war or peace, and all others proposed by the Tribunes and Plebeian officers, tho' they had not properly the name of Leges, but Plebiscita. They were generally conven'd by the Tribunes of the commons; but the same privilege was allowed to all the chief magistrates.

* Tabernaculum. † Tab. Ille. ‡ Ille. de Arte Poet. §. Dionys. 1. 7. ¶ See Mr. Walker of Coins, p. 126.

They

Year of
R O M E

Servius

Tullius

Scipio

Romulus

D. Hal. p.

224. 225.

L. v. B. 1.

c. 43.

D. Hal. p.

225.

L. v. B. 1.

c. 43.

D. Hal. p.

225.

L. v. B. 1.

c. 43.

D. Hal. p.

225.

L. v. B. 1.

c. 43.

D. Hal. p.

225.

L. v. B. 1.

c. 43.

D. Hal. p.

225.

L. v. B. 1.

c. 43.

D. Hal. p.

225.

L. v. B. 1.

c. 43.

D. Hal. p.

225.

L. v. B. 1.

c. 43.

D. Hal. p.

225.

L. v. B. 1.

c. 43.

D. Hal. p.

225.

L. v. B. 1.

c. 43.

D. Hal. p.

225.

L. v. B. 1.

c. 43.

D. Hal. p.

225.

L. v. B. 1.

c. 43.

D. Hal. p.

225.

L. v. B. 1.

c. 43.

D. Hal. p.

225.

L. v. B. 1.

c. 43.

D. Hal. p.

225.

L. v. B. 1.

c. 43.

These regulations being made, the troops were no longer raised at so many men each Tribe, nor were taxes levied at so much a head as formerly; but every Century furnished so many men, and so much money; and the first and richest Class, being more numerous in Centuries than all the rest together, furnished of consequence more men and more money for the public service than the whole Roman state besides. However, that ample amends might be made this Class for the weight laid on it, Servius gave it in effect the whole authority in publick affairs, by assembling the People in Comitia by Centuries, instead of Comitia by Curie. For the votes in the former being reckoned by Centuries; and the rich Class containing more Centuries than all the other five, had consequently every thing at its disposal. The votes of this Class were the first taken, so that if the 98 Centuries happened to agree in opinion, or only 97 of them, the affair was determined, because these made the majority of the 193 Centuries which composed the 6 Classes. There was very rarely any occasion to go so low as the fourth Class for a majority of votes. After this time the assemblies of the Curie were only held for the election of the Flamines, and the chief Curio; and for some other matters of no great moment.

D. Hal. p.

225.

L. v. B. 1.

c. 43.

D. Hal. p.

225.

L. v. B. 1.

c. 43.

D. Hal. p.

225.

L. v. B. 1.

c. 43.

D. Hal. p.

225.

L. v. B. 1.

c. 43.

D. Hal. p.

225.

L. v. B. 1.

c. 43.

D. Hal. p.

225.

L. v. B. 1.

c. 43.

D. Hal. p.

225.

L. v. B. 1.

c. 43.

D. Hal. p.

225.

L. v. B. 1.

c. 43.

D. Hal. p.

225.

L. v. B. 1.

c. 43.

D. Hal. p.

225.

L. v. B. 1.

c. 43.

D. Hal. p.

225.

L. v. B. 1.

c. 43.

Servius having established this distinction among the citizens according to the * census, or valuation of their estates, commanded them to appear on a day appointed, under arms, and according to their Classes and Centuries in the Campus Martius, which was a large plain field, lying without the city near the Tiber. It had been consecrated by Romulus to the God Mars. Here, by the King's order, was made a solemn lustration or expiatory sacrifice in the name of all the people. The sacrifice consisted of a sow, a sheep and a bull, whence it took the name of Succetaurilia. The whole ceremony was called Lustrum, à lucendo, from paying, expiating, clearing, or perhaps from the Goddess Lus (so named from the verb luo) to whom Servius is said to have built a temple. She was invoked in all expiations, and when people made up their accounts and paid their debts. Because of the continual change of mens estates, it was ordered, that the Census should be renewed every 5 years, and it being usually closed by the Lustrum, it was hence that this word came to signify that term of years. 'Tis probable, that the first coined money ever known in Rome was struck at this time. The sacrifices of the Lustrum might perhaps lead Servius to stamp the figures of the animals there slain on pieces of brass of a certain weight.

They were confined to no place, and therefore sometimes we find them held in the Comitium, sometimes in the Campus Martius, and now and then in the capitol.

The proceedings were in most respects answerable to those already described in the account of the other Comitia, and therefore need not be insisted on; only we may farther observe of the Comitia in general, that when any candidate was found to have most Tablets for a magistracy, he was declared to be designated or elected by the president of the assembly: And this they term'd renunciari Consul, Prætor, or the like: And that the last sort of the Comitia only could be held without the consent and approbation of the Senate, which was necessary to the convening of the other two*. Kennet's Antiq. P. 2. B. 3. c. 16.

* Diwyf. l. 9.

It is undoubted, that money was called Pecunia, from the word Pecus, i. e. Year of Cattle. ROM E

§. V. THIS wise Prince contrived also to augment the number of SERVIVS the citizens, by an expedient which none of his predecessors had ever TULLIVS thought of. Remembering his former servile condition, he commiserat- Sixth ed the case of those whom an unsuccessful war had reduced to slavery, and King.
who were often persons well born. He judged, that such of these unfortunate People, who by long and faithful services to their masters had deserved and obtained their freedom, were much more worthy to be made citizens of Rome, than untractable vagabonds from foreign countries, who were usually admitted without distinction. He gave the Freed-men their choice therefore, either to return to their own countries, or continue at Rome. D. Hal B.
Such as chose to continue there he divided into the four City Tribes. 4. P. 226.
They were still distinguished from the other Plebeians, by their old name of Liberti, or freed-men, but enjoyed all the privileges of free citizens.
The Senate at first took offence at this regard shew'd to such mean people; upon which the King having assembled them, addressed himself to them in the following manner:

If nature has made any distinction between slaves and such as are born free, we ought indeed to observe the order she has established, and to divide those from the rest of mankind whom she has separated from them: but if the placing some in a state inferior to others, be owing to fortune only; does it not become your wisdom to rectify the capricious determinations of a blind Goddess? Has this Fortune, who now inspires you with so much contempt for men taken in war, promised you that your happiness shall be perpetual? Are you sure you and your children shall uninterruptedly enjoy this prosperity which renders you so haughty? Brave and illustrious nations have been often known to experience the vicissitudes of the fortune of war. Such as have play'd the tyrant over those they had conquered, have been themselves reduced to undergo tyranny and oppression from them in their turn. How many instances of these unexpected revolutions have we in Greece, and the barbarous nations? But to return to us Romans; how inconsistent are our proceedings, when we refuse the rights of citizens to those men, to whom we grant liberty? If your slaves were vicious, why did you set them free? And if they were men of probity, why are they not to be incorporated in our tribes? You have hitherto admitted to be citizens all such persons of the neighbouring nations as the love of your laws has drawn to your city. And have you enquired whether their birth was not blemished by the slavery of their fathers? Why then are you influenced, to the disadvantage of your slaves, by such reflections as have no weight with you against fugitives who are utter strangers? In short, if we must compleat the peopling of Rome, let us fill it with such as have for the most part breathed its air from their infancy, such as education has already made entirely Roman, and whose probity has shewn them worthy of recovering their liberty. The publick interest invites you to this, and it is the private interest of every noble family that it should be done. The more of your freed-men you see made citizens of Rome, the greater credit and influence will you have in our

Year of
N O M E
Comitia. Gratitude will not suffer them to refuse you their suffrages; and your authority will increase in proportion to the number of your new clients.

SERVITIUS
TULLIUS
C. XII.
K. 2.
D. H. S.
4. 1. 23.
230.
This discourse entirely appeased the Senators, and they passed his institution into a law which subsisted ever after.

§. VI. When Servius had thus established order among the people, and encouraged the slaves to virtue, he came at last, from a love of the publick good, to reform the Regal Power. His predecessors had reserved to themselves the cognizance of all causes both publick and private. It is true, the Senate and People decided in publick affairs by their votes, but it was the King's business to draw up in form and report the matters that were to be laid before them: So that in reality the whole weight of the government lay upon the King: and he finding the duties of his office too much for one man to discharge them as he ought, transferred to other judges, chosen out of the Senate, the care of hearing and deciding all private causes, excepting state crimes; but he prescribed to these judges certain rules and laws by which they were to proceed.

p. 230.
L. L. B. 1.
43.
All these regulations at home being finished, Servius Tullius then turned his thoughts abroad; and he laid a scheme for securing more effectually the friendship and fidelity of the Latines and Sabines, by such social ties as should be strengthened by religion. He summoned the several cities of Latium and Sabinia to send their deputies to Rome. When they were come, he proposed to them to build a temple to Diana, at which the Latines and Sabines should meet every year, and join with the Romans in offering sacrifices to the Goddess; that this festival should be followed by a council, at which all disputes, which had happened between the cities, should be amicably determined; that there proper measures should be taken to pursue their common interests; and lastly, that, in order to draw the common people thither, a fair should be kept, at which every one might furnish himself with what he wanted. To this proposal the deputies readily consented, leaving to the King to chuse a proper place where to erect the sanctuary. Servius chose the hill Aventinus; the temple was finished, and assemblies were annually held in it. The treaty of alliance with the Latines, the laws ordained to be observed in those assemblies, as likewise their decrees were engraved on a pillar; which in Augustus's time were still to be seen in the temple of Diana.

D. H. S.
4. 7. 43.
L. L. B. 43.
D. H. S.
43.
L. L. B. 43.
§. VII. TO compleat his work of making the Roman people entirely free, this republican King is said to have come to a resolution in the latter part of his life, to abdicate the throne and reduce the government to a democracy. But whatever scheme he might have of this kind, it was frustrated by the ambition and violence of Tarquinius, the elder of his sons-in-law, afterwards surnamed the Proud. Tarquinius's wife endeavoured by all the ways of sweetness and insinuation, to moderate and soften the haughty fierceness of her husband, and to divert him from all criminal enterprizes; while her younger sister, a very fury of a woman, was ever urging the quiet, the good-natured Arms to the most villainous attempts, in order to reach the throne. She loudly lamented her fate in being ty'd to such an indolent indolent and drowsy husband. Similitude of temper and manners formed by degrees a great intimacy between her and Tarquin. At length she proposed to him nothing less than the murdering her father, sister, and husband, that they two might meet and ascend the throne together; and their conversation on this head ended in their anticipating the pleasures of an incestuous marriage. Shortly after they contrived the poisoning, he of his wife, she of her husband; and then impudently asked the King's and Queen's consent to their marriage. Servius and Tarquinia, though they did not give it, were silent, through too much indulgence for a daughter, in whom now was their only hope of posterity. These criminal nuptials were followed by intrigues against the King. The Patricians, apprehensive of the King's designs in favour of the people, were many of them easily brought over to favour the pretensions of Tarquin; and, by the help of money, he gained also great numbers of the poorer citizens to his interest. Servius, being informed of what was doing, had frequent conferences in private with his son-in-law and daughter, to persuade them by reason to desist from such proceedings, and to wait for the kingdom, till his death: But Tarquin and Tullia loved violent measures, and to make a noise; they despised the counsels of the King, and resolved to lay their pretensions before the Senate. So that the affair came to a formal process; and Servius was obliged to summon the Senate to hear it. Tarquin reproached his father-in-law, that he had placed himself upon the throne, without suffering a previous Interregnum; that he had bought the votes of the people, and had despised the suffrages of the Senate. He then urged his own right of inheritance to the kingdom, and the injustice of Servius (who was only his tutor) in keeping possession of it, when he himself was of an age to govern. To this Servius answered, that he had not been intrusted with the Regal Authority under an obligation to preserve it for his pupils, but to secure their lives against the sons of Ancus; who, if there could be an hereditary right to the scepter, had a much better one than the grandsons of the late King, who must himself have been an usurper. Take your choice, said he, *either to lay aside all hopes of reigning till after I am dead, or to submit from this instant to obey the murderers of your grandfather. But I am surprized, that there should be any among you, Fathers, who would join with this man in endeavouring to dethrone me. What injustice have I done you? Is there any violence, any oppression, any one tyrannical act you can accuse me of? No. But perhaps I am too proud and arrogant. Which of your former Kings ever shewed that moderation in the exercise of power which I have done? Have I not treated the citizens as a tender father his children? Have I not relinquished some part of the Regal Authority to you, and remitted all private causes to your cognizance and judgment? You have nothing to accuse me of but my kindness to the people. This is my only crime, and with regard to this, I have often justified myself to you. But it is needless to mention these things at present. If this Tarquin seems to you better qualified to govern, I will not envy the state a better prince than I am. I received the kingdom from the people; to them I will restore it; and will endeavour*

Year of
ROME
Servius
Tullius
Sixth
King.

D. H. E.
4. P. 235.

p. 236, 237.
107.

deavour to shew, when reduced to the condition of a private man, that as I knew how to govern, I know how to obey.

D. Hal. p.

240.

Year of
R O M E

SERVIVS
TULLIVS

Sixth

King.

When Servius had thus spoken, he immediately dismissed the Senate, and appointed an assembly of the people, which was proclaimed by heralds all over the city. The Roman Forum was soon filled with auditors, and the King harangued them in such a manner as gained all their affections. He began with an account of his exploits in war: he gave them the particulars of the battles he had fought, the victories he had won, and the triumphs he had obtained. And then passed on to the wholesome institutions of which he had been the author. The people repeated their applauses upon the mention of every action of Servius, and were a great while in suspense, not knowing to what this long preamble tended: Till, after an exact numeration of all the benefits for which the publick was indebted to his government, he fell at last upon Tarquin. *A new competitor for the throne offers himself to you, and comes to dispute with me the remains of a reign which I have dedicated to the happiness of the publick. He pretends that his dying grandfather bequeathed the kingdom to him, and that you had no right to dispose of the property of another. Can you bear this without indignation? Will you suffer your rights to be called in question? As for me, if the hardships of a tyrannical administration have made you weary of me, or if the virtues of Tarquin have made him more worthy to reign, I consent that you resume the scepter which I received from you: but I do not think myself at liberty to resign it into any hands but yours; and to you therefore I reject it.* As he ended these words, he would have immediately left the tribunal, but the people stopped him; they all cried out to him not to yield the throne to another. And amidst their confused noises, these words were likewise heard, *Let Tarquin perish, let him die, let us kill him!* This language terrified the proud Prince, and he retired to his house in great haste: whilst the King was conducted back to his palace with the acclamations of the people.

§. VIII. AND now Tarquin finding the ill success of violent measures, acted a new part. By caresses and submissions he entirely regained the King's favour, and lulled him into an agreeable security. Tranquillity seemed for some time to be re-established in the royal family; but it was not long before the cruel Tullia put an end to it. To reflect that Tanaquil a foreigner had made two Kings of Rome successively, and that she herself, a King's daughter, was not able to make one, were such afflicting thoughts as would allow her no repose. She fancied her husband grown stupid and insensible, she upbraided him with cowardice, and incited him to act every crime which could serve ambition. *I thought to have found in thee a man of spirit, a true Tarquin, one who had rather have than hope for a kingdom. If thou art the man whom I thought I married, I must call thee King as well as husband. Renze thyself. Thou hast no need like thy grandfather to come from Corinth or Tarquinius to seek a kingdom. Thy household Gods, the Gods of thy country, the royal palace, the regal throne in that palace, the name of Tarquin, create and call thee King.* But if thou art unmoved

Liv. B. 1.

cc. 47.

by

by all this, why dost thou deceive the expectations of the People? Why dost thou suffer them to regard thee as a man of a princely soul? Go, coward, get thee hence to Tarquinii or Corinth; thou hast more in thee of thy brother, than of thy grandfather.

Year of
R O M E
SERVIUS
TULLIUS
Sixth
King.

Tarquin, incited by these reproaches of his wife, renewed his intrigues among the Senators. He went from house to house to beg votes, and made his own house a rendezvous of pleasure for the young Patricians. Having formed his party, he chose the time of harvest (when most of the principal citizens were in the country) to put in practice a stratagem which surprized the People by its novelty, and succeeded by the boldness of its execution. Cloathed in royal robes, preceded by some of his domesticks bearing Fasces, and followed by a great number of his party, who had swords under their robes; he crossed the Roman Forum, and came to the gate of the temple where the Senators were wont to assemble. From thence he sent expresses to them all, commanding them, in King Tarquin's name, to repair immediately thither. He then advanced with a grave pace, and seated himself on the royal throne. Those of the Senators who were of his faction he found already in their places, having given them private notice to be there early; and he now exhorted them resolutely to pursue the intention of their meeting. In the mean time, the rest of the Senators made all the haste they could to the place to which they were summoned. The greater part of them thought Servius dead, since Tarquin assumed the title and the functions of King; and no one durst keep away from the assembly, for fear his absence, in the beginning of a reign, should be made a crime. When the Senators were got together, Tarquin repeated the invectives they had so often heard him utter against his father-in-law: That being a slave and the son of a slave, he had, after the cruel murder of Tarquin the late King, possessed himself of the kingdom, not by the free voices of the People, or the approbation of the Senate, but by the mere artifice of a woman. That thus born, and thus created King, he had ever been a favourer of mean wretches like himself, and, out of hatred to the Patricians, for their noble birth, had stript them of their estates to give them to the vilest of the people; that the burdens which were before common to all he had heaped on the nobles alone, and had instituted the Census for no other reason, but that the fortunes of the rich might be more visible to the eye of envy, and that he might have them ready to bestow on beggars whenever he be pleased.

Livy, B. 1.
c. 47.

While he was yet speaking, Servius Tullius appeared. He had been informed of the part his son-in-law was acting in the Senate, and immediately hastened thither with but few attendants, and with more boldness than discretion. As soon as he beheld Tarquin on the throne, he cried out at a distance, and with a loud voice, What is it, thou most flagitious of men, that has made thee thus audacious to convene the Senate, and take possession of my throne, while I am alive?—It is thy impudence, Servius, replied Tarquin, it is thy iniquity. I fill the place of my grandfather, which thy villainess was not ashamed to usurp. Is a King's grandson or his slave the more

c. 48.

worthy

Year of ~~senility to inherit his kingdom? A slave that has been too long suffered, licen-~~
 R O M E ~~tiously to insult his masters?~~ These words threw the old King into a transf-CCXIX. port of passion, which made him rashly give way to the motions of his S E N A T U S courage, without considering his strength. He drew near the throne to T U L L I U S pull Tarquin down from it. This raised a great shout in the assembly, and the people crowded into the temple; but no body ventured to part the two rivals. Tarquin, who was now under a necessity of coming to extremities, being more strong and vigorous, seized the old man by the waist, and hurrying him through the temple, threw him down from the top of the steps into the Forum. The King, grievously hurt and covered with blood, raised himself up with some difficulty, but all his friends had deserted him; only two or three of the people, touched with compassion, lent him their arms to lead him to his palace. As they were slowly trailing him
 D. Hal. p. along, the cruel Tullia appeared in the Forum. She had come hastily in her 242. chariot, upon the report she had heard of what passed in the Senate. She found her husband on the top of the steps of the temple, and, being transported with joy, was the first who saluted him King; and her example was immediately followed by the Senators of Tarquin's party. She then took her husband aside, and suggested to him the thought of not leaving his work imperfect; upon which he instantly dispatched some of his domesticks, to overtake the old King, and deprive him of his small remains of life.

p. 242. Tullia having heard the orders given for the parricide, mounted her chariot again with an air of triumph to return home. The way to her house was through a narrow street called Vicus Cyprius^a, or the good street. Extended across it lay the King's body, which was still panting. The charioteer perceived it, and being struck with horror, checked his horses and made a stop. Why don't you go on? cried Tullia to him. What is it that stops you? The charioteer turned about to her, alas! said he, it is the body of the King your father. At these words Tullia catching up a stool which was in the chariot, and throwing it at his head, Go on, villain, she cried, are you afraid of driving over a dead corps? The charioteer obeyed; and the blood of the father is said to have dyed the chariot wheels, and even the cloaths of the inhuman daughter. And from hence the street was called ever after Vicus Sceleratus, the wicked street.

Such was the deplorable end of Servius, a Prince of so excellent a conduct, says Livy, that even a good successor, a reasonable King, would have found it difficult to emulate him. He subdued all the enemies of Rome, and never made it his business to create her new ones. He did not conquer merely for the sake of glory; he rated the value of his conquests only by their tendency to the publick good. One triumph did not beget the ambition of obtaining another. He made Rome more formidable, by twenty years of peace, than his predecessors had done by many victories, and the sacking of a hundred cities. He introduced order in the Militia, and publick revenues; he rectified the confusion of the assemblies of the Peo-

^a The word Cyprius, according to Varro, who had inhabited this quarter, good or signified in the old language of the Sabines, happy.

ple; he extended the jurisdiction of the Senate, and yet kept its authority within due bounds. He distinguished the rich, only to make them bear the heaviest burdens; and he eased the poor, that he might keep them contented, and without murmuring, in their inferiority. In a word, he was beloved by the People, esteemed by the Patricians, and perhaps would have had no enemies if he could have preserved the affections of his own family. He died at seventy-four years of age, after he had reigned forty-four. Tarquin refusing to suffer the usual obsequies to be performed for him, lest it might occasion a dangerous commotion among the people, Tarquinius conveyed the body of her husband privately by night to his tomb; and the night following she died herself; but whether of grief, or by her own hands, or by the wickedness of Tullia, is uncertain. The veneration the people had for the memory of Servius seems to have placed him among the Gods. The slaves annually celebrated his festival in the temple of Diana Aventina, on the day he lost his life.

Year of
R O M E
CCXIX.

SERVIVS
TULLIVS
Sixth
King.

D. Hal. P.
243.

C H A P. VIII.

T A R Q U I N I U S S U P E R B U S.

§. I. The tyranny of Tarquin, who gets the surname of the Proud. His haughty treatment of the Latine deputies and treacherous contrivance to destroy Turnus Herdonius. §. II. The Latine association, and the institution of the FERIAE LATINÆ. Tarquin assisted by the Latines defeats the Volsci and subdues the Sabines. He finishes the COMMON SEWERS and CIRCUS MAXIMUS at Rome. §. III. His war with the people of Gabii, and the cruel stratagem whereby he becomes master of that city. §. IV. The adventure of the woman with the SYBIL'S BOOKS. The rise of the written civil law. Tarquin builds the temple of JUPITER CAPITOLINUS. §. V. He sends two of his sons with Brutus to consult the oracle at Delphos. §. VI. The rape of LUCRETIA. The Tarquins are banished, and a COMMONWEALTH established at Rome.

OF the seven Kings, who successively governed Rome, only the four first seem to have ascended the throne by the people's free choice, according to the original constitution of the State. The elder Tarquin (distinguished after this time by the surname of Priscus) had indeed the voices both of the Curie and of the Senate for his elevation; but, as he bought these voices, he in reality bought the kingdom: His successor Servius Tullius (though his merit entitled him to it) may be said to have artfully stole it: and as for the present Tarquin, the last of the Roman Kings, he seized upon it as his property, his undoubted right by inheritance. He who had so often reproached his predecessor with usurpation, for his want of a legal election to the government, disdained any other title

Year of
R O M E
CCXX.

TARQUIN
II.
Seventh
King.

Year of
R O M E
CCXX

T A R Q U I N

II.

Se nth

King.

L. H. B.

4. P. 244.

& 100.

Livy, B. 1.

c. 49.

D. H. B.

264.

P. 245.

245.

P. 247.

Livy, B. 1.

c. 50.

title to it himself, but that of hereditary right, or possession acquired by regicide.

The whole series of this Prince's reign was suitable to the manner of his accession to the throne. Scarcely had he seated himself there, when for his capricious humour and arrogant behaviour he got the surname of the Proud. He communicated no affairs of state either to Senate or People. Having made sure of a sufficient number of soldiers, partly strangers, to guard his person and to execute his pleasure; all his proceedings were by acts of power; and how grievous soever was the oppression, the oppressed were denied the privilege of complaining. Informers were dispersed throughout the city; the King was the sole judge of the accused; wealth and merit became unpardonable crimes. Of this latter the Tyrant gave a remarkable proof in the murder of M. Junius, a venerable old man, the father of the famous L. Junius Brutus, who afterwards destroyed the Regal Power. This M. Junius was descended of a noble family, and had an ample patrimony, upon which considerations the first Tarquin had given him his youngest daughter in marriage. The new King, to get possession of his estate, caused both him and his other son to be assassinated, and Brutus escaped only by counterfeiting stupidity. In short, Tarquin carried his tyranny to such excess, that the flower of the Senate went into a voluntary banishment, to avoid the effects of his cruelty and avarice. The People, who had rejoiced at first to see the Senate humbled, were now in their turn as ill-treated as the Patricians, and all the laws made in their favour were annulled. The poor were constrained to pay the same taxes as the rich. No Census, no Lustrum, no division of the citizens into Classes and Centuries. All assemblies of the people, even for diversion and recreation, were prohibited, both in town and country.

But now Tarquin, being sensible that all the orders of men in a state could not be long under oppression, without uniting against the oppressor, turned his thoughts to gain foreigners to his interest. And to this end he married his daughter to Ostavius Mamilius, a man of bravery and experience in war, and of the most considerable interest of any among the Latines. Mamilius procured his father-in-law many friends of the chief persons of Latium; but Tarquin had like to have lost them again by his haughty behaviour. He had desired the Latines to convene a national Council at Ferentinum, where he would meet them on a day appointed by himself. The deputies came and took their places in the sacred grove of the temple of Flora. There they waited many hours, but Tarquin did not appear. The assembly grew impatient, and Turnus Herdonius, an enterprising eloquent man, who hated Tarquin, and was jealous of Mamilius, laid hold of this occasion to inveigh against the King. I am not all surprized, said he, that Rome has given Tarquin the surname of the Proud. What can be a greater instance of pride than thus to trifle with the whole Latine nation; to summon hither the Latine Chiefs to meet him, and not to appear himself? Doubtless he means to put our patience to the test, and to judge by our manner of bearing his insults, how far he may oppress us when he has brought us under his yoke. If my ad- vice may have any weight with you, let us return home and take no more notice of the assembly-day than he who appointed it. But Mamilius rose up and excused his father-in-law, by imputing his absence to some unforeseen and urgent affairs which hindered his coming, and he prevailed to have the council adjourned to the next day^a. Then Tarquin appeared, and being put in mind by those who were near him to make some excuse to the Latines for having disappointed them the day before, I was engaged, said he very coldly, in making up a difference between a father and his son.—Of all differences, (briskly answered Herdonius) there is none requires so little time and so few words to compose it. There needs only to tell the son, that if he do not obey his father some dreadful mischief will befall him. This beginning did not please Tarquin, but he concealed his resentment for the present, and proceeded to tell the assembly, that his design in calling them together was to claim his right of commanding the Latine armies, a right which he derived by inheritance from his grandfather; but which he desired might be confirmed to him by them. These words were scarce ended, when Herdonius stepping forth into the midst of the assembly, with great warmth renewed his invectives against the King and opposed his demand. What! said he, does Tarquin the Proud pretend to an hereditary right to govern us? Needs there any stronger proof, than such a claim, of the injustice and wickedness of him who makes it? Was it then a condition in the treaties we made with his grandfather, that we should be subject to his posterity? Was this the meaning of the voluntary and temporary concession we made to him? Tarquin employs the same pretence of hereditary right against us, which he has improved to the ruin of Rome. Latines! if you hearken to him, your slavery is as certain as that of the Romans. And will it be less severe? His own subjects have been some of them murdered by him, others banished their country, others stripped of their estates; the very best among the Romans have been thus treated, and all in general are deprived of liberty. Will strangers find Tarquin a less cruel and less covetous master? Judge of the fate you are to expect by that of Rome.

Tarquin was disconcerted by the boldness of this orator, and desired that the assembly might sit again the following day, when he promised to give an answer to the invectives of Herdonius. In the mean time he corrupted some of Herdonius's domesticks, and engaged them to hide a great quantity of arms in their master's baggage. The next morning entering the assembly with an air of confidence, he told them that one word was sufficient to destroy all the calumnies of Herdonius. In reality (he added) my accuser has himself acquitted me. Were I such a person as he represents me, would he have sought an alliance with me? He earnestly solicited me to give him my daughter in marriage; but for good reasons I refused to accept him for a son-in-law, and here is the source of his malice. But this is no time to enter further into my justification. Your own interests, your own safety, your liberties and lives demand at present all your attention. He then accu-
Livy, B. 1. c. 50.
D. Hal. p. 248.
p. 249.
Livy, B. 1. c. 50.

^a Livy says, B. 1. c. 50. That the assembly was formed early in the morning, and that Tarquin arrived the evening of the same day.

Year of
R O M E

TARQUIN
II.
Seventh
King.

his adversary of having laid a plot to cut off all the Deputies there present, and to usurp a tyranny over the Latine cities; and, as a proof of this, he informed them of the arms in Herdonius's baggage. An accusation of such importance threw all the assembly into a fright, except the accused, who knowing nothing of those arms, and believing that his innocence would quickly appear, desired his baggage might be searched; declaring at the same time, his consent to be judged guilty, if the fact, alledged in evidence of the crime, proved true: accordingly an examination was made; and the arms being found and brought into the assembly, it put the Deputies into such a rage, that, without suffering Herdonius to make his defence, they immediately sentenced him to be thrown into a basin at the head of the spring of Ferentinum; where a hurdle being laid upon him, and stones heaped upon the hurdle, he was pressed down into the water and drowned.

§. II. BUT the death of an enemy was not the only advantage Tarquin drew from this monstrous treachery: The Latines looked upon him as their deliverer, renewed the treaty made with his grandfather, and declared the King of Rome General of the Latine armies. And, soon after this, the Hernici, and two Cantons of the Volsci, entered into a league with him upon the same terms. In order to keep these confederates firm to their engagements, Tarquin, with their approbation, erected a new temple in the midst of them to Jupiter Latialis. It stood on a hill near the ruins of Alba. There the Diets of the united Cantons were annually to assemble; and it was agreed that the several nations in league should upon no pretence do any act of hostility against each other during that time; but should there jointly offer sacrifices to Jupiter and feast together in token of union. These assemblies were called Latia; and the day appointed for their annual meeting, which was the 27th of April, was called Ferie Latine. The Romans, as the chief members of the alliance, always presided at the sacrifices and deliberations. The Diet consisted of forty-seven Deputies; from so many cities, forming that Latine association, which, in after-times, was the best part of the Roman strength, and contributed more than all the rest of Italy to the conquest of the world.

CCXXIV. Tarquin, thus strengthened and supported, resolved to make war upon those of the Volsci who had refused to enter into alliance with him. But he did not raise his army upon the foot of Servius's division of the Roman soldiery by Centuries, nor were the allies any longer a separate corps. Not having sufficient confidence in the fidelity of his Romans, he chose only a small number of them, such as he could most depend on, and blended them with the Latines in the same Legions. The inhabitants of Suessa Pometia, one of the most flourishing cities of the Volsci, having committed some depredations on the Latines, Tarquin laid hold of this pretence to begin the war. He defeated their army, took their city by storm, and gave the plunder of it as free booty to the soldiers, reserving only the tenth part of the spoil towards the expence of finishing the temple of Jupiter Capitolinus.

He

He then turned his arms against the Sabines, who had divided all their forces into two bodies, and posted them, one near Eretum, the other near Tidenæ. By his masterly conduct, he entirely defeated both armies, and made the whole Sabine nation tributary. And it is probable, that the King at this time decreed himself two triumphs, one for his victory over the Volsci, the other for having subdued the Sabines.

Year of
R O M E.
TARQUIN
II.
Seventh
King.
Fast. Cap.
CCXXX.

Upon his return to Rome, he set the people at work to finish the common sewers, and the great Circus. He thought an idle populace, who did not love their Prince, dangerous. The artificers were likewise taken out of their shops, and obliged to painful drudgeries, with short allowance: but by these vexatious methods he brought to perfection those two structures which his grandfather had begun.

§. III. IN the mean while, a great number of discontented Patricians, who fled from their own city, took refuge at Gabii, a city of Latium, about 100 furlongs from Rome in the way to Prænestæ; and the inhabitants being touched with compassion to see so many considerable persons under persecution, resolved to make themselves parties in the quarrel, and begin a war with the King of Rome. Tarquin was informed of their preparations to take the field, and, suspecting against whom they were designed, raised a prodigious bulwark (much boasted of in after-ages) to cover the city on the side of Gabii. This war between the Romans and the Gabini lasted seven years, with various success; and the inroads and devastations made on both sides, being a hindrance to all sowing and reaping, produced at length a scarcity of corn. It was chiefly felt at Rome, where complaints were made by the people, that they suffered, not by any hatred of their neighbours to them, but to the King; and they demanded either a peace or provisions; and these discontents were fomented by emissaries from the exiles at Gabii. Tarquin being much perplexed by the people's clamours, which tended to a general sedition, his son Sextus Tarquinius proposed, and, in concert with him, put in practice an expedient equally artful and dishonourable for reducing Gabii. He pretended to be upon very ill terms with his father, and openly inveighed against him as a tyrant, who had no compassion even for his own children; upon which the King caused him to be beaten publicly in the Forum as a rebel. This discontent of the son, and barbarity of the father, were reported at Gabii by trusty persons sent thither on purpose, who by artful management made the Gabini very desirous to have Sextus among them. Accordingly a secret negotiation was set on foot for that end, and Sextus was at length prevailed with to accept the invitation of the Gabini, they giving him their solemn promise never to deliver him up to his father, on any pretence whatsoever.

CCXXXV
to CCXLI.
D. Hal. p.
253.
P. 254.
Liv. B. 1.
c. 53.

When he was come to Gabii, his whole talk, both in publick and private, turned upon the tyranny of the King of Rome; and he suited his actions to his discourse. No enemy of Rome was more active and enterprising. He frequently made inroads on the Roman lands, and came back loaded with spoil; his father contriving to gain him honour, by always sending against him weak parties which must infallibly be worsted. By

D. H. ibid.
Liv. c. 54.

Year of
R O M E

TARQUIN

II.
Seventh
King.

D. Hal. p.
255.

p. 256.

p. 257.

D. Hal. p.
260.

this means, Sextus came at length to such a high degree of credit among the Gabini, that he was chosen General of their army, and was as much master in Gabii, as Tarquin was in Rome. And now finding his authority sufficiently established, he dispatched a slave to his father, to enquire what he should do. The King, unwilling to send an answer, either in writing, or by word of mouth, took the slave into a garden, and there (in imitation of Tharjivius the Milesian) struck off the heads of all the tallest poppies. This done, he sent back the messenger. Sextus understood the hint, assembled the Gabini, and pretended to have discovered a plot to deliver him up to his father. The people in a rage pressed him to declare the conspirators, and with much difficulty he suffered them, as it were, to extort from him the name of Antistius Petro, a man whose merit had made him the most considerable person in his country. Antistius despised the accusation; but Sextus had bribed his servants (in the same manner as Tarquin had formerly done those of Herdonius) to convey among his papers some letters from the King of Rome; which being produced and read, the populace, without further examination, immediately stoned him; and to Sextus was committed the care of discovering his accomplices, and appointing their punishment. Upon this he ordered the city gates to be shut, and sent officers into every quarter of it, to cut off the heads of all the eminent men, and flower of the Nobility, without mercy. And in the midst of the desolation and confusion, caused by this dreadful massacre, he opened the gates to his father, to whom he had given timely notice of his design; and Tarquin entered the city with all the pride of a conqueror.

The Gabini no sooner saw themselves thus totally at the mercy of the Tyrant, but they fell into the lowest depths of despair, and there was no evil which they did not expect to suffer. However, their misfortunes were not so great as their fears. Tarquin upon this occasion consulted good policy more than his revenge. Not one of the citizens was put to death by his orders. He granted them life, liberty, and estates, and even entered into a treaty with the city; the articles of which, when it was ratified, were written on a shield made of the hide of an ox sacrificed on that occasion. This treaty was yet to be seen at Rome in Augustus's time, in the temple of Jupiter Fidius.

It was one part of Tarquin's refined politicks to keep his sons at a distance from him. He left Sextus therefore in Gabii, and made him King of the place. His two other sons, Titus and Aruns, he sent away under pretence of making them the founders of two colonies*. The first was

* It is proper to declare, in the beginning of this history, on what occasions the Romans sent out colonies, and what privileges those colonies enjoyed. The Romans never sent out their citizens to found colonies, but either to enlarge their limits, or to curb some nations who were yet unsubdued, or to ease their city of too great a number of inhabitants, or to get rid of a multitude who were inclined to sedition, or to reward the old soldiers of the Roman legions. Before these colonies set out from Rome, a certain quantity of land was assigned them, in the place where they were to settle, which was to be their own property.

was to build a city at Signia, and the other at Circæum, a promontory on the shore of the Tyrrhene sea, and both these to keep the Volsi in awe.

§. IV. TARQUIN now enjoyed a profound peace at Rome; the Romans were become accustomed to the yoke of an imperious master; and the weight of oppression made them silent. It was at this time that an unknown woman appeared at court, loaded with nine volumes, which she offered to sell, but at a very considerable price. Tarquin refusing to give it, she withdrew and burnt three of the nine. Some time after she returned to court, and demanded the same price for the remaining six. This made her look'd upon as a mad woman, and she was driven away with scorn. Nevertheless having burnt the half of what were left, she came a third time, and demanded, for the remaining three, the same price which she had asked for the whole nine. The novelty of such a proceeding made Tarquin curious to have the books examined. They were put therefore into the hands of the Augurs, who finding them to be the oracles of the Sybil of Cumæ, declared them to be an invaluable treasure. Upon this the woman was paid the sum she demanded, and she soon after disappeared, having first exhorted the Romans to preserve her books with care. They soon began to be religiously respected at Rome. Tarquin appointed two persons of distinction^a, to be guardians of them. These were styled Duumviri. When the temple of Jupiter Capitolinus was built, the books were locked up there in a vault, and were afterwards burnt with the temple itself.

It was also in this Tarquin's time, that the written civil law had its rise among the Romans. One Papirius, a Senator, collected all the laws made by the Kings into one^b body, which was called the Papirian law.

Rome

perty. And the number of families sent from Rome was proportioned to the quantity of ground which was to be given them. The persons so transplanted were generally such as had neither land nor houses, either in city or country. They marched to the place of their new habitation in order of battle. There they either built them a city themselves, or took possession of one already built, which was left empty for them. Here they lived agreeably to the Roman laws, but immediately lost the right of suffrage they had had in the Comitia. Nor could they stand for any office in the Commonwealth, unless they were again made citizens of Rome. C. & R.

^a These officers were afterwards increased to 10 (Decemviri), and then to 15 (Quindcemviri.) It was their business to consult the Sybilline books, whenever the Senate thought it proper: But recourse was had to them, in times only of publick distress; as when a dangerous sedition threatened the state, when the Roman armies had been defeated, or when any of those prodigies appeared, which were thought fatal to Rome; as for instance, an eruption of the fire of Vesuvius or Ætna, or some monstrous birth of man or beast. Then the Duumviri had the care of putting in execution whatever they thought commanded by the books of the Sybil. They presided over the sacrifices, and publick sports, which they appointed, to appease the wrath of Heaven. And lastly, they ordered every thing that related to the Ludi Seculares. Their office was for life, and they were exempted from taxes, as well as from civil and military employments. This sort of magistracy continued at Rome till the time of Theodosius, when it was abolished with the rest of the Roman superstitions. C. & R.

^b Some pretend, that Papirius's work did not continue long in use, since the laws of the Kings did not survive Tarquin the Proud, but were abolished with the regal Power. But this

D. Hal. B. 4. p. 258, 259. C. & R. Rome continuing in peace, Tarquin laid hold of the opportunity to carry on the magnificent work his grandfather had begun, the temple of the Capital. The money necessary for it had been laid by ever since the taking of Saga Pometia. He hired architects and skilful workmen from Hetruria; and as to the laborious part, he made his subjects the drudges, as he had often done before; but as this was a religious undertaking, they assisted in carrying it one with more chearfulness than usual.

§. V. WHILE Tarquin and the Romans were thus employed, a dreadful plague raged in Rome; and this with some other extraordinary events made such an impression upon his mind, that he resolved to send his sons Titus and Aruns to consult the oracle of Delphi upon the cause and cure of the contagion. The Princes prepared magnificent presents for Apollo; and Junius Brutus (the counterfeit idiot) being to attend them for their amusement in the journey, resolved to carry his offering too. The present he chose for the God was an elder-stick, and this was matter of diversion to the whole court. However, as he knew that the Gods of those times, or their ministers, were much affected with valuable offerings, he had the precaution to inclose a rod of gold in his stick, without any body's knowledge. And thus it was a true emblem of his own mind and conduct, this opinion ought to be confined within just bounds. It is true, the laws that favoured the monarchick state were abolished after the revolution, which changed the government of Rome into a Republick. But the laws which related to good polity in general, such as those of Servius Tullius concerning commerce, contracts, the Census, and the Lex, always continued in force. It may likewise be affirmed, that the laws of Romulus, Numa, and other Kings were still respected, and ever continued to be, as it were, the ground-work of the Roman law. C. & R.

* The temple of Jupiter Capitolinus was situated on the top of the hill Tarpeius, which had been long since made a part of Rome. The original of the new name of Capitol, given to this hill, is by historians said to be this. As the workmen were digging the foundations, or levelling the Area of the temple of Jupiter, they are said to have found, very deep in the earth, the head of a man, whose features were preserved entire, and the blood of it was red as if but newly shed. This the Romans looked on as a prodigy, and the Hetrurian diviners being consulted upon it, declared it to presage, that Rome would some time or other become the mistress and head of Italy. The prodigy and the answer of the Augurs therefore encouraged Tarquin to spare neither pains nor cost, in the raising a structure to the honour of those Gods, who were the authors of so glorious a destiny. Accordingly the foundations of it, were marked out, and the temple was built of almost a square form; for it was but fifteen feet longer than it was broad. It is reckoned to have been two hundred feet broad, and about two hundred and fifteen feet long. The front of this great building was to the south, that is, it faced the hill Palatinus and the Forum Romanum. An hundred steps led up to it from the Forum, which were divided at certain distances, by large half-paces, or landing-places, to give those who went up time to breathe, before they came to the top of the hill, and the foot of the Portico. This front consisted of three rows of pillars; and the two sides of the temple were adorned with a Peristyle, consisting of a double row of pillars. It was, in after ages, burnt down more than once; and the Romans always rebuilt it, still preserving the same proportions: till at last, the embellishments that were added to it, made it one of the richest sanctuaries in the world. The whole arch of this prodigious building was gilt, both within and without. It contained three chapels, one dedicated to Jupiter, another to Juno, and the third to Minerva, or was rather three temples under the same roof. D. Hal. B. 4. p. 258, 259. C. & R.

who

who under a contemptible outside concealed the richest gifts of nature. It is probable that the Oracle told them, among other things, that there would quickly be a new reign at Rome; because it is said, that when they had performed their father's commission they enquired, which of them should succeed Tarquin; and that the God declared, that the government of Rome was destined to HIM who should first give a kiss to his mother. Upon this we are told, that the two brothers either drew lots, which of them at their return to Rome should first kiss his mother Tullia, or agreed to do it both together, that they might reign jointly; but that Brutus, imagining the Oracle had another meaning, pretended to fall down by chance and kissed the earth, the common mother of all living. Whether these things be entirely fabulous or not, the revolution, which abolished the Regal Power, happened soon after their return to Rome. They found the city in a commotion, on account of the war in which the King was engaged with the Rutuli. In hopes of recruiting his exhausted treasury, he had marched his army to Ardea, their capital, about 20 miles from Rome, thinking to take it without opposition: but he found himself obliged to besiege it in form. This put him under a necessity of laying a heavy tax upon the people; and this tax greatly increased the number of the malecontents, and disposed them to a revolt.

Year of
R O M E
TARQUIN
II.
Seventh
King.
Livy, ibid.
D. Hal. p.
265.
CCXLIII.

§. VI. THE siege being carried on very slowly, the general officers had a good deal of leisure for diversions, and they mutually made entertainments for one another in their quarters. One day, when Sextus Tarquinius was entertaining his brothers, their kinsman Collatinus being of the company, the conversation happened to turn upon the merit of wives. Every one extoll'd the good qualities of his own; but Collatinus affirm'd, that his Lucretia excelled all others. It was a kind of quarrel, and in order to end it, they took the method which mirth and wine inspired; which was to mount their horses, go and surprize their wives: and it was agreed, that she whom they found employed in the manner most becoming her sex, should have the preference. Away therefore they galloped first to Rome, where they surprized the King's daughters-in-law all together in the midst of feasting and diversions; and the Ladies seemed much disconcerted by the unexpected return of their husbands. From Rome they hastened away to Collatia, the place where Collatinus resided in time of peace. (He was the grandson of Egerius that nephew of Tarquinius Priscus beforementioned, to whom that King gave the city and territory of Collatia in property.) Tho' the night was far advanced when the Princes arrived there, they found Lucretia up, with her maids about her, spinning and working in wool. The company her husband brought her of a sudden did not discompose her; and they were all pleased with the reception she gave them. Sextus was so captivated with her beauty, and so inflamed with passion, which her insuperable modesty made the more violent, that he became exceedingly unwilling to leave the place; but there was an

Livy, B. 1.
c. 57.

* See Page 78.

Year of
R O M E
CCCLIII.

TARQUIN
II.
Seventh
K. of
Lat. B. 1.
c. 43.

D. H. B.
4. p. 262,
273.

Livy, ibid.

D. Hal. p.
275.

absolute necessity for his appearing at the camp before Ardea. However he found a pretence to return very soon to Collatia; and went to lodge at his kinsman's house. Lucretia, in her husband's absence, entertained him with great civility and respect, and after supper he was conducted to his apartment. When all were asleep he stole into Lucretia's chamber, and coming with his drawn sword to her bed side, laid his left hand upon her breast and awakened her: Lucretia, said he, I am Sextus Tarquinius, if you speak a word you die. Then he declared his passion, and by intreaties, mixed with menaces, endeavoured to make her yield to his desires. And when he found that all was in vain, and that even the fear of death could not prevail upon her to consent, he threatened her also with intamy. He told her that he would kill one of her slaves, lay him naked by her when she was dead, and then declare to all the world that he had only revenged the injured honour of Collatinus. The dread of ignominy was too powerful for Lucretia's constancy; Sextus obtained his wishes, and early the next morning appeared again in the camp. Lucretia, though she had escaped what she dreaded as the greatest of evils, yet could not endure the thoughts of life after the violence she had suffered. She dressed herself in mourning, took a ponyard under her robe, wrote to her husband at the camp to meet her at her father Lucretius's house, and then mounting her chariot came to Rome *. People were surprized to see her wearing all the marks of the deepest sorrow, and often asked her as she passed along what was the cause of her grief. She answered them only by weeping; and, when the same question was put to her at her father's house, she still refused to discover the matter, till there should be a full assembly of her friends and relations, whom she desired might be called together. Upon the first summons great numbers of the Nobility crowded to the house, and among the rest P. Valerius (afterwards Poplicola) and Lucius Junius, who seems to have waited for this moment to throw off that mask of stupidity, which had got him the surname of Brutus. When the assembly was pretty numerous, she addressed herself to her husband Collatinus, disclosed in few words the whole secret, her own shame and his dishonour, and the treacherous author of both: She protested the unspotted innocence of her heart, but at the same time declared her firm resolution not to live, and conjured them not to let the crime of Sextus Tarquinius go unpunished: All who were present gave her, one by one, their solemn promise to revenge the insult she had suffered; they also endeavoured to comfort her, by telling her, that the body could not sin, and that there could be no guilt, where the mind was unconsenting; but nothing could divert her from the desperate resolution she had taken: No, said she, no woman shall hereafter survive her honour, and say, Lucretia was her example; and then having embraced her father and her husband, as one that bids a last farewell, she immediately plunged the concealed dagger into her breast. Her father and husband, starting, cried out as she fell at their feet; a mixture of compassion and fury seized the whole assembly; and the blood which Lucretia shed to attest her innocence, or repair her glory, served likewise to cement the union of those illustrious patriots who gave liberty to Rome. For Brutus going near to the dying Lady, drew the ponyard out of her bosom, and, shewing it all bloody to the assembly, Yes, said he, I swear by this blood, which was once so pure, and which nothing but royal villainy could have polluted, that I will pursue Lucius Tarquinius the Proud, his wicked wife, and their children, with fire and sword, nor will ever suffer any of that family or of any other whatsoever to be King in Rome; Ye Gods, I call you to witness this my oath! — This said, he presented the dagger to Collatinus, Lucretius, Valerius, and the rest of the company, and engaged them to take the same oath. These noble Romans, struck with amazement at the prodigious appearance of wisdom in an idiot, look'd on him as inspired, and submitted entirely to his conduct. He then let them know, that his folly had been only feigned, he exhorted them to defer lamenting the death of Lucretia to another time, to behave themselves now like men and Romans, and think only of revenging it; and he advised them to begin by shutting the gates of Rome, and placing a trusty guard to secure them, that no body might go out of the city to give notice at the camp of what was doing. This counsel was approved, and, as Lucretius had been left Governor of the city by Tarquin, was put in execution without difficulty.

* According to Livy, she sent to desire her own house, and it was at Collatia that her father and husband to come to her at she killed herself.

Then Brutus, causing the yet bleeding Lucretia to be carried to the place where the Comitia were usually held, and placing the corps where it might be seen by every body, ordered the people to be called together. By a surprizing instance of good-fortune, he happened to be legally invested with the power of assembling the Comitia; this right was annexed to the office of Tribune, or chief commander of the King's horse-guards, which Tarquin had given him, because he thought him incapable of using it to his disadvantage. When the multitude were assembled, the imagined idiot, to their great surprize, addressing himself to them, began with an apology for his presuming to speak in publick on so important an occasion; he in few words explained to them all the mystery of his past conduct, and the necessity he had been under, for more than twenty years together, of counterfeiting folly, as the only means to preserve his life after the murder of his father and elder brother. He then proceeded to tell them the resolution the Patricians were come to of deposing the Tyrant, and press'd them in the strongest terms to concur in that design. He enumerated the crimes by which Tarquin, in concert with the wicked Tullia, had made his way to the throne. He put them in mind of Aruns Tarquinius (the Tyrant's brother) and the elder Tullia, both persons of amiable dispositions, and both treacherously poisoned, he by his wife the present Queen, she by her husband the present King; the criminal nuptials that followed the secret murders, and the horrid tragedy that followed those nuptials;

Year of
R O M E
CCXLIII.

TARQUIN

II.

Seventh

King.

Lib. B. 1.

C. 55.

D. 11. B.

4. p. 110.

4. 119.

nuptials; Servius Tullius, the justest, the mildest, the most beneficent of Kings, openly assassinated, and the cruel Tullia riding in triumph over the body of her expiring father: O execrable fact! ye Gods, the avengers of injured parents, I Lament it. But why should I dwell on these crimes committed by the tyrant against his own family and blood? The wrongs he has done his COUNTRY, his cruelties to every one of you in particular are insufferable and without end. With what an utter contempt of all our laws did he usurp an elective Kingdom? And how has he maintained himself in his illegal power? By murders, by banishments, by the oppression of all his subjects. As for the Patricians — you see the condition to which we are reduced; — I shall say nothing of it — our greatest enemies could not behold it without compassion. And as for you Plebeians, what is become of your rights and privileges? Are you ever called together to assist at the sacrifices? to elect your magistrates? or to give your suffrages in publick affairs? Have you not been treated as the vilest of slaves? The victorious Romans, victorious over all the nations around them, are condemned at home to undergo the most painful drudgeries, to be hewers of stone, to sweat under heavy burthens, to work in mines, and breathe the unwholesome air of sinks and common sewers. And are these miseries, these indignities never to have an end? Or, if you ever propose to assert your freedom, how long will you delay it? You wait, perhaps, for Tarquin's death. But what benefit would accrue to you from that? He has three sons, more wicked, if possible, than himself. By what the eldest of them has just now done, you may judge what is to be expected from such a race. There! Romans, turn your eyes to that sad spectacle—the daughter of Lucretius—Collatinus's wife—she died by her own hand. See there a noble Lady, whom the lust of a Tarquin reduced to the necessity of being her own executioner, to attest her innocence. Sextus, hospitably entertained by her, as a kinsman of her husband's,—Sextus, perfidious guest, became her brutal ravisher. The chaste, the generous Lucretia could not survive the insult. Glorious woman! Once only treated as a slave, she thought life no longer to be endured. Lucretia, a woman, disdained a life that depended on a tyrant's will; and shall we, shall men with such an example before our eyes, and after five and twenty years of ignominious servitude, shall we, through a fear of dying, defer one single instant to assert our liberty? No, Romans, now is the time; the favourable moment, we have so long waited for, is come. Tarquin is absent from Rome: The Patricians are at the head of the enterprize: The city is abundantly provided with men, arms, and all things necessary. There is nothing wanting to secure the success, if our own courage does not fail us. And shall those warriors who have ever been so brave when foreign enemies were to be subdued, or when conquests were to be made to gratify the ambition and avarice of a Tyrant, be then only cowards, when they are to deliver themselves from SLAVERY? Some of you are perhaps intimidated by the army which Tarquin now commands. The soldiers, you imagine, will take the part of their General. Banish so groundless a fear. The love of liberty is natural to all men. Your fellow citizens in the camp feel the weight of oppression with as quick a sense as you that are in Rome, and will as eagerly seize seize the occasion of throwing off the yoke. But should we grant, there may be some among them, who through baseness of spirit, or a bad education, will be disposed to favour the tyrant, the number of these can be but small, and we have means sufficient in our hands to reduce them to reason. They have left us hostages more dear to them than life. Their wives, their children, their fathers, their mothers, are here in the city. Courage! Romans, the Gods are for us, those Gods whose temples and altars the impious Tarquin has profaned by sacrifices and libations made with polluted hands, polluted with blood, and with numberless unexpiated crimes committed against his subjects. O ye Gods, who protected our fore-fathers, and ye Genii, who watch for the preservation and glory of Rome, do you inspire us with courage and unanimity in this glorious cause, and we will to our last breath defend your worship from all profanation.

Year of
R O M E
CCXLIII.
TARQUIN
II.
Seventh
King.

Brutus's harangue was often interrupted by the acclamations of the people. Some wept at the remembrance of past sufferings; others out of joy, at the hopes of a more happy government; and every one called out for arms. But Brutus did not judge it proper to arm the people, till they had first confirmed, by their suffrages, a decree of the Senate, which was to this effect: It deprived Tarquin of all the prerogatives belonging to the regal authority, condemned him and all his posterity to perpetual banishment, and devoted to the Gods of hell every Roman who should hereafter by word or deed endeavour his restoration. The Curia being assembled and the matter proposed, they were all unanimous in confirming the Senate's decree.

D. Hal. B.
4. P. 275.

And now the government being reduced to an Interregnum, and the people having declared Spurius Lucretius (the Father of Lucretia) Inter-Rex, the great and important question, the future form of government, was debated by the Leaders in the Revolution. And here again Brutus discovered himself to be a consummate politician: Experience, said he, has shewn us in the examples of Romulus and Numa, and other good Kings, that it is by no means proper that Rome should be without supreme Magistrates, to keep an even balance of the powers of the Senate and People; but it is necessary that the sovereign authority should neither center in one man, nor be perpetual; let it be divided between two, who may jointly make the interests of the publick their chief concern: they will be a check upon each other, and have a mutual emulation in the discharge of their duty. However, let us take particular care, not to continue their power too long, lest they abuse it, and become unwilling to part with it. Let us change the very names of King and Kingdom, and give the two heads that are to govern us, the name of Consuls*, and the Roman state that of Republick.

Let

* Pomponius the Civilian contends, that the name of Consul was taken from the word confulere, as signifying, To watch for the publick good. Varro derives this name from the same word confulere, but in a different signification, namely, as importing to consult, or ask counsel, because the intent of those who first instituted the Consuls, was, that they should do nothing, but with the advice, or counsel, of the people, and the Senate. The law which

Year of
ROME
CCXLIII.

TARQUIN
II.
seventh
king.

Let us abolish the pompous ^a ensigns of regal power, sceptres, crowns, and royal robes; let our Consuls only sit on an ivory chair, wear a white robe, and be attended by twelve Lictors ^b. But what am I saying? I am not for utterly abolishing the venerable name of King, which was consecrated by the same auspices as Rome herself at her foundation. Let us give it to that Magistrate to whom we commit the superintendency of religion; let his office be for life, and let him be called King of Sacred Things ^c. The whole council approved of this scheme; and the people, being again assembled by Curiae, established the new form of administration by a law.

But to lose no time, and to put the finishing hand to the revolution, the people were once more called together, not by Curiae, but by Centuries, and directed to come armed to the Campus Martius, in order to the election of the two first Consuls. There Junius Brutus, the warmest and most active of the patriots, and Tarquinius Collatinus, the husband of Lucretia, being proposed to the people by Lucretius the Inter-Rex, were unanimously chosen to the new dignity, the Romans believing they could no where find more irreconcilable enemies to the Tarquins. Tullia, now seeing that all was lost, and that she could no longer be safe in Rome, left it, to go to her husband. She was hooted at, and cursed by the populace as she passed through the city, yet they forbore to offer her any violence.

In the mean time Tarquin being informed by some who had got out of Rome before the gates were shut, that Brutus was raising commotions to his prejudice, came in all haste to the city, attended only by his placed the Consuls at the head of the Republic, calls them also Prætors and Judges. We have this law yet remaining, as quoted by Tully in his Third book of Laws. When it was made in the Comitia, which changed the Monarchy into a Republic, it is said to have run thus: Regis imperio duo sunt, iique prætorum, judicant, & consulendo, Prætores, Judices, Consules, appellantur. Militiæ summum prætor habent. Nemo parento. Ollis salus populi summa lex esto. C. & R.

^a The Consuls were only denied the common use of the sceptre, crown, and an habit of distinction. Livy, B. 30. assures us, that the Consuls, on the days of their triumphs, in the publick Sports, and at solemn Sacrifices, wore the crown of gold, the ivory staff or sceptre, and the habit striped with purple, as the Kings did. C. & R.

^b We read in the fourth book of Valerius Maximus, that the Consuls at first retained as many Lictors as the Kings, and that they had twenty-four. And he adds, that the Consul Poplicola reduced them to twelve. But each Consul was not attended with twelve Lictors; neither did they divide them so as to have each of them six. They were only guarded by the twelve Lictors alternatively, each in his month. This we learn from Livy. This ceremonial began with the two first Consuls. The Consul, who was the elder, or had most children, or most suffrages for the Consulship, had the Lictors the first month. It appears by a line in Virgil's 6th Book of the Æneis, that Brutus was first attended with the Fasces, before his colleague Collatinus:

*Consulis imperium hic primus sævasque securas
Accipiet — C. & R.*

^c The Rex Sacrorum, or Rex Sacrificulus, was a considerable dignity among the Romans, though inferior to that of Pontifex Maximus. For fear the name of King should make him too proud, they made him but a subordinate officer, even in the affairs of religion. His wife was called Queen. This office was never conferred on any, but in the Comitia of the people, assembled in the Campus Martius, by Centuries. Nor could any but a Patrician be chosen for it. The King of the Sacrifices was not suffered to intermeddle with state-affairs. Inasmuch, that when, in the Comitia, the sacrifice over which he presided, was ended, he withdrew from the assembly. C. & R.

sons,

sons, and a few friends; but finding the gates shut, the people in arms upon the walls, and that Lucretius refused him entrance, he returned with equal expedition to the camp. There to his extreme surprize he found that the conspirators had, during his short absence, gained over the army to them. The Consuls not doubting but Tarquin would, upon the first notice of the revolt, hasten to the city, had sent ² letters to the camp, giving an account of the resolutions taken at Rome, and exhorting the troops to shake off the tyrant's yoke. These letters Titus Herminius and Marcus Horatius had read in a full assembly of the soldiers convened by Centuries, and the matter being put to the vote, it was unanimously agreed to adhere to the decree passed in the city; so that Tarquin being both driven from his capital, and rejected by his troops, was forced, at the age of seventy-six, to fly for refuge, with his wife and three sons, to Gabii^b, that city of Latium, of which he had formerly made his son Sextus governor, investing him with a kind of regal power. Here he continued some time; but not finding the Latines forward enough to espouse his cause, he retired into Hetruria, the country of his mother's family, where he hoped to find more friends, and a readier assistance for attempting the recovery of his throne.

Year of
R O M E
CCXLIII.

D. Hal. B.
4. p. 276.

p. 277.

B. 5. p.
279.

^a Livy, (B. 1. c. 60.) says, that Brutus went in person to the camp on this affair, but to avoid meeting Tarquin, shunned the high-road; and that he arrived before Ardea at the same time that Tarquin appeared at the gates of Rome.

^b Tarquin's first retreat, according to Livy, B. 1. c. 60. was to Cære in Hetruria, whither he was followed by only two of his sons. Sextus (he adds) retiring to Gabii, as his kingdom, was there slain by some of the inhabitants, in revenge of his former treachery and cruelties. Livy also makes Sextus to be the youngest of Tarquin's sons, whereas Dionysius makes him the eldest. The last-mentioned author brings Sextus frequently upon the stage after this time; nay he introduces him 14 years after the expulsion of his father, at the battle of Regillus, where he is killed. The actions which Dionysius ascribes to Sextus in that battle, the Fathers Catrou and Rouillé give to a fourth son of Tarquin named Lucius: yet neither Dionysius nor Livy mention more than three sons of that King. Livy, B. 1. c. 52. calls Sextus, minimus ex tribus. D. Hal. B. 4. p. 273. makes Brutus say to the people in his speech on the affair of Lucretia, that Tarquin had three sons more wicked than himself: and B. 5. p. 279. Tarquin after his banishment wanders from place to place with his three sons. These three sons were Sextus, Titus, and Aruns. If indeed we suppose with Livy that Sextus was slain by the Gabini, and yet suppose with Dionysius, that Tarquin had two sons living at the battle of Regillus, we must unavoidably allow him to have had, in all, four sons; for it is agreed, that Aruns was killed in his encounter with Brutus in the first battle after the refuge: but it is to be observed, that Dionysius, who makes two of Tarquin's sons to be in the battle of Regillus, makes Sextus to be one of the two; and Livy, who supposes Sextus to be slain before this time, speaks but of one son of Tarquin in that battle.

THE

Roman History.

SECOND BOOK.

From the establishment of the ROMAN COMMONWEALTH in the year of Rome 244, to the re-building of the City in 365, after the burning of it by the Gauls.

CHAP. I.

- §. I. The state and condition of Rome on the abolition of the Regal Power.
 §. II. Tarquin prevails with the Magistrates of Tarquinii in Etruria to send an Embassy to Rome in his favour, with a letter from him to the Roman people. §. III. A second Embassy from the Tarquinienſes to the Romans. The Ambassadors engage ſome of the young Patricians in a plot againſt the new government. It is diſcovered by Vindicius a ſlave. Brutus condemns his own ſons to death and ſees the execution.
 §. IV. Collatinus is forced to abdicate the Conſulſhip; and Valerius is choſen to ſucceed him. §. V. Tarquin having ſtirred up the Tarquinienſes and Veientes to take arms in his cauſe, they come to a battle with the Romans, in which Brutus is ſlain. §. VI. The people entertain a jealouſy of Valerius's ambition, but ſoon after give him the name of Poplicola or Popular, on account of the laws he makes in their favour, to the diminution of the Conſular Authority.

Year of
R O M E
CCXLIV.
Bef. J. C.
DVIII.

JENIUS BRUTUS, and TAR-QUINIUS
COLLA-TIUS Conſuls.

§. I. THE baniſhment of the Tarquins delivered Rome from her domeſtick tyrants, but it raiſed her many enemies abroad, and, by occaſioning the defection of her allies, reduced her empire almoſt within the ſame limits where Romulus had left it. What might properly be called the Roman territory, had always been confined to a very narrow circuit. In the ſpace of 243 years, the Romans, though conſtantly victorious in war, had not gained land enough to ſupply their city with provisions. The main ſtrength of the ſtate lay in the number of the citizens of Rome, which the cuſtom of tranſplanting the inhabitants of the conquered cities thither had so prodigiously increased, that it put the Romans in a condition of usurping an authority over other nations, the most inconsiderable of which had an extent of country far exceeding theirs. By frequent incursions and depredations they so harassed the petty states of Latium and Etruria, that many of them were constrained to enter into treaties with Rome, whereby they obliged themselves to furnish her with auxiliaries, whenever she should be pleased to invade and pillage the lands of her other neighbours. Submissions of this kind she called making alliances with her; and these useful alliances supplied the want of a larger territory. But now upon the change of her government, all her allies forsook her at once, and either stood neuter, or espoused the cause of the banished King; so that she was left entirely to herself to maintain the liberty she had assumed.

Year of
R O M E
CCXLIV.
Bef. J. C.
DVIII.
First Con-
sulship.

Rome however enjoyed a profound peace in the beginning^a of the new administration. The army which had been employed in the siege of Ardea marched home under the conduct of Herminius and Horatius, who had made a truce with the Ardeates for 15 years. Upon this increase of strength by the return of the troops which had served under Tarquin, the Consuls thought it expedient to convene the people again by Centuries in the Campus Martius; and when they had in long speeches exhorted them to concord, the decree, passed some days before against the Tarquins, was confirmed. Nor was this all. The Consuls standing before the altars where expiatory sacrifices had been just offered, took an oath in the name of themselves, their children and posterity, that they would never recall King Tarquin, nor his children, nor their posterity from banishment, nor create any other King of Rome, nor suffer any to be created; and they made the people take the same oath. After this the Comitia proceeded to elect a Rex Sacrorum to preside at the sacrifices; and many of the laws of Servius Tullius were revived to the great joy of the people, who were restored to their ancient right of deciding by their votes in all important affairs.

D. Hal. B.
4. P. 277.

B. 5. p.
277.

Livy, B. 2.
c. 1, 2.

D. Hal. p.
278.

Brutus, being jealous of some in the Senate, put all the Senators likewise to the test of an oath. In this venerable body Valerius was the man of the greatest weight. He had expected to be named Consul at the first election, and being highly displeased at the preference given to Collatinus, had for some time withdrawn himself from publick affairs; insomuch that he began to be suspected of favouring the banished King: But he removed these apprehensions, by the remarkable zeal he shewed for liberty, when the day came for the Senators to take the same oath which the people had taken. He was the first man who swore never to favour the pretensions of the Tarquins; and his actions soon after proved the sincerity of his oath.

Plut. in Poplic. p.
97, 98.

§. II. IN the mean time the Tarquins were using their utmost endeavours to stir up the neighbouring states to take arms against Rome. Having

D. Hal. B.
5. P. 279.

^a Livy and Dion. Hal. agree in fixing the Consulship of Brutus and Collatinus to the year of Rome 245; but the Capitoline Tables, (which the Fathers Catroux and Rouillé constantly follow) fix it to the year 244.

Year of
R O M E
CCXLIV.
B. C. I. C.
DVIII.

Plut. Con-
sulp.
Pat. in Popl. P.
98.

wandered from city to city, the old King at length made Tarquinius in He-truria his place of residence; and by moving words he so railed the compassion of the Tarquinienses as to engage them to send an Embassy to Rome, with a modest, submissive letter from himself, directed to the Roman people. The Ambassadors represented to the Senate in such strong terms the reasonableness of letting the King be heard, before he was condemned, and the danger which threatened the Roman state, from the neighbouring powers, if that common justice were refused, that the Consuls inclined to bring these agents before the people, and leave the decision of the affair to the Curia: But Valerius strenuously opposed so hazardous a proceeding, and, by his influence in the Senate, defeated this first attempt of the artful Tarquin. Indeed the Senate was most especially concerned for ever to exclude Kings, who had often oppressed it; and the Consuls therefore thought it proper to restore that venerable body to all its rights and prerogatives, and to gain it the respect of the people, not only by the dignity but by the number of its members, which Tarquin's murders and proscriptions had greatly diminished. And to this end, wise men, and men of interest, were sought out, amongst the Roman Knights, to fill up the vacant places; so that the ancient number of 300 was once more compleated. The old Senators had been styled Patres, or Fathers; and because these new ones were put upon the same list with them, they were called Conscripti^b, i. e. Persons written or enrolled together with them.

§. III. BUT notwithstanding all these prudent measures, the rising Republick was upon the brink of being destroyed in its very beginning.
Many of the young Patricians having been accustomed to licentiousness and pleasure, the austere form of a republican government, in which the laws alone, always deaf and inexorable, were to reign, gave them greater apprehensions than tyranny itself. They were fond of the flattering distinctions of a court, and could not bear the mortification of seeing themselves almost upon a level with the multitude. The sons of Tarquin building their hopes on these young debauchees, who regretted the loss of their former companions in pleasure, prevailed with the Tarquinienses to send a second Embassy to Rome, under pretence of demanding the estates of the

Plut. in Popl. P.
98.

^a We have this account from Plutarch.
D. Hal. affirms, that Brutus had no regard to the remonstrances of the Ambassadors.

^b These Conscript Fathers were called the New Senate, Novus Senatus. And it appears by Livy's words, rightly understood, that the old Senators only were called Patres; and that the new ones were distinguished from them by the name of Conscripti. It is true, Dion. Hal. gives the same name of Patres Conscripti to the first Senators, created by Romulus: but this form, Qui Patres, quique Conscripti essent, which was used when the Senate was called together, sufficiently shews the mistake of the Greek historian: So that when we find in Latin authors, Patres Con- scripti, used to express the Senate in general, the words must be understood, as if they were joined by a conjunction, Patres, & conscripti, i. e. The Fathers, and those who have been added to them. Festus favours this opinion, when he says, that those were called Conscripti who had passed from the order of Roman Knights into that of Senators. Thus far Father Reuillé.

Plutarch in his life of Romulus says, that the Senators were at first called simply Patres, and when more were added to them, Patres Conscripti: But this does not determine whether the latter appellation was given them upon the addition made by Tatius the Sabine King, by Tarquinius Priscus, or by Brutus.

exiles;

exiles; but with private instructions to spirit up a faction, if possible, to attempt the lives of the Consuls. The Ambassadors were admitted, and nothing could be more modest than the demands of the banished King. He asked only his paternal estate; and on that condition promised never to attempt the recovery of his kingdom by force of arms. The Consul Collatinus was for complying with the request; but Brutus opposed it. The affair, having been long considered by the Senate, was at last referred to the people. Brutus endeavoured to bring his Collegue, who was a relation of the Tarquins, under a suspicion of treachery. However, the opinion of Collatinus prevailed in the Comitia, and it was carried by ^a one vote, that the Tarquins should be put in possession of the estates of their family.

Whilst the people were employed in loading carriages with the effects of the exiles, and in selling what could not be carried off, the Ambassadors found means to draw some of the nearest relations of the Consuls into a plot against them. These were three young Noblemen of the Aquilian family (the sons of Collatinus's sister) and two of the Vitellii (whose sister Brutus had married) and these latter engaged Titus and Tiberius, the two sons of Brutus, in the same conspiracy. They all bound themselves by solemn oaths, with the dreadful ceremony of drinking the blood of a murdered man, and touching his entrails. The house of the Aquili was their place of meeting, and there they all wrote letters to the banished King, which they put into the hands of the Ambassadors. But notwithstanding a great deal of precaution used by the conspirators, to keep the secret from their servants, Vindicius a slave, and then butler to the Aquili, suspecting his master's designs, staid at the door of the apartment, and through a crevice saw and heard all that passed. He durst not disclose the secret to either of the Consuls, on account of their near relation to the conspirators: he went strait to Valerius, and unburdened his mind to him. Valerius took the slave under his protection; and then, by the help of his brother M. Valerius, and of his own friends, clients and domesticks, not only seized the letters of the conspirators, but took all the heads of the conspiracy prisoners.

Early the next morning the people being summoned to the Comitium, where Brutus and his Collegue sat on the tribunal of justice, the prisoners were brought forth to trial. Brutus began it with the examination of his two sons. Vindicius appeared against them, and the letters they had written to the Tarquins were read. The proof being clear, the prisoners stood quite silent, and pleaded only by their tears. Titus and Tiberius, said the stern Brutus, What have you to offer in your defence? They were thrice called upon to plead, but tears were still their only answer. The major part of the Senators being touched with compassion, a low murmur was heard among them, Banish them, banish them. Collatinus wept, and even Valerius seemed to relent, because he said nothing. All the people stood trembling

^a Dionysius must here mean, that there was 16 Curia against 14, because he tells us, that the affair was decided by the 30 Curia.

Year of
R O M E
CCXLIV.
Bef. J. C.
DVIII.

First Con-
sulship.

Part. in Part. P.
100.

in expectation of the sentence. Brutus at length rose up, and with a steady voice, not interrupted by a sigh, said, Lictors, I deliver them over to you, the rest is your part. At these words the whole assembly shrieked; the universal confusion was inexpressible; distress shewed itself in every face, and the mournful looks of the people pleaded for pity: but neither these intercessions, nor the bitter lamentations of the young men, who called upon their father by the most endearing names, could soften the inflexible judge. The Lictors seized upon the criminals, beat them with rods, and then struck off their heads; Brutus all the time gazing on the cruel spectacle with a steady look, and a composed countenance. This execution over, he immediately^a quitted the tribunal, and left his colleague to do the rest. Collatinus, being inclined to spare his nephews the Aquilii, allowed the prisoners a day to clear themselves; and ordered their slave Vindicius (the only evidence against them) to be delivered up to his masters. But this roused the indignation of the people, as well as the zeal of Valerius, who had promised with an oath to protect the witness. In vain did the Lictors attempt to force Vindicius from him; and the multitude called out for Brutus to return to the Comitia. When Brutus came, he told the people that what he had done was by virtue of his paternal authority over his children: but that for the rest of the delinquents, it belonged to them to determine their fate. Accordingly, by a decree of the Curia, the conspirators all suffered as rebels, except the Ambassadors, who were spared out of respect to the law of nations. As for Vindicius, the people judged him worthy of that liberty^b he had secured to the Romans; and beside the privileges of

^a Diss. Hal.'s account of this matter differs from that of Plutarch. The former pretends, that Brutus, immediately after the execution of his children, had the Aquilii brought before him: that after their letters were read aloud, he gave them leave to make their defence; and that they, having nothing to say for themselves, had recourse to tears and entreaties; but to no purpose. For Brutus, still inflexible, ordered the Lictors to seize them, and carry them to execution. Collatinus suspended it, and made the warmest remonstrances to his colleague in favour of the conspirators: but being piqued when he found he could make no impression upon him, he had recourse to his authority, and pardoned the criminals. This so exasperated Brutus, that he committed the Aquilii to prison, in spite of the opposition of his colleague, and accused him before the people, of treason and perfidiousness. Collatinus seeing with grief, that the people were unanimously against him, and against those whose defence he had undertaken, thought he could no longer exercise the office of a Consul with dignity; and therefore chose to abdicate the magistracy, at the persuasion of Spurius Lu- cretius, his father-in-law. Collatinus was succeeded by Publius Valerius. Brutus immediately, with the concurrence of his new colleague, put all those to death, who had been concerned in the conspiracy. D. Hal. p. 284.

^b It is commonly thought, and is probable enough, this Latin phrase, Vindicare in libertatem, had its rise from the name of Vindicius, who was made free by the Consul: But there are others, who will have it to be derived from the word Vindicta, which signifies a Wand, with which the Prætor, whose office it was afterwards to grant freedoms, struck the slave, whose master had a mind to set him at liberty. In order to reconcile these opinions, it may be said, that the Wand itself took its name from Vindicius. In the ceremony of granting freedoms publicly, (for there were private ones, which were granted either by will, or in the presence of witnesses) the master presented his slave to the Prætor, first holding him by the hand, and afterwards quitting his hold; whence came the Latin word Manumissio. Then, after he had given him a little blow on the cheek, he presented him to the Consul or to the Prætor: who striking him gently with his wand, pronoun-

cc.

of a Roman citizen, gave him * 23000 Asses of brass,ⁿ (about 80 l. 14 s. 7 d.)

And now, though the people had formerly decreed that the estates of the Tarquins should be restored to them, the Senate made no scruple to destroy their palace, and distribute their lands among indigent citizens; the publick only retaining a piece of ground (near the Campus Martius) which the King had usurped, and added to his demesnes. This piece of ground they consecrated to Mars, and it became afterwards a common field, where the Roman youth exercised themselves in running and wrestling. But after this consecration, the Romans scrupled to house the corn which they found there ready reaped to their hands; so that, with some trees, it was thrown into the Tiber, and the water being low, it stopped in the middle of the river, and began to form that fine island which was called Insula sacra, after many temples had been built on it.

§. IV. THE severity with which Brutus had treated his two sons, greatly increased his authority, insomuch, that there was not a single Roman who durst for the future entertain a thought of bringing back Tarquin. Collatinus on the contrary, by his weak conduct with regard to the conspirators, had exasperated the Romans against him; his very name of Tarquinius became an offence to them. Brutus observing this, and hating his colleague, either on account of his relation to the Tarquins, or because there was some reason to believe he secretly favoured them, or perhaps only because he was of a character and temper different from his own, took advantage of the disposition the people were in to get him deposed. In a numerous assembly, he made a speech to them to this effect: If, Romans, when you chose two Consuls, you could at the same time have united their sentiments and inclinations, there would have been no defect in the new government, and I should have had nothing more to wish. But it unfortunately happens, that there is as great a difference betwixt Collatinus and me, as between a hatred of tyranny, and a love of tyrants. His affection for his detestable family, makes him run all hazards to restore our oppressors; whilst I am profuse of my own blood to preserve the liberty of my country. Have not all Collatinus's thoughts, and the whole strength of his interest, been levelled at the destruction of that liberty, which his honour obliged him to defend? And you had hopes, he would defend it: but his soliciting you to restore the Ty- ced these words: Aio te liberum esse more Quiritium. This ceremony being ended, the slave was registered upon the roll of Freed-men. Then he was shaved, and put on the cap called Pileus, which was worn by the Romans upon certain days. In order to make the taking possession of this kind of cap more solemn, it was performed in the temple of Feronia, the Goddess of the Freed-men. In one of these temples there was a stone seat, with this inscription on it: Benemeriti Servi sedeant, surgant liberi: and it is well known, that the Pileus was, among the ancient Romans, the sign and symbol of liberty. At the death of Nero, the people appeared in the streets with this cap on their heads. C. & R.

* Livy says only, that a sum of money was given to Vindicius. It is here fixed at five and twenty thousand Asses of brass; because Livy himself, in B. 9. of his first Decad, has observed, that the reward appointed by law, for the slaves who should discover conspiracies, amounted to that sum; as that for freed-men did to a hundred thousand. C. & R.

Year of
R O M E
CCXLIV.
Bef. J. C.
DVIII.

First Con-
sulship.
Livy, B. 2.
c. 5.
Plutarch,
p. 100.
D. Hal. B.
5. p. 287,
288.

p. 284
285.

Year of 184. E. rants their estates, and the impunity with which he was going to dismiss the
 184. E. conspirators, have discovered his secret inclinations and designs. What! Col-
 184. E. latinus, have I refused to spare my own children, and shall I spare you? A 184. E. man, whose loyalty is with us, and whose soul and affections are with our
 184. E. enemies? A perfidious man, who would preserve the betrayers of his country, 184. E. and would destroy me for being its zealous defender? No, far from shewing you any indulgence, I declare you from this moment deposed from the magistracy; and I command you to retire to some other city. As for you, Romans, I shall without delay assemble you by Centuries, that you may confirm, if you think good, the sentence I have pronounced. You are free to chuse whether to have Collatinus or Brutus for your Consul; but be assured of this, you cannot have both.

D. Hal. B. These words raised so great a commotion among the People, that they
 5. p. 236. would scarce hear Collatinus's defence: In vain did he reproach Brutus with betraying his friend, and defaming his Colleague; no attention was given to his invectives. At length, by virtue of his authority as Consul, he forbade the holding that assembly of which Brutus had spoken. But this prohibition incensed the People yet more, and they cried out to have their votes instantly taken. Collatinus was just going to be deposed with ignominy, and banished by a publick decree, when his father-in-law, Sp. Lucretius, desired permission of the Consuls to speak to the Assembly, and obtained it. He is said to have been the first private man that ever made a speech in the Comitia. His age, and the remembrance of Lucretia his daughter, gained him attention; and he addressed himself first to his son-in-law: 'Tis in vain, Collatinus, to pretend, against the will of the People, to continue in the Consulship. You received it at first from them; and to them you ought now to resign it. As to the crimes, of which you are accused, you will more easily clear yourself by your future conduct, than by all your protestations, or by any thing you can say. If the People judge it necessary for their tranquillity that you should retire, do you shew your regard and deference for the publick by acquiescing in the publick sentiment. You should consider, that though with respect to all other crimes, it is only the actual commission of them that is cognizable by the justice of a nation; yet when treason against the State is but apprehended, and this upon never so ill grounds, it is held more prudent to guard against it, as an evil really impending, than to run the least hazard of destruction by too much security.

Then turning to Brutus, he pressed him not to insist on the disgraceful banishment of a Colleague, who had so happily joined with him in measures which had procured the common liberty; and he added, that if Collatinus would of his own accord divest himself of the Consulship, and retire from Rome, not only time ought to be allowed him to remove his effects, but a present made him out of the publick treasury, a mark of the People's good will, which might be a consolation to him under his misfortune.

p. 237. This advice of Lucretius being received by the Assembly with applause, Collatinus became sensible that he had no way left but to conform himself to it; therefore when he had invoked the Gods to be witnesses of his innocence,

nocence, and of the ingratitude of his relations and friends, he resigned the Consulship. Brutus highly commended his wisdom, and to remove all suspicion of his having any personal enmity to him, procured him a present of ^a twenty talents out of the publick treasury, to which he added five talents of his own. The place to which Collatinus chose to retire was Lavinium; where he lived in peace, and at last died of old age.

Year of
R O M E
CCXLIV.
Bef. J. C.
DVIII.
First Con-
sulship.

Brutus, that he might not give the Romans any cause to suspect that he intended to govern singly, and, under the name of Consul, aimed at the authority of a King, immediately assembled the Centuries in the Campus Martius, in order to proceed to the election of a new Consul, to fill the place of Collatinus. The Suffrages of the people were in favour of Publius Valerius, a descendant of that noble Sabine named Valerius Volesus, to whom Plutarch (as was before * observed) gives the honour of negotiating the Peace between the Sabines and Romans, in Romulus's time. Publius had got himself a great name by the means of his wealth and his eloquence; which latter he had, during Tarquin's reign, generously employ'd in the defence of justice, as he had done his riches in the relief of the poor, to whom he was ever easy of access. He was also remarkable for his frugality and temperance; and in all the parts of his conduct from his early years he discovered such a surprizing wisdom, that he seemed to have been born a Philosopher. The two Consuls, equally eminent for their love of the publick good, began their joint administration, by passing a law which granted a general Amnesty to all those who had followed the fortune of the Tarquins, provided they returned to the city within twenty days; and this brought back a great number of excellent subjects to Rome.

Plut. p.
100.
D. Hal. B.
5. p. 287.
P. 38.

§. V. HOWEVER, nothing could so far discourage the dethroned King, as to make him quit the Hope of recovering the Kingdom by force. He went about, soliciting the neighbouring Nations, and engaged the Veientes and Tarquinienses to unite their forces in the support of his cause. The first were moved to it by the hopes of regaining what they had lost in their former wars with Rome, having now at their head a Roman General of known courage and ability: And as for the Tarquinienses, the considerations of name and blood, and the glory of having a man of their own Nation King of Rome were to them sufficient inducements. These allies took the field and entered the Roman territory. The Consuls without delay marched out their troops to meet them; Brutus commanded the horse, and Valerius the foot drawn up in a square battalion. The two armies being in sight of each other, Brutus advanced with his cavalry at the same time that Aruns, one of Tarquin's sons, was coming forward at the head of the enemy's horse, the King himself following with the legions. Aruns no sooner discovered Brutus attended by the Lictors, but all inflamed with rage, he cried out, There he is, that enemy who has banished

Livy, B. 2.
c. 6.
D. Hal.
Liv. Vol.
Max.
Plut. Popl.
p. 101.
Livy, ibid.
D. Hal. p.
289.

* According to Dr. Arbuthnot, who reckons but 60 Minæ to a Talent, the 20 Talents amount to 3875 l. Sterling. Livy represents Collatinus as resigning before the conspiracy, and Valerius as consul when it was discovered. B. 2. c. 2, 3.

Year of
R O M E
CCXLIV.
B.C. J. C.
DVIII.

First Con-
sulship.

Liv. B. 2.
Plut. ibid.

D. Hal. p.
291.
Plut. ibid.

Livy, B. 2.
c. 7.

D. Hal. p.
292.

Liv. B. 2.
c. 7.
Plut.
Popl. p.
102.

us from our native country! See how gallantly he rides adorned with all the ensigns of my father's dignity! Now aid me, ye Gods, the avengers of injured Kings! This said, he instantly set spurs to his horse, making directly at the Consul, who perceiving his design made no less speed to meet him. Blindly following the dictates of hatred and passion, and regardless of self-preservation, they rushed on to the encounter, and with their lances ran each other through the body. They both fell dead from their horses; and the death of these Generals was the prelude to the battle. Never was the success of an engagement more dubious; for when the night had put an end to it, it was not known in either camp which side had gained the victory, or which had lost the greater number of men. A report was spread, that a voice had been heard out of the wood Arfic, declaring the Romans conquerors; a stratagem probably of Valerius. Be that as it will, it is certain that their enemies, very soon after the action, left their camp in confusion, disbanded, and returned into their own country. And it is said, that Valerius, remaining master of the field of battle, caused the slain to be numbered, and then found, that the Hebrurians had lost 11300 men, and the Romans only 11299.

Rome was inconsolable for the loss of Brutus; a hero who had restored liberty to his country, cemented it with the blood of his children, and died in defending it against the tyrant. The first funeral honours were paid him in the camp; but, the next day after Valerius's triumph, the corpse was brought into the Forum in a magnificent litter, and then Valerius gave Rome the first example of those funeral orations, which were ever after made in praise of great men. The Ladies distinguished themselves on this occasion. To shew their respect for the avenger of the sex's honour, they mourned for him a whole year, as if they had lost a common father.

§. VI. AS Valerius, for some reasons, deferr'd convening the Centuries for the election of a new Consul, this delay began to raise a distrust, as if it were owing to ambitious designs, a jealousy which seemed to be in some measure authorized by his then building a fine house on a steep part of the hill Palatinus, which overlook'd the Forum. The people considered it as a citadel, whence the new Monarch might command the city. But when Valerius was informed of their uneasiness, he ordered some workmen to go the very next night and pull down the fabrick to the ground; and calling the people together as soon as it was day, he expostulated with them about their unjust suspicions, and bid them go see the ruins of his house: He then told them he would fix his habitation in the valley, that from the top of the hill, where he had intended to dwell, they might crush him with stones, if he continued to be the object of their jealousy. This said, he ordered the Comitia to assemble for the election of a new Consul, in which he left them entirely free; and they chose Lucretius, the father of the unfortunate Lucretia. The people, as they came out of the Comitia, being ashamed of having suspected Valerius, complimented mented him with a large ground-plot, in an agreeable place, and there they built him a house.

The new Consul died in a few days after his promotion, so that Valerius was once more sole Governor. And now the sensible proofs which, in the interval between the death of Lucretius and the election of another Colleague, he gave the people of his zeal for their interest, gained him the surname of Poplicola, or Popular; they called him by no other ever after. He ordered the Axes, which were so apt to strike terror, to be taken out of the Falces; and commanded the Lictors to lower these in the assemblies of the People, by way of homage to their sovereignty. And this was a kind of introduction to a law, enacted while he was sole Consul, whereby an accused person was allowed to appeal to the People from the judgment of the magistrates. Another law was made, exempting artificers, widows, and old men (who had no children to relieve them) from paying tribute. A third law, tho' it prescribed an absolute submission to the orders of the Consuls, yet limited the penalty for disobedience to the value of five oxen and two rams (probably pieces of money with those figures stamp'd upon them.) And, to remove all manner of suspicion of his having the least thoughts of tyranny, Poplicola published a fourth decree, making it lawful to kill, without waiting for a legal condemnation, any person who should aim at being master of the liberty of his fellow-citizens, and so likewise in the case of usurping a publick office without the People's consent: The assassin was to be declared innocent, provided he brought proof of the ill designs of him he had slain ^a.

Poplicola would not take upon him the keeping of the publick money, rais'd to defray the expences of war; but caus'd it to be deposited in the temple of Saturn^b; and by his advice, the people appointed two persons, elected out of the Senate, to take the charge of it. These officers

^a Livy represents these laws as made before the election of Lucretius to the Consulship. B. 2. c. 8.

^b The publick treasury was called Ærarium; because at first nothing was lodged in it but unstamp'd brass, which went by weight, and which was called Æs rude. Afterwards stamp'd pieces of brass were lodged there, which were called Æs grave, or Æs leve, according to the different weight of the several coins. This treasure had been kept at the houses of the Kings and Consuls, till the time of Poplicola, who removed it to the temple of Saturn, which was situated at the foot of the hill Saturnius, or the Capitol. In after-times, the publick treasury was divided into two branches; the one was called, The Common Treasury, or Ærarium vulgare; the other was called, The Sacred Treasury, or Ærarium Sanclius; in which the Aurum vicissinarium was reserved, for the extraordinary occasions of the commonwealth. But of this in its proper place.

According to Plutarch, there were no Quæstors in Rome, till Poplicola's time; and this office was originally a branch of that of the Consuls. But Ulpian pretends, on the contrary, and quotes several authors for it, that there were Quæstors even in Tullus Hostilius's time. It was therefore to be observed, that the name of Quæstors, among the Romans, had two different significations. Sometimes it signified Commissioners, by whom capital crimes were cognizable, and sometimes Magistrates who were put in commission for getting in the publick money. Ulpian might speak of the former sort of Quæstors, as being in the time of the Kings, and Plutarch of the other sort, which was introduced by Poplicola in the time of the commonwealth. These latter Quæstors were chosen by the People assembled in Comitia. C. & R.

they

Year of
R O M E
CCXLIV.
B. E. J. C.
DVII.
First Con-
sulship.
D. Hal. B.
5. p. 292.
Liv. B. 2.
c. 8.
Plut. Popl.
p. 102.
Plut. ibid.
103.

Year of
R O M E
CCXLIV.
Bef. J. C.
DVIII.
First Cons.
ship.

they afterwards called Quæstors. The first persons chosen to this office were P. Veturius and M. Minucius. When Poplicola had by these regulations done all he desired towards diminishing the Consular authority, he assembled the people in the Campus Martius, for the election of a new Consul, to be his Collegue; and the choice fell upon Horatius Pulvillus.

C H A P. II.

§. I. Poplicola is chosen Consul a second Time, and T. Lucretius appointed to be his Collegue. Porfena, King of Clusium in Etruria, sends a threatening embassy to Rome. The Romans chuse Poplicola Consul a third time, and give him Horatius Pulvillus for a Collegue. §. II. Porfena in conjunction with some of the Latine states, marches an army into the neighbourhood of Rome. The remarkable bravery of Horatius Cocles. §. III. The desperate enterprize, and wonderful resolution of Mucius Sævola. Porfena intimidated by the courage of the Romans, desists from his demand of having the banished King restored. He makes a truce with the Romans, who refer it to his judgment, whether they shall restore to Tarquin his paternal estate or not. The adventure of Clælia during the pleadings. Porfena renounces the cause of Tarquin entirely, and makes a peace with the Romans. §. IV. The temple of Jupiter Capitolinus is consecrated. Sp. Lartius and T. Herminius chosen Consuls. The Romans shew their gratitude to Porfena.

Year of
R O M E
CCXLV.
Bef. J. C.
DVII.
Second
Consulship.
D. Hal. B.
6. P. 293.

I N a few months after the promotion of Horatius, the first year of the Consular power expired, and then the Romans thought fit, because of the present critical situation of their affairs, to chuse Poplicola again; and with him they joined T. Lucretius, the brother of the famous Lucretia. These began their administration by reviving the old institutions of King Servius Tullius, the Census * and the Lustrum, and they

* The learned differ about the persons whose names were given in upon each Roman Census. Some will have it, that in this multitude, all the Roman citizens were comprehended, without excepting their wives, children, widows, orphans, or pupils. But is it credible, that the commonwealth, when Rome was become the capital of the world, should reckon but three hundred, four hundred, and never so much as five hundred thousand citizens, in all the Roman territory, and in the whole extent of its municipal towns? For we don't find that the most numerous Census ever exceeded five hundred thousand, for above seven hundred years together. Others think that the number mentioned by the Greek and Latin authors, comprehended only the heads of families. But this opinion can't be supported. For, not to say that it cannot be reconciled with the account the historians give us, we shall never be persuaded, that under the Consulship of Valerius, for instance, the Roman state, which was confined within narrow limits, and extended little farther than the walls of Rome, should be able to reckon up a hundred and thirty thousand heads of families; and consequently, several millions of souls, including children, slaves, widows, orphans, pupils, strangers, &c. whose names were not taken down in the Census. It is therefore they found the number of Roman citizens, at or past the age of puberty, to be 130000. As a war from the Latine quarter was what the Romans, at this time, chiefly apprehended, the Consuls at a great expence fortify'd Sinquinium, or Sigliuria, an important post on that side. However the first of the neighbouring powers that appeared, after the death of Brutus, in favour of the Tarquins, was Porfena, a potent Prince, King of Clusum in Hetruria. He sent a haughty and threatening embassy to the Romans, requiring them either to recall the Tarquins, or to give them back their estates. The first they absolutely refused, and as to the second, they answered, that it was impracticable; a part of those estates having been consecrated to Mars, and the rest divided among indigent people, from whom they could not be recovered.

While the Romans were employed in preparations for a brave defence, the time came for electing new Consuls, and then Poplicola was chosen a third time, and, with him, Horatius Pulvillus, who had before been a few months in that office.

§. II. PORSENA, attended by his son Aruns and the exiles, marched towards Rome with a formidable army, and was joined by a considerable body of Latines, under the command of Mamilius, Tarquin the Proud's son-in-law. The Consuls upon their approach made the peasants carry their effects into strong holds, and they endeavoured to secure the hill Janiculum which overlooked Rome, and was its only fortification on that side the Tiber. And to keep the populace in temper and spirit, the Senate made several agreeable regulations with respect to taxes and provisions, and took great care to provide for their subsistence during the war; they sent to several parts of Campania, and even to Cumæ, to fetch corn, which was afterwards sold to the common People at low rates, lest the want of bread should tempt them to purchase it with the common liberty, and open the gates of Rome to Tarquin. Nay the Senators, at the same time that they taxed themselves higher than any others, would lay no impost on the common people during the war; following this generous and equitable maxim, "That the lower sort paid tribute enough to the Commonwealth by bringing up children who would in time be able to defend it." In a word, the Romans were all sensible of the difference of therefore more reasonable to conclude, with Fabius Pictor, as quoted by Livy, that none but those who were able to bear arms, were included in this reckoning; i. e. those only who were about seventeen years of age, and under forty-six. Thus we are to understand Dion. Hal. when, speaking of this fifth Roman Census, he says, that the number of those who were arrived to the age of puberty, is 130,000, amounted to an hundred and thirty thousand men. He speaks in much the same manner, whenever he mentions the Census, always excepting the women, children, orphans, handicraftsmen, slaves, and people of mean trades, and low condition of life, who in earlier times of the Republick were excluded from the Roman militia; as we are informed by credible authors. And in short, if we do but consider, that at the end of Romulus's reign the Roman army consisted of forty-six thousand foot, and very near a thousand horse, it will not appear at all surprising, that Rome, which was now become more powerful, and better peopled, should be able to raise an hundred and thirty thousand men; especially since the inhabitants of Alba and the other conquered cities had removed thither. C. & R.

Year of
R O M E
CCXLV.
Bet. J. C.
DVII.

Second
Consulship.
D. Hal. B.
5. p. 293.

Year of
R O M E
CCXLV.
Bet. J. C.
DVI.

Third
Consulship.
D. Hal. B.
294.
Livy, B. 1.
c. 9.

Year of the present government from the former, and all equally solicitous to avoid ROME servitude; so that concord reigned in Rome even in the time of a famine CCXLVI with which it was grievously afflicted before the end of this war.
 Ref. J. C. DVI.

Porsena soon display'd his banners along the Tiber. His first attack Third was upon the fort of the Janiculum, and he drove the Romans out of it.
 Consulship. Upon this, the Consuls made all their troops pass the river, and drew
 D. Hal. B. them up in order of battle to defend the bridge: and Porsena advanced
 S. P. 294. to engage them. The victory was for a long time doubtful; but M. Va-
 295. lerius (Poplicola's brother) and T. Lucretius who were at the head of the Livy, B. 2. left wing, being both unfortunately wounded, and carried out of the field, a. 10. a general terror seized the Roman army. The bridge Sublicius was in a moment covered with runaways, who strove to gain the city. Horatius Cocles (nephew of Horatius the Consul) being joined by Sp. Lartius and T. Herminius, (who had commanded the right wing) these three gallant men, to hinder the enemy from pursuing the Romans, posted themselves at the entrance of the bridge, and for a long time bravely defended it.
 The defensive arms of Lartius and Herminius being at length broken, they retired; Horatius desiring them to advise the Consuls, from him, to cut the bridge at the other end. Then for a while he sustained alone the attack of the enemy. The heaps of dead bodies which had fallen by the hands of the three heroes formed a kind of rampart for him against close assaults, and with his buckler he covered himself from the missive weapons thrown at him. At length being wounded in the thigh, and the signal being given that the bridge was almost broken down, he leapt into the river, and swam across it through a shower of darts. Thus Cocles saved the Republick from ruin; and the Romans being sensible of it, erected a statue of brass to him in the temple of Vulcan. They gave him likewise as much land as he himself, with one yoke of oxen, could plough in one day. And each of the inhabitants of Rome, to the number of 300000, gave him the value of as much food as each consumed in a day. But notwithstanding all this, because he had lost one eye; and from his wounds continued lame the remaining part of his life, these defects prevented his ever being elected to the Consulship, or to any military command.

Though the city was not entirely invested, but had several avenues open, it was very difficult to find provisions for so great a number of inhabitants, as could hardly subsist there in time of peace; and a famine began to be severely felt. Porsena, having notice of it, sent the Romans word, that if they would receive their old masters, he would furnish them with provisions; to which they returned this answer, that hunger was a less evil than slavery and oppression.

§. III. NEVERTHELESS Rome was almost wearied out with this long siege, when Mucius Cordus, a young Roman of noble birth, desired permission of the Consuls and Senate to cross the Tiber, and go into the enemy's camp, there to attempt something for the service of his country; and he begged, as his only recompence, that, in case he fell

in

in the dangerous enterprize, his zeal might not be buried in oblivion, but proclaimed after his death. The Consuls and Senate having encouraged him to undertake any thing in the present exigence, he dressed himself in an Hetrurian habit, and, with a ponyard hid under his clothes, left the city. As he spoke the language of the Hetrurians perfectly well, he easily got into their camp, and made his way quite to the King's tent. It happened to be the day, on which the troops were reviewed and paid. Porfena's secretary, magnificently dressed, was sitting on the same tribunal with the King, giving audience, and receiving petitions. Mucius mistook him for the King himself, leaped upon the tribunal, and with one stroke of his ponyard laid him dead at the King's feet. He then attempted to escape, but was seized, and brought back to the presence of Porfena. Thou execrable villain, said the King, who art thou, whence comest thou? Who are thy accomplices? Mucius, with a haughty look that struck more terror than it expressed fear, answered, that his name was Caius Mucius; that he was a Roman; and that Roman bravery made him capable of attempting whatever man could do, and of suffering whatever man could endure. Porfena filled with amazement at his answer, was yet more astonished when he saw him with a steady countenance, and a look which testified his inward rage for having missed his aim, thrust his right hand into a pan of burning coals, and there let it broil, without shewing any signs of pain. The King's resentment changed wholly into admiration; he granted him life and liberty, and even restored him the dagger with which he had designed to stab him; and because Mucius, having now lost the use of his right hand, took it with his left, he had thence the surname of Scevola, i. e. left-handed.

The Roman was no less surprized at the King's generosity than the King had been at his intrepid boldness: However, he had the presence of mind to invent a story for the service of his country. He pretended to be moved by the King's goodness to discover to him a secret, which, he said, no torments could have extorted from him: That three hundred young Romans, all as resolute as himself, and who were dispersed in the Hetrurian camp, had bound themselves by the most sacred oaths, to attempt his life one after another, at the like hazard as he had done. This discourse struck Porfena once more with terror, and having ordered Mucius to withdraw, he called a council to deliberate upon the best means to preserve himself from the dangers with which he was threatened. His son Aruns, a great admirer of the Roman virtue, advised him to render all precautions needless, by concluding a peace with the Romans. The King readily listened to this proposal, and the more readily as the Romans, in a sally out of the town, had destroyed a great many of his troops; which occasioned a murmuring in the camp: Deputies were sent to Rome, who had orders not to mention the recalling of the Tarquins, but only to insist on a restitution of their estates, or an equivalent; and as to what concerned the Hetrurian nation, to require the Romans to reinstate the Veientes in the possession of seven villages taken from them in former wars. Poplicola, zealous to have the people relieved in their misery, prevailed with the Senate to comply with these conditions: but the people themselves refused to consent to the first article, till Porfena had heard their cause pleaded against the Tarquins; and to his arbitration they left it. As to the second, they readily agreed to it, and offered hostages to secure its performance.

A truce being made, the Romans deputed some of the Senators to plead their cause before the Hebrurian King, and, at the same time, sent ten young virgins, and as many boys, of the best families in Rome, for hostages: But then the Tarquins refused to admit Porfena for a judge between them and the Romans. The King however resolved to inform himself in the affair, and made his son Aruns his associate for the hearing and deciding it. The Roman deputies had scarce begun to open the cause, when the proceeding was interrupted by news brought, that the young women, given as hostages, had ventured to swim cross the Tiber, and were returned to Rome. They had been permitted to bathe in the river; where the famous Clelia, (one of the number) happening to turn her eyes towards her native city, took a longing to go back to it. Away she swims, the rest follow her, and they all get safe to the opposite shore*. When the truth of the matter was known, it served only to increase the esteem which Porfena and Aruns had for the Roman bravery. But in the mean time Poplicola was very uneasy at the return of the young women, among whom was his own daughter Valeria. He dispatched a deputation to the Hebrurian camp, to excuse the folly of the girls, and with a promise to send them back. Mamilius and the Tarquins having notice of this, prepared an ambush to surprize them on the road; and when the Roman maids, under the guard of a few horsemen, were almost at the gates of Porfena's camp, they appeared on a sudden with a considerable body of horse and fell with fury upon the weak convoy. Poplicola had by good fortune put himself at the head of the Roman troop; he sustained the attack of the enemy with incredible valour, while his daughter Valeria, exceedingly terrified, rode full speed to the Hebrurian camp, and gave notice of the danger her father was in; and then Aruns, with a great body of cavalry, flying to his relief, the assailants were soon routed.

This attempt of the Tarquins greatly displeased Porfena, and gave him a strong suspicion of the badness of their cause. He summoned the chief officers of his army, and, in their presence, heard the complaints of the Romans; who enlarged on all the crimes committed by their tyrants, from the assassination of King Servius, to the violence committed on the chaste Lucretia. The Hebrurians were filled with horror; and Porfena, renouncing all alliance with the Tarquins and Mamilius, ordered them to leave his camp. He then commanded the ten young virgins to be brought before him, and enquired who was the first author of their enterprize. Clelia, with a fearless air, confessed, that she alone was guilty, and that she had emboldened the rest by her advice. The King, as much surprized with her steadiness, as with her courage, addressed himself to her in a gracious manner,

* Livy adds, that they passed the River through a shower of Hebrurian darts.

manner, extolled her adventure above the bravery of Horatius, and the intrepidity of Mucius, and made her a present of a fine horse with sumptuous furniture. After this he concluded a peace with the Romans, restored them all their hostages, and told the Consul, that he looked upon the Roman probity as the best guarantee of the treaty.

And now Porfena being to return to Clusum, signalized his departure from the neighbourhood of Rome by an act of liberality, which the noble manner of it made the more agreeable to the Romans. He ordered his Illetrurians to leave behind them their tents furnished with all sorts of provisions, and other valuable effects, and to carry nothing away with them but their arms. Rome was hereby much relieved in her wants; and the Romans, on this occasion, took up a custom, whenever any effects belonging to the publick were to be sold, of proclaiming them by a herald, in the following words, These are Porfena's goods; the intention of which was, to preserve the memory of that Prince's kindness; and it also signified, that the effects exposed to sale would be sold cheap. More than this, the Senate set up a brazen statue of the King near the Comitium, and sent an embassy to him with a present of a throne, a sceptre, a crown of gold, and a triumphal robe^a.

§. IV. WHEN, after the departure of Porfena, the Romans had rewarded those who had behaved themselves well in the siege, and particularly Mucius Scaevola, to whom they gave a large piece of ground, and erected a statue, their next care was to shew their gratitude to the Gods, by some publick act of religion. The temple of Jupiter Capitolinus, though finished, had not yet been consecrated. It naturally belonged to one of the Consuls to perform the ceremony; and it must prove an immortal honour to whoever should do it. Had the election of the consecrator been in the people, Poplicola would undoubtedly have carried it: but it was the Senate's right to nominate the man; and they being grown envious, and jealous of Poplicola, sent him upon a slight expedition, and, in his absence, commissioned his Colleague to dedicate^b the temple. We are told,

^a These presents being of the same kind with those which the Illetrurians are represented to have sent^{*} to Tarquin the elder by way of recognizing their Sovereignty over them, as a people subdued, give good ground to believe, that Porfena took Rome, and totally subjugated the Romans. Tacitus speaks of it as a thing well known, that the city surrendered to Porfena: Sedem Jovis Optimi Maximi [the capitol] auspicio a Majoribus pignus imperii ceditam, quam non Porfena DEDITA URBE, neque Galli capta temerare potuissent, &c. L. 3. c. 72. Hist. And Pliny says, that in the treaty which Porfena granted the Romans, an express stipulation is found, that they should make no use of iron but for the business of agriculture. In facere quod expulsi Regibus, populo Romano dedit Porfena, nominatim comprehensum invenimus, ne ferro nisi in agricultura uterentur. L. 34. c. 14. See B. 1. c. 6. §. 2.

^b The honour of dedicating a temple was a mark of distinction, which the great men of Rome earnestly solicited. This office, in the earliest times of the Commonwealth, belonged to him of the two Consuls, whom the Senate should appoint. Afterwards the people assembled by Tribes named the Consecrator. At length the right of nomination was again in the Senate, and this even in the time of the Roman Emperors. The dedication of a temple was a solemn festival, accompanied with extraordinary rejoicings.

Year of
R O M E
CCXLVI.
Bæ. J. C.
DVI.

Third
Consulship.
Prim. Popi.
p. 104.

told, that just as Horatius was beginning, at the door of it, to pronounce the form of consecration, Poplicola's brother Mercus, who had watched his opportunity, cried out, Thy son, O Consul, lies dead in the camp: The thing was false, but he hoped by these words to avert him from his purpose. Horatius, without shewing the least emotion, only answered, Then cast the body where you please, I admit not of mourning, and finished the consecration. Thus Poplicola, in the close of his third Consulship, received a sensible mortification: And no necessities of state obliging the people

The altars were then adorned with flowers and garlands; sacrifices were offered up, and hymns sung to instruments. The Magistrate who was to preside at the ceremony, gave the college of the Pontifices notice of the day of the dedication. He summoned the Pontifex Maximus to appear at the temple, and pronounce the words of consecration: after whom, this magistrate repeated them, word for word, with his hand upon the side-post of the door of the temple. He was obliged to be extremely exact in doing it. A syllable forgotten, or ill-pronounced, gave the people an alarm, and they thought it an inauspicious omen to the consecrator. Therefore Natellus, the Pontifex Maximus, who had an impediment in his speech, was several months learning to articulate the word Opifera. It was not lawful to appear at this solemnity in mourning, but only in white clothes.

The name of the magistrate who performed the ceremony of the consecration, was usually inscribed on the frontispiece of the Temple. Thus far F. Cat. and Ronillé.

It may be proper here to take notice once for all of the general names by which the places set apart for divine worship are called in ancient authors.

Templum was a place which had not been only dedicated to some Deity, but withal formerly consecrated by the Augurs.

Ædes Sacra, were such as wanted that consecration; which if they afterwards received, they changed their names to temples. Vid. A. Gell. L. 14. c. 7.

Dilubrum, according to Servius, was a place that under one roof comprehended several Deities.

Ædicula is only a diminutive, and signifies no more than a little Ædes.

Sacellum may be derived the same way from Ædes Sacra. Festus tells us, 'tis a place sacred to the Gods, without a roof. Ken. Antiq. Part 2. B. 1. c. 3.

'Twere endless (adds Mr. Kennet) to reckon up but the bare names of all the temples we meet with in authors. The most celebrated on all accounts were, the Capitol and the Pantheon.

The Capitol, or temple of Jupiter Capitolinus, was the effect of a vow made by Tarquinius Priscus in the Sabine war (a). But he had scarce laid the foundations before his death. His nephew, [son, or grandson] Tarquin the Proud, finished it with the spoils taken from the neighbouring nations (b). But upon the expulsion of the Kings, the consecration was performed by Horatius the Consul (c). The structure stood on a high ridge, taking in four acres of ground. The front was adorned with three rows of pillars, the other sides with two (d). The ascent from the ground was by an hundred steps (e). The prodigious gifts and ornaments, with which it was at several times endowed, almost exceed belief. Suetonius (f) tells us, that Augustus gave at one time two thousand pound weight of gold: and in jewels and precious stones, to the value of five hundred testerces. Livy and Pliny (g) surprize us with accounts of the brazen thresholds, the noble pillars that Sylla removed hither from Athens out of the temple of Jupiter Olympus; the gilded roof, the gilded shields, and those of solid silver; the huge vessels of silver, holding three measures; the golden chariot, &c. This temple was first consumed by fire in the Marian war, and then rebuilt by Sylla; who dying before the dedication, left that honour to Quintus Catulus. This too was demolished in the Vitellian sedition. Vespasian undertook a third, which was burnt down about the time of his death. Domitian raised the last and most glorious of all; in which a: Livy, lib. 1.

in A. Gell. cap. 50.

(b) Ibid.

(c) Paterculus in P. Poplicol.

(d) Dionys. Halicarn.

(e) Tacitus.

(f) Livy, lib. 10, 55, 38. Pliny, lib. 33, &c.

people to continue him longer in office, Sp. Lartius, and T. Herminius, (who had distinguished themselves in the war with Porfena) were chosen Consuls for the next year.

The new Consulship proved a year of peace; the only remarkable thing the Romans did was shewing that they were a grateful people. Aruns, the

Year of
R O M E
CCXLVII.
Bef. J. C.
DV.

Fourth
son Consulship.

the very gilding amounted to twelve thousand talents (b). On which account Plutarch (i) hath observed of that Emperor, that he was like Midus, desirous of turning every thing into gold. There are very little remains of it at present; yet enough to make a Christian church (k).

The Pantheon was built by Marcus Agrippa, son-in-law to Augustus Caesar; and dedicated either to Jupiter Ultor, or to Mars and Venus, or more probably to all the Gods in general, as the very name (quasi Tōv πάντων Θεῶν) implies. The structure, according to Fabrizius (l) is an hundred and forty feet high, and about the same breadth. But a latter Author hath increased the number of feet to an hundred fifty-eight. The roof is curiously vaulted, void places being left here and there for the greater strength. The rafters were pieces of brass of forty feet in length. There are no windows in the whole edifice, only a round hole at the top of the roof, which serves very well for the admission of the light. Diametrically under is cut a curious gutter to receive the rain. The walls on the inside are either solid marble, or incruited (m). The front on the outside was covered with brazen plates gilt, the top with silver plates, which are now changed to lead (n). The gates were brass, of extraordinary work and bigness (o).

The temple is still standing with little alteration, besides the loss of the old ornaments, being converted into a Christian Church by Pope Boniface III. (or, as Polydore Virgil (p) hath it, by Boniface IV.) Dedicated to St. Mary, and all Saints, tho' the general name be St. Mary de Rotonda (q). The most remarkable difference is, that whereas heretofore they ascended by twelve steps, they now go down as many to the entrance (r).

The ceremony of the consecration of temples (a piece of superstition very well worth our notice) we cannot better apprehend, than by the following account which Tacitus gives us of that solemnity, in reference to the Ca- pitol, when repaired by Vespasian: Though perhaps the chief rites were celebrated upon the entire raising of the structure, this being probably intended only for the hollowing the floor. Undecimo Kalendas Julias (s), &c.

‘ Upon the 21st of June, being a very clear day, the whole plot of ground designed for the temple, was bound about with fillets and garlands. Such of the soldiers as had lucky names, entered first with boughs in their hands, taken from those trees which the Gods more especially delighted in. Next came the Vestal Virgins, with boys and girls whose fathers and mothers were living, and sprinkled the place with brook-water, river-water, and spring-water. Then Helvidius Priscus the Prætor, (Plautus Elian, one of the chief Priests, going before him) after he had performed the solemn sacrifice of a swine, a sheep, and a bullock, for the purgation of the floor, and laid the entrails upon a green turf, humbly besought Jupiter, Juno, Minerva, and the other Deities, Protectors of the empire, that they would be pleased to prosper their present undertaking, and accomplish, by their divine assistance, what human piety had thus begun. Having concluded his prayer, he put his hand to the fillets, to which the ropes, with a great stone fastened in them, had been tied for this occasion; when immediately the whole company of Priests, Senators, Knights, with the greatest part of the common people, laying hold together on the rope, with all expressions of joy, drew the stone into the trench designed for the foundation, throwing in wedges of gold, silver, and other metals, which had never endured the fire.’

Some curious persons have observed this similitude between the shape of these old temples, and our modern churches: That they had one apartment more holy than the rest, which they termed Cella, answering to our chancel or choir: That the porticos in

(b) Plutarch in Poplicola.
por. Rem. Antiq. lib. 6. cap. 6.
cap. 8.

(i) Ibid.
(q) Fabriz. cap. 9.

(l) Fabriz. Roma, cap. 9.
(r) Ibid.

(s) Ibid.
(o) Marlian. ibid.

(p) Lib. 6.

son of Publius, being an amiable youth, his father was desirous to have him gain some glory before he disbanded his troops, and therefore gave him the command of an army, which he immediately march'd to Cusum. The young Prince, eager to obtain a first victory, ran furiously upon the Albians, and routed them; but he was afterwards defeated by a strata-

Fourth
Consulship.

D. H. P.
111.

L. 3. 2.

L. 14.

L. 15.

L. 16.

the sides were well adapted to the use of arms, and that our Albians, or best of the country, is an imitation of their Boians.

There are two other temples particularly worth our notice: not so much for the magnificence of the structure, as for the customs that depend upon them, and the remarkable use to which they were put. These are the temples of Satur and Janus.

The first was famous by account of serving for the publick treasury, and the reason of which some fancy to have been, because Satur first taught the Italians to coin money, or, as Plinius conjectures, because in the golden age under Satur, all persons were honest and sincere, and the names of False and Counterfeits unknown in the world (2). But perhaps there might be no more in it, than that this temple was one of the strongest places in the city, and so the fittest for that use. Here were preserved all the publick registers and records, among which were the Libri Equestrum, or great ivory tables, containing a list of all the Tribes, and the schemes of the publick accounts.

The other was a square piece of building (some say of entire brass) so large as to contain a statue of Janus five feet high; with brazen gates of each side, which used always to be kept open in war, and shut in time of peace (3).

But the Romans were so continually engaged in quarrels, that we find the last custom but seldom put in practice.

First, all the long reign of Numa. Secondly, A. U. C. 519, upon the conclusion of the first Punic war. Thirdly, by Augustus, A. U. C. 725, and twice more by the same Emperor, A. U. C. 729. And again about the time of our Saviour's birth. Then by Nero, A. U. C. 811. Afterwards by Vespasian, A. U. C. 824. And lastly, by Constantinus, when, upon Magnentius's death, he was left sole possessor of the Empire, A. U. C. 1105 (4).

Of this custom Virgil gives us a notable description:

*Quædam hæc in porta si memine dicunt.
Pulchra, præterea, præformidine Martis:
Cernitur, et laquei tectis, æternaque feræ
Fides, et, quæ sit, efficitur hinc Janus.
Hæc, quæ sit, efficitur hinc Janus, pugnæ;
Hæc, quæ sit, efficitur hinc Janus, pugnæ;
Hæc, quæ sit, efficitur hinc Janus, pugnæ.
Hæc, quæ sit, efficitur hinc Janus, pugnæ.*

Sacred to Mars, two stately gates appear,
Which stand in the dread of arms and war;
An hundred iron bolts from impious power,
And everlasting bars the dome secure,
And watchful Janus guards his temple door.
Here, when the fathers have ordain'd to try
The chance of battle by their fix'd decree,
The Consul, rich in his Gabinian gown,
And regal pall, leads the procession on;
The sounding hinges gravely turn about,
Reuze the imprison'd God, and let the furies out.

The superstition of consecrating groves and woods to the honour of the Deities, was a practice very usual with the ancients: For, not to speak of these mentioned in the Holy Scripture, Plinius assures us, That trees in old time served for the temples of the Gods. Tacitus reports this custom of the old Germans; Q. Curtius of the Indians, and almost all writers of the old Druids. The Romans too were great admirers of this way of worship, and therefore had their Luci in most parts of the city, generally dedicated to some particular Deity.

The most probable reason that can be given for this practice, is taken from the common opinion, That fear was the main principle of devotion among the ignorant Heathens. And therefore such darksome and lonely places, putting them into a sudden horror and dread, made them fancy that there must necessarily something of divinity inhabit them, which could produce in them such an awe and reverence at their entrance. Ken. 16.

(2) Plinius Hist. Rom. Lib. 15. cap. 3. (3) Plinius Lib. 15. cap. 3. (4) Vid. Marrian. Topog. Rom. Annot. Lib. 3. cap. 2. (x) Vid. Cassiodor. Not. ad Theod. A. 250. cap. 22. (y) Virg. Æn. 7.

gem of the Cumans *, their allies, commanded by more experienced officers. He lost his life; and his scattered troops took refuge in the villages about Rome. The Consuls invited them to the city, sent carriages for the wounded, made provision for their cure at the publick expence, and allotted a quarter in the city for those of them who were willing to settle in it. It was afterwards called the Tuscan or Hetrurian Street.

Year of
R O M E
CCXLVII.
Ref. J. C.
DV.

Fourth
Consulship.
• From Campania.

C H A P. III.

§. I. The Romans, in the Consulship of M. Valerius, (brother of Poplicola,) and P. Posthumius, make war against the Sabines, and twice defeat them.

§. II. The Sabines unite in a national body against Rome, where Poplicola is chosen Consul a fourth time. Appius Claudius leaves the Sabines and comes over to the Romans, with all his followers and dependants. The Sabines are again defeated.

§. III. Poplicola dies. The Sabines upon his death take courage, and renew the war, in the Consulship of P. Posthumius and Menenius Agrippa, who obtain a signal victory over them.

§. IV. An OVATION only is decreed to Posthumius, but a Triumph to Menenius.

§. V. The Sabines are subdued in the succeeding Consulship of Sp. Cassius and Opiter Virginus.

§. I. ROME, since the new modelling of her government, being, as we have already seen, utterly destitute of allies, and always apprehensive lest the ill-extinguished fire of the royalist party should break out into a new flame, the Sabines, who knew her weak condition, thought this a favourable opportunity to put it out of the power of that imperious city to give law any more to her neighbours. They began the war by incursions and depredations on the Roman lands. M. Valerius (brother of Poplicola) and P. Posthumius were now Consuls; and before they would have recourse to arms, they sent envoys in an amicable way to demand satisfaction of the Sabines for the injuries the Republick had suffered; but receiving only a contemptuous answer, they both took the field. The Roman forces were divided into two bodies. Posthumius with one of them encamped near Rome, to prevent a surprize from the Tarquins, who had many friends in the city. Valerius, with the other, posted himself at Tibur upon the Anio, the enemy being encamped on the opposite shore. That part of the river, near which they lay, being by an accident found fordable, Valerius made all his troops pass, and drew them up in battalia on the same side with the enemy. A general engagement quickly ensued. Valerius, assisted by the counsels of his brother, gained some advantage with his right wing, but his left lost ground; it was almost pushed into the river, when Posthumius having notice of the action, came seasonably to the relief of the Romans, charged the enemy in flank, and recovered the day. The Sabine troops would have been entirely cut off, or made prisoners,

Year of
R O M E
CCXLVIII.
Ref. J. C.
DIV.

Fifth
Consulship.
D. Hal. B.
5. p. 305,
306, 307.
Liv. B. 2.
c. 16.

Year of
R O M E
CCXLVIII.
Bet. J. C.
DIV.

First
Consulship.
Plut. Popl.
p. 107.

Plut. B. 36.
c. 15.

Cic. de
Leg. B. 2.

Year of
R O M E
CCXLIX.
Bet. J. C.
DIII.

Sixth
Consulship.

Plut. Vit.
Popl. 108.

D Hal. B.
Livy, B. 2.
c. 16.
Plut. Vit.
Popl. p.
108.

soners, if the night coming on had not given them an opportunity to escape. They left their camp to be plundered, and in separate parties returned home. This was the first considerable advantage Rome gained over her enemies after she became a Republick, and it revived the old Roman confidence. The two Generals were decreed a triumph; but they both entered Rome in the same chariot. As a further reward for Valerius, (who is said by Plutarch to have gained in this same year a second victory over the Sabines, in which he slew 13000 of them without the loss of one Roman), the Republick built him a house, the door opening outwards to the street; whereas the doors of all other houses opened inwards. The design of this distinction was not only to do him honour, but to put him in mind, as often as he went in or out, that he was indebted to the publick for his house. As for Postumius, he was honoured with a privilege, never before granted to any, which was, to have a burial place for himself and his family, within the walls of Rome. Thus did the first Romans keep up an emulation among their Generals, rather by distinguishing marks of honour, than substantial rewards. They did not heap wealth upon them, but taught them to prefer the glory, which attends great actions, to exorbitant riches, which often give umbrage, and are always odious in a Republick.

§. II. THE Sabines the next year having formed the design of uniting in a national body against Rome, and of engaging the Latines to assist them, the Romans thought it adviseable to chuse Poplicola Consul a fourth time, and they once more joined T. Lucretius with him. But it happening at this time, that some women were delivered of monstrous or imperfect births, the people gave way to superstition, and were unwilling to enter upon action, imagining by these presages, that it must prove a fatal year. Upon this, Poplicola caused the Sybil's books to be consulted, and he interpreted the answers in the sense that best suited his purpose; he likewise ordered sacrifices to be offered to Pluto, the festivals and sports to be revived, and in a word, by artful management removed the publick fears.

In the mean while, the storm continued to gather on the side of the Sabines. One of the Tarquins had, by his intrigues, put in motion the turbulent and factious members in their assemblies. Poplicola endeavoured therefore to bear down the interest of the banished King, by negotiation; and he so far succeeded as to gain over ACTIVUS CLAUSUS, (the most considerable man in Sabinia, and of the greatest talents and merit) to oppose the design of renewing the war. He spoke in all the Sabine diets against it; and his opposition had its due weight. But those who envied him for his wealth and power, took occasion from this proceeding to put a bad construction on the good understanding he had with the Romans; and they spread by degrees such a jealousy and distrust of him through the nation, that at length nothing less was talked of than citing him as a traitor to appear before their great Council. Clausus provoked by this unjust treatment, his first thought was to arm his friends and clients, and begin a civil war. No measure could have been more advantageous to Rome: But Poplicola dissuaded him from polluting his hands with the blood blood of his countrymen: He represented to him, that the most honourable and most effectual way to be revenged upon them, would be to leave them; that a man of his consequence, abilities, and virtues, would soon be missed; and that Rome offered him a retreat and protection both for himself and followers. Clausus remained a while in suspense; but at length chose rather to act a proud, than an angry part, and removed to Rome. There he changed his name to Appius Claudius, was immediately declared a Patrician, and took his place in the Senate. Twenty-five acres of land were given him in fee, and a quarter in the city assigned for his friends and followers, amounting to five thousand families; to each of which were granted two acres of ground, with the rights of Citizenship. And these donations were made irrevocable by a decree of the Senate, confirmed by the suffrages of the people.

The Sabines, enraged at the retreat of Clausus to Rome, deferred no longer to take the field. Their army they divided into two bodies, one of which encamped near Fidenæ, the other shut itself up in that town, which was but five miles from Rome. Poplicola and Lucretius made a like division of the Roman troops, and encamped advantageously near each other. The Romans having no opportunity for stratagems, were eager to engage: But the Sabines durst not come to a battle by day-light. Their General (who is said to have been one of Tarquin's sons) formed a design to attack Poplicola's camp in the dead of the night, while the troops of Fidenæ, light-armed, were to march out, and fetching a large compass, come behind, and surprize Lucretius's camp, as soon as he should leave it to go to the succour of his colleague; and then those same troops were to charge Lucretius in the rear, or at least terrify him by their shouts. Poplicola had timely intelligence of these designs, and took proper measures to make them fatal to the enemy. He gave Lucretius notice of the intended night-expedition; and it was agreed between them to shew no marks of suspecting the enemy's intention; in the beginning of the night all fires were put out in both the Roman camps. The Sabines before midnight marched silently towards Poplicola's entrenchments, filled up the ditch with fascines, and passed over to scale the rampart; but as fast as they drew near to it, they were stabbed by the Roman troops, who, unseen, were posted on the outside of it, in the space between it and the ditch. They suffered a great slaughter, before the moon rising discovered their error. Then a fright seized them, they all fled, and the Romans pursued them with loud shouts, which were heard in Lucretius's camp; who immediately detached his horse against those of the enemy, who lay in ambush behind him, while he with his infantry hastened to complete the destruction of those whom Poplicola had routed. In this bloody action 13000 Sabines were killed upon the spot, and 4200 made prisoners.

What now remained, was to reduce Fidenæ, which had been often subdued, and had as often rebelled. Poplicola undertook to scale the walls in person, on that side where the city was thought most impregnable. Having carried the place by assault, he put to death the heads of the revolt,

Year of
R O M E
CCXLIX.
B. C. J. C.
DIII.

Sixth
Consulship.

D. H. I. R.
5. p. 308,
329.

p. 316

Year of ROME CCL. but spared the rest of the inhabitants, obliging them only to surrender to the garrison, which he placed with them, a part of their lands for its support. He then returned to Rome, and was honoured with a triumph.

§. III. POPPLICOLA had scarce resigned the Fasces into the hands of P. Posthumius, (now chosen to the Consulate a second time) and Menenius Agrippa, when he was seized with a distemper, and died, as destitute of the goods of fortune, as full of glory. His chief care had been to transmit his virtues to his children, not to enrich them. Though he had been four times Consul, and had enjoyed two triumphs, he left little more to his posterity than a noble model for their imitation: So that he was buried at the publick expence, not so much by way of distinction, as on account of his poverty. The Romans erected a tomb for him near the Ferum, and gave his family a right of interment in the same place: But as the Valerii always affected popularity, they never made use of this privilege. The bodies of those who died in Rome were first carried to that sepulchre, but afterwards conveyed without the walls, and there burnt; and the bones were deposited in a tomb without the city. As Poplicola had been one of those who stood up in defence of the chastity of the Roman Ladies, they went into a year's mourning for him, as they had done before for Brutus.

D. Hal. B. 5. p. 311. The death of Poplicola revived the courage of the Sabines; they took the field again that same year, and made so sudden an incursion upon the Roman territory, (which they pillaged and laid waste) that one part of their army was advanced to the very gates of Rome, before the Romans had any notice of their approach. Posthumius the Consul sallying out with a good number of men hastily assembled, and chasing those advanced Troops of the enemy to a forest, where the rest of the Sabine forces lay in ambush, was there surprized and defeated, losing many of his Romans, and narrowly escaping himself. He took refuge with the remains of the rout on the top of a steep hill, where he passed the night, invested by the enemy. But the next day his Colleague Menenius coming to his relief with the best part of the Roman youth, the Sabines retired. Nevertheless the advantage they had gained raised their confidence to such a height, that they sent a summons, requiring the Romans to receive the Tarquins, and submit to be governed by their conquerors. They were answered, that Rome commanded the Sabines to lay down their arms, and return to their duty; and that when they had made their submission they should come and ask pardon for their irruptions into her territory, if they expected any indulgence, or had no mind to see the war speedily carried into the heart of their country.

p. 312. These mutual bravadoes were followed by a serious war, in which both nations brought all their strength into the field, and encamped near Eretum, a Sabine city about ten miles from Rome. In the battle which ensued Menenius commanded the right wing, and Posthumius the left. The latter to repair his honour, threw himself, like a man in despair, among the thickest of the enemy, and did prodigious acts of valour; and, as

Menenius

A. A Ram worked by the Soldiers, by mere Strength of Arm
B. Two different sorts of Rams, hung different Ways.

J. B. 1740 sculp

C. Another way of hanging the Ram. D. The Ram Tortoise invented by Polidus of Thessaly. E. A Ram covered with a Shed, and running upon Wheels. F. A Ram which might be raised or sunk, as there was Occasion, either by Springs, or Ropes, and pulleys, according to Hero's Description of it.

Menenius likewise, urged by his example, exerted himself in an extraordinary manner, the Romans, animated by two such Leaders, obtained a complete victory.

Year of
R O M E
CCL.
Bel. J. C.
DII.

§. IV. BUT notwithstanding the equal bravery of the Consuls on this occasion, the Senate, having deliberated on the reception to be given them at their return, thought it necessary to make a distinction in their rewards.

Seventh
Consulship.

Posthumius's gallant behaviour in the late action had not sufficiently atoned for his miscarriage, in suffering himself to be surprized in the former.

They invented therefore a new kind of triumph, less honourable than that in use: The person rewarded with it was to enter Rome on foot, or at

Licinus apud
D. Hal. p.
314.
Pliny, B.
15. c. 29.

best on horseback, attended only by the Senate; his crown was to be of myrtle, and his robe the Prætexta, or common habit of magistrates: and this imperfect triumph, called OVARIO^a, they decreed to Posthumius.

The modest Consul accepted of it, and entered Rome two days before his Colleague, who was honoured with a compleat triumph in all its magnificence and pomp.

§. V. SPURIUS CASSIUS and Opiter Virginius, the succeeding Consuls, divided the Roman forces between them; and Cassius had commission

Year of
R O M E
CCLI.
Bel. J. C.
DI.

to give the Sabines the finishing blow. He defeated them in a pitched battle in the heart of their country, slew 10300, and took 4000 prisoners; after which they humbly sued for peace, and were forced to purchase it with corn, money, and a part of their lands.

Eighth
Consulship.
D. Hal. p.
315, 316.

In the mean time Virginius marched with his army and surprized Camerium, a town of Latium which had revolted from the Romans. Having beat down the wall with his battering^b rams, he took the place by assault, beheaded

^a The Ovation some fancy to have derived its name from shouting Evan! or Evoe! to Bacchus; but the true original is Ovis, the sheep, which was usually offered in this procession, as an ox in the triumph. The show generally began at the Albanian mountain, whence the General, with his retinue, made his entry into the city: he went on foot, with many flutes, or pipes, sounding in concert as he passed along, wearing a garland of myrtle as a token of peace, with an aspect rather raising love and respect, than fear. A. Gellius informs us, that this honour was then conferr'd on the victor, when either the war had not been proclaimed in due method, or not undertaken against a lawful enemy, and on a just account; or when the enemy was but mean and inconsiderable^{*}. But Plutarch has delivered his judgment in a different manner: he believes that heretofore the difference betwixt the Ovation and the Triumph was not taken from the greatness of the at-chievements, but from the manner of performing them: for they who having fought a set battle, and slain a great number of the enemy, returned victors, led that martial and (as it were) cruel procession of the triumph. But those who without force, by benevolence and civil behaviour, had done the business, and prevented the shedding of human blood, to these commanders custom gave the honour of this peaceable Ovation. For a pipe is the ensign or badge of peace, and myrtle the tree of Venus, who beyond any of the other Deities, has an extream aversion to violence and war †. Ken. Antiq. Part II. B. 4. c. 16.

^b The Battering Ram was a great wooden beam, bound about with iron at the end, or armed with a head of iron, representing that of a Ram. The ancients used it, to beat down the walls of a city. Vitruvius ascribes the invention of the Battering Ram to the Carthaginians. They made use, says he, of this sort of battery at the siege of Cadix. At

* Nob. Att. lib. 5. cap. 6.

† Plat. in Marcel.

first,

Year of
R O M E
CCLII.
Ber. J. C.
DI.

Eight
Consulship.

beheaded the most guilty of the inhabitants, sold the rest, and razed the city.

first, it was only a mere beam, or kind of lever, which the besiegers drove against the walls, with repeated blows, by strength of arm. Peribolus, a carpenter of Tyre, taking the hint from the first trial which was made of this machine, fixed up a mast of a ship, to which he hung cross-ways, by cables and iron chains, a huge piece of timber. This heavy, unweildy mass, poised and pushed with violence, threw down the walls of the city besieged. After this manner, as Josephus tells us, B. 3. the Romans set their Ram against Jerusalem. To guard the machine, and those who worked it, from the attacks of the enemy, Cetras of Chaldeen was the first who made a sort of pent-house, or gallery, covered over with skins soaked in water, to preserve it from fire. It went upon wheels, that the Ram, which was hung up within, upon one or two rollers, might be brought forward with greater ease. This was afterwards called the Ram-Tortoise, either because its motion was slow, according to Vitruvius; or, as Vegetius has observed, because the machine resembled the figure of a Tortoise, who puts his head out of his shell, and draws it in again, in like manner as the head of the Ram moved out and in, as there was occasion. Above the Tortoise, there was sometimes raised a centry-box, in the form of a turret, where two soldiers were posted, to observe the motions of the besieged. Vitruvius assures us, that Polydus of Thessaly perfected the Tortoise at the siege which Philip of Macedon, son of Amyntas, laid to Byzantium. The make and disposition of the machine was in this manner. He made a covered gallery, thirty cubits wide, and fifteen high, without reckoning the roof, which itself was seven from the platform to the ridge. Over the roof he raised a little tower, at least twelve cubits wide. It contained four stories, in the uppermost of which were put the Scorpions, and the Catapults. In the lower stories was placed a great quantity of water, to extinguish the fire which might be thrown from the top of the ramparts. Vitruvius makes the length of the Ram a hundred and six feet; Plutarch, eighty only. The Ram-Tortoise is described in these verses of Propertius:

*Dumque Arics cornu murum pulsabat alieno
Vineaque inducunt longa tegebat opus. l. 4.*

Vitruvius, Vegetius, and Justus Lipsius have expatiated upon the different forms of this antient engine of war; but they all amount to the same thing. Those which are here represented, will enable the reader to form a judgment of the rest. C. & R.

CHAP. IV.

§. I. The Latines declare for King Tarquin against the new Republick; but, before they take the field, send an Embassy to Rome with proposals for an accommodation. §. II. A conspiracy is there formed by some of Tarquin's Emissaries, who accompany the Latine Ambassadors. The plot is discover'd and prevented, and the Ambassadors dismiss'd with a refusal of their demands. §. III. The Latines dispatch a second Embassy to Rome with offers of peace, upon new conditions; these are also rejected by the Senate. The Romans prepare for war: but when the Consuls would make the necessary levies, the poorer citizens refuse to serve. §. IV. The cruelty of their creditors is the cause of this mutiny. The debtors demand an absolute remission of their debts. Great disputes arise in the Senate on this occasion. In so dangerous a situation of affairs they judge it necessary to create a DICTATOR, (a sovereign uncontrollable Magistrate) and to this they get the People's consent. §. V. Titus Lartius is appointed to that supreme dignity.

nity. The levies for the war are now carried on without difficulty. After very little action in the field, a truce is made with the Latines for a year; during which the Roman women married into Latium, and the Latine women married at Rome, have leave to return to their respective countries. §. VI. The truce being expired, Posthumius one of the Consuls is named Dictator, and has the sole conduct of the war. He gives the Latines an entire overthrow in the battle of Regillus; after which the whole Nation submits. Tarquin being obliged to quit Latium, retires to Cumæ in Campania, and there in a few months after, dies.

THE next year, when Posthumius Cominius and T. Lartius were Consuls, a very important event gave a new alarm to the rising Republick. The Latine Nation, which had hitherto stood neuter in the quarrel between Rome and her banished King, came at length to a resolution openly to espouse the King's cause. It was Mamilius, Tarquin's son-in-law, who by his pressing instances had brought his countrymen to this determination. M. Valerius, the brother of Poplicola, had just been deputed by the Romans to those of the Latine cities that were nearest Rome, to complain of some of their people, who (by secret direction of the chief men among them) had made inroads and depredations in the territory of the Republick. Hearing that the Latines were assembled in a national council at Ferentinum to deliberate on a war with the Romans, Valerius hastened thither, tho' not invited, and there demanded, as a Deputy from Rome, the chief seat in the Council; a right due to him by the treaties subsisting between the two nations. To this, it was answered, That those treaties had been shamefully violated by the Romans; at whose instigation, as the Deputies from Aricia alledged, Porfena's troops had made that attack upon the Aricians, in which his son Aruns was slain. Some exiles also from Fidenæ and Camerium complained loudly of the cruelty of the Romans. And it was farther added by the Partisans of Tarquin, That the Latine confederacy having been concluded with the King, and not with the Republick of Rome, the latter could claim no benefit from that transaction. The Deputies however, came to no determination that day; it was wholly spent in accusations and replies: but the very day following, when they met again, they refused to admit Valerius into their Assembly; and it was signified to him, that the Latines, thinking themselves, in many instances, greatly injured by the Romans, had resolved to consider at leisure of proper revenge.

It was at this time, and upon the news of the danger that threatened Rome from the Latines, that (according to Livy) the Senate first thought of creating a Dictator; tho' they did not put that project in execution till a more difficult conjuncture. During the present alarm from abroad, they happily discovered a conspiracy formed at home by a number of slaves, who had combined together to seize the capitol, and set fire to the city in several quarters at the same time. The offenders were all crucified.

Year of
R O M E
CCLII.
Bef. J. C.
D.

Ninth
Consulship.
D. Hal. B.
5. p. 316.

p. 327.

Livy, B. 2.
c. 12.
D. Hal. p.
317.

Y. 4 of
R O M E
CCLIII.
Ber. I. C.
F. 319.
Tenth
Consulship.
D. Hal. p.
42.

In the following Consulship of Serv. Sulpitius and Manius Tullius, the Tarquins, in concert with some of the inhabitants of Fidenæ, found means to possess themselves of that City by surprize. Tho' the Roman Senate had good reason to suspect that many of the chiefs of Latium were concerned in this affair, yet were they in no haste to declare war against the Latine people, being well assured that the lower order of men among them were not in the same dispositions with the Nobles, but rather averſe from any rupture with Rome. But as to the Fidenates, the Consul Manius marching with a numerous army, closely invested their City, and reduced them to great extremities. The besieged in their distress implored the assistance of the Latines; and this occasioned a new meeting of the Deputies from the several Cities of Latium.

Here the question was debated, whether a war should be absolutely declared against Rome in favour of Fidenæ and the Tarquins, or whether the Latines should adhere to the ancient treaties between the two States. Those of the Council who hoped for great employments in case of a rupture were very warm for this side of the question, but the richest and the moderate men of the Assembly were of the contrary sentiment, and this was also the most agreeable to the Nation in general. The first however so far prevailed, as to obtain a decree, that an Embassy should be sent to the Romans to exhort them to raise the siege of Fidenæ, and recall their banished King, who on that condition was to engage by oath to grant a general amnesty; the Ambassadors were to allow the Romans a year to consider of these overtures, and to threaten them with a war in case of non-compliance.

The party who carried this point in the Assembly very well knew that the Republick would never listen to such proposals; but they were willing to have some plausible pretext for a breach, as also time to make due preparations for war; and they likewise hoped, that before the year was expired they should find means to gain over to them those of their Countrymen, who now opposed their measures.

§. II. IN the mean time, Tarquin and his sons seeing how averſe the people of Latium were from a war with the Romans, and having little hopes of any advantage from the Embassy proposed, turned their thoughts to a more promising scheme. In the train of the Latine Ambassadors they sent to Rome some Emissaries of their own, who by the help of large sums of money were to kindle an intestine war in the City. It was believed, and with good reason, that two sorts of men would be there found very ready to enter into this design; the slaves and the meaner citizens overwhelmed with debt. The first knew themselves mistrusted by their masters, and wanted only an opportunity to revenge the severe treatment which their fellows had lately suffered; and as for the poor debtors, the cruel usage they daily received from their creditors made them easily believe there could be no change in the government but to their advantage. Tarquin's agents having secretly engaged a multitude of these unhappy men of both sorts to attempt a revolution, the parts they gave them to act were.

were these: The poor Citizens were at an appointed hour to possess themselves of the ramparts and gates of the City, and then to raise a great shout, which was to be the signal for the slaves who lay round their masters to rise and massacre them: The gates of the City were then to be opened, and the exiles were to enter Rome while it was yet streaming with the blood of the Senators.

Year of
R O M E
CCLIII.
Ref. J. C.
Four hundred ninety-nine.

It is almost incredible that of so great a number of vile and mercenary wretches, not one should be tempted by the prospect of rich rewards to betray the secret. Dionysius ascribes the preservation of Rome to a particular providence of God, who had taken this City under his protection. He tells us, that Tarquin's two principal agents, Publius and Marcus (both of his own name and family) were so terrified with nightly visions and frightful dreams, that they durst not proceed in their design, till they had consulted a Diviner; that having asked him in general terms whether it was a proper time to execute a project they had formed, he advised them, By all means to lay aside their project, whatever it was, for that otherwise it would assuredly prove fatal to them; and that upon this, they fearing to be prevented by some of the other Conspirators, went strait to Sulpitius, the only Consul then at Rome, and discovered the whole matter to him. Sulpitius commended them highly, promised them ample recompence, and detained them in his own house, without imparting the secret to any body. Instantly he assembled the Senate, when the first thing done was to call in the Latine Ambassadors, and give them their audience of leave, with an answer to their proposals. The answer was very short. The Consul addressing them by the appellation of Friends and Kinsmen, told them, The surprize the Senate were under, that the Latines, who had been witnesses of the constancy of the Roman People when attacked by all the forces of Portena, should threaten them with a war, unless they would submit to Tyrants, and raise the siege of Fidenæ: And he concluded with a sort of defiance. The Ambassadors being thus dismissed, were conducted out of the City.

Tenth
Consulship.
D. Hal. E.
S. P. 320.

Then Sulpitius laid open to the Fathers the horrible conspiracy of which he had just got information. The truth of the fact seemed not to admit of a dispute; the only question was in what manner to apprehend and punish the guilty; and this was a nice point. To take the conspirators by force from their families and carry them to execution might raise a flame in every quarter of the City, and be attended with fatal consequences: Nor was it by any means expedient to cite them in legal form before the Judges; because should the accused be obstinate in denying the fact, the evidence of the two informers, who were the only witnesses, might be thought insufficient for a capital conviction of Roman Citizens. Sulpitius therefore, to whom the Senate left the whole conduct of this critical affair, took a method which he thought would equally serve to prove the guilt, and secure the punishment. He directed the Senators to get together their friends and clients, and upon a signal to be given, to seize all the strong places of the City, each Senator in that quarter where he lived. The

p. 321.

p. 322.

Year of Roman Knights also were commanded to hold themselves ready in the R O M E houses adjoining to the Forum, to execute the orders they should receive.
 CCLIII. And lest, upon the apprehending of the criminals, their relations or friends Bet. J. C. should raise a sedition, and occasion a bloody conflict between fellow citi-
 Four hun- zens, he sent to his Collegue, who was besieging Fidenæ, to come away dred nine- as soon as it was dark, with a chosen body of his troops, and post them ty-nine. near the ramparts of Rome. These precautions taken, the two informers, Tenth by the Consul's direction, gave notice to the most active and leading men Consulship. of the conspiracy to meet them exactly at midnight in the Forum, under pretence of settling the last measures for the execution of their enterprize. Every thing succeeded according to the Consul's scheme. The Conspirators met at the time and place appointed; the Senators, upon receiving the signal, possessed themselves of the strongest posts in all parts of the City; the Knights invested the Forum, so closely blocking up all the avenues of it, that no-body could possibly escape from thence; and at the same time the Consul Marcius being arrived from before Fidenæ, drew up his troops in the Campus Martius. The next morning, as soon as it was light, both the Consuls, strongly guarded, appeared upon their tribunal, and, having convened the People, discovered to them the conspiracy which had been formed against the common liberty, and produced the witnesses. Leave was given to the accused to make their defence, if they had any thing to say against the evidence; but not one of them had the boldness to deny the fact. Hereupon the Consuls instantly repair'd to the Senate, whence they soon after returned, bringing with them a decree of the Fathers, whereby the right of Citizenship was granted to the two Informers, together with a large pecuniary reward; and the conspirators were condemn'd to death, in case the People approved it.
 This decree being confirmed by the Assembly, the multitude were then ordered to retire, and the criminals were deliver'd up to the soldiers, and put to the sword. And now, as the peace of Rome was thought sufficiently secured by this stroke of severity, the Consuls would receive no accusation against any other accomplices of the treason, but published an Amnesty for all those who had escaped punishment. They also ordered that the Romans should purify themselves by expiations, because they had been constrained to dip their hands in the blood of their Countrymen; after which they appointed sacrifices and thanksgiving to the Gods, and three festival days for the celebration of publick games. A melancholy accident disturbed the general joy on this occasion; the Consul Manius fell from his chariot in the middle of the Circus, and was so grievously hurt that he died a few days after. As the year was near expiring, Sulpitius remained sole Consul to the end of it, the Romans not thinking it worth while to chuse him a new Collegue.

Y. of R.
 352.
 P. 324.
 325.
 Y. of R.
 355.

§. III. FIDENÆ continued to be invested, but was not taken during the following Consulship of T. Æbutius and P. Veturius. But the next year, when T. Lartius and Q. Clælius were raised to that dignity, the former having the conduct of the siege, carried on the attacks with so much skill and vigour, that he at length forced the Fidenates to surrender at discretion.

Year of
R O M E
CCLV,
Bef. J. C.
Four hundred nine-
ty-seven.

The reduction of Fidene struck a terror into the Latines, who had neglected to succour it as they might, and now repented of that neglect. Tarquin, Mamilius, and the Aricians seized the opportunity furnish'd by their present fears, to unite them against the Roman Republick. The Deputies from the Latine Cities^a being assembled at Ferentinum, entered into a confederacy, and bound themselves by oaths never to violate their engagements. However, before they began hostilities, they judged it proper to send to Rome a second Embassy, consisting of some of the principal men of each City in the alliance. These being admitted to an audience of the Senate, complained of the injustice of the Romans, who, they said, had formerly put the Hetrurians upon attacking Aricia; and they added, that the only way for the Republick to avoid the war which threatened her from the Latines, was to submit her quarrel with the Aricians to the decision of the Latine Council. Tho' the Fathers had never been in greater perplexity than at this time, because of the vastly superior strength of the Latine nation, yet they haughtily rejected the proposal; and the war being now looked upon as unavoidable, they turned their thoughts wholly to fortify themselves by alliances, and get assistance from their neighbours. To this end they sent about to the several States with which they were surrounded; but their negotiations proved every-where unsuccessful: The Hernici required time to examine the rights of the two parties; the Rutuli declared for the Latines; the Volsi insulted the Roman Ambassadors; and as for the Hetrurians, they resolved to stand neuter for a while, and then chuse their side, as the events of the war should guide them. These disappointments, how great soever, did not discourage the Senate; but what was worse than all these, the Republick had in her own bosom rebellious children, who refused to lend their aid for the defence of their country.

Twelfth
Consulship.
D. Hal. B.
5. p. 326.

p. 327

§. IV. IN order to a right understanding of the true source of this intestine evil, it will be necessary to call to mind some particulars in the manners, customs, and policy of the Romans, during these early ages of their State.

p. 328.

* Of all the means which the necessities of nature have put men upon inventing for subsistence, the Romans practised only tillage and war. They

M. l'Abbé
Vertot.

^a Livy only says, that 30 Cities of Latium were in the Confederacy against Rome. But D. H. gives us a list of them, by which it appears, that they were not all Cities of the Latines: Ardea, Aricia, Bovilla, Bubentum, Cora, Corventum, Circæum, Corioli, Corbintum, Cabanum, Fortinæum, Gabii, Laurentum, Lanuvium, Lavinium, Lavicum, Numiculum, Norba, Prænestæ, Pedum, Corcotulum or Querquetulum, Satricum, Scapeia, Setia, Tellenium, Tibur or Tivoli, Tusculum, Toleria, Tricrinum and Velitræ.

* N. B. In what follows in the Text, to the year of Rome 371, frequent use has been made of Monsieur Vertot's History of the Revolutions which happened in the Government of the Roman Commonwealth. Care, however, has been taken to avoid many things, in that work, which were found to be the pure product of his imagination, as also many errors or misrepresentations; and to make such Additions to his Accounts as were necessary to the nature of this more general History of Rome.

Year of
R O M E
CCLV.
Bef. J. C.
Four hundred ninety-seven.

Twelfth
Consulship.

D. Hal. &
Varr. de
Re Rust.
L. 2.

lived upon their own harvests, or upon those which they reaped sword in hand in the territories of their enemies. All the mechanick arts, not subservient to these two professions, were unknown at Rome, or left to slaves and strangers. The Romans, generally speaking, from the Senator to the meanest Plebeian, were all husbandmen, and the husbandmen all soldiers: And we shall see in the course of this History, that some of their most renowned Captains were called from the plough to command their armies. The very greatest men in the Republick insured their children to a hard and laborious way of life, to make them the more robust, and the more capable of sustaining the fatigues of war.

This domestick discipline had its rise from the poverty of the first Romans: They afterwards made a virtue of what was the mere effect of necessity; and men of noble minds considered this equal poverty of all the citizens, as the means to preserve their liberty from usurpation. Each citizen had at first, for his subsistence, but two acres of land. Rome afterwards extended her territory by acquisitions from her neighbours. The Romans usually sold one moiety of the lands they conquered, to reimburse the State for the charges of the war, and added to the publick domain the other moiety, which was afterwards either given or let at a small rent to the poorer sort: Such was the ancient custom of Rome, under her Kings. But, after the extinction of the regal power, the Nobles and Patricians, who looked upon themselves to be the only Sovereigns of the Republick, did, under various pretences, appropriate to themselves the best part of those conquered lands, if they lay near their own estates, or were any other ways convenient for them; thus insensibly enlarging their own revenues to the diminution of those of the Republick: Or else, under borrowed names, they caused those portions which were allotted for the subsistence of the poor citizens, to be adjudged to themselves at inconsiderable rates. They afterwards laid them to their other lands, without distinction; and a few years possession and their own great power covered these usurpations. The State lost its revenue; and the soldier, who had spent his blood to enlarge the bounds of the Republick, saw himself deprived of the small portion of land that ought to have been at once his pay and his reward.

The covetousness of some Patricians was not confined to these usurpations only; but when the harvest fell short by the badness of the year, or by the irruptions of enemies, they knew how, by an ill-meant relief, to make themselves a title to their neighbour's field. The soldier, being then entirely destitute, for he had no pay, was forced, for his subsistence, to have recourse to the rich. They lent him no money but at usury; which, in those days, if we may believe Tacitus, was arbitrary. The debtor must engage his small estate; and the cruel assistance he received often cost him his liberty: For the laws allowed the creditor, upon default of payment, to seize his debtor, carry him to his own house, and there treat him like a slave. Both principal and interest were often exacted with stripes and torments; his land was taken from him by accumulated

Tac. Ann.
l. 6. ad
Ann. -53.

cumulated usury; and, under pretence of the observation of the laws and strict justice, the people daily suffered the utmost wrong.

A Government so severe, in a new Republick, quickly raised a general discontent. Those of the Plebeians who were oppressed with debts, and afraid of being arrested by their creditors, applying themselves to their Patrons and the most disinterested among the Senators, represented to them their extream want, the difficulty they had to bring up their children, and how hard a case it was, that after fighting successfully against the Tarquins in defence of the publick liberty, they should be exposed to become the slaves of their fellow-citizens.

These complaints were followed by secret menaces; and the Plebeians, finding no redress of their grievances, at length broke out into open sedition, under the Consulate of T. Lartius and Q. Clælius, on occasion of the powerful confederacy formed against the Commonwealth, by the Latines and their allies. As Rome had no soldiers but her own citizens, it was necessary to make the people take arms; but the poorer sort, and especially such as were plunged in debt, declared, that it was the business of those who enjoyed the dignities and riches of the Republick, to defend it; that, for their own parts, they were weary of exposing their lives every day for Masters so cruel and insatiable. Accordingly, they refused to give their names^a in, to be listed for the service. The hottest of them said boldly, that they were no more tied to their native country, where ^a It was the province of the Consuls to direct the levying of men for the war. The two Consular armies, generally speaking, consisted at this time of four legions, each containing at least four thousand two hundred foot, and three hundred horse. The manner of making the levies was as follows.

After the Consuls had chosen twenty-four Tribunes, (or Colonels) fourteen from among the Roman Knights, and ten from among the Plebeian families, six of these Tribunes were appointed to every legion, to command and lead it: And it was the business of all the Tribunes to chuse their soldiers in the following manner. Every tribe of the Roman people was brought into the area before the capitol, one tribe after another, according to the order in which it was their lot to be summoned. The first tribe called was divided according to the order of the classes, regard being had to their superiority, i. e. their riches. After this, four persons, who were of age to serve, were called out of these classes; and the Tribunes of each legion chose one of the four into their legion. The Tribunes of the first legion chose the first man, the Tribunes of the second legion the second man, and so on.

When these four were thus distributed, four others were called; and then the Tribunes of the second legion had their turn of chusing the first man: So that the Tribunes of each legion had the first choice, one after another, according to the order of their legion; and every legion was very near equally furnished with good men. After a certain number of soldiers were chosen out of one tribe, another was called in; and the same number was chosen out of that, in the same manner, till the legions were sufficiently full.

Here we must observe, that the Roman Knights, as being higher in rank, came sooner to the Tribuneship than the Plebeians. But neither of them could be chosen Legi-nary Tribunes, till they had served half of the time the laws prescribed them. Thus the Knights who were obliged to ten years service, might be promoted to the Tribuneship after five campaigns, whereas the Plebeians could not come to it till after ten years service in the Army, because they were obliged to serve twenty complete. The latter were called Seniores Tribuni; and the former, Juniores Tribuni. C. & R.

Year of
R O M E
CCLV.
Bef. J. C.
Four hundred ninety-seven.
Twelfth
Consulship.

Y. of not an inch of land was left them in property, than to any other Country
 1. O M E though never so remote; that at least there they should have no debts to CCLV. pay; that the only way to free themselves from the tyranny of their cre-Ber. J. C. ditors was to leave Rome: and they loudly threatened to abandon the Four hun- City, unless all debts were abolished by a Senatus-consultum.
 dred nine-
 ty-seven.

Twelfth The Senators, much disturbed at a disobedience so little different from Consulship. a barefaced rebellion, immediately assembled: Various opinions were D. Hal. B. given. M. Valerius, the brother of Poplicola, and who after his example
 c. p. 328, affected popularity, represented to the Fathers, That most of the poor Ple-
 329. beians had been forced to contract debts only by the misfortunes of war; that if in such a conjuncture as this, when a great part of Italy had espoused the cause of Tarquin, they did not redress the grievances of the people, it was to be feared, despair might drive them into the Tyrant's party; and the Senate, by stretching their authority too far, might lose it all in the re-establishment of the Royalty. Several of the Senators, and especially those who had no debtors, declared themselves of the same opinion; but it was rejected with indignation by the rich usurers. Appius Claudius also opposed it, but from different motives. Austere in his manners, and a severe observer of the laws, he maintained, that no alteration could be made in these, without endangering the Republick. Though he commise-rated the condition of the poor, (many of whom were daily relieved by his bounty) he nevertheless declared in full Senate, that they could not with justice refuse the authority of the laws to such creditors as would prosecute their debtors with rigour; that justice was the surest support of a State; that there was no abolishing the debts of particular persons without ruining the publick faith, the only bond of society; that the people themselves, in whose favour this unjust decree was proposed, would be the first sufferers by it; that in any new necessity they would get no Succour from the rich; that the discontent of the great was no less to be feared than that of the people, and that perhaps the former would not easily bear to be stript of that wealth, which had been left them by their ancestors, or was the fruit of their own temperance and œconomy. He added, that Rome, at the beginning, assigned no greater portions of land to the Pa- tricians than to the Plebeians; that these latter had but lately shared the estate of the Tarquins; that they had often got considerable booty in war, and that if they had squandered it all away in extravagant living, there was no reason why they should be reimburs'd at the expence of those who had lived with more prudence and good management: That it should be further considered, that those of the mutineers who made the most noise, were Plebeians of the very lowest classes, and who in battle were usually placed only in the wings or in the rear of the legions; that most of them were armed with nothing but slings; that there was neither great service to be expected, nor great danger to be feared from such soldiers; that the Republick in losing them, would suffer but a very inconsiderable loss; and that to despise the sedition was sufficient to quell it, and make the authors of it submit themselves to the clemency of the Senate.

Some

Some of the Fathers who were for finding a medium between two opinions so extremely opposite, proposed, that, without cancelling the debts, they should take away the creditors power over the persons of their debtors. Others were for remitting the debts of those only who were notoriously unable to pay. Some again, to save the publick faith, and at the same time satisfy the creditors, proposed to pay them out of the publick treasury. And lastly, it was the judgment of others, that such of the citizens as had been ^a sold, or were in danger of being sold, to satisfy their debts, should be redeemed from slavery, by giving the creditors other slaves in their room.

Year of
R O M E
CCLV.
Bef. J. C.
Four hundred ninety-seven.

Twelfth
Consulship.
D. Hal. p.
333.

The Senate adopted none of these schemes; but, in order to pacify the people, and engage them to take arms in defence of the state, they decreed a suspension of all prosecutions for debt till the end of the war.

This condescension of the Fathers was owing to the fear of the foreign enemy. But a great many of the Plebeians, grown bolder for the same reason, declared, that they would either have an absolute remission of all debts, or leave it to the rich and great to take care of the war, and defend a city, in whose safety they thought themselves no longer concerned, and which indeed they were ready to leave. The number of the mal-contents increased daily; for, among the people, many who had no debts of their own, could not help complaining of the severity of the Senate, either through compassion for the debtors of their own order, or out of that secret aversion which every man naturally has to behold, in others, a spirit of domination.

Though the richest of the Plebeians, and especially the clients of the Nobles, had no part in the sedition; yet the separation which the mal-con-

^a When the debtor was insolvent, the creditor had a right to put him in irons, or to sell him as a slave. Sometimes he was cruel enough to whip him unmercifully. After a certain number of summons's, the law granted to the debtor thirty days of grace, to give him time to raise the sum for which he was accountable. These are the words of the law: Æris confessi, rebusque jure judicatis triginta dies justi sunt. Post dein manum endo jacito—Vincito aut nervo aut compedibus—After the thirty days were expired, if the debtor had not discharged the debt, he was led to the Prætor, who delivered him up to the mercy of his creditors. These bound him and kept him in chains, for the space of sixty days. Afterwards, for three market-days successively, this debtor was brought to the tribunal of the Prætor. Then a publick Crier proclaimed, in the Forum, the debt for which the prisoner was detained. Oftentimes there were found rich persons who redeemed the prisoners, by paying their debts. But if no-body appeared in behalf of the debtor, after the third market-day, the creditor had a right to sell him, or to imprison and make him a slave in his own house; which was called Coercition. Such imprisoned slaves were styled Nexi, and not Servi, because their slavery lasted no longer than till their debts were paid. This Coercition was afterwards changed into publick imprisonments, which was a less rigorous punishment than the slavery the debtors underwent in their creditors houses. Cat. & Rouillé.

It has been thought, that, by one of the Decemviral laws, expressed in these terms, Si plures sint, quibus reus sit addictus, tertius nundinis partes secanto; si plus minusve secuerint, sine fraude esto, if an insolvent debtor had several creditors, they could cut his body into as many parts, and so share him among them. But it is not probable that the law had any such meaning. Doubtless by cutting or dividing the debtor, we ought to understand dividing the price of his body sold. Bynkershoek. L. 1. C. 1.

tents.

Year of
R O M E
CCLV.
B.C. 51.
Fourth
Consulship.

Twelfth
Consulship.
D. Hal. p.
314

tents threatened, and their obstinate refusal of taking arms, were of dangerous example, especially at a time when the Republick was going to be attacked by the greater part of the Latine forces, commanded by the sons and son-in-law of Tarquin. The Senate might indeed have prosecuted the most active in the mutiny; but then the Lex Valeria, which allowed appeals to the assembly of the people, was a shelter for the guilty, who were sure of being acquitted by the accomplices of their sedition. To elude the effect of a privilege that put such a restraint upon their power, the Fathers resolved to create one supreme Magistrate, who, with the title of Dictator^a, should be equally above the Senate and assembly of the People, and be invested with absolute authority. And in order to obtain the people's consent, it was represented to them in a publick assembly, that in so difficult a conjuncture, when they had their domestick quarrels to decide, and the enemy to repulse at the same time, it would be expedient to put the Commonwealth under a single Governor, who, superior to the Consuls themselves, should be arbiter of the laws, and as it were the father of his country: That, nevertheless, lest he should abuse his uncontrollable authority, by making himself a Tyrant, they ought not to trust him with it above six months.

P. 335.

P. 336.

§. V. THE people^b not foreseeing the consequences of this change, agreed to it; and then the only thing that remained, was to pitch upon a man duly qualified for so great and important a trust. Titus Lartius, one of the present Consuls, appeared to the Senate to be of all men the most unexceptionable; yet they were unwilling to offend his Colleague by an invidious preference. The expedient they fell upon was to give the two Consuls the power of naming the new Magistrate, but with this limitation, that he should be one of the two, not doubting but Clælius would readily yield to the superior talents of Lartius. Nor were they disappointed in this expectation. But then Lartius, no way behind his Colleague in modesty or generosity, with the same readiness remitted the high honour in question to him; and a contest arose between them, which of the two should advance the other to sovereign authority. The dispute did not end the first day; but the day following, when the Senate met again upon this weighty affair, Clælius finding that he could no otherways prevail, started up on a sudden, and after the manner of an INTERREX proclaimed Titus Lartius Dictator, instantly abdicated the Consulship, and descended from the tribunal.

This

^a This Magistrate was also called, Magister Populi and Prætor Maximus.

^b It seems not improbable, that the people were induced to consent to this change, partly from the flattering hopes which persons in distress usually conceive from all unexperienced changes in the Government; and partly from the knowledge their leaders had of the temper and character of the person destined to the High Office in question: For we shall find that Lartius was a friend to the poor Plebeians.

^c It became the custom for this Magistrate to be chosen only in the night viwa voce, by one of the Consuls; and this choice was to be confirmed by the divination from birds.

This new kind of Government erected at Rome, might be called an absolute Monarchy in a Republick, tho' not durable. The moment the Dictator was named, he had power of life and death over all the Citizens of every degree, and without any appeal^a. The authority and the functions of all other Magistrates ceased, or were subordinate to his. He had the naming of the General of the Horse, who served as his Lieutenant-General, and was wholly at his command. Twenty-four lictors, armed with axes, (as those of the Kings had used to be) attended him. He might raise troops or disband them at his pleasure. Whenever war was declared, he commanded the armies, without being obliged to consult either the People or the Senate concerning his Enterprizes; nor, when his authority expired, was he obliged to give an account of any thing he had done during his administration.

Year of
R O M E
CCLV.
Bef. J. C.
Four hundred ninety-seven.

Twelfth
Consulship.
First Dictatorship.
D. Hal. B.
s. p. 336.
Livy, B. 2.
c. 18.

T. Lartius being invested with this great dignity, named, without the participation either of Senate or People, Spurius Cassius Viscellinus for General of the Horse; and in all his proceedings, tho' he was indeed one of the most moderate of the whole Senate, he outwardly affected a stately reserve, and a peremptory manner, to awe the People into their duty. They found that under so resolute a master, who would not fail to make an example of the first that should rebel, submission was the only course they had to take.

D. Hal. p.
338.

All mutiny and murmurings being thus silenced, the Dictator commanded a Census to be taken of the people according to the institution of King Servius Tullius; and there appeared to be in Rome 150700 men who were past the age of puberty. Out of these he formed four armies. The first he allotted to himself, the second to Clælius, his late Collegue, the third to Cassius; his General of the Horse; and these three were to take the field against the Latines; the fourth, under the command of the Dictator's brother, Spurius Lartius, was to stay in Rome and guard the City.

The Latines were not so forward in their preparations for the war as their menaces had given cause to fear they would be; so that there was little action this campaign. The Dictator having intercepted a detachment which they had sent to ravage the Roman territory, treated the prisoners more like allies than enemies. He caused particular care to be had of the wounded, and set all at liberty ransom free. By this humane and skilful conduct, he disposed the Latines, to listen the more readily to the overtures which he at the same time made them for a suspension of arms. Notwithstanding all that Tarquin and Mamilius could do to hinder it, a truce was soon after agreed to for a year. And then Lartius seeing

p. 339.

His power was confined in two other respects besides that of time. He was not allowed to march out of Italy, lest he should take advantage of the distance of the place to attempt something against the common liberty; and he was always to march on foot, except in case of a tedious or sudden expedition, and then he formally asked leave of the people to ride.

^a This was doubtless the intention of the Senate at the time when a Dictator was first created: But we shall hereafter find an appeal from the sentence of a Dictator to the assembly of the people.

the Republick in tranquillity, resigned the Dictatorship, tho' the time appointed for its duration was not yet expired; and, what is remarkable, no citizen had been punished with death or banishment, or in any manner severely treated during the whole continuance of his uncontrollable power.

Year of
R O M E
CCLVI.
Bet. J. C.
Four hundred ninety-six.

The following Consulship of Sempronius Atratinus and Minutius Augurens, produced nothing memorable relating to war or conquest. The Senate seem to have been chiefly taken up with a compassionate concern for the Roman women married to Latine husbands. It was feared they might suffer by the rupture between the two nations. A decree therefore was passed by the Fathers, and confirmed by the People, (in consequence doubtless of an agreement made with the Latines) that the Latine women who were willing to leave Rome and return to Latium, and the Roman women who were willing to come back from Latium to Rome, should have liberty to quit their husbands and return to the respective countries of their nativity; and it was ordered, with regard to their children, that the boys should remain with their fathers and the girls follow their mothers. How agreeable a place Rome was to wives most remarkably appeared on this occasion. For out of the great number of Latine women who had married Roman husbands, only two went back to Latium; but almost all the Roman women, married to Latines, left their husbands and returned to their native City.

Year of
R O M E
CCLVII.
Bet. J. C.
Four hundred ninety-five.

§. VI. THE year of truce with the Latines was expired, when Aulus Posthumius and T. Virginius took possession of the Consulship. The Nobles of Latium, who were in the interest of Tarquin, carried all before them in the assemblies of the States, contrary to the inclination of the people, many of whom came with their families to Rome, where they were well received. It was necessary therefore to prepare for war; and tho' there were no dissensions at this time between the Senate and People, it was judged proper to put the conduct of it into the hands of a Dictator: The Consuls had the power given them, as before, to name one of themselves to that dignity; whereupon Virginius, tho' the elder of the two, readily yielded it to his Colleague as the more able Commander.

Year of
R O M E
CCLVIII.
Bet. J. C.
Four hundred ninety-four.

Posthumius having named Æbutius Elva to be his General of the Horse, divided the Roman forces, as the former Dictator had done, into four bodies; one he commanded himself, put another under the conduct of his late Colleague Virginius, the third under Æbutius, and committed the fourth to Sempronius, with the Government of the City. News was presently brought, that the Latines had forced the castle of Corbio, a strong hold belonging to the Republick, and put the garrison to the sword; and that this small advantage gained by the enemy had determin'd the Volsi of Antium to join them. Posthumius immediately marched from Rome with 5000 men, and encamped in the night near the lake *Regillus, upon a steep hill which was inaccessible on every side. Virginius following soon after with his troops, posted them on another hill over against the Dictator; the Latine army, which consisted of 40000 foot and 3000 horse, under the command of Sextus Tarquinius, Titus Tarquinius, and Mamilius, lying lying between them. As Posthumius had no intention to fight, but only to observe and tire out the enemy, he sent word to Æbutius to march secretly in the night with the cavalry and light-armed infantry, and take possession of a third hill, upon the only road by which provisions could come to the Latines. The General of the Horse obey'd his order; but before he could fortify his camp, he was briskly attack'd by a body of the enemy under Sextus Tarquinius, who endeavoured to dislodge him: However, the Dictator sending him a timely reinforcement, the Latines were repulsed with loss, and retired. After this Æbutius intercepted two couriers who were carrying letters from the Volsi to the Latine Generals, importing that a considerable body of that people would join the Latine forces in three days. Posthumius hereupon drew his three bodies of Romans together; for tho' they amounted to no more than 23700 foot and 1000 horse, necessity constrained him now to hazard an engagement without delay.

Year of
R O M E
CCLVII.
Bef. J. C.
Four hundred ninety-five.
Fourteenth
Consulship.
D. Hal. B.
6. p. 344,
345.

It was the custom for Generals to harangue their troops, before they led them to battle; and the Dictator may be said to have had at this time the better part of the Roman Nation for his auditors. The Senate almost to a man were come to serve as volunteers. Indeed there was no way of rising to offices of dignity and power but by long and painful service in the troops; but now even the oldest Senators had taken arms in defence of their country. Posthumius in his speech to the soldiers, (after he had put them in mind of the miseries they must expect from the return of the Tarquins, and had encouraged them not to fear the superior numbers of a faithless enemy whom their fathers had so often vanquished) took particular notice of this, that in the present exigence, the most ancient and venerable had covered their grey hairs with the helmet. He added: And shall the young, the healthy and strong be unactive and fearful? Shall they be so shameless to turn their backs upon the enemy, when the old and the infirm are resolved either to conquer or die? I declare, that whoever shall this day be guilty of so base a cowardice, shall be put to death by my order, and his dead carcase deprived of the rites of burial: But he that shall bring me witnesses of his having signalized his courage in the battle, shall, beside the usual honours decreed to men of distinguished bravery, receive from the publick an estate in land, as an additional recompence of his merit.

Having thus spoken, the Dictator drew up his army in order of battle; Liv. B. 2. and the Latines, depending on their numbers, and beginning to want provisions, did not decline the fight. Titus Tarquinius was in the center of their army at the head of the exiles and deserters from Rome; Mamilius^a commanded the right wing, and Sextus Tarquinius the left. In the Roman army the Dictator led the main body, Æbutius the left wing, and Virginus the right.

In this battle, which proved very obstinate and bloody, the Generals of the two armies did not confine themselves to giving orders, but exposed

^a Dionysius leaves it uncertain, whether this Mamilius was the son-in-law of Tarquin the Proud, or the son of that son-in-law.

Year of
R O M E
CCLVII.
Bef. J. C.
Four hundred ninety-five.

Fourteenth
Consulship.
D. Hal. p.
349.

Liv. B. 2.
c. 19.

q. 20.

D. Hal. p.
350.

their persons in the hottest of the conflict, and mutually charged one another. Titus ^a Tarquinius, coming out from the center of the Latines, ran full speed at the Dictator Posthumius to encounter him singly; but receiving a wound in his right side, fell from his horse, and was carried by his own men out of the field. The battalions of the main body having now lost their Leader, (who was mortally wounded) made but a faint resistance, when pressed by the troops of the Dictator. They were already losing ground and beginning to break, when Sextus Tarquinius coming up with the choice of the Latine cavalry and supported by the exiles, took the place of his brother. Encouraged by the presence and valour of this new Commander, the disheartened Latines recovered their ranks, renewed the fight, and made the success of the day in the center doubtful.

In the wings where Mamilius and Æbutius commanded, the fury of the battle was equal. After a long and bloody conflict, the two Commanders defy'd each other to single combat; Æbutius with his lance wounded Mamilius in the breast through his cuirass; and Mamilius ran his sword through Æbutius's right arm. Neither of the wounds was mortal, but both Generals fell from their horses and were carried out of the throng. Æbutius's place was then supply'd by his Lieutenant Marcus Valerius, (the brother of Poplicola.) He put himself at the head of the Roman horse, and with them endeavoured to break the enemy's battalions; but the cavalry of the Roman Royalists, advancing to their succour, quickly repulsed the cavalry of the Republick; and Mamilius, not disabled by the hurt he had received, appeared again in the van with a considerable body of horse and light-armed infantry. In this action Valerius receiving a wound in his side fell dead from his horse; which occasioned the battle to be renewed with more fierceness than ever. The two nephews of the deceased (the sons of Poplicola) fought with inexpressible courage to hinder the dead body from being stript; and having recovered it from the enemy, they delivered it to Valerius's servants to be conveyed to the Roman camp: But throwing themselves afterwards into the midst of the enemy, they were both killed upon the spot.

The loss of Valerius and his two nephews, and especially the absence of Æbutius, greatly disheartened the left wing of the Romans. Posthumius perceiving that the soldiers began to give ground, hastened to their assistance with a body of Roman Knights who attended him as his guard. He gave orders at the same time to Titus Herminius, one of his Lieutenants, to repair to the rear of the army, command those who fled to stop, and put all to the sword who would not obey. And now the Dictator himself with his Knights giving the reins to their horses, drove with the utmost fury upon the Royalists, broke them, slew many of them, and put the rest to flight. Herminius in the mean while rallied the run-aways, and returning presently to the charge, fell upon some close battalions of the enemy's right wing which still kept their ground. His chief aim was at the person of Mamilius who commanded them, and who was easily known by his tall stature, and the richness of his habit and armour. The Roman, to come at him, beat down all that stood in his way; he then attacked him, and with his first blow laid him dead upon the ground: Nevertheless he lost his own life by a wound from an unknown hand, while he was busy in stripping the Body of his enemy.

^a Livy (B. 2. c. 19.) makes King Tarquin himself to be the person who attacked Posthumius; which is very strange, considering, that he supposes him to be the Son of Tarquinus Priscus. See Remarks on the Hist. of the Rom. Kings, Article Tarquinus Priscus.

Year of
R O M E
CCLVII.
Bef. J. C.
Four hundred ninety-five.

During all this time Sextus Tarquinius, who had returned from the center of the Latines, and put himself again at the head of the left wing, maintained the fight with great bravery against the Consul Virginus. He had even broke the right wing of the Roman Army, when Posthumus appeared on a sudden with his victorious squadrons, to support it. This unexpected turn of affairs made Sextus lose at once all hopes of victory. Rushing therefore among the thickest ranks of the Roman Knights, he there sunk under a multitude of wounds, after he had sold his life dear.

Fourteenth
Consulship.
D. Hal. p.
350.

The death of Sextus Tarquinius was followed by the entire rout of the Latines, who had before lost their two other Generals. Their camp was taken the same day, and the plunder abandoned to the Roman Soldiers. No victory, hitherto gained by the Romans, had been either more necessary or more compleat. Scarce 10000 of the 43000 Latines who had come into the field, returned home. The whole Nation, for a long time after, felt this severe stroke; nay, it may be truly said, they never recovered of the blow which they received in the battle of Regillus.

Posthumus, the next morning, distributed the usual rewards to those who had behaved themselves well in the action, and returned thanks to the Gods by sacrifices. Scarce were these ceremonies ended, when the scouts brought intelligence, that a great body of troops covered the plain, and was marching in order of battle. It was the Volsi come to the assistance of the Latines. Finding at their arrival how matters had gone, some of them were for falling upon the Romans before they could recover from the fatigue of the preceding day; but another party, willing rather to ingratiate themselves with the Conquerors, prevailed to send messengers to the Dictator, to tell him, they came to his assistance. Posthumus convicted them of falshood by their letters which he had intercepted; and giving leave to the messengers to return, whom the multitude would have torn to pieces, he resolved to attack the Volsian army the next day: but in the night they broke up their camp and fled.

p. 351.

p. 352

The Dictator at his return to Rome was honoured with a triumph: and to his other names was added that of Regillensis, from the place of the late action. He allotted a tenth part of the spoils to defray the expences of the publick Games, and to build some temples in honour of the Gods; particularly one to Castor and Pollux, who were said to have appeared during the battle of Regillus upon white Horses, and to have fought for the Romans.

The

* Dion. Hal. relates a fabulous story of two young horsemen, of an extraordinary and majestick stature, who during the action appeared to Posthumus and his party. They marched

Var. 1. The Latins having now no remedy, but in an absolute submission, chose
 8. 10. 11. deputies out of the cities which had opposed the war, to be mediators at
 8. 11. 12. Rome, in favour of the whole Nation. These appeared in the Senate,
 8. 12. 13. bearing in their hands olive branches bound round with wool, the usual
 8. 13. 14. marks of suppliants. They laid the blame of the rupture wholly upon the
 8. 14. 15. Nobility of the country under the influence of the Tarquins. They repre-
 8. 15. 16. sented in a moving strain the loss they had sustained of all the flower of
 8. 16. 17. their youth; that scarce a family in Latium was out of mourning. They
 8. 17. 18. conjured the Romans to have regard to consanguinity, and the zeal which
 8. 18. 19. the Latins had formerly shewn for the interests of Rome; and in conclu-
 8. 19. 20. sion, they yielded themselves wholly to the judgment of the Fathers, laying
 8. 20. 21. at the feet of the Dictator the badges which they bore of suitors and
 8. 21. 22. suppliants.

Rome, had long since made it a maxim, to spare the Nations which submitted; and Titus Lartius, the late Dictator, declared himself for observing it in the present case. He advised a total oblivion of the fault committed by the Latins, and a renewal of the ancient treaties with them.
 Nevertheless the Senate was not without some severe men, who were for razing all the cities of Latium, seizing their territories, and reducing the inhabitants to slavery. Among these was Spurius Cassius. Others were for depriving them of half their lands, by way of punishment; and, in consideration of kindred and blood, for leaving them in possession of their liberty. But the opinion of Lartius being approved by Posthumius, there was no further opposition to it; and a Decree was accordingly passed for renewing the old League; on condition however, that the Latins restored the prisoners they had taken, delivered up the deserters, and drove the Roman exiles out of Latium.

Such was the end of the last war which the Romans had with their
 D. Hall. P. neighbours on account of their banished King. As for Tarquin himself,
 353. the only person now left of his family, being abandoned by the Latins, Utrurians, Sabines, and all the other free States about Rome, he retired marched at the head of the cavalry, striking terror among the Latins, whom they wounded with darts and lances. In the evening, after the victory, the same horsemen appeared at Rome in the Forum. Their fierce and threatening countenances, and their horses all dropping with sweat, made people conclude that they were returned from the battle. When they had dismounted, they washed themselves in the water of a spring that rose near the temple of Vesta; and they told the crowd of citizens, who surrounded them, the first news of the victory gained by the Romans; after which, they disappeared.
 The next morning the Magistrates receiving letters from the Dictator, which among the other circumstances of the battle mentioned the sudden appearance of the two young horsemen, who fought for the Romans, it was concluded they were the same who had brought the news to Rome, and that they could be no other than Castor and Pollux.
Plutarch in his life of Paulus Æmilius, adds to this relation, that Lucius Domitius was the first who was informed by Castor and Pollux, of the entire defeat of the Latins: and to make the fable still more wonderful, the same author affirms, that, Domitius having appeared surprized at the account, the two horsemen took him gently by the beard, and it immediately changed its colour from black to red; which miracle confirmed the relation, and got Domitius the surname of Æno- barbus Brazen-beard: and this story, fabulous as it is, was believed among the Romans.
 They transmitted it to posterity by publick monuments, which were still subsisting in the time of Dionysius.

into Campania to Aristodemus, Tyrant of Cumæ. Here he shortly after ended his days, at about 90 years of age, and after 14 years exile, which he had made remarkable, by almost as many wars.

It must be granted, that Tarquin had several of those endowments and qualifications which enter into the character of a Hero; intrepid courage; experience in arms; an excellent capacity for negotiations; an address whereby, even in banishment, and when divested of all power, he could alienate from the Romans their ancient Allies, and unite those Allies against his enemies; an invention fruitful in expedients; and a steady resolution never to quit his claim to Empire but with life. All these made an assemblage of qualities not to be despised. But with these he had also in his nature such a strange composition of the most extravagant vices, as could not but prove fatal to his usurped tyranny. And as a judicious * writer has observed, had not the death of the unfortunate Lucretia administered to the Roman people an opportunity of liberty, yet a far slighter matter would have served them for a specious reason to endeavour the assertion of their rights.

The freedom which the Romans recovered by the expulsion of Tarquin the Proud was now secured to them by his death; a freedom that was indisputably the source of all their future grandeur. Nevertheless it is the opinion of Livy, that this very freedom, had they assumed it more early, and wrested the Royal Power from any of their former Princes, would have proved the ruin of the rising state. For what, says he, would have been the consequence, if that commonalty, made up of herdsmen and outlaws from other countries, who found refuge and impunity at Rome, if they, being set free by some Brutus from the dread of Majesty, had begun to be ruffled and agitated by the storms of Tribunician fury, and, in a strange City, to engage in quarrels with the Nobles, before the pledges of wives and children, and an affection (not quickly entertained) for the very place and soil, had associated their hearts, and linked them together in one common interest. Certainly the State not yet come to maturity, would through discord have faded and perished; whereas a peaceable and gentle government fostered and cherished it, and by a proper nourishment brought it to such strength and perfection as to be able to produce the wholesome fruits of liberty.

How just this reflection of the Latine historian is, will sufficiently appear by the events which come next to be related.

C H A P. V.

§. I. Domestick broils at Rome. §. II. The Volsci encouraged thereby, prepare to fall upon the Romans. The Plebeians refuse to list themselves for the war. Servilius, one of the Consuls, with an army of volunteers, who follow him out of personal affection, terrifies the enemy into a submission for the present; but he has no sooner led back his army, when they renew their preparations to attack the Republic. §. III. While the Senate are

Year of
R O M E
CCLVII.

Bef. J. C.
Four hundred ninety-five.

Fourteenth
Consulship

* Kenn: Antiq.

Liv. B. 2.
c. 1.

consulting about the levies to be made on this occasion, a sudden accident occasions an insurrection at Rome. Servilius appeases the tumult. News comes that the Volsci are approaching. Servilius by fair promises in relation to the debts engages the people to lift themselves. §. IV. He defeats the enemy, and, tho' the Senate refuse him a triumph at his return, on account of his indulgence to the soldiers, he triumphs in spite of their opposition. §. V. After this he takes the field again, and defeats the AURUNCI. §. VI. The debtors at his return from the war claim the performance of his promises. Servilius, not having power to make them good, is treated by the people with contempt. He thereupon becomes their enemy, and the sedition increases.

D. Hal. B.
6. p. 338,
& seq.

Year of
R O M E
CCLVIII.
Ref. J. C.
Four hundred ninety-four.

Fifteenth
Consulship.

§. I. SCARCE was the dangerous war with the Latines over, and the Dictatorship of Posthumius expired, when the domestick feuds and dissensions at Rome revived. The Senate, who thought it needless any longer to court the people, or even to shew them any condescension, revoked, by a decree, that suspension of the suits for debt, which nothing but necessity had before induced them to grant. The creditors began to prosecute their debtors with more rigour than ever; and these of course renewed their murmurs and complaints. To prevent the mischiefs which this grand affair might occasion, the Senate procured the Consulship for Appius Claudius, whose resolution they were well acquainted with. But lest he should carry it too far, they gave him, for his Colleague, P. Servilius, a man of a gentle, humane character, and agreeable to the poor and the multitude. These two Magistrates were sure to be of contrary opinions. Servilius, out of goodness and compassion to the unfortunate, inclined to the remission of the debts, or at least of those exorbitant and accumulated interests which considerably exceeded the principal. He exhorted the Senate to make some regulation in this matter, that might ease the people, and settle the tranquillity of the State upon a lasting foundation.

But Appius, a severe observer of the laws, maintained, with his usual constancy, that it was a manifest injustice to relieve the debtors at the expence of their creditors; that this project tended to the very ruin of the subordination necessary in a well governed State; that the condescension which Servilius was for shewing to the necessities of the people, would be looked upon by the seditious, only as a disguised weakness, and so breed new pretensions; whereas nothing would be a better proof of the power of the Government, than a just severity shewed to those who by their disobedience and cabals had violated the Majesty of the Senate.

This diversity of opinion produced nothing but bitterness of speech and personal reflections. The Senate assembled daily, and as often broke up without coming to any conclusion. In the mean time the people continued to be oppressed and to complain. Being informed of what passed in the Senate, and of the different inclinations of the two Consuls, they showered many praises upon Servilius, and heaped as many imprecations upon Appius. The most seditious among the multitude flocked together: They

They held secret assemblies in the night and in by-places; and, in a word, the discontent and disorder in the City were such as seemed to presage nothing less than a civil war.

§. II. THE news of these disturbances at Rome having reached the Volsci, they immediately began to draw their forces together, in order to march and besiege it; believing they could never have a more favourable opportunity to crush the new Republick, which they hated, and had always looked upon with a jealous eye. Had the authority of the Senate been regarded, an alarm of this kind would have been the luckiest thing that could have happened for their views, because it furnished a pretext to send away the most mutinous of the people from the City: But the Roman youth, being summoned as usual to be listed for the service, absolutely refused to appear; and this disobedience occasioned another dispute between the Consuls. Appius was for punishing the refractory with rigour, and Servilius for more indulgence.

As it was necessary to take the field against the enemy, the Senate without coming to any determination about the affair of the debts, decreed that Servilius should conduct the war, and Claudius govern the City. They made this regulation, in hopes that Servilius, being a popular man, would have less difficulty than the other to levy an army. Nevertheless the people still refused to list themselves in the accustomed manner. What troops he could raise were only volunteers who offered to serve, out of personal affection to the General. They were indeed the more formidable on this account; and the Consul marched them strait into the enemies territory. The Volsci, depending on the civil broils at Rome, and little expecting that they should so soon have occasion to act upon the defensive, had not made such expedition in their preparations for the war, as to be in a condition to face the Romans in the field. They were forced therefore to have recourse to supplications and intreaties; and by these they wrought upon the easy Consul to favour them. He required of them only subsistence and cloaths for his troops, and 300 hostages of the best families.

Not long after the return of Servilius to Rome, and when the rich Patricians, believing the state to be in no danger from any quarter, were pursuing their poor debtors with the usual severity, some Envoys from the Latines arrived in the City, bringing with them by force certain Deputies who had been sent by the Volsci to the Latine Nation. Those Deputies had been commissioned to engage the Latines, if possible, to join with the Volsci, the Hernici and Sabinas in a league against Rome: But the Latines quite humbled by their defeat in the battle of Regillus, would listen to no proposal for a new rupture with the Republick; and the Romans, to reward their fidelity, and the zeal they shewed on this occasion, restored them 6000 prisoners taken in the last war; these captives they also new clothed before they sent them home, in order to make the favour yet more obliging.

§. III. THE discovery made by the Latine Envoys of the secret negotiations of the Volsci, was more than sufficient to determine the Senate to a

Year of
R O M E
CCLVIII.
Etc. J. C.
Four hundred nine-
ty-four.

Fifty-seventh
Consulship.
L. B. 2.
C. 2.
D. H. 1. P.
351.

declaration of war against them: But the Fathers had now the same difficulties as before, in relation to the levies. They were assembled to debate this matter, and likewise what number of soldiers it would be proper to raise in the present exigence, when a sudden accident suspended their deliberations; and the calamity of a private citizen occasioned a general insurrection of the people.

A Plebeian, loaded with chains, threw himself into the publick place as into an Asylum. He was a man in years, tall of stature, meagre, pale, and his eyes sunk into his head; his cloaths dirty and ragged, his beard bushy, his hair matted, and his appearance all together a shocking spectacle. Nevertheless he was very well known; and some remembered to have been with him in the wars, and to have seen him fight with great valour. He himself named the Consuls and the Tribunes under whom he had served, and, addressing his speech to a multitude of people that surrounded him, and earnestly enquired the cause of his deplorable condition; he told them, that while he bore arms in the last war against the Sabines, he had not only been hindered from cultivating his little inheritance, but that the enemy, in an incursion, had plundered and burnt his house. That the necessities of life, and the tributes which, notwithstanding his misfortunes, he was obliged to pay, had forced him to contract debts; that the interest being by degrees grown to an excessive sum, he was reduced to the melancholy expedient of yielding up his inheritance to discharge part of it. But that the interest's creditor, not being yet quite paid, had dragged him to prison, with two of his children; that to oblige him to hasten the payment of the residue, he had delivered him over to his slaves, who by his order, had torn his body with whips. At the same time throwing off his garment, he shewed a back still bloody with lashes, suffered from his creditor; and a breast covered with the scars of wounds he had received in battle.

The people already ripe for sedition, and justly provoked at so barbarous an action, uttered a thousand cries of indignation against the Patricians. The noise ran in a moment over the whole City, and the people flocked from all parts into the Forum. Those whom the like misfortunes had thrown into the fetters of their creditors, made their escape; and sedition quickly found leaders and abettors, and the authority of the Magistrate was no longer regarded. The Consuls, who came in hopes of putting a stop to the disorder by their presence, being surrounded by the people hot with fury, found neither respect nor obedience in the citizens.

Appius, abhorred by the multitude, was just going to be insulted, if he had not escaped under favour of the tumult. Servilius, though more agreeable to the people, was forced to throw off his consular robe, and without any mark of his dignity, to run into the thickest of the crowd. He caressed and embraced the most mutinous, and with tears in his eyes conjured them to appease this disorder. He gave them his word that he would immediately call the Senate, and take as much care of the people's interests in it, as any Plebeian could do; and as a proof of his sincerity, he he proclaimed by a herald, that no citizen should be arrested for debt, till the Senate had made some new regulation in this affair.

The people upon his word dispersed themselves; and the Senate immediately assembled. Servilius laid before them the disposition of men's minds, and the necessity, in such a conjuncture, of abating somewhat of the severity of the laws. Appius, always faithful to his first opinion, firmly opposed this measure, and as he could never help tincturing his counsels with the austerity of his character, and the harshness of his manners, he publicly upbraided his Collegue with being a flatterer and a slave of the people. Servilius, in his turn, reproached him with the obstinacy of his temper, his pride, and the animosity he shewed against the Plebeians. Each Consul had his party. The warm contention, occasioned by this opposition of sentiments, had begun to raise a great noise in the assembly, when some horsemen came full speed with an account, that an army of Volsi were upon their march to Rome.

Year of
R O M E
CCLVIII.

Bef. J. C.
Four hundred ninety-four.

Fifteenth
Consulship.

Livy, B. 21
c. 24.

This alarming news had not the same effect on all. The Senators, their Clients, and the richer sort of Plebeians took arms: But those who were oppressed with debts, shewing their chains, asked with a bitter smile, whether it was worth their while to expose their lives to preserve such ornaments? And all these Plebeians obstinately refused to give their names to be inrolled.

Rome was at this time in such an agitation as usually precedes the greatest revolutions; the Consuls divided; the people disobedient to their Magistrates; an enemy at the gates. The Senate, who were almost equally afraid of the citizens and the Volsi, engaged Appius to take upon him the defence of the city; because they hoped the people would more willingly follow his Collegue into the field. Servilius, being appointed to march against the enemy, conjured the people not to abandon him in this expedition; and, to prevail upon them to take arms, he published a new prohibition against detaining in prison any Roman Citizen who was willing to go with him to the war, or seizing his children or his goods: And by the same edict he engaged himself, in the name of the Senate, to give the people, at his return, all reasonable satisfaction, with relation to their debts.

This declaration was no sooner published, but the people crowded to list themselves, some out of affection to the Consul, whom they knew to be their friend, and others that they might not stay in Rome under the severe and imperious government of Appius. But of all the Plebeians, none enrolled themselves more chearfully, than those very persons who had been most active in the last tumult.

§. IV. AS soon as the levies were compleated, Servilius marched to meet the enemy, and, when he was come within a small distance of them, encamped, a little before night, near the Pentine * lake. The Volsi insulted him the very next morning in his camp. The Consul was in no haste to leave his entrenchments, not being yet sufficiently assured of the good will of his troops; but when he overheard his men accuse him of inactivity, and by their shouts was convinced of their eagerness to fight,

D. Hal. p.
363.

6. P. 374.
Liv. B. 21.
c. 25.

* In Liv.
21. 25.

Year of
ROME
CCLXIII.
B.C. 100.
Fourth century before Christ.

he immediately ordered all the gates of his camp to be opened, and a general rally to be made. The Volsi could not stand the attack of the Romans, but were entirely defeated; and the Consul, to reward his soldiers, gave them all the plunder of the enemy's camp, which was very rich, to enable them to pay their debts.

He then marched to Sutrin, a considerable city of the Volsi, took it by assault, and put all to the sword who were past the age of puberty; an act of barbarity which seemed contrary to his natural temper. (Scipio at the same time beheaded the 300 Volsian hostages at Rome.) As to the spoil of Sutrin, Servilius abandoned that likewise to his soldiers, without reserving any part of it for the publick treasury.

This profuseness of the Consul to his troops highly displeased his Colleague. Servilius in his return to Rome, where he doubted not to obtain a triumph, received intelligence that Scipio had persuaded the Senate to refuse him that honour, under pretence, that he was a seditious man, who aimed at popularity by an excessive indulgence to his soldiers. The conqueror, touched to the quick with so undeserved a treatment, no sooner came before Rome, but he caused the People to be called together in a field without the walls, and there complained to them of the jealousy of his Colleague, and the injustice of the Senate. He presently found by the disposition of the audience, that he might attempt whatever he pleased. Without regard therefore to the Senate's decision, he immediately decreed himself a triumph, and marched with the usual pomp to the capitol, attended by his army and all the people.

D.H.C.B.
100.
100.
100.

§. V. BEFORE the expiration of this Consulship, a new enemy started up against the Republick. Eccetra a Volsian town had lately submitted to the Romans; and there had sent thither a garrison to defend it. The Aurunci, a small community that possessed a part of Campania, not far from the Volturnus, took umbrage at the neighbourhood of that garrison; they sent to Rome a haughty demand to have it instantly removed; and they added threatenings in case of a refusal. The Senate in answer, bid the Envoys go tell their Masters, That it was a dangerous thing to attack those who very neighbourhood was formidable to them. A war presently ensued. The Aurunci entered Latium and advanced as far as Aricia: There the Romans came up with them, and, at first sight of these new ene-

* Servilius made an halt, as soon as he came before Rome, because the Laws did not permit him who demanded a triumph to enter into the city. He was obliged to keep without the walls with his army, and there wait for the consent of the Senate; to which he, according to custom, sent a letter wrapped up in laurel. Upon the receipt of this, the Senators assembled in the temple of Bona, which stood in one of the suburbs of Rome. Here the General gave them an account of his expedition, after which they made a decree, whereby they granted the conqueror the honours of a triumph. This decree was reported to the people, who confirmed it, and fixed the day for the ceremony, unless the Tribunes of the People opposed it; which sometimes happened. And this Law was a great instance of the policy of the Romans. An ambitious General at the head of a victorious army, might have caused great disorders in Rome, if he had been permitted to enter it with his army; and might by force have obtained a triumph, which he had not merited. C. & R.

^b This triumph is not marked in the Capitoline Tables.

nies,

mies, were a little daunted at their gigantick stature, those fierce looks, and that martial air which distinguished them from all the other Nations of Italy: However, calling to mind the great abilities of their own Generals, Servilius and Posthumius Regillensis (which latter commanded the cavalry) this restored their confidence. In the beginning of the action the Romans had much the disadvantage, being very unequal in strength to the enemy, and unable to sustain the fury of their first charge; and, to their further discouragement, they quickly found that their horse could be of no service to them, because the field of battle was extremely uneven and full of rocks. Posthumius nevertheless recovered the day by his able conduct. Making his cavalry dismount, he led them to the assistance of those battalions that were giving ground, and by his words and example in a short time brought them again into order; after which the enemy were soon routed and their camp taken. The Aurunci entirely disappearing, Servilius marched his army back to Rome.

Year of
R O M E
CCLVIII.
Bef. J. C.
Four hundred ninety-four.
Fifteenth
Consulship.

§. VI. AND now after so many victories obtained, chiefly by the bravery of those who were most in debt, the people thought they might confidently demand the performance of Servilius's promises; and indeed for his part, he left no means untried to make good his word. He employed his utmost efforts to prevail with the Senate to grant the debtors a general release. But Appius, who looked upon the least change in the laws to be dangerous, strongly opposed his Colleague's desire. He gave the creditors fresh power to drag the debtors to prison; and the applauses he thereby got from the rich, and the curses from the poor, equally concurred to the confirming this Magistrate in his severity.

Liv. B. 2.
c. 27.

Those who were arrested, appealed to Servilius; they urged upon him the promises he had made to the people before the campaign, and the services they had done in the war. They cried aloud before his tribunal, that either in quality of Consul he should undertake the defence of his fellow-citizens, or, as General, not desert the interest of his soldiers. But Servilius, who was naturally timorous and averse to strife, durst not declare openly against the whole body of Patricians; and by endeavouring to manage both parties, he disoblged both, so that he got the hatred of the one, and the contempt of the other.

How low he was sunk in the esteem of the people most remarkably appeared, when the time came to consecrate a temple which had been erected to Mercury. The consecrator was to have considerable powers and privileges. He was to be the Head and Founder of a society of ^a Merchants in Rome; to have the charge of furnishing the city with provisions, and to inspect them; and he was to have all the honours, and perform all the functions of a Pontifex Maximus within the verge of this temple. Appius and Servilius standing in competition for this office, the Senate were unwilling to decide any thing in the matter, and therefore referred it wholly to the people. This would some time ago have been in

c. 27.

^a Mercury was thought by the Pagans to be the God of Commerce, whence Cicero calls Merchants Mercuriales.

Year of
R O M E
CCLVIII.
Bef. J. C.
Four hundred ninety-four.
Fifteenth
Consulship.

effect to decree in Servilius's favour; but at present the people were so much dissatisfied with both their Consuls, that they would not bestow the honour in question upon either of them; they chose one M. Latorius, who was only a centurion, to perform the consecration. Hereupon the two Magistrates, equally enraged, joined with the Senate in putting the laws in execution against the debtors with the utmost rigour; a vain effort of revenge; for the multitude paid no regard to their authority. When any Plebeian was prosecuted for debt, the populace came in crowds into court, and made such a noise, that the sentence, pronounced by the Judges, could not be heard. The debtors no longer endeavoured to appease their creditors and mollify the Senate by entreaties, they insulted both; and instead of the Plebeians, the Patricians were now in danger of imprisonment and slavery. Nothing prevailed in the City but tumult and violence.

C H A P. VI.

- §. I. The people refuse to obey the summons of the new Consuls (A. Virginius and T. Veturius,) to lift themselves for a war against the Sabines, Æquians, and Volsci. Manius Valerius, a brother of Poplicola, is created Dictator.
 §. II. Valerius prevails with the people to serve, by promising them full satisfaction in relation to their complaints when the war shall be over, and by suspending in the mean time all prosecutions for debt. Three armies are raised, to be commanded by the Dictator and the two Consuls. The enemy are defeated on all sides.
 §. III. The Dictator at his return home demands of the Senate to discharge his engagements to the debtors. His demand is rejected. He excuses himself to the people and resigns the Dictatorship.

Year of
R O M E
CCLIX.
Bef. J. C.
Four hundred ninety-three.
Sixteenth
Consulship.
Liv. B. 2.
c. 28.

- §. I. SUCH was the state of Rome when A. Virginius and T. Veturius, men of little steadiness, took possession of the Consulate. The most considerable of the discontented Plebeians held private assemblies by night to consult the proper measures for a redress of their grievances, and for preventing their being drawn by surprize into any thing disadvantageous to them, when they should be called together in legal Comitia. Notice being brought to the Consuls of these secret meetings, they inform the Senate of them, submitting it to the wisdom of that venerable body to prescribe a remedy for the growing evil; a deference that was by no means agreeable to the Conscript Fathers, who saw through the policy of their Magistrates, that were unwilling to draw the odium of punishing the offenders upon themselves. The Senate having severely reproved them for their timid conduct, ordered them immediately to raise an army in legal form, for a war which threatened the Republick. It seems the Sabines, encouraged by the intestine broils at Rome, had revolted, and they had engaged the Roman colony of Medulia to enter with them into a league confirmed by oaths. The Consuls according to their instructions summoned the tribes, but it was to no purpose, the people being obstinately determined not to lift themselves till such time as all debts should be abolished. Virginius and Veturius finding that no-body regarded their summons, laid all the blame of the disobedience upon the Senate. They even accused the Fathers to the Fathers themselves, and they added, Let those of you who are the boldest within doors at making severe decrees, now shew their heads without doors, and face the fury of the multitude. You will then see whether it be to our want of courage, or to your false measures, that the untractableness of the people is owing. These words so provoked the younger Senators, that, leaving their seats, they surrounded the Consuls, called them cowards, and bid them come down from their thrones and discharge themselves of a burthen that was too heavy for their weakness.

Year of
R O M E
CCLIX.
Bef. J. C.
Four hundred ninety-three.
Sixteenth
Consulship.
Liv. B. 2.
c. 29.

After some time spent in these mutual reproaches, the Consuls returned once more to the Forum, guarded by a good number of the Senators, to add the more weight to their authority. They ascended their tribunal, and called upon one of the most factious by name to come and be enrolled. The man did not answer; and his silence being taken for disobedience, he was instantly seized: but the populace quite furious, tore him out of the lictors hands; and the Consuls experienced on this occasion how little respect is paid to Majesty without strength; they had enough to do to defend the Senators, who attended them, from blows.

D. Hal. B.
6. p. 368.

While the people were thus enraged against the Senate, the Senate against the people, and the Consuls regarded by neither people nor Senate, Envoys came from the Latines and Crustumini (allies of Rome) complaining of the hostilities of the Æqui and Sabines; and an Embassy from the Volsci arrived at the same time, demanding restitution of the lands conquered by the Romans from them. Upon this new alarm the Senate assembled extraordinarily. Titus Lartius, that venerable Senator, who had been formerly Dictator, gave his opinion first. He said, That the only way to put an end to these alarms from abroad, was to establish peace at home, and he proposed, that the assembly might meet again the next day to deliberate about the methods necessary to procure that happiness. That in the mean time the Volscian Ambassadors should be answered, That it was not consistent with the honour of the Republick to comply with their demands. And as to the allies, he advised, that assurances should be given them, that Rome would never leave them exposed to the insults of their enemies. This advice was approved and followed.

p. 369.

The next day the Senate sat again. The Consul Virginus spoke first, and proposed a medium between the severity of Appius and the general release of debts. He was for having those soldiers, who had fought so successfully the last year, protected by the Senate against their creditors; but for leaving the other debtors to the severity of the law.

Liv. B. 2.
c. 29.
D. Hal. p.
370.

Lartius stood up next and said, That he saw, with abundance of grief, Rome split as it were into two Cities: That one was full of nothing but riches and pride, and the other of misery and rebellion; That there was no appearance in either of justice or of honour, or even of common decency; that the haughtiness of the great was no less odious than the disobedience of the lower sort; that he could not but foresee, the extreme poverty of the people would always keep up dissension; and that he did not

Year of not think it possible to restore peace and union between the two orders, ROME by any other means than a general abolition of the debts.

CCLIX. Appius, when it came to his turn to speak, was equally against both Ben. C. these proposals: He affirmed, That the frequent mutinies among the Four C. people did not proceed so much from their want, as from an unbridled licentiousness, which seditious men were pleased to call by the name of liberty; and from the abuse which they made of the Lex Valeria. "They Sixteenth violate, said he, the Majesty of the Consuls with impunity, because they Consulship know they can appeal from the condemnation of their crime to the very "accomplices of it: and what order can we ever hope to establish in a "State, where the decrees of the Magistrates are subject to the revilal and "judgment of a rabble guided wholly by their fury and caprice? Let us "create a Dictator, whose judgments are without appeal; and then we "need not fear, that even the most daring of the Plebeians will be so in"solent as to repulse the lictors of a Magistrate, who has the sovereign "disposal of their lives and fortunes."

D. Hal. p. The younger Senators, and those especially whose interest was concerned
 371. in the abolition of the debts, declared for Appius's opinion; and were even
 L. B. 1. for conferring the Dictatorship upon him: They said, that a supreme Ma-
 6. 30. gistrate of his firmness and intrepidity was absolutely necessary to reduce the people to their duty. But the more experienced and the more moderate of the Senate thought the Dictatorial power, always formidable, would be very improperly placed in the hands of a man naturally severe and inflexi-ble. By their advice one of the Consuls named to that office Manius Va- lerius, a man of above 70 years of age, brother to the famous Poplicola.
 This nomination was indeed contrary to law, which required that the Dictator should always be chosen out of such as had been, or were actual Consuls; but as no person was judged so proper for that station at this time, the necessity of the case made the Senate overlook rules.

D. Hal. B. §. II. VALERIUS, Plebeian in his inclination, named, for General of
 6. p. 371. the Horse, Quintius Servilius, the brother of the last year's Consul, and who thought, as the Dictator himself did, that there was a great deal of justice in the people's complaints. Then having convened a general assembly of the Citizens, he told them, That they need not have any apprehensions, that either their liberty, or the Lex Valeria, which was its chief support, would be in danger under a Dictator of the family of Valerius Poplicola.
 That he did not ascend his tribunal to cheat them with false promises:
 that indeed there was a necessity of their marching against the enemies who were advancing towards Rome; but that he would engage in his own name, and on the part of the Senate, to give them full satisfaction, with relation to their complaints, at their return from the campaign: He add- ed, "And in the mean while, by the sovereign authority with which I am "invested, I declare your persons, your lands, and your goods, to be per"fectly free: I suspend the effect of all obligations that might be made "use of to give you trouble. Come and assist us to conquer new lands "from our enemies for your use."

This

This speech filled the people with hopes and with comfort. Every body took arms with pleasure, and ten legions were raised compleat; three were given to each Consul, and the Dictator reserved four to himself. The Romans marched against the enemy on different sides. The Dictator gained a notable victory over the Sabines, laid waste their country, and enriched his soldiers with spoil: The Consul Veturius routed the Volsci, after which he took their camp, and then Velitrae, into which place he entered sword in hand in pursuit of the vanquished: And A. Virginus, the other Consul, obtained over the Aequi a victory, which, by reason of their hasty flight, was without much bloodshed. Except the victory at Regillus, the Romans had never gained a more important one than that of the Dictator over the Sabines. Accordingly he was decreed a triumph by both Senate and People; and as a further mark of distinction, they allotted him an honourable place in the Circus, at the celebration of the publick games, and appointed that a curule chair should always be placed there for him; and this honour they made hereditary in his family.

§. III. THE Senate apprehending that the soldiers at their return would challenge of the Dictator the execution of his promise, desired him and the two Consuls to detain them still under their ensigns, upon pretence that the war was not quite finished. The two Consuls obeyed; but the Dictator, whose authority was independent of the Senate, disbanded his army. He declared his soldiers free of the * oath they took when they lifted themselves; and as a new proof of his affection to the Plebeians, he chose out of that order four hundred of the most considerable, whom he brought into that of the Knights. He then went to the Senate, and demanded that a decree should be pass'd for the abolition of the debts, pursuant to the promise he had made the people. The oldest Senators and the best men, excepting only Appius, were for consenting to this demand. But the faction of the rich got the better, being supported by the young Senators, who thought that nothing could be done for the relief of the people,

* The giving the military oath, which was called Sacramentum, was properly speaking, the legal method of forming the Roman armies. After the soldiers had been chosen out of each tribe, in the manner elsewhere described, this oath was administered to them. The ceremony was this. The Tribunes of each Legion assembled the body they commanded. Then one soldier in a Legion swore, in the name of all the rest, to obey the Commanders of the Roman army. After this, every soldier came, and singly engaged to perform what had been sworn. This custom continued till the 538th year of Rome; and then another oath, called by Livy, B. 22. Fusjurandum, (of which we shall speak in its proper place) was added to the former. By virtue of this engagement, rebels and deserters were punished with death, and no appeal admitted. There was likewise another way of enlisting men, which was called Conjuratio. It took place, in case of unforeseen commotions, and the sudden irruptions of an enemy. Then, that no time might be lost in raising the necessary succours, the soldiers were excused the formalities usually observed in enrolling them. The General only went up to the Capitol, and there erected two standards; one red, for the foot; and the other blue, for the horse. After which, he pronounced these words, with a loud voice: Let those who love the safety of the Republick, make haste and follow me. A third way of enrolling or enlisting men, then in use, was this. The Consuls committed it to the care of chosen persons, to raise troops in different places, as the Republick had occasion for them; and this was called Evocatio. C. & R.

Year of
R O M E
CCLIX.
Bef. J. C.
Four hundred ninety-three.

Sixteenth
Consulship.
Liv. B. 2.
c. 31.

but to the diminution of the Senate's authority. There were even several who, presuming upon the Dictator's mildness of temper, reproached him, that he sought by the vilest methods the applauses of a base populace. Not only his demand was rejected, but he was made to understand, that if his dictatorial dignity had not set him above the laws, the Senate would call him to an account for disbanding his army, as an action contrary to the military laws, while the enemies of the Republick were still in arms.

The venerable old man answered, " I plainly perceive that I am not agreeable to you : I am accused of being too popular ; may the Gods grant that all the defenders of the Roman people, who shall rise hereafter, may be as moderate as I am ! But expect not that I will deceive my Fellow-Citizens, who took up arms upon my promise, and who at the price of their blood have triumphed over your enemies. A foreign war, and our domestick feuds, were the occasion of the Republick's honouring me with the Dictatorship. We now have peace abroad, and I am hindered from establishing it at home ; thus my office being grown useless, I am resolved to hold it no longer. I had rather behold the sedition as a private person, than with the title of Dictator." Concluding with these words, he left the Senate abruptly and convened an Assembly of the People.

D. Hal. R.
6. p. 374.
375.

When the Assembly was formed, he appeared in it with all the ensigns of his dignity ; he first returned the people thanks for the readiness with which upon his orders they had taken arms, and then he highly praised the valour they had shewn in every action of the war, against the enemies of the Commonwealth. " You, said he, like good Citizens, have performed your duty. It were now my turn to acquit myself of the promise I made you ; but a faction more powerful than the authority of the Dictator himself, hinders the effect of my sincere intentions. I am publicly called an enemy to the Senate ; my conduct is censured ; it is imputed to me as a crime, that I left you the spoils of our enemies, and above all, that I absolved you from the military oath. I know after what manner, in the vigour of my life, I should have answered such injuries ; but they despise an old man of above threescore and ten ; and as I am now past either revenging myself, or doing justice to you, I freely resign a dignity in which I can do you no service. If any one of my Fellow-Citizens condemns me for the non-performance of my word, I willingly put my small remains of life into his hands ; he may deprive me of it, if he pleases, I shall neither murmur nor oppose."

The Multitude heard this discourse with respect and veneration for the man, and they conducted him to his house with as many praises as if he had pronounced the abolition of the debts.

C H A P. VII.

§ I. The discontent among the people augments. The Consuls, to give the mutineers a diversion, lead their two armies, which they had not yet disbanded,

banded, again into the field. The soldiers desert their Generals, and, by the advice of Sicinnius Bellutus, retire to a hill three miles from Rome. §. II. The Senate dispatch a deputation to them to persuade them to return; but in vain. Posthumius Cominius, and Spurius Cassius, are chosen Consuls. Warm debates in the Senate. A second deputation is sent to the mutineers in spite of the remonstrances of Appius Claudius. §. III. The artful management of Sicinnius Bellutus, and Junius Brutus, the two heads of the sedition, in their conference with the Deputies. §. IV. Menenius Agrippa, by his famous apologue, overcomes the obstinacy of the mutineers; but when they are just ready to go back to the city, Brutus puts a stop to their march till the Senate have agreed to the creation of some new officers, chosen out of the Plebeians, to be the future protectors of the people. These officers are stiled TRIBUNES OF THE PEOPLE.

Year of
R O M E.
CCLIX.
Bef. J. C.
Four hundred ninety-three.
Sixteenth
Consulship.

§. I. AND now the Plebeian debtors turned their whole indignation against the Senate, which had so often deceived them: They held assemblies, not by night, but in open day, and seemed determined to keep no longer any measures. The Consuls, who still held their troops engaged by the customary oath they had taken to them, never to quit their ensigns without leave, led them by the Senate's advice out of the city under pretence of apprehending a new war from the Æqui and Sabines. The soldiers, perceiving the artifice, had no sooner entered the field, but the most furious were for murdering the Consuls, in order to free themselves and their fellows at once from the oath that bound them: But the more sober having represented to those madmen how useless, with regard to their purpose such a crime would be, they, by the advice of one Sicinnius, took another method. They snatched up the ensigns, which they had sworn not to desert, and marched away with them. The legions instantly, forsaking their officers*, followed; and retired to a hill, (afterwards called Mons sacer) three miles from Rome, near the river Anio. Here they encamped, and here they continued quiet, observing an exact discipline, and attempting no sort of violence whatever.

Livy, B. 2.
C. 32.

§. II. A DESERTION so general, and which looked like the beginning of a civil war, gave great uneasiness to the Senate. They immediately set guards at the gates of the city, as well for its security, as

D. Hal. p.
376.

* Dion. Hal. gives us the reason why the legions so readily followed their ensigns. The Romans, says he, when they are in the field, respect nothing more than their ensigns and standards. They are to them as so many Deities. They swear by their military ensigns, and pay them a sort of religious worship. On certain festivals, they crown them with flowers, and perfume them. Aquila certe, ac signa illa pulverulenta, & custodiis horrida, inunguntur etiam festis diebus. Utinamque dicere possemus quis primus instituisse! Plin. B. 13. This custom is also attested by an inscription on an ancient marble; which runs thus, CORONÆ. INLATÆ. SIGNA QVE UNCTA. Animated by this superstitious prejudice, the soldiers braved the greatest dangers, and despised death itself, to secure these precious pledges from being taken by the enemy. It often was treated as a capital crime, a man's suffering his standard to be taken from him: History gives us several instances of those who were condemned to be whipped, and to lose their heads, for having lost the colours committed to their care. C. & R.

Year of
R O M E
CCLIX.
P. C. I. C.
to hinder any more of the Plebeians from joining the mal contents. But, notwithstanding this precaution, those who were burthened with debts, and even many others, who, without being in debt, were discontented, escaped to the mutineers; and Rome saw at her gates a very formidable army of her own citizens, ready to turn their arms against those that remained in the city.

Sixteenth
Consulship.
The Patricians immediately divided themselves into several bodies, to be differently employ'd: Some at the head of their clients, and of such Plebeians as would not take part in the Secession, secured the most advanced posts; others intrenched themselves at the entrance of the city; the old men undertook the defence of the walls; and all appeared equally vigorous and resolute.

D Hal
3-3.
After these precautions, the Senate dispatched a deputation to the mal contents, to offer them a general pardon, and exhort them to return into the city. But this step, taken before the swell of passion had subsided, produced nothing but a contemptuous and menacing answer from the Seceders, That the Patricians should quickly find what enemies they had to deal with: which augmented the general consternation and perplexity in Rome.

Year of
R O M E
CCLIX.
P. C. I. C.
Four hundred nine-
ty-two.
The two Consuls, whose Magistracy was expiring, appointed an assembly for the election of their successors; no-body presented himself candidate for that dignity; several even refused it. At length Posthumius Cominius, and Spurius Cassius Viscellinus, both consular persons, were constrained to accept it; and the Senate pitched upon them, because they were equally agreeable to the Nobles and Plebeians, and because Cassius especially had always behaved himself very prudently between the two parties.

Seventeenth
Consulship.
B. 6. p.
3-9, & seq.
The new Consuls began their administration with assembling the Senate to consider of the best and most speedy methods of restoring peace and union in the State.

Menenius Agrippa, a consular person, and eminent for integrity of manners, being the first called upon to give his opinion, declared, that he thought it adviseable to dispatch a new deputation to the mal contents, and to give the Deputies full power to put an end to this ugly affair, upon whatever conditions they should find necessary for the good of the Republick. Some of the Fathers objected, that it would be a derogation to the majesty of the Senate, to send a second deputation to rebels, who had given such an unworthy reception to their first: But Menenius answered, that this was no time to insist upon a vain punctilio; that the preservation of the Republick, and even necessity, to which the Gods themselves were submitted, obliged the Senate to court the people. That Rome, the terror of her neighbours, was in a manner besieged by her own citizens; that indeed they had as yet committed no act of hostility, but that for this very reason the Senate ought to be the more careful to prevent a war, which, whatever should be the success of it, could not but be fatal to the State.

He added, that the Sabines, the Volsci, the Æqui, and the Hernici, all irreconcilable enemies of the Roman name, would already have joined the rebels, if they had not perhaps thought it more proper to let the Romans weaken and destroy themselves by their own divisions. That no great assistance was to be expected from the Allies of the Republick; that as for the nations of Campania and Hetruria, they were always governed by events, and their faith was to be suspected; that even the Latines were not much more to be depended on, a people jealous of the superiority of Rome, and even fond of novelty. That the Patricians deceived themselves, if they hoped, merely with the help of their clients and slaves, to withstand a combination of so many foreign and domestick enemies.

Year of
R O M E
CCLX.
Bef. J. C.
Four hundred nine-
ty-two.
Seventeenth
Consulship.

M. Valerius, (the late Dictator) whose mind was embittered against the Senate, added to what Menenius had said, that there was reason to apprehend the mal-contents would renounce their country, and think of settling elsewhere: That Rome would become a desert; and the Senate, by continuing inflexible, lose its chief strength. That, if they had followed his advice During his Dictatorship, they might by the abolition of the debts have preserved union and peace between the two orders in the state; but must not imagine that the people, who had so often been cheated by the false promises of the Senate, would now be satisfied with that abolition. That he feared the ill treatment they had received would incite them to demand securities for the future enjoyment of their rights and liberties. That the creation of a Dictator, a modern invention of the Senate's, entirely defeated the purpose of the Lex Valeria, the People's refuge, and the guardian of their liberty. That it could not be denied, but many of the Plebeians had been despoiled of their lands by the exorbitant interests exacted from them for money lent by certain rich usurers; and those poor wretches thrown into chains and slavery as so many criminals: That indeed the more equitable among the Patricians had no share in these tyrannical proceedings, but only some haughty spirits, who aimed at an Oligarchy, and had formed themselves into a faction; at the head of which was Appius Claudius, the most declared enemy of the People, and who was always endeavouring to perplex and embroil the publick affairs. And he concluded with seconding the motion of Menenius for sending a new deputation to the Seceders.

Appius, when it was his turn to speak, rose up, and addressing himself to M. Valerius, said, "If you had confined yourself barely to give your opinion upon the affair in question, without falling upon me so unjustly, you had not exposed yourself to hear truths, which may not be very agreeable to you. But before I offer them to this Assembly, it is fit I should answer your calumnies. Tell me, Valerius, Where are the Romans whom I have prosecuted with the rigour of justice, to oblige them to pay me what they owe me? Name the Citizens whom I have kept in chains; go search among the crowd of mal-contents, and see whether there be one man who will say, he left the City out of fear of being imprisoned by me. Every body knows that I have used my debtors like my clients and friends; that without considering

p. 386, &
seq.

" the

Year of
Rome
CCLX.
L. J. C.
Four hundred sixty-
two.
Seven eenth
Consulship.

“ the old debts, I have assisted them anew in their necessities; and that,
“ as much as in me lay, the Citizens were always free. Not that I pro“ pose my conduct as a rule for others; I will always contend for the “ authority of the laws in favour of those who have recourse to them. I “ am even convinced, that, with regard to certain debtors who spend their “ lives in idle nets and debauchery, it is as reasonable to make them pay,
“ as it is noble and generous to forgive poor Citizens who are peaceable
“ and laborious, but whose misfortunes have reduced them to extream “ want: such has been my conduct, and such are the imperious maxims
“ with which I am charged. But, it seems, I have declared myself a fa“ vourer of the great, and it is by my counsels that they have possessed “ themselves of the Government.—This crime, (turning toward the chief “ of the Senate) I am guilty of in common with you. The Government “ belongs to you, and you are too wise to yield it up to an unbridled rab“ ble, to that furious beast which hearkens only to its flatterers, its slaves; “ slaves that often become its Tyrants: And this is what we ought to ap“ prehend from M. Valerius; who, tho’ all the credit he has in the Re-“ publick be owing to the dignities with which we have honoured him, “ makes use of it now to ruin our laws, change the form of our govern“ ment, and by his mean condescensions, pave himself a way to the ty“ ranny. You have heard his own words, and must have observed, that, “ being better informed than we of the pernicious designs of the rebels;
“ he gives us notice to prepare for new pretensions: under colour of de“ manding security for the liberty of the people, he seeks nothing but to “ destroy that of the Senate.

“ But to come to the chief point, upon which we meet this day; I “ say, that it is striking at the very foundation of a State to change its “ laws; and that it is impossible to annul the contracts between private “ persons, without violating the publick faith, the bond of society. Will “ you now grant to a seditious mob, who are ready to turn their arms “ against their Country, what you have often prudently refused to quiet “ Citizens, and to brave soldiers? Consider that you can make no con“ cession in this article of the debts, without opening a door at the same “ time to new pretensions. Before it be long, the Leaders of the sedition, “ in concert with M. Valerius, will want to be admitted into the chief “ dignities of the State. May the tutelar Gods of Rome grant, that the “ Government do not at last fall wholly into the hands of a base populace, “ that will punish you for your weakness, and banish you yourselves from “ your Country!

“ Endeavours are used to terrify you with the arms of the Rebels: But “ have you not their wives and children in hostage? Will they, with open “ force, attack a City which incloses all that they hold most dear? But “ I shall grant, that they have no more regard to the ties of Blood, than “ to the laws of the Government: Have they the Generals, the Provi“ sions, the Money necessary to maintain themselves in such an enter“ prize? What will become of them during winter, which is now approach“ ing,

“ ing, without bread, without shelter, and without daring to straggle for “ fear of falling into our hands? If they take refuge among our neigh“ bours, will they not find the Government there, as well as at Rome, in “ the hands of the great? Can rebels and run-aways expect to be placed “ in any other condition, than that of wretched slaves? Perhaps it is fear“ ed, that our neighbours and they will join their forces and besiege Rome;
 “ and that the City will not have a sufficient number of inhabitants for its “ defence; as if the strength of the Republick lay wholly in the rebels.
 “ But have you not amongst the Patricians a flourishing youth, and full “ of courage? Our clients, who are the soundest part of the Plebeian “ body, are they not, like us, immoveably faithful to the interest of the “ commonwealth? It appeared by the last numbering of the people, “ that we had no less than 130000 men fit to bear arms; there is scarce
 “ the seventh part of these among the mal-contents. But, if occasion “ be, let us arm our slaves, let us make of them a new people; these “ we shall find obedient. In our service, and from our example, they have “ learnt the discipline of war. How courageously will they fight, if liberty “ is to be the reward of their valour? If all these helps do not seem suf“ ficient, recal your colonies. Nay, rather than submit to receive law “ from the rebels, grant the Latines the rights of Citizens of Rome, which “ they have so long sued for: You will then see them immediately run to “ your assistance; and you will want neither soldiers nor Citizens. To “ reduce my opinion to a few words, I think we ought not to send De“ puties to the rebels, nor do any thing that can shew the least fear or un“ easiness. If they return to their duty, we ought to use them gently; but, “ if they persist in their revolt, fall upon them sword in hand.”

Year of
 R O M E
 CCLX.
 Bef. J. C.
 Four hundred ninety-two.
 —————
 Seventeenth
 Consulship.

This advice was approved, tho' for different reasons, by the faction D. Hal. p.
 of the rich, and by all the young Senators. On the other hand, the two ^{391.} Consuls, favourers of the people, and the old men, naturally timorous, maintained, that Civil War was the greatest calamity that could befall a State. The same was urged, by such of the Senate as regarded only the preservation of the publick liberty, and who doubted whether some ambitious and enterprising man might not arise even out of the body of the Senate, and by the help of these divisions make himself sole master of the Government. But scarce were they so much as heard; the place was filled with clamour and threatenings. The youngest Senators, insolent upon account of their birth, and jealous of the prerogatives of their rank, went even so far as to intimate to the Consuls, that they suspected them.
 They put those magistrates in mind, that being in the place of the Kings, it was their duty to maintain, against the invasions of the people, not only the regal authority, but that of the Senate; and the more violent declared, that if the least insult were offered to the latter, they would take arms to preserve to their order an authority which they had received from their ancestors.

The Consuls, having conferred together, determined to give these warm spirits time to cool; and for that purpose to put off the decision of this great-

Year of
ROME
CCLX.
L. J. C.
L. J. C.
L. J. C.
L. J. C.
L. J. C.

Senate
CCLX.
L. J. C.
L. J. C.
L. J. C.
L. J. C.

L. J. C.

great affair to another day: But, before the Assembly broke up, in order to intimidate the young Senators*, who had talked in so audacious a manner, they threatened them, that unless they behaved themselves for the future with more modesty in so venerable an assembly, means would be found to exclude them wholly from it by affixing^a the age necessary for a Senator. As this had not yet been settled, the young men, more afraid of losing their dignity than their point, truckled to the menaces and power of the Consuls, who at the same time made use of another artifice against the older Senators who opposed the abolition of the debts. They told them, they could no longer bear this division in the Senate; and that, if the Fathers did not enter into more unanimous measures, they would carry the affair before the People, to whom, as it related to war, they could not without injustice refuse the cognizance of it, according to what had been practised even under the Government of the Kings.

§ 393.

Those of the Senators, who had embraced Appius's opinion with most warmth, plainly saw by the turn which the Consuls gave to this affair, that it would slip from them, if they persisted in their first sentiments. The fear of falling into the people's hands staggered them; and the tears and cries of the women and children who embraced their knees, and begged of them their fathers and husbands, gained them over entirely; so that, the Senate being convened again, they declared for coming to an agreement with the mal-contents, Appius remained almost alone in his opposition. Addressing himself to the two Consuls, he said, "I find, it will be to no purpose for me to offer any thing further upon this matter; you seem resolved to treat with the rebels upon their own conditions; however, you will give me leave to declare once more, that this shall never be with my consent. I repeat it, that I think we cannot indeed have too much regard to the miseries of those debtors who have continued faithful and obedient to the government; but I affirm, that all manner of negotiation with rebels is dangerous, so long as they continue in arms."

§ 394.

As the Fathers had already taken their resolution, they gave no longer any heed to the opposition of this inflexible Senator; but named ten Commissioners to treat with the mal-contents; and chose them out of those of their own body who had always declared in favour of the people. At the head of this deputation were T. Lartius, Menenius Agrippa, and M. Valerius, all three in great esteem, and of whom two had governed

^a That there was a certain age, in after times required, is plain from the frequent use of Ætas Senatoria in Authors. Dic Casfius positively limits it to five and twenty, which was the soonest time any one could have discharged the Quæstorship, the first office of any considerable note: Yet we meet with very many persons promoted to this order without any consideration had to their years, as it usually happened in all other honours whatever. Kenz. Antiq. p. 102.

Pompey established among the Bithynians, a law by which no one could become a Member of their Senate till he was thirty complete. It is probable that he followed the custom of the Roman Republic in this regulation; and the more so, because Pliny the younger tells us, in one of his letters to the Emperor Trajan, that the Bithynians made the Romans their pattern, especially in what related to their Magistracy and Senate. C. & R.

the

the Republick, in quality of Dictators: They set forward with their Collegues towards the camp. This great news got thither before them; and the soldiers ran out in crowds to receive them.

§. III. AMONG the Seceders was a certain Plebeian, named Lucius Junius, and who, out of a ridiculous vanity, had assumed the surname of Brutus, that he might have the greater resemblance to the illustrious deliverer of his country from the Tarquins. Notwithstanding this affectation, for which many of his companions laughed at him, he was a man of singular penetration and foresight, and wanted not the talents of speaking readily and to the purpose. He advised Sicinnius, the Leader of the mutineers, to cross the negotiation at first, and to start new objections against a re union, in order to find out what advantage they might get from it, and at what price the other party would purchase it. “The Senate, said he, betray their fear: We are masters, if we know how to improve this opportunity: Let those grave Senators deliver their errand: I undertake to answer them in the name of our companions; and I hope to do it in a manner that will not be unserviceable to the common cause.”

These two heads of the Secession having agreed upon the different parts they were to act, Sicinnius introduced the Deputies into the camp, who, when they had placed themselves where they could be heard by the multitude, which flocked about them, were told, that they might give an account of their commission. Manius Valerius then said, That he brought them joyful news; that the Senate had not only decreed an amnesty of all their past faults, but had impowered him and his Collegues to grant them all the favours that were compatible with the honour of the Patrician body; and that there was nothing now to hinder them from returning to the city. To this he added some pressing exhortations to the Seceders, not to neglect the present favourable opportunity, which the Senate's great condescension and goodness gave them, of putting a happy period to all their discontents.

When Valerius had ended, Sicinnius observed to the audience, That, in affairs of importance, prudent men never came to a determination, upon hearing only what could be said on one side of a question: And he declared, That whoever was willing to answer Valerius, might speak his objections without shame or fear, or reserve; the necessity of the case not admitting of ceremony or human respects. Nevertheless a profound silence reigned in the assembly; the soldiers stood looking at one another, each expecting that some other would make himself advocate for the common cause. Then Brutus, pursuant to his agreement with Sicinnius, stepped forward, and, addressing himself to his comrades, said: “From this deep silence, fellow-soldiers, one would imagine, you are still awed by that servile fear in which the Patricians and your creditors kept you so long. Every man consults the eyes of the rest to discover, whether there be more resolution in others than he finds in himself; and not one of you has the courage to speak, in publick, that which is the con-

Year of
R O M E
CCLX.

Bel. J. C.
Four hundred ninety-two.

Seventeenth Cassellus.

stant subject of your private conversations. Know you not that you are free? This camp, these arms, have they not convinced you, that you are no longer under your Tyrants? Or, if any doubt remained, this step which the Senate has now taken, is not this sufficient to satisfy you? Those Patricians, so haughty and imperious, now send to court us; they no longer make use either of proud commands, or of cruel threats; they invite us as their fellow-citizens to return into our common city; nay some of our Sovereigns, you see, are so gracious as to come to our very camp, to offer us a general pardon. Whence then can proceed this obstinate silence, after such singular condescensions?
If you doubt the sincerity of their promises; if you fear, that, under the veil of a few fine words, they conceal your former chains, why do you not speak?—All silent?—Hear then a Roman, who has the courage to declare his thoughts freely to these ambassadors, and to dissemble nothing.”

Then turning to Valerius, “ You invite us to go back to Rome; but you do not tell us upon what terms we are to be there: Can Plebeians poor, tho’ free, think of being united with Patricians so rich, and so ambitious? And, should we agree to the conditions you have to offer, what security will the Patricians give us for the performance?
Those haughty Patricians, who make it a merit among themselves to have deceived the people? You talk to us of nothing but condescension and forgiveness, as if we were your subjects, and subjects in rebellion; but that is the point to be discussed. Is it the People or the Senate who are in fault? Which of the two orders was it, that first violated those laws of society, which ought to reign among the members of one and the same Republick? This is the question.

“ In order to judge of this without prejudice, give me leave barely to relate a certain number of facts, for the truth of which I will appeal to no other but yourself and your Collegues.

“ Our government was originally monarchick; we had seven Kings in succession; and none of them ever did the people the least wrong, Tarquin himself, the last of those princes, Tarquin, so odious to the Senate and the Nobility, favour’d our interests as much as he opposed yours. He loved the soldiers, he had an esteem for valour, he was always for rewarding it; and every body knows, that having found immense riches in Sæssa, a town of the Volsci, which he had taken, he chose rather to leave the booty to his army, than to appropriate it to himself; so that beside the slaves, the horses, the corn, and the houshold-stuff, there remained over and above to each soldier five Minae of silver.

351. Arbuthnot.

“ Nevertheless, to revenge your wrongs, we drove that Prince from Rome; nor were all his repeated solicitations, and rich offers sufficient to move us, to forsake your interests and return to his obedience. We afterwards cut to pieces the armies of Veii, and Tarquinius, which endeavoured

“ deavoured to restore him to the throne. The formidable power of “ Porfena, the famine we underwent during a long siege, the fierce as-“ faults, the continual battles—Were all these, or, in short, was any “ thing capable of shaking the faith which we had given you? Thirty “ Latine Cities united to restore the banished King. What would you “ have done, if we had then abandoned you, and joined your enemies?
 “ We might have had any rewards from Tarquin, while the Senate and “ Nobles would have been the victims of his resentment. Who disper“ sed that dangerous combination? To whom are you obliged for the “ defeat of the Latines? Is it not to this people? To them you owe “ that very power which you have since turned against them. What “ recompence have we had for the assistance we gave you? Is the con“ dition of the Roman people one jot the better? Have you associated “ them in your offices and dignities? Have our poor Citizens found so “ much as the smallest relief in their necessities? No, our bravest sol“ diers, oppressed with the weight of usury, have been groaning in the “ chains of their merciless creditors. All those fine promises of abolish“ ing in time of peace the debts which the extortions of the great had “ forced us to contract, What is become of them? Scarce was the war “ finished, but you forgot both our services, and your oaths. With “ what design then do you come hither? Is it to seduce this people by “ the enchantment of words? The most solemn oaths have not strength “ enough to bind your faith. And after all, what would you get by a “ union effected by artifice, never free from mutual distrust, and which “ must end at last in a Civil War? Let us on both sides avoid such hea“ vy misfortunes; send to us our wives and children; suffer us to depart “ from this land of our nativity, where we are loaded with chains like so “ many slaves; or, at best, are only farmers of our own inheritances, “ and constrained to cultivate them for the profit of Tyrants. So long “ as we have our swords in our hands, we shall be able to open ourselves “ a way into more fortunate climates; and where-ever the Gods shall “ grant us to live in LIBERTY, there we shall find OUR COUNTRY.”

Year of
R O M E
CCLX.
Bef. J. C.
Four hundred nine-
ty-two.
Seventeenth
Consulship.

This bold discourse renewed in the assembly the melancholy remembrance of all those miseries whereof the people had so frequently complained; every man was eager to quote examples of the rigour of the Pa- tricians; some had lost their inheritances; others had suffered in the prisons of their creditors; several shewed the marks of the stripes they had received; and there was not one who, beside the general cause, had not a particular injury to revenge.

The venerable T. Lartius, undertaking to answer Brutus, began with the article of the debts. He said, that to hinder men, who had fairly lent their money, from exacting the payment of it, had been a thing impracticable; and that it was without example in any well regulated State, that the Magistrate should refuse the aid of the laws to those who demanded it, so long as those laws and customs served for a rule in the Government. That

D. Hal. p.
403.

p. 404.

Year of
R O M E
(CLX.
Bel J. C.
F. hundred nine-
ty-two.
Seventeenth
Consulship.

nevertheless, as the creditors had doubtless been cruel to their debtors, the Senate was willing to look into the necessities of the people, and to provide a remedy for them by new regulations; but that it became the Senate's justice at the same time to distinguish men, who, tho' not fortunate, had been ever sober and industrious, from such as were fallen into poverty, only thro' their own sloth and intemperance: that it was highly unjust in the Patricians to extort by force of arms, an abolition of the debts, when they might obtain it by fair means; and to complain of the Senate as refusing what they demanded, when they ought only to complain of those who threw obstacles in the way of the Senate's good intentions.

Lartius, continuing his discourse, was beginning to say something of the rashness of their enterprize, when Sicinnius, provoked at what he had thrown out against him and Brutus, and addressing himself to his companions: "You now see, by the haughty speech of this Patrician, what you are to expect from his negotiation, and what treatment is preparing for you at Rome, if the Senate can once draw you into their power:" And then, turning immediately to the Deputies: "Propose directly the conditions you are impowered to offer us; or this instant leave our camp, where we are not disposed to bear with you any longer."

D. Hal. p.
475, A. 107.

§. IV. THESE words were highly applauded by the multitude. But then Menenius, in the midst of their acclamations, made a sign to them, that he had something to say. His known character of integrity, and of being a friend to the people, easily gained him attention. Silence being made, he told them, that the Commissioners were not come to the camp, only to justify to them the Senate's conduct, but also to inform them of what the Senate had resolved in their favour. That the Fathers, studious of the publick good, had carefully enquired into the causes of the unhappy divisions, and had found, that the severity of the creditors to their debtors was the true source of them. That, in order to remedy these evils, they had determined a remission of all debts due from insolvents; liberty to all debtors, whether actually in arrest, or in danger of being so, in consequence of any sentence given against them: And that as to debts which might be contracted hereafter, a new regulation should be made by the People and the Senate in concert, and should become an established law: And that all the Commissioners in the Assembly engaged their lives to the people, and devoted themselves and their children to the infernal Gods, if they failed in their promise.

Plut. in Cornel.

This prudent Senator finding the minds of the people softened by the promise he had made them, and desiring to extinguish, as much as possible, their jealousy and hatred of the Senate, by convincing them, that subordination in the State was necessary, and that the higher orders of men were as useful to the lower, as the lower to the higher. He, to make this truth the more palpable to them, employed the famous apologue of a conspiracy of all the members of the human body against the stomach, under pretence, that this alone, without working, enjoyed the fruit of all their labours. Having applied it it to the people and the Senate, he desired them to consider, that this august body, like the stomach, convey'd into the several members joined to it the same nourishment that it received itself, but much better prepared; and that to it alone they owed their life and strength. He added, "Cease then, Romans, unjustly to accuse the Senate of having driven you from your Country, and reduced you to the condition of indigent vagabonds. The Fathers have never indeed done you any injury, nor have they any disposition to hurt you: Far otherwise; they call to you, they intreat you to return; they have opened to you the gates of Rome, and with open arms are ready to receive you."

Year of
R O M E
CCLX.
Bef. J. C.
Four hundred ninety-two.

Seventeenth
Consulship.
D. Hal. p.
407, 408.

While Menenius was speaking, it was visible that his words made a considerable impression on the Seceders; but when, in the close of his discourse, he fell to a pathetick bewailing the calamities of his Country, the impending miseries that threatened all his fellow-citizens, as well those within the city, as those without,—the whole multitude broke into tears; and they all cried out to him, as with one voice, to lead them back, without delay, to Rome. The artful Brutus, however, put a stop to this sudden motion. He told the people, that in truth they ought to be very thankful for the favour shew'd them at present, in the abolition of the debts; but that he could not forbear letting them know, he was very anxious about the future, much fearing, that the Senate would one day revenge themselves for the just concessions they had been forced to make, unless means were found to secure the rights and liberties of the People against the enterprizes of so ambitious a body.

"What better security, said Menenius, can you ask, than what our laws and the constitution of the Republick already afford?" Grant us, answered Brutus, "the privilege of creating annually, out of the body of the Plebeians, some magistrates, who shall have no other power but that of succouring the Plebeians, when injustice or violence is done to them, and of defending their rights both publick and private. We desire, we earnestly intreat you not to refuse us this request; but generously to add this to the other favours which, of your own motion, you have already granted us. If you came hither with a sincere intention of peace, you cannot reject so equitable a proposal."

The people highly applauded this answer. On the other hand the Deputies, extremely surprized at the new demand, made by Brutus, retired a little apart from the assembly to confer together; but soon returned. Menenius then said, That though he and his colleagues had full powers to treat, they did not think it would become them to make use of those powers in the present instance: That the thing asked was very extraordinary, and what, he feared, might one day prove a source of much dissension: That, nevertheless, the deputies would not oppose the people's request, and did not doubt but the Fathers would comply with it: That he himself with one part of his colleagues would stay in the camp, while Valerius, with the other, would go and report the matter to the

Year of
R O M E
CCLX.
Bef. J. C.
Four hundred ninety-two.

Seventeenth
Consulship.
D. Hal. p.
410.

the Senate; whose answer they would doubtless bring in a very short time.

These Commissioners repaired with all expedition to Rome, and laid before the Senate the new pretensions of the Seceders. Valerius made himself their advocate. Appius heard him with indignation. He called the Gods to witness the innumerable mischiefs, which he pretended to foresee from such an innovation in the Government. But the angry Senator could not prevail; the majority being inclined to peace, a Senatus Consultum was passed to permit the creation of new Magistrates, who were to be called TRIBUNES OF THE PEOPLE.

This Decree (which included also the abolition of the debts) the Deputies carried to the camp as the seal of peace. The Seceders (in pursuance of advice given them by Menenius) sent L. Junius Brutus with M. Decius and Spurius Icilius to finish, in form, the accommodation with the Senate; which was accordingly done by the ministry of the Feciales. Brutus and his Collegues returned the next day to the camp: And then was held an assembly by Curia; where they chose, for the first Tribunes of the People, (according to Dionysius) L. Junius Brutus, and C. Sicinnius Bellutus, the Leaders in the Secession, with whom they joined C. and P. Licinius, and Sp. Icilius Ranga in the same dignity.

The election over, the Deputies imagined that all business was finished. But Brutus not yet content, having convened the people, advised them, to make a Law, (before they left the camp) declaring the persons of their TRIBUNES sacred. The motion was universally approved: He and his Collegues drew up the Law in writing, and the Assembly pass'd it. By this Law, whoever offered the least violence to a Tribune, was declared accursed; and his effects confiscated to the Goddess Ceres: He might with impunity be slain without any previous form of process. And all the Romans were to engage themselves by oath, and under the most dreadful imprecations, in their own name, and in that of their posterity, never to repeal this law. The people, after these regulations, erected an altar to Jupiter the Terrible, upon the top of the hill where their camp stood, and when they had offered sacrifices to the God, and consecrated the place of their retreat, they returned to Rome led by their TRIBUNES and the Deputies of the Senate.

* The Tribunes were elected the 10th of December, which continued ever after to be the day when these Magistrates entered on their office. Livy says, that C. Licinius and Lucius Albius were the first Tribunes, and that they chose themselves three Collegues, among whom Sicinnius Bellutus was one, and the same Historian adds, that, according to some Authors, there were but two Tribunes created upon the Mons Sacer.

C H A P. VIII.

§. I. The TRIBUNES OF THE PEOPLE obtain of the Senate, that two Officers be annually elected (out of the Plebeians) to be their Ministers and Assistants; who are afterwards called ÆDILES. §. II. The war is renewed against the Volsci. Caius Marcius Coriolanus signalizes his courage in this war. §. III. A famine at Rome revives the civil dissensions. The Senate send away great numbers of the people to plant two Colonies. §. IV. The Tribunes give out, that the dearth of provisions is owing to the malice of the Senate. The Consuls convene the People to undeceive them. The Tribunes dispute with the Consuls for the right of speaking in the assembly. The contrivance of Brutus to engage the People to make A LAW, Tribuno rogante. The Senate will not admit this Law to be valid. The Tribunes refuse the Senate levies regularly made to act against the Antiates. Coriolanus at the head of some Volunteers ravages the enemy's territory, sharing all the spoil among his soldiers.

§. I. ROME, by the establishment of the Tribuneship, made a great advance towards a new change in the form of her Government. It had passed before, as we have already seen, from the Monarchick State, to a kind of Aristocracy; for upon the expulsion of Tarquin, the whole authority did really and in fact devolve upon the Senate and the Great: But, now, by the creation of the Tribunes, a Democracy began to take place; and the people by insensible degrees, and under different pretences, got possession of the much greater share in the Government.

Year of
R O M E.
CCLX.
Bef. J. C.
Four hundred nine-
ty-two.
Seventeenth
Consulship.

The Senate indeed had no reason at first to apprehend so fatal a mischief to their authority from the Tribunes. These officers, at their original institution, had neither the quality of Senators, nor a particular tribunal, nor any jurisdiction over their fellow-citizens; they could not properly be called Magistrates. Habited like mere private men, and attended by only one servant, called Viator, who was little different from a footman, they sat upon a bench without the Senate, and were never admitted into it but when the Consuls called them in to ask their opinion upon some affair that concerned the interests of the Plebeians. Their sole functions were to defend the Plebeians; to interpose in all grievances and impositions offered them by their superiors. This interposing in matters decreed, or going to be decreed by the Senate, or the Magistrates, was called Intercessio, and was performed by pronouncing only one word, VETO, (I forbid it.) But this power was confined within the walls of Rome, or extended at most to a mile round it. And that the people might always have protectors at hand, the Tribunes were not allowed to be absent from the city any one whole day, except in the Feria Latina. For the same

Liv. B. 3.
c. 20.
D. Hal. B.
8. p. 554.
A. Gell.
L. 3. c. 2.
Macrob.
Sat. L. 14. reason

c. 3.

Y^{et} of reason they were obliged to keep their doors open day and night to receive the complaints of such citizens as should stand in need of their protection.

These officers, immediately after their establishment, obtained permission of the Senate, that two persons should be their Substitutes and Assistants in the multitude of their affairs, might be annually chosen out of the Plbeians: And such was the origin of the PLEBEIAN ÆDILES. They were at first called Minor and Assistants of the Tribunes; and, in the beginning, were indeed doing more than the Tribunes Agents; but they had, in after-times, the inspection of the publick edifices, the care of the temples, baths, aqueducts, and the cognizance of a great many affairs of the like nature, which before belonged to the Consuls: and then they were stiled * Ædiles.

§. II. ALL opposition to the making of regular levies being now at an end, the Consul Cominius led an army against the Volsci. He defeated them in battle, and took from them Longano and Polucia; after which he besieged Corio, a city strongly fortified, and which might be called their Capital. He carried this place, and gained a victory over the Antiates the same day: but CAIUS MARCIUS, an eminent Patrician, had all the glory of both actions. The troops detached by the Consul to scale the walls of Corio being repulsed in their first assault, Marcus rallied the runaways, led them on afresh to the charge, drove back the enemy within their walls, and, entering the city with them, made himself master of it. This exploit achieved, he with all expedition put himself in the foremost ranks of the Consul's main army, that was just going to engage with the Antiates, who were come to the relief of the place; and there he behaved himself with equal bravery, and had equal success.

The next day the Consul, having erected his Tribunal before his tent, called the soldiers together. His whole speech to them was little more than a panegyrick upon Marcus. He put a crown upon his head, assigned him a tenth part of all the spoil, and, in the name of the Republick, made him a present of a fine horse with stately furniture, giving him leave at the same time to chuse out any ten of the prisoners for himself; and lastly, he allotted him as much money as he could carry away. Of all these offers Marcus accepted only the horse and one captive of the ten, an old friend of his family, that he might give him his liberty. So generous and disinterested a conduct left no room for jealousy or envy: and, to add to the glory of the brave warrior, the Consul bestowed on him the surname of CORIOLANUS, transferring thereby from himself to Marcus all the honour of the conquest of Corio.

Cominius, at his return to Rome, disbanded his army; and war was succeeded by works of religion, publick games, and treaties of peace. The Latines having of late deserved well of the Republick, a new treaty of peace and alliance was made with them and confirmed by oaths: And in memory of the happy reconciliation between the Senate and People, a third day was at this time added to the Ferie Latine.

During

During this festival Menenius Agrippa died, and in great poverty like Poplicola. His relations thought to bury him privately and without ceremony; but the people being informed of it, they agreed to pay a Sex-tans (or two ounces of brass) per head, in order to have magnificent obsequies for him. Upon this the Senate entered into an emulation with the Commons, and would by no means suffer an illustrious Patrician to be buried at the expence of the Plebeians. They allotted a sum out of the publick treasury for his funeral, and committed the care of it to the Quæstors. Nevertheless the People refused to receive back their money, and ordered it to be given to Menenius's children, to comfort them in their indigence, and excite them to the pursuit of virtue.

Year of
R O M E
CCLX.
Bet. J. C.
Four hundred nine-
ty-two.
Seventeenth
Consulship.
D. Hal. p.
416.

A Census and a Lustrum closed the events of this memorable Consulship; there appeared to be in Rome at this time no more than 110000 men fit to bear arms, a number by many thousands * less than at the last enrollment.

§. III. UNDER the following administration of T. Geganius and P. Minucius, Rome was terribly afflicted by a famine, occasioned chiefly by the neglect of ploughing and sowing during the late troubles: For the Secession had happened after the autumnal equinox, about sowing-time; and the accommodation was not made till just before the winter solstice. The Senate dispatched Agents into Hetruria, Campania, the country of the Volsci, and even into Sicily, to buy corn. Those who embarked for Sicily met with a tempest which retarded their arrival at Syracuse; where they were constrained to pass the winter. At Cumæ, the Tyrant Aristodemus seized the money brought by the Commissaries; and they themselves with difficulty saved their lives by flight. The Volsci, far from being disposed to succour the Romans, would have marched against them, if a sudden and most destructive pestilence had not defeated their purpose. In Hetruria alone the Roman Commissaries met with success. They sent a considerable quantity of grain from thence to Rome in barks: But this was in a short time consumed; and the misery became excessive: The people were reduced to eat any thing they could get; and nature in so great extremity loathed nothing.

Year of
R O M E
CCLXI.
Bet. J. C.
Four hundred ninety-one.
Eighteenth
Consulship.
D. Hal. B.
7. P. 417.
Livy. B. 2.
... 12.
D. Hal. p.
418, & 427.

During this distress a Deputation came from Velitræ a Volscian City, where the Romans had formerly planted a colony, representing, that nine parts in ten of its inhabitants had been swept away by a plague, and praying the Romans to send a new colony to repeople it. The Conscript Fathers, without much hesitation, granted the request: For they considered that Velitræ might be an excellent barrier against those of the Volsci who should be disposed to invade the Roman territory; and that by discharging Rome of a great number of the Citizens, the famine would be lessened. But what more than any thing else determined them to this measure, were the murmurings of the people against the Patricians, for not having foreseen and prevented, by timely precautions, the present calamity. Some went so far as to accuse the Nobles of designedly bringing the famine

Plut. in Coriol. p.
219.
D. Hal. p.
428.

* Doubtless great numbers had run away to avoid being slaves to their creditors.

Year of ROME CCLXI. B.C. 443. upon the Plebeians, by way of revenge for the Secession. The Senate therefore pressed the departure of the colony, and without delay named three Leaders to conduct it.

Four hundred ninety-one. The people at first were very well pleased with the proposal, as it gave them a prospect of relief in their hunger: but when they reflected on the terrible havoc the plague had made among the old inhabitants of Velitrae, they began to fear that the place might be still infected; and this apprehension became so universal, that not one of them would consent to go thither. Nevertheless the Senate at length publishing a decree that all the citizens should draw lots, and that those to whose lot it fell to be of the colony should instantly march for Velitrae, or suffer the severest punishments for their disobedience, fear and hunger made the people comply; and the Fathers, a few days after, sent away a second colony to Norba, a considerable city of Latium. But the Patricians were disappointed as to the benefit they expected from these measures. The Plebeians who remained in Rome, being more and more pressed by hunger and want, grew daily more angry with the Senate. At first they assembled in small companies to vent their wrath in abusive complaints; and at length, in one great body, rushed all together into the Forum, calling out upon their TRIBUNES for succour.

p. 229. §. IV. THE Tribunes made it their business to heighten the general discontent. Having convened the people, SPURIUS ICILIUS, chief of the College, inveighed most bitterly against the Senate, and when he had ended his harangue, exhorted others to speak freely their thoughts; particularly, and by name, calling upon Brutus and Sicinnius, now Ædiles. These men, far from attempting to extinguish the fire, added fresh fuel to it. In set speeches, which they had purposely prepared, they insinuated, that the dearth of provisions was wholly owing to the resentment and revenge of the rich Patricians, touched to the quick at the liberty the people had recovered by their Secession: That having corn hid in their granaries, and money to buy what provisions were brought from foreign countries, (while the Plebeians had had neither the one nor the other) they little troubled themselves about the famine: And that the sending away such a numerous colony of Roman citizens into an infected air, could be with no very good design*. And the more to inflame the spirits of the multitude, they enumerated all the past insults which the people had suffered from the Nobles. Brutus concluded his harangue with loudly threatening, that, if the Plebeians would follow his advice, he

* The Plebeians and their Leaders were doubtless, in some respects, very unjust towards the Senate, on this occasion: Yet the latter seem blameable for not having taken more early measures to prevent the scarcity of provisions, which the want of a year's crop must naturally occasion. And by the speeches which Dionysius and Livy would soon oblige those men, who had caused the present calamity, to find a remedy for it: After which the assembly was dismissed.

(as we shall see hereafter) put into the mouth of Cornelius, and which are represented as heard with applause by a great part of the Senate, it appears, that there were many in that body, who meant to take advantage of the people's hunger to get the Tribuneship abolished.

The next day, the Consuls, greatly alarmed at this commotion, and apprehending, from the menaces of Brutus, some very mischievous event, thought it adviseable to convene the Senators, that they might consider of the best means to avert the impending evil. The Fathers could not agree in opinion. Some were for employing soft words and fair promises to quiet and gain over the most turbulent. But Appius's advice prevailed, which was, That the Consuls should call the people together, assure them that the Patricians had not brought upon them the miseries they suffered, and promise, on the part of the Senate, all possible care to provide for their necessities; but, at the same time, should reprove the disturbers of the publick peace, and threaten them with the severest punishments, if they did not amend their behaviour.

When the Consuls, towards the close of the day, having assembled the people, would have signified to them the disposition and intention of the Senate, they were interrupted by the Tribunes. A dispute ensued, in which no order or decency was observed on either side. Several speaking at the same time, and with great vociferation, no one could be well understood by the audience. The Consuls judged, that being the superior Magistrates, their authority extended to all assemblies of the Citizens. On the other side, it was pretended, that the assemblies of the people were the province of the Tribunes, as the Senate was that of the Consuls. The dispute grew warm, and the hottest, in each party, were just ready to come to blows, when Brutus advancing into the midst of the assembly, and addressing himself to the Consuls promised them that he would quiet the tumult, if they would give him leave to speak. The Consuls hearing a Plebeian orator ask of them permission to speak, instead of asking it of his Tribunes; and imagining from hence, that he yielded the point in dispute, readily consented to his request. Silence being made, Brutus, without any preamble, fell at once to interrogating the Consuls: "Don't you remember (said he) that in our treaty of accommodation, this right was granted by you to us, That when the Tribunes should convene the people, on any affair whatever, the Patricians should neither be present in the assembly, nor disturb it?—I remember it very well, answered Geganius.—Wherefore then (added Brutus) do you disturb us now, and hinder our Tribunes from saying what they think fit?—Because (replied Geganius) the people are not now assembled by the Tribunes orders, but by ours. If the Tribunes had convoked this assembly, they would have met with no molestation from us, nor would even our curiosity have brought us hither to hear what pass. Nor, though we convened the present assembly, do we object to their speaking: But we think it highly unjust that they should hinder us from exercising that Prerogative."

Brutus hereupon cried out, "Plebeians, the victory is ours, our adversaries have yielded all we desired. Cease disputing to day; to-morrow I will shew you what is the extent of your power. And, you Tribunes,

" give place to the Consuls for the present ; you will not do it for ever,
 " when you shall know the prerogatives of your dignity : And these you " shall soon learn. I promise you to make the thing clear to demon" stration, and to humble, in some measure, the haughtiness of these " Patricians. If I deceive you, inflict upon me what punishment you
 " please."

No body offering to answer Brutus, the assembly broke up ; and the two parties retired with very different thoughts. The indigent Plebeians went home, persuaded that Brutus had hit upon some excellent scheme, and would not be so bold in promising, if he had not the means of performing. On the other hand, the Patricians despised him as an idle boaster, and considered his promises as mere empty air ; knowing very well, that the only power, granted by the Senate to the Tribunes, was that of succouring the Plebeians in case of oppression. Not all the nobles, however, made so light of the matter. The oldest Senators, especially, apprehended some great and incurable mischief from the fury of that enter-prizing Plebeian.

Brutus spent the following night with the Tribunes, imparting to them his project, and consulting with them on the best measures for its execution. Escorted by a considerable body of Plebeians, they, by break of day, repaired to the Forum, took possession of the temple of Vulcan, (where it was usual for those to place themselves who intended to harangue,) and presently gave orders to call the people together. The Forum was quickly crowded ; never was a greater confluence of the citizens. Then the Tribune Itilius, stepping forward, entered into a long invective against the Patricians, summing up all the hardships and oppressions which the people had formerly suffered from them. He added,—“ And no longer ago than yesterday, they even hindered me “ from speaking, thereby depriving me of all power belonging to my “ office. For what power can we hereafter have to do any thing, if the “ liberty of speaking be not allowed us ? How shall we be able to give “ you any assistance when oppressed by them, if we be deprived of the “ power of calling you together, [and conferring with you ?] For all “ business is begun by words ; and certain it is, that they who have not “ the privilege to speak what they think, will never be able to execute “ what they desire. Take back therefore the Authority you have given “ us, if you will not so confirm it to us, that we may have the free and “ undisturbed exercise of it ; or, if you are willing to confirm it, make a “ Law, prohibiting all persons from giving us hereafter any molesta“ tion.”

This discourse being received with great applause, and the people crying out to him to propose the Law, he immediately read it aloud to them, (for he had prepared it the night before) and then, without delay, proceeded to take their suffrages ; the affair requiring the utmost dispatch, lest the Consuls should come and oppose it. The law was in terms to this effect : “ When a Tribune is speaking to an assembly of
 “ the

“ the people, let no one contradict or interrupt him. If any one violate “ this Law, let him give security to the Tribunes, to pay the fine to “ which, after trial, they shall condemn him. If he refuse, he shall be “ put to death, and his goods confiscated. If there happen any dispute “ concerning the fine, the people shall decide it*.”

Year of
 ROME
 CCLXI.
 Bet. J. C.
 Four hundred ninety-one.

As Eighteen
 Consulship.

* Mr. Vertot and Mr. Rollin seem to have wholly misunderstood this passage of Dionysius's History. To conform their Narrations to their own Ideas of his meaning, they have altered the words, which he puts into the mouth of Brutus, interrogating the Consuls. They make Brutus's Question relate only to the Negotiations on foot at the time of the Secession, “ Whether it was not granted to “ the People, that during those negotiations,
 “ the managers for the People should have “ liberty to confer with them, without be“ ing molested by the Patricians?” And the latter part of Geganus's answer, where he says, ‘That if the Tribunes had convened the Assembly then present, he would not have interrupted it, nor have come to hear what passed, they impute to the Consul’s hastiness, and his not foreseeing the Consequences; (of which inconsiderateness Dionysius says nothing.) And they suppose that, by the new law, of which Brutus was the projector, the Tribunes acquired the power of convening the people, and presiding in the assemblies by them convened, and that this was the great point now gained. * La nouvelle loi dont il s’agit donne beaucoup plus d’étendue à la fonction des Tribuns que la voie de simple opposition.— Cette loi leur donne expressément le pouvoir de convoquer les assemblées du peuple et d’y présider.

Mons. Rollin, that the law may the better square with his notion, makes it run thus, In the assemblies of the people, HELD BY THE TRIBUNES, let no one contradict them, &c. Now the words held by the Tribunes, are not in the law; and we may observe, that the pretence for making the law was the Tribunes having been hindered the day before from speaking in an assembly, HELD BY THE CONSULS. And there is not, in the law, one word of convening or presiding. And it appears, I think, very plainly, from the concession, made by the Consul Geganus to Brutus, in their dispute, that the Tribunes, by the treaty of reunion on the Mons Sacer, were to have the privilege of convening the people as often as they pleased, and conferring with them, without being exposed to any molestation from the Patricians. And the Tribune Isilius speaks of this as a right belonging to them, and of which the Patricians intended to deprive them: And what he urges upon the people is, To secure to the Tribunes, by a new law, the undisturbed exercise of their undoubted right of speaking to the people assembled. It is probable, that when this right was first granted, there was no penalty laid on those who contradicted or interrupted the Tribunes when speaking to the people; and in this respect therefore the present Law had something new; and it seems likewise to extend the privilege of the Tribunes to ALL assemblies of the people by whomsoever called. But I should think, that the principal point gained by Brutus, on this occasion, was not any thing contained in the new law, but was rather his engaging THE PEOPLE to assume the power of making laws. TRIBUNO ROGANTE (at the motion of a Tribune.) The people were not accustomed to pass any thing into a law but what was proposed to them by the Senate, or the Patrician Magistrates. Brutus had promised, not only to shew the TRIBUNES the prerogatives of their office, but likewise to shew the PEOPLE the extent of their power; and this meaning could not be that he would shew them they had a title to powers which no-body disputed. In pursuance of this promise, he persuaded them (as appears by the event) that they had a right to enact laws, without any previous recommendation or approbation of them by the Senate or Consuls, and at the sole request of the Tribunes. The Tribunes had hitherto held only Cencia, councils, for conferring with the Plebeians, but they now turned these Cencia into Comitia, for making Laws. This was a matter of great importance, extremely diminishing the authority of the Senate, and augmenting that of the people and their Plebeian Magistrates.

It would seem that Brutus and the Tribunes raised that quarrel, which they had, the day before, with the Consuls, on purpose to.

Year of ROMAN CONSULS SENATORS
E. 439
CONSULS
D. 439
439.

As soon as the Tribunes had got the law passed, they dismissed the assembly.

This transaction was followed by many disputes and altercations between the Consuls and the Tribunes, on various matters. The Senate would not approve the Placita of the Commons, nor would the Commons confirm the Decrees of the Senate. Each party kept itself upon its guard against the other. But these mutual jealousies and oppositions produced none of those mischievous effects, which are the usual consequences of civil dissension. The indigent Plebeians (pacified probably by the late enlargement of their own authority and that of their Tribunes) did not break open the houses of the rich Patricians to search for hidden provisions; nor did they seize by violence what was brought from abroad to the markets; but contentedly purchased very small matters at high prices; and, when their money failed, feeding on roots and herbs, gathered in the fields, bore the famine with patience. Nor did the rich Patricians, on the other hand, take advantage of the superior strength they had, by means of their numerous clients and domesticks, to fall upon the poor, enfeebled by hunger, slaying one part of them, and driving the other out of the city; but endured their offences (says Dionysius) with that gentleness and benevolence of mind, which prudent and indulgent fathers exercise towards their children.

During this distress of the Roman People, several of the neighbouring states invited them to come, as many as pleased, and settle in their territories, where they should be admitted to all the privileges of the natives. These invitations were made by some from good-will and commiseration; by others from jealousy of the former prosperity of the Republick. Many Roman Citizens accepted the offer, and to bring about this design. They rudely interrupted the Consuls when speaking, that they themselves might be interrupted, and so have a pretext for complaining of ill treatment; and might by that complaint engage the people to make a law in favour of their Tribunes, at the motion of their Tribunes. And Brutus in this proceeding seems to have had a particular view to the affair of supplying the city with provisions; which was the great business then in hand, what the people were most intent upon, and in which the confident promises of Brutus had made the poor citizens hope some instable assistance from him. One of Brutus's views, I say, in engaging the people to act independently of the Senate, was, that in case the Senate did not take such measures with regard to provisions, as the necessities of the people required, and the Tribunes approved, the people and their Tribunes might, by their own authority, regulate that matter according to their own desire. And we shall presently find them threatening the Senate to exercise this authority.

It may be proper to observe, that though the new law, above-mentioned, is here considered as the first PLEBISCITUM, or law made by the people, Tribuno rogante, yet we have seen, that Brutus, as soon as he was created Tribune, acted the Legislator in form, when, on the Mons Sacre, that law was made, which declared the persons of the Tribunes Sacrosanct. He is represented as convening the people, and proposing the law to the assembly. But perhaps, as, at this time, all transactions were irregular, this was not looked upon as a precedent which could authorize an imitation of it, when things were settled; and this might be the motive to Brutus and the Tribunes to take such precautions for preventing opposition from the Consuls in the affair of the new law; in the very making of which the prerogative of law-making, independently of the Senate, was assumed by the people and their Tribunes.

removed from Rome with their families; and of these one part never returned, but the rest came back when the Republick had recovered its tranquillity.

Year of
R O M E
CCLXI.

Bef. J. C.

Four hundied ninety-one.

Eighteenth
Consulship

The Consuls observing these Migrations, resolved, with the approbation of the Senate, to raise an army, and lead it into the field. Some incursions, which the Volsi had made on the Roman territories, furnished a fair pretext for this measure. And it was hoped, that the unanimity, which generally reigns among fellow-soldiers in the same camp, would take place of that animosity between the Patricians and Plebeians, which was not yet extinguished; and, at least, one advantage was sure to follow from the expedition, that the troops, destined for the campaign, would find bread in the enemy's country, and thereby lessen the distress in their own.

Nevertheless, the people, insensible to all these reasons, and dissuaded by their Tribunes, would not give their names to be inrolled; and the Consuls thought it not adviseable to put the Laws in force, to constrain them. An army of volunteers was formed of Patricians only with their clients, strengthened by some few of the Plebeians, who joined them just before their marching from Rome. These were allured to the service by the perfect confidence they had of success; a confidence founded on the experienced bravery and abilities of Caius Marcius Coriolanus, whom they were to have for their commander. The army advanced to the very gates of Antium, ravaged all the country about it, and brought from thence slaves, cattle, and corn, in great abundance. Coriolanus reserved no part of the booty for himself, but shared it all among the soldiers, who returned to Rome loaded with provisions. And then those of the people who had refused to serve, murmured at their Tribunes for having diverted them from following so successful a Leader.

D. Hal. p.

433.

Plut. in

Coriol. p.

219.

C H A P. IX.

§. I. Plenty of corn being brought to Rome from Sicily, fresh disputes arise in the Senate about the distribution of it. Coriolanus is for taking advantage of the people's distress to get the Tribuneship abolished. The younger Senators applaud the motion. §. II. The Tribunes who had been present at this debate go away in a fury, and stir up the people to revenge. They cite Coriolanus to appear before them. He refuses. They endeavour to seize him as he comes out of the Senate-house, but are repulsed by those who attend him. The Consuls appease the tumult. §. III. Early the next morning the Tribunes hold an Assembly of the People on this affair. Minucius the Consul, by gentle words, disposes the multitude to peace; but Coriolanus spoils all by a fresh declaration of the same sentiments which had before offended them. The Tribunes condemn him to death. The Patricians oppose the execution of this rash sentence, and the people seem

not

not to approve it. The Tribunes therefore resolve to prosecute Coriolanus in a legal way, and to convene the people by Tribes for his trial. The Assembly is adjourned.

§. I. IN the following Consulship of M. Minucius and A. Sempronius, plenty succeeding to the famine gave birth to new commotions at Rome.

These Magistrates took effectual care to store the publick magazines with provisions, both from the maritime towns of Italy, and from the inland countries. About the same time the commissioners, whom the Senate had employed to go into Sicily, returned with a great number of ships laden with corn. Cato, Tyrant of Syracuse, had made a present of one half of it, and the commissioners had bought the other very cheap with the publick money: The question now arose in the Senate, what price to set upon it; and the Tribunes were called into the Assembly, to give their opinion. Those of the Senators who had no views, but to restore a perfect intelligence between the People and the Senate, were for distributing gratis, among the poor, that corn which they owed to the liberality of the publick treasure. But when it came to Coriolanus's turn to speak, this Senator, to whom the institution of the Tribuneship was odious, maintained, that such a condescension in the Senate to the People would only encourage them in their insolence; that there was no keeping them to their duty any longer than they were in indigence, and that the time was now come to avenge the majesty of the Senate, violated by a seditious rabble, whose Leaders, by an additional crime, had extorted dignities for themselves, as a reward for their rebellion. It was thus that he declared himself in the very presence of the Tribunes.

But before we proceed to the consequences of this affair, it will be proper to give some further knowledge of a man, who is to act so great a part in this period of our History.

Plut. Life of Coriol. Caius Marcius Coriolanus was descended from one of the most illustrious Patrician families in Rome: He received the surname of Coriolanus, as was before observed, for having taken, sword in hand, Corioli, one of the chief towns of the Volsci. Having, in his infancy, lost his father, he was educated by his mother, Velutia; for whom (as Plutarch tells us) he conceived so high a respect, and so tender a regard, that though no man was ever more ardent in the pursuit of glory, yet glory itself, the ultimate end of other men in their noblest actions, was by him coveted chiefly as a means to create delight and satisfaction to his mother. Happily disposed by nature, and virtuously educated, he kept himself master of those passions by which young men are usually enslaved; and to great an abhorrence he had of vice, that to be innocent, or to avoid injustice from the necessity which the laws imposed, or from fear of punishment, he reckoned not as virtue. He was frugal, disinterested, a contemner of riches, patient of hardships and fatigue; and never were these excellent qualities accompanied with a more exalted courage, or a greater capacity for the art of war; he seemed to have been born a General; but he was harsh and imperious in command; as severe to other men as to himself; a generous friend, an implacable enemy; too haughty for a Republick. Though ambitious of the highest dignities, he neglected those arts of management and insinuation so necessary to obtain them in a State founded upon equality and freedom. He had stood for the Consulship at the last elections, and most of the Senators, with a crowd of other Patricians, had appeared for him. But this very recommendation of him by the Great proved the hindrance to his promotion. For the Tribunes, who dreaded the extraordinary courage and firmness of Coriolanus, represented the earnest solicitations of so many Nobles as a kind of conspiracy against the Plebeians, and thereby engaged the latter, tho' they had come to the assembly well disposed in his favour, to refuse him their voices. Of this refusal he conceived the sharpest resentment, as he evidently shewed, on the present occasion. He said in full Senate, "If the people expect to have provisions at a low price, let them restore to the Senate its ancient rights. Why must I behold Plebeian Magistrates in Rome? I, who could not endure Tarquin upon the throne, shall I suffer a Sicinnius to reign? Let him secede once more with his Plebeians. The way is open to the Mons Sacer, and to the other hills. Let them pillage our fields as they did three years ago, and live upon the crops they find there, the rich harvests their madness has occasioned. When tamed by hunger, they will be more disposed (if I mistake not) to cultivate the lands, than, by a new secession in arms, to hinder them from being cultivated."

The popular and pacifick men of the Senate extremely disliked this passionate and haughty speech; and declared, that it was more like the ravings of a madman, than the counsel of a wise politician. On the other hand, almost all the young Senators, with the rich and the ambitious of the elder, gave it the highest commendations. The majority of the assembly were for abolishing the Tribuneship, and re-establishing the Government upon its ancient foundations.

§. II. THE Tribunes, who (as was said before) had been called into the Senate, broke out into the extremest passion of rage, when they saw how things went. To loud complaints and reproaches, they added the sharpest invectives against Corollanus, whom they stiled an incendiary, and the pest of the Republick; and they threatened, that if the Senate did not condemn him to death or banishment, they would do it themselves. Corollanus, on the other hand, threatened them, that if they did not cease their insolence, he would find means, more effectual than words, to repress it. Most of the Senate taking part with Coriolanus, the Tribunes went out in the greatest fury, invoking the Gods, the revengers of perjury, to witness the solemn oaths by which the Senate had authorized the establishment of the Tribuneship. They assembled the

Year of
R O M E
CCLXII.
Bef. J. C.
Four hundred ninety.

Nineteenth
Consulship.
L. V. B. 2.
C. 15.
D. Hal. P.
438.

people tumultuously, and cried aloud to them, that the Patricians had made a league to destroy them, their wives and children, unless they delivered their Tribunes chained into the hands of Coriolanus, a new Tyrant rising up in the Republick; and they sent him a summons to come and answer for his behaviour before the Assembly of the People.

Coriolanus, naturally haughty and resolute, having contemptuously sent back their Officer, the Tribunes immediately went with a strong party of the most daring of the Plebeians, and waited for him at the door of the Senate, in order to seize him when he should come out. They met him, attended as usual with a crowd of his clients, and a great number of young Senators, who had a respect for his person, and who thought it an honour to follow his opinion in the Senate, and his example in war. The Tribunes no sooner saw him, but they ordered Brutus and Iulius, who this year performed the office of Ædiles, to lay hold of him and lead him to prison. But it was not easy to execute such a commission. The Patricians, who thought it a most extravagant enterprize of the Tribunes, to offer violence to a Senator, against whom no process was commenced, resolutely put themselves before him to defend him. They beat back the Ædiles with their fists: No other arms were used in those days, in the city, the inhabitants never putting on the sword, but when they marched out against the enemy. The Tribunes, enraged at this resistance, called the people to their aid; the Patricians received fresh succours from their own party, and the tumult increased. But the Consuls at length arrived, and, more by intreaties than authority, prevailed upon both parties to retire.

§. III. BUT the Tribunes did not stop here; they convened the people early the next morning, inveighed, as usual, against the whole order of the Patricians; and then in particular against Coriolanus, enumerating his crimes; the words he had spoken in the Senate relating to the corn; his refusal, when summoned, to appear before the people; and his driving away with blows the Ædiles, who were sent to arrest him. In conclusion they added, That if the Patricians would speak in their own defence, they were at full liberty to do it; and they kept the people together, waiting till the Senate should break up. For the Fathers were at the same time deliberating, whether they should justify themselves to the people, or silently let things take their course. The former was at length resolved; and the Consuls, having dismissed the assembly, repaired to the Comitium, to clear the Patricians from the charge against them, and to beg the people not to proceed to any harsh resolution against Coriolanus.

D. Hal. P.
439, & 440.

Minucius the first Consul spoke to the following effect. He first complained in general, and with abundance of moderation, of those who caught at the least pretence to raise new disturbances in the Republick; and then remonstrated to the people, how very unreasonable it was to accuse the the Senate and Patricians of having caused the dearth, when every body knew it to have been wholly occasioned by the desertion of the people, and their neglecting to cultivate and sow their lands. He told them, that the other calumnies they so often heard, of the Senate's designing to abolish the Tribuneship, and to make the whole Roman People perish by famine, were no less extravagant and monstrous. That to put a stop at once to reports so false and injurious, he declared to them, that the Senate did again confirm the power of the Tribunes; and that as to the corn, they left it entirely to the People to fix what price upon it they themselves thought fit.

Year of
R O M E
CCLXII.
Bef. J. C.
Four hundred ninety.
Nineteenth
Consulship.

The Consul, after a preamble so well adapted to soften the minds, and gain the good-will of the People, added, by way of a mild reproach, that he could not help blaming them for the precipitation with which they suffered themselves to be carried away by the first reports spread abroad by some particular incendiaries. That it was a strange thing to hear the Senate accused as criminal in relation to a matter wherein it had neither done, nor determined any thing, and only because in the debates about it, the members had delivered different opinions. “Remember, said he, that “at the time of your secession on the Mons Sacer, all your intreaties,
“and even your utmost wishes at first were only to obtain the abolition “of the debts. Scarce had you received so great a favour, but you made “yourselves a kind of new right, founded on the easiness of the Senate, “to demand the creation of two Plebeian Magistrates, whose whole au“thority, according to your own proposal, was to be confined to the “hindering a Patrician from oppressing a Plebeian: a new grant, for “which you returned us the greatest thanks, and which seemed to give “you full content. In those times of trouble, even when the sedition “was at the highest, you never thought of requiring a diminution of “the Senate's authority, or an alteration in the form of our Govern“ment. By what right then do your Tribunes now pretend to carry “their inspection, and give their censure upon what passes in our delibe“rations? When till now was a Senator ever treated as a criminal, for “having spoke his mind freely in the Senate? What laws give you au“thority to demand his banishment or his death? Let us suppose, since “you will have it so, that Coriolanus has let slip some words too harsh in “delivering his opinion, and that he is accountable to you for this; are “you not obliged in equity to forget a few random words that were “lost in air, for the sake of his real services, of which you yourselves “have reaped all the fruit? Preserve the life of so excellent a Citizen, “preserve to your Country so great a Captain; and if you will not ac“quit him as innocent, at least grant him as criminal to the whole Senate, “who intreat this favour of you by my mouth. This will be a bond to “unite us more closely than ever, and will be a new motive to the Senate “to continue their goodness towards you: whereas if you persist in your “resolution of destroying this Senator, perhaps the opposition you

Year of ROME CCLXII. Bet. J. C. Four hundred and ninety. Nineteenth Consulship. D. Hal. p. 442. P. 443.

" may meet with from the Patricians may produce calamities that will " make you repent of having pushed your resentment too far."
 This discourse made an impression upon the multitude, and brought them to an inclination for peace and union. Sicinnius was surprized and confounded at it, but, dissembling his uneasiness, gave great praises to Minucius and all the Senators, for having been pleased to condescend so far as to account to the People for their conduct, and for not having disdained to interpose their prayers and good offices in favour of Coriolanus. Then, turning to that Senator, he added in an ironical tone, " And you, excellent Citizen, will you not defend to-day before the People that advice so useful to the publick, and which you so boldly gave in the Senate? Or rather, why have you not recourse to the clemency of the Roman People? For I would not advise you to deny a fact, of which there are so many witnesses, nor impudently attempt to justify it. Coriolanus, I suppose, thinks it below him, in person to ask pardon of the people, though not below the Consuls and Patricians to ask pardon for him."

Part. in Consul. p. 221.

The artful Tribune spoke in this manner, because he was persuaded that Coriolanus, a man of too lofty a spirit to retract what he had said, or to stoop to supplications, would provoke the People afresh by the haughtiness of his answers. Nor was he deceived in his hopes; for Coriolanus was so far from owning himself guilty, or endeavouring to pacify the people, as Minucius had done, that he quite destroyed the effect of that Consul's speech, by an ill-timed resoluteness, and by the harshness of his expressions. He inveighed more violently than ever against the Tribunes, and declared boldly that the People had no right to judge a Senator: that, if any man was offended at what he had said in the Senate, he might summon him before the Consuls, whom he acknowledged for his legal judges, and before whom he should be always ready to give an account of his conduct. That if he now appeared before an Assembly of Plebeians, on their citation, it was not to submit himself to their judgment, but to reproach them for their wicked behaviour at the time of the Secession, and ever since; and to exhort them to amend their manners.

D. Hal. p. 444.

The young Senators, charmed with his intrepidity, and overjoyed to have a man who durst speak openly what they all thought, cried out, that he had advanced nothing but what was conformable to the laws: but the People, who saw themselves despised, resolved to make him feel their power. Some were even for killing him instantly; and the Tribunes gave the reins to this fury. Sicinnius, without collecting the voices of the Assembly, pronounced sentence of death against him, declaring that it was the sentence of the whole College of Tribunes, as a punishment for his insult upon them the day before, in the persons of their Ædiles; and he ordered him to be thrown down from the top of the Tarpeian rock. The Ædiles immediately drew near to lay hold of him; but then all the Patricians in the Assembly running to his assistance, they placed him in the midst of them, resolutely determined to oppose force with force.

force. The tumult rose to a great height, and the two parties, from mutual reproaches, came even to blows. At length the Consuls throwing themselves into the crowd, and ordering their Lictors to disperse it, the tumult and scuffle presently ceased; so great a reverence, says Dionysius, had the multitude in those days for that royal authority which resided in the Consuls.

Year of
R O M E
CCLXII.
Bef. J. C.
Four hundred ni ne-
ty.

While Sicinnius, much disconcerted at this event, and yet very unwilling to quit his enterprize, was considering what new step to take, Brutus, that able counsellor, ever fruitful in expedients, taking him aside, represented to him, That he must never think of destroying Coriolanus so long as he was guarded by the whole body of the Nobility; that even the People had begun to murmur at his pretending to be both Judge and Party at the same time; that the multitude, who turn in an instant from the most violent fury to sentiments of compassion, looked upon the sentence of death as too rigorous; that in the present disposition of mens minds he would not succeed by ways of violence; and that the most reasonable and unexceptionable method was, to cite Coriolanus to appear in judgment before the people; and he advised him by all means to have their suffrages taken by Tribes, where the great and the rich would be mingled with the poor, and every man's voice would be of equal value; whereas in an Assembly by Centuries, the rich Patricians might carry their point against a majority of the Citizens.

Nineteenth
Consulship.
D. Hal. p.
445.

Sicinnius seeing no better way to extricate himself out of his perplexity, resolved to follow his friend's advice. Addressing himself to the people, "You see, Romans, that no thanks are due to the Patricians, if much blood is not shed this day, and that they are ready to come to the greatest extremities to rescue the declared enemy of the Roman People out of the hands of justice. Let us set them an example of more moderation. Some, to screen the delinquent, have cited the law which forbids the putting any man to death, before a formal trial and condemnation. Let us admit this plea, though they act not legally towards us. Return home now, and wait a more favourable opportunity to do yourselves right. You will not wait long. As for us, when we have regulated some affairs more pressing, we shall appoint a day for Marcus to appear before you. In the mean time, as to what regards the price and distribution of the corn, if the Senate do not take proper care of that matter, the Tribunes will give directions about it themselves." Having thus spoken, he dismissed the Assembly.

C H A P. X.

- §. I. The Consuls endeavour by remonstrances to allay the heat of the Tribunes, and bring them to conform to the ancient usages, which did not allow the People to take cognizance of any affair till it was referred to them by a decree of the Senate. The Tribunes consent to observe this rule, and desire they may be heard by the Fathers in relation to their charge against Coriolanus.

Coriolanus. §. II. The Tribune Decius makes a long speech in the Senate, inveighing bitterly against the accused, and contending for the People's right to judge him. §. III. Appius Claudius in very strong terms opposes this pretension. §. IV. But Valerius in terms no less strong urges the expediency of the Senate's compliance. He exhorts Coriolanus in the most pathetick manner to submit himself to the People's judgment; and he adds a discourse in behalf of a balance of power between the Patricians and Plebeians. §. V. It is carried by a majority of votes that Coriolanus shall be tried by the People. Coriolanus having assurances given him, that the accusers charge shall be confined to the single crime of Tyranny, consents to the drawing up of the decree. A day for the trial is appointed.

Year of POME CCLXII.
Ber. J. C.
Four hundred and sixty.

Nineteenth
Centulship.
D. Hal. B.
P. 445.
P. 445.

§. I. THE CONSULS having, soon after, assembled the Senate, to deliberate on means for appeasing the present troubles, it was resolved, that they should endeavour to soothe the Plebeians, by selling the corn to them at the lowest price it had ever been at before the secession; and likewise to engage the Tribunes, for the Senate's sake, either to drop the prosecution against Coriolanus entirely, or at least to defer it for a considerable time, during which, the passions of the people might happily subside. The decree about the corn, when published, was universally well received and ratified; But the Tribunes could not be prevailed upon, with regard to the trial, to grant any thing more than the delay requested. A farther delay was occasioned by some acts of hostility committed by the Astivates which called the Romans into the field. But those enemies readily submitting, the troops in a short time returned home: And as soon as they were disbanded, Sicinnius called an assembly of the people, and named to them a day for Coriolanus's trial. He invited all the inhabitants of the city to be present at it, and ordered those who dwelt in the country to quit their work, and punctually repair to the Assembly, that they might give their votes in an affair which concerned the liberty and safety of the whole State. And he likewise sent notice to Coriolanus to appear there and answer for his conduct; assuring him, that he should have justice done him in all its forms.

P. 447.

Great was the solicitude of the Senate, to put a stop, if possible, to this proceeding. The Consuls, not desparing to overcome the obstinacy of the Tribunes, entered into conference with them upon the affair of the accused. Minucius put them in mind, that it was contrary to established custom, to refer any affair to the People, before it had passed the judgment of the Senate: that the Kings themselves had always had this deference for that august body. He exhorted them to conform to the usage of their ancestors, and, if they had any considerable grievances to lay to the charge of Coriolanus, to apply themselves to the Senate, who, according to the nature of the crime, and the solidity of the proofs, would refer it by a Senatus-consultum to the judgment of the People; who then, and not till then, would have a right to try a Citizen.

Sicinnius clamoured against this proposal, declaring that he would never suffer the authority of the Roman People to be restrained and directed by a Senatus-consultum. His Collegues, however, were more tractable. By the advice of Decius, they consented that the Senate should first make a decree upon the affair; a complaisance, that with regard to the present case, was of little moment, because they had doubtless taken a firm resolution, if the Senatus-consultum were not such as they desired, to appeal from it to the Assembly of the People, and for so doing to make the Lex Valeria their foundation of right; so that in reality the only question was, whether the affair should be carried before the People in the first or second instance.

Year of
R O M E.
CCLXII.
Bef. J. C.
Four hundred ninety.
Nineteenth
Consulship.

When the Tribunes consented to let the Conscript Fathers decree (as usual) whether the commons should take cognizance of the matter depending, they demanded, in return, that not only they themselves, who by their office were Protectors of the People, might be heard in the Senate, but any citizen, who would support the reasons of the Tribunes, or oppose them; and they farther insisted, that the Senators should be all sworn, as judges used to be, to give their sentence according to truth and equity; and that a decree should be made conformable to the opinion of the plurality. To these conditions the Consuls agreed.

§. II. THE Tribunes were the next day introduced into the Senate.

Decius, though a young man, was their speaker, an honour yielded to him, doubtless, because of his eloquence, and the readiness with which he expressed himself in publick: "You are not ignorant, Conscript Fa-

"thers, of what might happen to us, if a certain Collegue of ours, who "disapproves our coming hither to ask from you, as a favour, that pow"er, to which by the Laws we have a right, should bring us into judg"ment before the People for this proceeding: We should doubtless be "condemned, as deserters and betrayers of our trust, to the most ig"nominous punishments. Nevertheless, confiding in the justice of our "cause, and the sincerity of your oaths, we have ventured to come.
"And though we are inconsiderable men, little qualified to speak in a "manner suitable to the importance of the subject, yet as the subject is "so highly important, we doubt not but this will be sufficient to engage
"your attention to our words. And if that which we are going to demand, "shall appear to you to be just and useful to the Republick, and even "necessary to its welfare, we hope that you will readily, and without he"sitation, comply with our request.

D. Hal. p.
448, & seq.

"When you, Conscript Fathers, having, by our assistance, expelled
"Kings, and established the present form of government (of which we "do not complain) came to remark, that the Plebeians, in all contro"versies which they afterwards had with Patricians, were constantly
"worsted, you, by the advice of Valerius Poplicola, made a Law, that "any Plebeian, who suffered violence and injustice from the Patricians, "might bring his cause before the People. And nothing contributed "more,

Yet, more, than this Law, to the maintaining that union among the citizens, which enabled them to defeat the many attempts of Tarquin to reascend the Throne. It is in virtue of this Law that we, the Tribunes, now cite Caius Marcius before the Tribunal of the People, to answer for the violence and injuries we have all suffered from him.
 And what need can there be of a previous Senatus-consultum for this prosecution? In matters concerning which there are no Laws enacted, you have a power to make Decrees, which the People, if they please, may confirm by their suffrages. But in cases provided for by an inviolable Law, actually subsisting, we may certainly make use of this Law, without waiting for a previous Decree of consent from you. Will any one say, that every private citizen has the privilege of appealing to the People from an unjust sentence, but that we, the Tribunes, have not the same privilege?

Nineteenth
 Consulship.

With regard to natural rights, the unwritten Laws of Nature, we think it just, that the Plebeians should be upon an equal foot with you.
 The honours, dignities, magistracies of the State, we readily yield to those of your order, who are most eminent for merit and riches. But not to suffer injuries, and, if any person do them, to bring him to condign punishment, we judge these to be rights common to all the citizens. And, in this respect, we will not suffer the equality between the two orders to be destroyed. So much for the question of Right.

If it be asked, whether the granting what we now demand, will be for the interest of the Republick, there is surely no man, who considers, that discord is the greatest evil that can happen to a State, but must answer in the affirmative. I will suppose that it was against your inclination, and was neither for the honour, nor the particular advantage of your order, to make us those concessions, which we obtained from you on the Mons Sacer. Yet as you have made them, and are bound by the most solemn oaths, never to violate the articles of our treaty, what consequences can you expect from your infraction of them, but a new revolt, and a civil war? And what hope can there be of preserving that domestick peace which was then effected, if you refuse the People, assembled by Tribes, the power of judging a private citizen, who not only has himself violated our convention, by insulting the Tribunes in the persons of their officers, but has had the insolence to exhort you in full Senate, entirely to abolish the Tribuneship, the strongest bulwark of our liberty, and principal bond of our reunion? Nor is this the worst of his crimes. You remember it well, Conscript Fathers, he audaciously told you, that the fortunate moment was come for revenging yourselves upon the people: He would have you keep up the high price of provisions, that you might thereby force one part of the poor Plebeians to fly their country, and reduce the other, miserably to perish by hunger.
 Cruel and unthinking man! did he not consider that this people, whom he meant to exterminate with so much inhumanity, and who are more numerous

“ numerous and powerful than he could wish, being reduced to despair, “ would have broken into the houses of the rich, forced open those gra-“ naries and secret repositories which conceal so much wealth, and either “ have fallen under the power of the Patricians, or effectually rooted out “ that whole order? Could he imagine that an enraged populace would “ in such a case have hearkened to any law but what was dictated by “ necessity and resentment?

Year of
R O M E
CCLXII.
Bef. J. C.
Four hundred ninety.
Nineteenth
Consulship.

“ For, that you may not be ignorant of the truth, we would not have “ perished by a famine brought upon us by our enemies; but, having “ first invoked the Gods, Revengers of injustice, filled Rome with blood “ and slaughter. Such had been the fatal consequence of the counsels “ of that perfidious Citizen, if some Senators, better friends to their “ country, had not hindered them from taking effect. To you, Con- “ script Fathers, we address our just complaints. To your aid, and to “ the wisdom of your decrees, we have recourse, to oblige this publick “ enemy to appear before the whole Roman People, and answer for his “ conduct. It is there, Coriolanus, that thou must defend thy counsels, “ if thou darest so to do, or excuse them as proceeding from want of “ thought: Take my advice; leave thy haughty and tyrannical max“ ims; make thyself less; become like us: Nay, put on a habit of “ mourning, suit thyself to thy present fortune, implore the pity of thy “ fellow-citizens; perhaps thou mayest obtain their favour, and the for“ giveness of thy faults.”

When Decius and his colleagues had said all they thought proper to say, the Consuls asked the opinion of the Assembly: They began with the Consulars and the oldest Senators; for in those days, says Dionysius, the young Senators were not so presumptuous as to think themselves capable of instructing their seniors. Modest and reserved, and not daring to speak, they only gave their opinion by some sign, or by walking over to that side which they thought to be most in the right. It was from this respectful way of declaring their minds, that they were called Senatores Pedarii, (from the Latin pes, a foot:) Thus it was a common saying, that a Pedarian opinion was like a head without a tongue.

D. Hal. B.
7. P. 453.

§. III. APPIUS CLAUDIUS, when called upon for his opinion, spoke to this effect: “ You know, Conscrip Fathers, that I have long opposed, and “ frequently alone, that too great easiness with which you grant the Peo“ ple whatever they demand. Perhaps I made myself troublesome, “ when I so frankly laid before you the misfortunes which I presaged “ would follow from our re-union with the deserters from the Common“ wealth. The event however has but too well justified my apprehen“ sions. The People take advantage of your favours to ruin your au“ thority; you cannot but see that there is a design to change the form “ of our Government. At first the only demand was the abolition of “ the debts; and this People, who are now so haughty, and who en“ deavour to make themselves the sole Judges of the Senators, then

Year of ROME CCLXII. Bef. J. C. Four hundred ninety. Nineteenth Consulship.

“ thought they stood in need of a pardon, for the disrespectful manner “ in which they sued for that first concession.
 “ Your easiness gave occasion to new pretensions; the Plebeians would “ have their particular Magistrates. You know how earnestly I opposed “ this innovation; but you assented in this point also; you allowed the “ annual creation of Tribunes, that is to say, ringleaders of sedition.
 “ Not content with this, the People would have the persons of their “ Tribunes declared sacred and inviolable, made secure by the most so“ lemn oaths; privileges never granted even to the Consuls: Yet you, “ Censcript Fathers, suffered this usurpation too, and swore upon the al“ tars the destruction of yourselves and your posterity. What has been “ the fruit of all these favours? They have only served to encourage the “ People to further encroachments upon your authority. They make “ laws without previously consulting you, and even contrary to your will.
 “ They despise the Decrees of the Senate, accuse the Consuls of male-“ administration, and, if any extraordinary adversity happens, which “ human prudence could not foresee, they impute it, not to fortune, but “ to our malice. They pretend, that we form plots to deprive them of “ their liberty, or drive them out of their country: and under this pre“ text they are ever conspiring against us, as if they knew no way of “ preserving themselves, but by our destruction. Too many of their “ actions, which are fresh in your minds, evidently discover this design;
 “ but especially their late attempt, without any the least form of justice,
 “ to take away the life of that great captain, and most worthy citizen, “ Caius Marcius, on pretence that he gave bad counsels in our Assembly.
 “ If the Consuls and most respectable Senators had not united to stop “ their fury, we had all in one day been deprived of our dignities, our “ power, and our liberty.
 “ The resolution and courage, which you shewed upon this last occa“ sion, in some measure awakened these mad-men from their drunken “ fit. They seem now to be ashamed of a crime which they could not “ accomplish; they desist from violent methods, because they have found “ them unsuccessful; and they seemingly have recourse to justice, and the “ rules of law.
 “ But what is this justice, immortal Gods! which these men would “ introduce? they endeavour, by appearances of submission, to obtain “ from you a Senatus-consultum, which may give them power, not to try,
 “ but, in truth, to drag to execution the best Citizen of Rome. They “ alledge the Lex Valeria as the rule of your conduct: But does not “ every body know, that this law, which allows of appeals to the Assem“ bly of the People, was not a law made against the Patricians, but only “ for the relief of such poor Plebeians as might happen to be oppressed
 “ by the Great? And when you afterwards consented to the creation “ of the Tribunes, neither you, nor even the People themselves, in“ tended any thing more in the establishment of those new Magistrates, “ than

“ than that this law might have protectors, and the poor be provided “ with advocates. The treaty of re-union gave no power to the People “ to try Patricians at their Tribunal. No, the Valerian Law is what “ they insist upon. Well then, during eighteen years that it has been “ in force, let Decius give me one single instance of a Patrician called “ in judgment before the People by virtue of that law, and our dispute “ will be at an end. There is no such precedent. If Marcus or any “ other Patrician has so offended the people, as to be thought worthy “ of death or banishment, let him be try’d; not in an Assembly of Ple- “ beians, but here, in this Assembly; and let him be punished as the laws “ direct. For can it be supposed that the Plebeians will be impartial “ in their own cause, and, when they come to give their votes, be un“ der no influence from prejudice against a Patrician whom they con“ sider as their enemy? It is my advice, Conscript Fathers, that, before “ you come to any determination, you maturely consider, that in this “ affair your interests are inseparable from those of Coriolanus: As for “ the favours you have already granted the People, I am not for revok“ ing them, by whatever means they were obtained; but I cannot for“ bear exhorting you to refuse resolutely what they now demand, or may “ hereafter demand, inconsistent with your own authority, and the pre“ sent form of our Government.”

Year of
 R O M E
 CCLXII.
 Bef. J. C.
 Four hun-
 died ninety.
 Nineteenth
 Consulship.

§. IV. MANIUS VALERIUS, that popular Senator who had been so serviceable in the treaty upon the Mons Sacer, spoke next after Appius, and, in a studied harangue, took the part of the people. Having first said something in general, in the stile of invective, against those who fomented discord between the two orders in the state, he proceeded to the affair of Coriolanus, and declared himself for granting to the people what they desired. He said, that nothing was more likely to disarm the People's rage against the illustrious Patrician accused, than to leave him to their judgment: that the multitude calling to mind his personal merit, and full of gratitude for the Senate's ready compliance with their desires, would certainly absolve him: That, nevertheless, to appease them entirely he would have all the Senators disperse themselves in the Assembly, and each endeavour, by a gentle and popular behaviour, to win over those of the Plebeians with whom he was acquainted.

D. Hal. B.
 7. P. 459:
 & seq.

Valerius then turning to Coriolanus, conjured him in the most affecting manner to give peace to the Republick: “ Go, Coriolanus, offer yourself “ generously to the People's judgment; this is the only way of justify“ ing yourself, that is worthy of you; this is the surest means to silence “ those who accuse you of aiming at the tyranny. If you persist in “ shewing a contempt for that Tribunal, and in disowning its jurif“ diction, to you alone will be imputed all the evils that shall be con“ sequent to such an obstinate and proud behaviour. Are you desirous “ that the Senate, your zealous friends, should, for your sake alone, en“ gage in a contest with the People, where a defeat must be fatal to “ them,

Year of
R O M E
CCLXII.
B.C. J. C.
From the date of the
—

Numerical Consular
D. Hall B.
p. 460.

“ them, and even a victory would be shameful? Set before your eyes
“ the frightful image of a Civil War; the laws without force; the Ma“ gistrates without power; fury and violence reigning universally; fire
“ and sword gleaming on all sides; your fellow-citizens murdering each “ other; Rome sinking under the rage of the two parties, and buried be“ neath its own ruins.”

Valerius, who sincerely loved his country and was softened by the idea of these great calamities, could not restrain his tears; and the tears of so venerable a Consular, more eloquent than even his discourse, touched the greater part of the Senators, and disposed their minds to peace.

Then Valerius, finding that he was master of the assembly, raised his voice, and, as if he had got fresh strength, or were become another man, shewed himself undisguised, and spoke to them with that authority which his age and long experience in affairs gave him: “ We are made to fear, “ that the publick liberty will be in danger, if we grant so much power “ to the People, and allow them to try those of our order who shall be “ accused by the Tribunes. I am persuaded, on the contrary, that no“ thing is more likely to preserve it. The Republick consists of two or“ ders, Patricians and Plebeians: The question is, which of these two “ orders may more safely be trusted with the guardianship of that sacred “ depositum, our liberty. I maintain that it will be more secure in the “ hands of the People, who desire only not to be oppressed, than in those “ of the Nobles, who all have a violent thirst of dominion. The No“ bles, invested with the prime Magistracies, distinguished by their “ birth, their wealth, and their honours, will always be powerful “ enough to hold the People to their duty: And the People, when they “ have the authority of the laws, being naturally haters and jealous of “ all enormous power, will watch over the actions of the Great, and,
“ by the dread of a popular enquiry and judgment, keep a check up“ on the ambition of such Patricians as might be tempted to aspire “ to the tyranny. You abolished the Royalty, Conscript Fathers, because “ the power of a single man grew exorbitant. Not satisfied with di“ viding the regal authority between two annual Magistrates, you gave “ them a Council of three hundred Senators to be inspectors over their “ conduct, and moderators of their Empire. But this very Senate, so “ formidable to the Kings and to the Consuls, has nothing in the Re-“ publick to balance its power. I know very well, that hitherto there “ is all the reason in the world to applaud its moderation. But who “ can say, whether we are not obliged for this to our fear of enemies “ abroad, and to those continual wars which we have been forced to “ maintain? Who will be answerable, that our successors, growing “ more haughty and more potent by a long peace, shall not make at“ tempts upon the liberty of their country, and that in the Senate there “ shall not arise some strong faction, whose Leader will find means to “ become the Tyrant of Rome, if there be not at the same time, some “ other

“ other power, out of the Senate, to withstand such ambitious enter“ prizes. by impeaching the authors and abettors of them before the “ People ?

Year of
R O M E
CCLXII.
Bef. J. C.
Four hundred ninety.

“ Perhaps it will be said, that the like inconvenience is to be appre“ hended from the People, and that it is impossible, by any provision, “ to assure ourselves, that there shall not arise, among the Plebeians, some “ popular man, who will abuse his influence over the minds of the mul“ titude, and, under the pretence of defending the People’s interests, “ in the end invade both their liberty and that of the Senate. But you “ well know, that upon the least danger which the Republick may seem “ to be in, from that quarter, our Consuls have the privilege to name a “ Dictator, whom they will never chuse but from among your own body ;
 “ and that this supreme Magistrate, absolute Master of the lives of his fel“ low-citizens, is able, by his sole authority, to dissipate a popular fac“ tion. The wisdom of our laws has allowed him that formidable power “ but for six months, for fear he should abuse it, and employ, in the “ establishment of his own Tyranny, an authority intrusted with him on“ ly to prevent the usurpations of other men.

Nineteenth
Consulship.

“ Thus with a mutual inspection the Senate will be watchful over the “ behaviour of the Consuls the People over that of the Senate ; and the “ Dictator, when the State of Affairs requires the intervention of such a “ Magistrate, will curb the ambition of all.

“ If, Conscript Fathers, what I have said, concerning a balance of “ power, be reasonable, refuse not to the People their present demand.
 “ They annually create the Magistrates of the Commonwealth ; they “ enact Laws, they abrogate Laws ; they make peace ; they declare “ war : The Senate has never pretended to be absolute master in these “ points ; which, nevertheless are, of all, the most important to the “ State. While you recognize in the People those high prerogatives I “ have mentioned, how can you think of denying them the permission “ to try a private citizen, who is accused of exciting sedition, and aspir“ ing to the Tyranny ? The more you intimidate the violators of our “ laws, and the corrupters of our manners, by the many inspectors you “ establish to watch the conduct of covetous and ambitious men, the “ more secure will be our liberty, and the more perfect our consti“ tution.”

Almost all the Senators, who spoke after Valerius, agreed with him in opinion ; and, in conclusion, it was carried by a great majority to refer the cause in question to the judgment of the People. D. Hal. B.
7. p. 462.

§. V. BEFORE the Decree was drawn-up, Coriolanus, who found the Senate were deserting him, desired leave to speak ; and having obtained it, he said, “ You know, Conscript Fathers, what the whole course of “ my life has hitherto been. You know that this unjust persecution “ which I now suffer from the People, is occasioned only by the steady “ and unalterable zeal which I have always shewn for your interests. I “ shall say nothing of the return I now meet with ; the event will shew
 “ the

Year of ROME CCLXII. Bef. J. C. Four hundred ninety.

“ the weakness, and perhaps the malice of the counsels given you in this affair. But since Valerius's opinion has at length prevailed, let me know at least what is the crime I am charged with, and upon what conditions I am delivered over to the fury of my adversaries.”

Coriolanus said this, in order to draw the Tribunes into a confession, that they had no crime to accuse him of, but the speech he had made in the Senate. That speech was doubtless the sole or principal cause of their rage against him. However, that they might not be obliged to confine their charge to one fact only, and a fact, which, to treat as a crime, must naturally engage the whole body of the Senate in his defence, they, after conferring together, declared in general, that they would accuse him of aspiring to the Tyranny.

Nineteenth Consulship. D. Hal. R. 7. p. 462. p. 463.

Plut. p. 223.

Coriolanus instantly replied, “ If that be the charge I am to answer to, I freely submit myself to the judgment of the People; let the Senate’s Decree be put in writing.”

The Senate, for two reasons, were very well pleased, that the affair took this turn: First, because no attack was to be made on the freedom of speaking in their Assemblies; and, in the second place, because Coriolanus, having always observed an irreproachable conduct, with regard to the crime undertaken to be proved upon him, they doubted not but he would easily clear himself at his trial.

All the parties being thus far agreed, and the Decree drawn up, the cause (as custom required) was appointed to be heard on the day after the third market-day; that is to say, twenty-seven days were allowed to the accused to prepare his defence: For these markets were held every ninth day, when the country people came to the City, to vend their commodities, and make up their differences with one another. The Tribunes, having assembled the People, read the Senate’s Decree to them, notified the trial, and exhorted all the Citizens of the Republick, as well as those who dwelt in the country, as the inhabitants of Rome, to be at the Forum on the day appointed for hearing and judging so important a cause. There needed not much eloquence on this occasion. Most of the Plebeians waited impatiently for the favourable opportunity to signalize their hatred to Coriolanus; and were as zealous against him, as if the preservation of the Commonwealth had depended on his destruction.

C H A P. XI.

§. I. The day being come for Coriolanus's trial, a dispute arises between the Consuls and Tribunes, whether the people shall give their Suffrages by CENTURIES, according to the ancient custom, or by TRIBES, which had never yet been practised. The Tribunes who are for the latter prevail, §. II. Coriolanus's cause is heard. He is condemned to banishment, and leaves Rome.

§. I. WHEN the day came, that the great affair of Coriolanus was to be decided, an innumerable multitude crowded the Forum betimes in the morning. The Tribunes separated them by Tribes in order to their voting in this cause; whereas, from the reign of Servius Tullius, the voices had always been gathered by Centuries. The Consuls being come to the Assembly, were for keeping up the ancient custom, not doubting but they could save Coriolanus, if the voices were reckoned by Centuries, of which the Patricians themselves and the richest Citizens made the majority*. But the Tribunes, no less artful, and more resolute, alledged, that in an affair which concerned the rights of the People and the publick Liberty, it was but just that the vote of every the poorest and meanest Citizen should be of equal weight and value with that of the richest and most noble; and, after a warm struggle, the Tribunes carried their point.

Year of
R O M E
CCLXII.
Bef. J. C.
Four hundred ninety.
Nineteenth
Consulship.
D. Hal. B.
7. p. 464.

Just before they entered upon the cause, Minucius, the first Consul, made an harangue to the Assembly. He opened his discourse with reminding the people of the affection which the Senate had for them, and the favours it had heaped upon them at different times; and he declared, that all the return the Fathers asked was Coriolanus's discharge. He exhorted the Plebeians not to consider so much a few words which had escaped him in the heat of his discourse, as the important services which he had done the Commonwealth; and to be satisfied with his submission to their censure. He intimated to them, that if they acquitted Coriolanus by a plurality of voices, it would be said, they had found him innocent; whereas, if they discharged him without proceeding any farther in the prosecution, it would be considered as an act of favour to those who interceded for him. In answer to this, Sicinnius loudly protested, that he would neither betray the liberties of the People, nor suffer any other man to betray them. But that, if the Senate did, bona fide, submit the accused to the judgment of the People, he should have a fair and impartial trial.

“ Well then, (replied Minucius) since, notwithstanding our intreaties, “ you obstinately insist that Coriolanus shall be tried by this Assembly, I “ demand that, pursuant to your agreement with the Senate, you con“ fine your accusation to the single article of aiming at the Tyranny, “ and that you pretend not to mention any thing, by him said against “ the People in our Assemblies: For you are barred from that, by the “ conditions expressed in the very Decree which refers his cause to the

* See this matter fully explained, B. 1. c. 7.

YOUNG
ROME
COLLIER
B. 1. C. 1. 1. 1.
F. 1. 1. 1. 1. 1.
C. 1. 1. 1. 1. 1.
N. 1. 1. 1. 1. 1.
C. 1. 1. 1. 1. 1.
D. 1. 1. 1. 1. 1.
F. 1. 1. 1. 1. 1.

“Judgment of the People.” To prove what he alledged, he read aloud to them the Senatus-consultum; after which he descended from the §. II. SICINNIUS then began the accusation with a laboured speech, which consisted however of only general invectives, importing, that the accused, by the whole tenour of his words and actions against the People, had manifestly discovered an intention to invade their Liberties, and become the Tyrant of his Country.

As soon as the Tribune had done speaking, Coriolanus, with a courage deserving a better fortune, presented himself in the Assembly, and answered the calumnies thrown upon his conduct, by a bare recital of his services. He began with his first campaigns, he gave an account of all the engagements in which he had fought, the wounds he had received, the military honours which his Generals had bestowed upon him, and the several commands in the army to which he had been gradually promoted. He exposed to the view of the whole People a great many different crowns which he had received, either for mounting the breach first in assaults, or for having first broke into the enemies camp; or lastly, for having in various battles saved the lives of a great number of Citizens. He called them aloud, each by his name, and cited them as witnesses of what he advanced. These men immediately stood forth, and gave publick testimony of the obligations they lay under to him. Stretching out their hands as supplicants, they conjured the Assembly not to destroy a man, to whom they owed their lives, and all that was dear to them; and they offered to undergo, in his stead, any punishment to which he should be condemned. As these Romans were mostly Plebeians, and men known to have deserved well of their Country, the multitude could not resist their pressing solicitations nor even refrain from tears. Then Coriolanus, tearing away his robe, shewed his breast all covered with the scars of a great number of wounds which he had received: “It was to save these worthy men, said he, it was to rescue “these good Citizens out of the hands of our enemies, that I have a “thousand times ventured my life. Let the Tribunes shew, if they can,
“how such actions are consistent with the treacherous designs they lay
“to my charge. Is it easy to believe, that an enemy of the People,
“a man who intended to destroy them in a time of peace, would ex“pose himself to so many dangers in war, only to preserve their “lives?”

This discourse, supported by a noble air, and that confidence which flows from innocence and truth, made the Plebeians quite alarmed of the prosecution. The best men of that order cried out, that they ought to acquit so good a Citizen. But then the Tribune Decius, alarmed at this change, stood forth and said, “ Though the Senate does not allow us to prove the ill designs of Coriolanus, by the speech he made in their Assembly, and by his violent proceedings that followed it, we do not want other proofs equally strong and cogent, of his pride, and that spirit of tyranny of which we accuse him. You know that according to our laws, the spoils of the enemy belong to the Roman People; that neither the soldiers, nor their General himself has power to dispose of them; but that all ought to be sold, and the money, thence arising, carried by a Quæstor into the publick treasury; such is the usage and constitution of our Government. Nevertheless, contrary to these laws, which are as ancient as Rome itself, Coriolanus, having got a considerable booty in the territories of the Antiates, divided it all, by his private authority, among his friends, giving them what was the People’s due. This I call a proof of Tyranny. For indeed what was this, but with the publick money to make to himself creatures, and provide guards, and supporters of his intended usurpation? He must either deny a notorious fact, and say, that he did not dispose of that booty, or must shew that, in disposing of it, he did not violate the laws. Without dazzling us with the splendid show of his crowns and scars, or using any other arts to blind the Assembly, let him answer directly to this one article which I urge against him.”

* Liberty is taken to use this word for speaking to the People; though the word the juggeram (or pulpit) or any eminent rostra was not introduced till many years place, whence we find the Magistrates after this time.

Year of
R O M E
CCLXII.
Bef. J. C.
Four hundred ninety.
Nineteenth
Consulship.
D. Hal. B.
7. p. 468.

It was true, Coriolanus had, by his private authority, disposed of the plunder which the Tribune spoke of: but it was not true, that he had divided it among his friends and creatures only, as was objected to him, but among all his soldiers: nor had he done this with a view to the Tyranny, or with any evil intention; but to engage his soldiers to follow him the more readily another time, and in hopes, that the example of their success would incite the Plebeians at Rome voluntarily to take the field, and seek provisions in the enemy’s country, at a time when the City was grievously distressed by a famine, and the Tribunes opposed all regular levies of Soldiers. This was the real fact. But it is probable, that many of the people, who had had no share in that expedition, were envious of the good fortune of Coriolanus’s soldiers; and Decius, perhaps, having observed this, took the present occasion of awakening their envy, and of seducing them thereby to condemn Coriolanus for a generous action, by which they themselves had received no benefit.

As neither Coriolanus, nor any of his friends had expected this last accusation, they were wholly unprepared with an answer. The Tribunes laid hold of this opportunity to collect the suffrages; and Coriolanus was condemned to perpetual banishment. Of the twenty-one tribes, but nine voted for him, and twelve against him.

Plut. in Coriol. p.
223.

Most of the Nobles and Patricians thought themselves in a manner condemned to banishment with this great man, who had always been

Year of the defender and support of their order. At first it was only a general
 R O M E CCLXII. consternation; but this was quickly succeeded by indignation and rage:
 Bef. J. C. Some reproached Valerius, that he had misled the Senate by his artful dis-Four hun- courses; others reproached themselves for their excess of condescension to dred nine- the People; all repented that they had not rather endured the last ex-
 ty. tremities, than abandoned so illustrious a Citizen to the insolence of the Nineteenth multitude.
 Consulship. Coriolanus was the only person among the Patricians who seemed un-D. Hal. B. concerned at his disgrace; he left the Assembly with the same tranquil-7. P. 472. lity, in appearance, as if he had been acquitted. He went immediately to Plut. in his own house, where he found his mother Veturia, and Volumnia his wife, Coriol. p. all drowned in tears, and in the first transports of their grief. He exhort-
 223. ed them in few words to bear this reverse of fortune with courage and constancy; and having recommended to them the care of his children, which were yet but infants, he instantly took his leave, not suffering any body to attend him in his exile, except three or four of his clients. A great number of the Senators and other Patricians accompanied him to the gates of the city, but he said not one word to them by the way, and he parted from them in the same reproachful silence, neither thanking them for any good offices past, nor requesting any future favour*.

* Coriolanus was probably about 35 years of age at the time of his banishment. He had stood for the Consulship the year before, and, (according to Phuarch, p. 220.) had then served 17 years. He began to serve as soon as he was of an age to bear arms, that is at 17.

C H A P. XII.

§. I. The Plebeians exult upon the victory they have gained over the Patricians in the affair of Coriolanus. The Romans having now no war abroad, nor squabble at home to employ them, turn their minds wholly to superstition, during the Consulate of Q. Sulpicius and Sp. Lartius. §. II. The Tribunes, from a political view, persuade the People, at the next election of Consuls, to chuse men of little spirit, and mean abilities for war. Their choice falls upon C. Julius and P. Pinarius Rufus. §. III. In the mean time, Coriolanus retires privately to Antium, one of the principal cities of the Volsci, discovers himself to Attius Tullus, General of that Nation, offers him his service against Rome, and is nobly received by him. §. IV. These two Generals concert a stratagem to stir up the Volsci to renew the war with the Romans. Coriolanus is introduced by Tullus into the Assembly of the Volscian States, and there makes a speech, which is highly applauded. They resolve upon war, and to commit the conduct of it to Tullus and Coriolanus; but first, by the advice of the latter, send an embassy bassy to Rome, to make such demands of the Republick, as they are sure will be rejected. The Volscian Ambassadors are dismissed by the Roman Senate with a baughty answer.

§. I. NEVER did the People testify more joy, not even upon vanquishing the most formidable enemies of Rome, than they did now for the advantage they had just gained over the Senate and the whole body of the Patricians. By the proceedings in the affair of Coriolanus, the PEOPLE had got a precedent for citing before their Tribunal, and judging the most illustrious of the Nobles; a precedent which the Tribunes failed not to improve into an established custom. And how much soever the ancient dignity of the Patrician order was diminished by this innovation, Dionysius is of opinion, that it was a proper curb upon the ambition of the Great, and not only salutary to the Republick, but even necessary to its preservation: And though some hot-headed Tribunes, animated by views of self-interest, or private pique, might now and then abuse their power, by commencing unjust prosecutions, yet those of the Nobles, who took upon them the management of publick affairs, with honest and patriot intentions, would be in little danger of suffering any disgrace by a sentence of the People.

Year of
R O M E
CCLXII.
Bef. J. C.
Four hundred ninety.
Nineteenth
Consulship.
D. Hal. B.
7. p. 470.

The same Historian, in the close of his relation of what happened at Rome, from the time of the Secession, to the trial of Coriolanus, very justly remarks, as more worthy to be admired, than the most shining exploits of the Romans, the rare temper and moderation which appeared in both parties, in their late contentions: That such important changes should be brought about, merely by conferences and arguments, and without any of those inhuman and fatal acts of violence, which, on the like occasions, were so common in the States of Greece and Sicily.

During the following Consulship of Q. Sulpicius and Sp. Lartius *, superstition alone filled the minds of the Romans. Nothing now was talked of but visions, spectres, miraculous voices, monsters, and prodigies of all sorts. Titus Latinus, or, according to Livy, Tib. Atinius, an old man, and bed-ridden, made himself be conveyed in a litter, from the country to Rome, where he related to the Conscript Fathers a dream, in which he said, Jupiter Capitolinus had appeared to him, and commanded him to tell the Senate, "That they must repeat the celebration of the Publick Games, because, in the last performance, a bad Dancer had led up the dances. He added, That he having neglected the admonition, Jupiter in revenge had thrown him into the condition he then was, having first killed one of his sons." As fast as the man discharged his commission, so fast he recovered the use of his limbs; and this put the Senate into a terrible fright. Strict inquiries were made after the bad Dancer, and he was at length found to be a Slave, whom his Master, a substan-

Year of
R O M E
CCLXIII.
Bef. J. C.
Four hundred eighty-nine.
Twentieth
Consulship.
* A 2d time
Consul.
D. Hal. B.
7. p. 472,
473.
Livy, B. 2.
c. 36.
Plut. in Coriol. p.
225.

Year of ROME CCLXIII. Def. J. C. Four hundred eighty-nine. Tenth Consularship. D. Hal. B. 7. P. 480. tial Citizen, had, just before the religious procession that preceded the sports, caused to be whipped through the Crossways, the Forum, and the Circus, through all which places the procession was to pass. The poor wretch, from the violence of his pain, had uttered imprecations, and had screwed himself into an hundred odd postures at every stroke; an improper and indecent prelude to so solemn a ceremony. And this it seems had offended Jupiter. The Citizen was fined, and a decree passed for renewing the Games in a more sumptuous and expensive manner than before. The Senate however deferred the celebration of them to the next Consulate.

§. II. THE Consular Power being now the only thing which kept the Tribunes in awe, we may well suppose, that they employed their efforts to hinder its falling into any hands, but of Patricians devoted to their interests, or too little esteemed to be much feared: And, perhaps, they insinuated to the People, that the greatest Captains were not the most fit to govern a Commonwealth: That men of their high courage, and accustomed to an absolute power in the armies, brought home with their victories a spirit of pride, ever dangerous in a free State. As the Consuls were always chosen in the Comitia by Centuries, of which those of the first and richest class made the majority, the Senators and Patricians had usually disposed of that dignity as they pleased. But now, even in that kind of Assembly, the Plebeian party carried their point by the artful management of their Tribunes. C. Julius and P. Pinarius Rufus, men known to be but indifferent soldiers, were, by the votes of the People, raised to the Consulship, and chiefly, (says Diomysius) for that reason *.

D. Hal. B. 8. P. 481. Year of ROME CCLXIV. Def. J. C. Four hundred eighty-eight.

Twenty-first Consularship.

* M. Vertot observes upon this occasion, that the Senate and the People acted both of them contrary to their real interests, and seemed to aim at joining two things incompatible. All the Romans, says he, as well Patricians as Plebeians, aspired to the conquest of Italy; the command of the armies was reserved to the Patricians, who indeed possessed all the dignities of the State; they had no soldiers but the Plebeians, whom they would reduce to that timid submission, and that servile dependence, which they could scarce have expected in mean artificers, and a populace bred up in obscurity. The People, on the other hand, powerful, numerous, and full of that ferocity growing from a continual exercise of arms, in order to lessen the authority of the Government, were for having Consuls and Generals who would be easy, indulgent, complacent to the multitude, and would behave themselves towards their soldiers rather with the modest manners of equality, than with that lofty and imperious air which the command of armies naturally gives a General. It was necessary for putting an end to the misunderstanding between those two orders in the Republick, that they should either jointly have resolved to content themselves with the narrow limits of their State, and lay aside the ambition of making conquests; or that the Patricians should have allowed a greater share in the Government to a warlike People, Citizens during winter, but Soldiers all the summer; and the People, on their side, have named to the command none but the best Generals in the Republick.

Mr. Vertot adds, that he owes this reflection to the events that follow; it not being long before the People repented their having intrusted the government of the State, and the command of the Armies, to two men equally incapable of those functions.

§. III.

§. III. IN the mean time, Coriolanus, that exiled Hero, who had appeared so unmoved by his disgrace, was meditating, with all the force of his mind, the most effectual means to revenge his wrongs; his silence and seeming insensibility having been the pure effect of an indignation and resentment too deep for superficial expression. He spent the first days of his banishment at a country-seat of his own, his thoughts wholly employed how to compass the destruction of his enemies; a design, which his vengeful heart would not forego, though the execution of it should involve the ruin of his country. At length, when he had cast his eyes upon the several nations that were neighbours and enemies to Rome, Sabines, Æqui, Tuscans, Volsci, and Hernici, he found none that seemed more exasperated against the Romans, or in a better condition to undertake a war, than the Volsci.

Year of
R O M E
CCLXIV.
Bef. J. C.
Four hundred eighty-eight.
Twenty-
first Consulship.
D. Hal. B.
8. p. 481.
Plut. in Coriol. p.
224.

They were a Republick or Community, consisting of several small cantons, united, by a league, and governed by an Assembly of Deputies from each of them. This Nation bordering upon Rome, and jealous of her rising greatness, had always opposed it with remarkable courage, though with little success. The Romans had taken from them some of their towns, and part of their territory; and, during the time that Coriolanus's affair was depending, had, by threatening them with a new war (on occasion of some violence they had offered to certain Sicilian Ambassadors sent to Rome upon the corn traffick) terrified them into the submission of suppliants for peace. The Volsci obtained of the Republick a truce for two years. But this did not lessen the animosity in their hearts; they fought all over Italy to stir up new enemies against the Romans; and it was upon the knowledge of this Coriolanus built his hopes of engaging them to renew the war. But he was the most unfit man in the world for such an undertaking; he had done them more mischief than all the other Roman Generals; more than once he had cut to pieces their troops, ravaged their country, taken and plundered their towns: the name of Coriolanus was no less odious than formidable throughout the whole community of the Volsci.

Besides, they had at this time, for their General, Attius Tullus, whom Coriolanus, in many actions, where they fought against each other, had constantly vanquished; a disgrace which few Commanders have magnanimity enough to forgive. Nothing could be more dangerous for the Roman, than to put himself into the hands of such an enemy: Nevertheless, immoderate thirst of vengeance being now the prevailing passion in his soul, that was unused to fear, he resolved to apply himself immediately to Tullus.

He departed from his retreat in disguise; and in the evening, entered Antium, one of the chief Cities of the Volsci. It was here that Tullus resided, and to his house Coriolanus went directly. With his face covered, and without speaking one word, he walked in, and seated himself by the hearth of the domestick Gods, a place sacred in all the houses of the ancient Pagans. A behaviour so extraordinary, and a certain air of autho-

Liv. B. 2.
c. 35.
Plut. in Coriol. p.
224.
D. Hal. B.
8. p. 481.
Val. Max.
B. 5.

Year of
R O M E
CCLXIV.
Bet. J. C.
Four hundred eighty-eight.

Twenty-
first Consulship.

rity that never abandons great men, surprized the servants; they ran to tell their master. Tullus came, and demanded of him who he was, and what he required.

Coriolanus then discovering himself: "If thou dost not yet know me, I am Caius Marcius, my surname is Coriolanus; the only reward left me of all my services. I am banished from Rome through the hatred of the People, and the pusillanimity of the Great: I seek revenge; it lies in thy power to employ my sword against our common enemies. If thy Republick will not accept of my service, I give my life into thy hands; destroy an old enemy, who otherwise may do more mischief to thy country."

Tullus, amazed at the greatness of his courage, gave him his hand: "Fear nothing, Marcius, thy confidence is thy security. By giving us thyself, thou makest us an inestimable present; we shall know how to value thy services better than thy fellow-citizens: So great a Captain may justly expect the highest honours from the Volsci." He then led him into his apartment, where they privately conferred about the means of renewing the war.

D. Hal. B.
2. p. 452,
483.
Liv. B. 2.
c. 37.
Plut. in Coriol. p.
226.

§. IV. IT has been already observed, that there was at this time a truce between the Volsci and the Romans; the business was to bring the former to a resolution of breaking it; a point not easy to be carried, because of the losses which the Volsci had suffered in the last war. However, the two Generals found means to compass what they desired. The Romans were preparing for their publick sports (a part of the religion of those times) pursuant to the admonition, before mentioned, of Jupiter by the old man. From the several Nations about Rome, there flocked to the show great numbers, and particularly of the Volsci. They crowded every quarter of the City; nay many, not being able to find hosts to receive them, lay under tents in the publick places. So unusual a multitude of strangers gave uneasiness to the Consuls; and, to add to it, Tullus contrived to raise a false alarm, that the Volsci intended to set fire to the Town. The known animosity of that People against the Republick made the report easily credited; so that the Magistrates caused an order to be published, injoining all the Volsci to depart before night, and even prescribing the gate through which they should pass: And accordingly all of that Nation were instantly driven out of Rome. As they were returning home, each man bearing in his heart the shame of this ill usage, and a strong desire of revenge, Tullus met them in the way as by chance; and, when he had heard them relate the unworthy manner in which they had been treated, "Is it possible, he cried, they could drive you from a publick festival, like the profanest wretches and outlaws? After so vile a treatment, you can no longer hide from yourselves the implacable hatred which the Romans bear you. And will you patiently wait till, without regard to the truce which has disarmed you, they suddenly invade us again, and lay waste our territories?"

An

An Assembly of the States was called without delay; and the more violent were for immediately carrying fire and sword into the territory of Rome, in revenge for the insult they had received. But Tullus, who conducted this affair, advised them, before they broke out, to send for Coriolanus into their Assembly: “That Captain, said he, whose valour we have so often experienced, and who now bears more enmity to the Romans, than even we ourselves, seems to have been brought hither by the Gods to restore our affairs; and he will give us no counsels, whereof he will not share the dangers of the execution.”

Year of
R O M E
CCLXIV.
Bet. J. C.
Four hundred eighty-eight.
Twenty-
first Consulship.
D. Hal. B.
8. p. 484,
& seq.

The Roman, being introduced into the Assembly, appeared there with a countenance sad, but resolute; all present fixed their eyes attentively upon the man, whose name had been so dreadful to them; and they listened to him with that respect which is always paid to merit under persecution. When he had first related to them his story, and represented the ingratitude and injustice, with which he had been condemned by his fellow-citizens to perpetual banishment, he proceeded in words to this effect:

“If I had sought only a place of refuge, I might have retired either among the Latines our allies, or to some Roman colony. But a life so obscure had been to me insupportable; for I always thought it better for a man to die, than be reduced to such a condition, as to be unable either to serve his friends, or to revenge himself upon his enemies. This is my temper: I would deserve by my sword the Asylum I ask of you: let us join our common resentments. Those ungrateful Romans, who have banished me so unjustly, are your most inveterate enemies; you are sensible of it; with pleasure I perceive, you are all disposed to renew the war; and indeed it is much your interest to stop the progress, and diminish the strength of so incroaching a neighbour. But, in order to render this war successful, the motive you shall assign for taking arms, must be just in the sight of the Gods, and such as will engage the several States about Rome to espouse your cause. You are not ignorant of how small an extent, at the founding of that City, the Roman territory was, which is now stretched into a wide dominion, by the conquests they have made, or, to speak more justly, by their usurpations. There is not, in all their neighbourhood, a Nation from which they have not wrested some of its towns, and a considerable part of its lands. The Sabines, Albans, Æqui, Hetrurians, and others have suffered from them like injuries to yours. Make it the common interest of those States to join you in your enterprize. Let Ambassadors be sent to demand of the Romans, A restitution of the lands and cities which they have taken from you, whether by hostile invasions, or by compulsive treaties.

“If the Romans, intimidated by your menaces of a war, consent to restore to you the towns and the lands which they have deprived you of, then, after your example, the other Nations of Italy will demand back what has been taken from them; which, if submitted to, will

as

Year of " at one stroke reduce that proud People to their original weakness. Or,
 R O M E " if they resolve, as I doubt not but they will, to retain their usurpations, CCLXIV. " and bid you defiance, then, in a war so equitable, you will have both Bef. J. C. " Gods and men your friends. As for me, in whatever post you place Four hun- " me, you may rely upon my zeal for your service, and my punctual exe-dred eigh- " cution of your General's orders. If heretofore, when your enemy, I ty-eight. " was very hurtful to you, I may perhaps be found equally useful, when Twenty- " fighting in your cause."
 first Consulship.
 D. Hal. B. Loud and universal applause was given by the Assembly to this dis-
 8. P. 487. course; and, to bind Coriolanus more strictly to them, they instantly conferred on him the quality of Senator. At the same time, pursuant to his advice, Ambassadors were dispatched to Rome; where being admitted to

p. 488.

audience, they represented to the Senate, " That the Volsci were very de" sired to terminate amicably all their differences with the Roman Re-
 " publick; but that, in order thereto, it was necessary Rome should re" store to them the towns and lands of which she had deprived them:
 " That without this, there could be no solid and lasting peace between " the two States: and they therefore hoped, the Senate would not, by " a refusal of justice, put them under the necessity of commencing a " war."

Plut. in Coriol. p.
 226.

The Ambassadors being withdrawn, the Senate did not spend much time in deliberation: At Rome to yield to menaces was a thing unknown, or to submit to an enemy, even though victorious; so that the Ambassadors were soon called in again. The first Consul told them in few words, that fear would never make the Romans give up what they had conquered by their valour; and that, if the Volsci were the first to take arms, the Romans would be the last to lay them down. And with this answer they were dismissed.

C H A P. XIII.

§. I. Coriolanus at the head of a Volscian army recovers from the Romans all the towns they had taken from the Volsci; carries several cities in La- tium by assault, and then leads his troops within five miles of Rome; where new Consuls are chosen, Sp. Nautius and Sex. Furius. §. II. The People terrified at his approach, cry out to have the sentence of his banishment reversed. The Patricians oppose it. He marches to Rome and invests the place. The Senate and People agree to sue to him for peace. Three Deputations are sent to him successively, to persuade him to desist from his demands in favour of the Volsci; but all in vain. §. III. The Mother and Wife of Coriolanus go attended by all the Roman Ladies of distinction to make a fourth attempt upon his resolution. §. IV. The interview and conference between Coriolanus and his Mother, who prevails upon him to raise the siege of Rome; after which he is assassinated by the Volsci.

§. I.

§. I. THE report of the Ambassadors, at their return, was followed by a declaration of war. Tullus and Coriolanus, foreseeing the Senate's answer, had held their troops in readiness to enter upon action. The first, with a part of the forces, made an incursion into the country of the Latines, in order to hinder them from sending any assistance to the Romans: At the same time Coriolanus, with the remainder, threw himself into the territory of Rome, where he made a prodigious capture of freemen, slaves, corn and cattle, no measures having been taken to oppose him. Both parties returned from their expeditions enriched with booty; which proved an effectual means to augment the army: For the people henceforward, big with the hopes of conquest and plunder, came in crowds to enlist themselves. And now it was agreed that Tullus with a body of reserve should stay in the country to defend the entrance of it against the enemy, while Coriolanus at the head of the main army marched to give the Consuls battle, in case they appeared in the field. According to Livy, he first drove from Circaum a colony of Romans that were established there; but Dionysius says, that the inhabitants, intimidated by the approach of the enemy, opened their gates, and that Coriolanus only obliged them to furnish him with provisions and cloaths for his soldiers. He then took from the Romans Satricum, Longulum, Polusca, and Corioli, towns which they had won but a little before; he also made himself Master of Corbio, Vitellia, Trebia, Toleria, Bola, Labicum, and Pedum, all in Latium, or upon the confines of it. The Latines had sent to Rome for aid, but the Senate had excused themselves, the distress of the Republick being extreme. For the Æqui and other allies had revolted; and divisions and animosities reigned at home in the City.

Coriolanus, in his first expedition, had spared the houses and estates of the Patricians, either out of some remains of regard for those of his own order; or, which is more probable, to make them suspected by the People, and to increase the dissensions between them. Whatever was the motive, this was the effect of his conduct. The People failed not to accuse the Senate publickly of an understanding with Coriolanus, and of having engaged him to come at the head of an army, to abolish the Tribunitian power. The Patricians, on their side, reproached the People, with having forced so great a Captain to throw himself in despair into the party of the enemy. Suspicion, distrust, hatred actuated both orders; and in this time of danger they thought less of repulsing the Volsci, than of defaming each other. The two Consuls, hid behind the walls of Rome, made levies but slowly. Spurius Nautius and Sex-tus Furius, who succeeded them, used diligence in raising an army, but did not shew more courage and resolution than their predecessors: It was visible, they durst not encounter so able a General. The People themselves were in no haste to give their names to be inrolled: nobody cared for stirring out of Rome, whether it was that they had no great opinion of the capacity of their Leaders, or that they saw

Year of
R O M E
CCLXIV.Bef. J. C.
Four hundred eighty-eight.Twenty-
first

Consulship.

D. Hal. B.

8. p. 489.

Plut. p.

226.

D. Hal. B.

8. p. 490.

Livy, B. 2.

c. 39.

D. Hal. B.

8. p. 491.

p. 492.

P. 489.

Plut. p.

226.

P. 491.

Year of

R O M E

CCLXV.

Bef. J. C.

Four hundred eighty-seven.

Twenty-

second

Consulship.

Year of ROME CCLXV. Feb. J. C. Four hundred and eighty-seven. themselves assisted by their allies, who had readily espoused the cause which they were engaged in. Coriolanus, leading his army in the field to oppose his designs, advanced straight on, took Latium, and at length encamped at the Cluilian trenches five miles distant from Rome.

Twenty-second Consulship. D. Hal. B. 493. P. 493. 227. §. II. UPON the fame of this great run of success, multitudes of the Volsi flock'd to Coriolanus's army. The very soldiers of Tullus himself, drawn by the hopes of the plunder of Rome, left their General, and declared, they acknowledged no other but the Roman; a fresh victory, of a new kind, which Coriolanus gained over his old adversary, and of which Tullus retained a sharp resentment in his breast. The eyes of all Italy were turned upon the Romans and Volsi, who, by only one man's changing sides, had experienced a surprizing change in their fortunes: So true it is, that the strength of a state consists not so much in the number and bravery of its troops, as in the abilities of him who commands them.

D. Hal. B. 496. The consternation was general at Rome. The People, who from the tops of the walls beheld the enemies spread all over the country, came into the Forum, and with clamorous voices demanded a peace, and to have the sentence against Coriolanus reversed. That very people who, with so much fury, had hurried him into banishment, with equal violence now pressed to have him recalled. The Senate being assembled to consider of this proposal, absolutely rejected it; which they did, either to remove the suspicion of their having intelligence with him, or perhaps from that high spirit so common among the great men of the Republick, never more averse from peace than after ill success.

Plut. p. 227. D. H. ibid. Coriolanus no sooner heard of the Senate's resolution, but he broke up his camp, marched directly to Rome, and invested the place, as if he meant to besiege it. A design so daring threw both the Patricians and the Plebeians into an equal consternation; all courage and resolution failed them, and hatred gave place to fear. The Senate and People with one accord determined now to sue for peace. Five Senators, who had been zealous friends of Coriolanus, were chosen to be sent to him upon this negotiation. These were M. Minucius, Posthumius Cominius, Sp. Lartius, P. Pinarius, and Q. Sulpicius, who had all five been Consuls.

Plut. p. 228. The Volsi made these Deputies pass thro' two ranks of soldiers standing to their arms; and Coriolanus, surrounded by his chief officers, received them seated in his Tribunal, with the state of an enemy who is resolved to prescribe the law.

D. H. ibid. & seq. Minucius exhorted him in modest and pathetick terms to give peace to the two Nations; and conjured him not to push too far the advantages, which his superior courage and abilities had given the Volsi; but to remember the regard he owed to his Country. He put him in mind of the friendship the Patricians had always shewn him; and even excused in some measure the People, of whom nine tribes had voted for him. He represented to him the unreasonableness of carrying his resentments to such an unbounded excess, and the remorse that must follow so criminal an enter-enterprize as he was engaged in, how successful soever it might prove. He then reminded him of the instability of fortune, tho' it had hitherto favoured him; and, in conclusion, invited him to return into the bosom of his native City, which now, as a tender mother, stretched out her arms to receive him.

To all these remonstrances Coriolanus gave this severe answer: That Rome might obtain a peace, if she would restore to the Volsci the Country she had taken from them, grant them the same rights of Citizenship which she had granted to the Latines, and recal the Roman colonies from those towns she had got possession of unjustly; but that he could abate nothing of these demands.

That as to the liberty offered him of going back to Rome, it was not worth his acceptance. "With what satisfaction, said he, can I return to a City where injustice reigns, and vice enjoys the honours which are due to virtue? Consider the men who govern there, and the man you have driven thence. What was my crime? I could not bear to see the whole authority of the Government fall into the hands of factious Tribunes and a senseless Populace. This was the offence for which the Senate delivered me up to the fury of the People. Yes, the Senators are they whom I accuse as the Authors of my misfortunes. The injustice of the people indeed condemned me, but it was the weakness of the Senate which put me within the reach of their power: so that baseness and iniquity are become universal in the Republick. — What a shameful life should I be forced to drag on, in Rome? Flatter the insolent multitude? not dare to speak my opinion with freedom? — And who will promise me, that I shall not meet with a Sicinnius or a Decius to arm the Populace once more against me? How can I be assured that the devastations made on your lands, the conquest of your cities, and the slavery of your allies will not be laid as fresh crimes to his charge, who was deemed worthy of death for bare words? — You accuse me of impiety. Have I been guilty of any towards Rome, that cruel mother, whom no services could oblige, and who has cast out of her bosom a son that was useful to her, and zealous for her glory? I owe her no longer any duty. The Nation of the Volsci is now my mother. She forgot the mischiefs I did her; she received me when a fugitive, a wanderer and poor. She has been profuse in bestowing upon me her honours, her magistracy, and the command of her armies. You think it impious to abandon professed enemies; and you would have me betray the most affectionate friends, when they place all their confidence in me. No, Romans, I am not like you. I know how to acknowledge obligations, and to adhere to those who have done me honour. The remorse you speak of is for Rome herself to feel; let her dread the rage of those avenging furies which torment the guilty. As for me, the Gods have sufficiently shewn that they approve of my resentments; and victory proclaims aloud whose cause it is that they espouse."

Year of
R O M E
CCLXV.
Bef. J. C.
Four hundred eighty-seven.

Twenty-
second
Consulship.
Plat. ibid.
D. Hal. B.
8. p. 502,
& seq.

Year of
R O M E
CCLXV.
P. J. C.
Four hundred eighty-seven.

Twenty-
second
Consulship.

Coriolanus having spoke in this haughty strain as to what concerned the interests of the Volsi, and the injuries he had suffered from the Romans, came to a more gentle behaviour towards the Deputies. He assured them that he had not forgot the good-will they had formerly expressed for him; nor could ever lose the sense of his obligations to them for their generous protection of his mother, wife and children, since his banishment. That he was ready to do them any personal good office in his power, and for their sakes would even grant the Romans a truce for thirty days with regard to the proper territory of Rome; but, that after the expiration of that term, he should expect from them a decisive answer. He then dismissed the Deputies.

D. Hal. B. The thirty days, which he allowed the Romans to consider of his de-
8. p. 509. mand, he employed in taking other towns of Latium; and then appear-Plut. p. ed once more with his whole army in the neighbourhood of Rome. The 228. Senate had spent the time in deliberations, and had come to a resolution never to receive law from their enemies, nor even to treat of an alliance with the Volsi, till they had withdrawn their troops from the territory of Rome, and from those of her allies. Ten other Senators, who had all been Consuls, were dispatched to Coriolanus to signify to him this determination of the Fathers. These Deputies conjured him to moderate his displeasure, and demand nothing that was unbecoming the dignity of the Roman name to grant. They bid him remember, that the Romans were not men whom threats could terrify; but they added, that, if in his opinion the Volsi deserved favour, they might, upon laying down their arms, obtain by treaty whatever they could reasonably desire.

D. Hal. B. His answer was short, That the Romans had no choice but restitution or
8. p. 510. war; and that he would allow them but three days to come to a final determination. The Deputies would have replied; but he refused to hear them, commanded them instantly to leave his camp, and threatened to punish them as spies if they did not obey.

The Senate, though extremely piqued, when, from the report of their Deputies, they understood with what a haughty arrogance Coriolanus had treated them, were yet in no haste to send an army into the field against him; not thinking it adviseable to trust an affair of so great importance to the management of two Consuls, who had neither vigour, courage, nor military skill. It was resolved to keep close within the fortifications of Rome, and apply the whole strength of the Republick to the defence of the City; which they had much reason to fear would speedily be attacked. Some hope, however, still remained to the Fathers of preventing the calamity of a siege, by a new deputation to Coriolanus. As if the Republick (says Plutarch) had been beaten by a tempest, and were just ready to perish, they (according to the Proverb) threw out the Holy Anchor. For they ordered the Pontiffs, Priests, Augurs, all the Ministers of Religion, vested in their ceremonial habits, to go in solemn procession to his camp, and with most pressing instances, conjure him to comply with the proposals, which had been twice made to him for finishing the war.

In Cor. p.
228.

To these Sacred Ambassadors Coriolanus did not refuse an audience ; yet they found him as inexorable to them as he had been to the prophane. He would abate nothing of his former demands.

§. III. ALL hope of pacifying the injured exile being now extinguished, the sole business at Rome was to prepare with the utmost diligence for sustaining a siege. The young and able-bodied men had instantly the guard of the gates and trenches assigned to them ; while those of the veterans, who, though exempt by their age from bearing arms, were yet capable of service, undertook the defence of the ramparts. The women in the mean while, scared by these movements and the impending danger into a neglect of their wonted decorum, ran tumultuously from their houses to the temples. Every sanctuary, and especially the temple of Jupiter Capitolinus, resounded with the wailings and loud supplications of women, prostrate before the statues of the Gods. In this general consternation and distress Valeria, (sister of the famous Valerius Poplicola) as if moved by a divine impulse, suddenly took her stand upon the top of the steps of the temple of Jupiter, assembled the women about her, and having first exhorted them not to be terrified by the greatness of the present danger, confidently declared, “ That there was yet “ hope for the Republick ; that its preservation depended upon them,
“ and upon their performance of the duty they owed their country.”— “ Alas ! cried out one of the Company, what resource can there be in the “ weakness of wretched women, when our bravest men, our ablest warriors themselves despair ?—It is not by the sword, nor by strength of “ arm (replied Valeria) that we are to prevail ; these belong not to our “ Sex. Soft, moving words must be our weapons and our force. Let “ us all, in our mourning attire, and accompanied by our children, go “ beg and intreat Veturia, the mother of Coriolanus, to intercede with her “ son for our common country. Veturia’s prayers will bend his soul to “ pity. Haughty and implacable as he has hitherto appeared, he has “ not a heart so cruel and obdurate, as not to relent, when he shall see “ his mother, his revered, his beloved mother, a weeping suppliant at “ his feet.”

This motion being universally applauded, the whole train of women took their way to Veturia’s house. Her son’s wife, Volumnia, who was sitting with her when they arrived, and was greatly surprized at their coming, hastily asked them the meaning of so extraordinary an appearance. What is it, she said ? What can be the motive that has brought such a

Valeria, addressing herself to the mother, “ It is to you, Veturia, that “ these women have recourse in the extreme peril, with which they and “ their children are threatened. They intreat, implore, conjure you to “ compassionate their distress, and the distress of our common country.
“ Suffer not Rome to become a prey to the Volsci, and our enemies to “ triumph over our liberty. Go to the camp of Coriolanus : Take “ with you Volumnia and her two sons : Let that excellent wife join “ her :

Year of
R O M E
CCLXV.
Bef. J. C.
Four hundred eight-
ty-seven.
Twenty-
second Consulship.
D. Hal. B.
8. p. 511.
Plut. p.
229.

D. Hal. B.
8. p. 512.

Year of
R O M E
CCLXV.
Bef. J. C.
Four hundred eighty-seven.
Twenty-
second
Consulship.

“ her intercession to yours : Permit these women with their children to “ accompany you ; they will all cast themselves at his feet. O Veturia, “ conjure him to grant peace to his fellow-citizens : Cease not to beg till “ you have obtained : So good a man can never withstand your tears :
“ Our only hope is in you. Come then, Veturia ; the danger presses ;
“ you have no time for deliberation ; the enterprize is worthy of your “ virtue ; the Gods will crown it with success : Rome shall once more “ owe its preservation to our sex : You will justly acquire to yourself an “ immortal fame, and have the pleasure to make every one of us a sharer “ in your glory.”

Veturia, after a short silence, with tears in her eyes, answered, “ Weak “ indeed is the foundation of your hope, Valeria, when you place it in “ the aid of two miserable women. We are not wanting in affection to “ our country, nor need we any remonstrance or intreaties to excite our “ zeal for its preservation. It is the power only of being serviceable “ that fails us. Ever since that unfortunate hour, when the People in D. Hal. B. “ their madness so unjustly banished Coriolanus, his heart has been no
8. p. 513. “ less estranged from his family than from his country. You will be “ convinced of this sad truth by his own words to us at parting. When “ he returned home from the Assembly, where he had been condemned,
“ he found us in the extremest depth of affliction, bewailing the miseries “ that were sure to follow our being deprived of so dear a son, and so “ excellent a husband. (We had his children upon our knees.) He kept “ himself at a distance from us ; and when he had a while stood silent, “ motionless as a rock, his eyes fixed, and without shedding a tear, 'Tis “ done, be said.—O mother, and thou Volumnia, the best of wives, to “ you Marcus is no more. I am banished hence for my affection to my “ country, and the services I have done it. I go this instant ; and I “ leave for ever a city, where all good men are proscribed. Support “ this blow of fortune with the magnanimity that becomes women of “ your high rank and virtue. I commend my children to your care.
“ Educate them in a manner worthy of you, and of the race from which “ they come. The Gods grant they may be more fortunate than their “ father, and never fall short of him in virtue ; and may you in them “ find your consolation ! Farewel.

“ We started up at the sound of this word, and with loud cries of la“ mentation ran to him to receive his last embraces. I led his elder son “ by the hand, Volumnia had the younger in her arms. He turned his “ eyes from us, and putting us back with his hand, Mother, said he,
“ from this moment you have no son : Our country has taken from you
“ the stay of your old age.—Nor to you, Volumnia, will Marcus be “ henceforth a husband ; may'st thou be happy with another, more for“ tunate !—My dear children you have lost your father.

“ He said no more, but instantly broke away from us. He departed
“ from Rome without settling his domestick affairs, or leaving any orders “ about them ; without money, without servants, and even without “ letting “ letting us know, to what part of the world he would direct his steps. Year of “ It is now the fourth year since he went away; and he has never en R O M E “ quired after his family, nor, by letter or messenger, given us the least CCLXV.

 “ account of himself; so that it seems as if his mother and his wife Bef. J. C.
 “ were the chief objects of that general hatred which he shews to his Four hun-“ Country. dred eigh-“ Country. ty-seven.

“ What success then can you expect from our intreaties to a man so Twenty“ implacable? Can two women bend that stubborn heart, which even second
 “ all the ministers of religion were not able to soften? And indeed what Consulship.
 “ shall I say to him? What can I reasonably desire of him? That he “ would pardon ungrateful Citizens, who have treated him as the vilest “ criminal? That he would take compassion upon a furious, unjust Po“ pulace which had no regard for his innocence? And that he would “ betray a Nation, which has not only opened him an Asylum, but has “ even preferred him to her most illustrious Citizens in the command of “ her armies? With what face can I ask him to abandon such generous “ protectors, and deliver himself again into the hands of his most bitter “ enemies? Can a Roman mother, and a Roman wife, with decency, “ exact, from a son and a husband, compliances which must dishonour “ him before both Gods and men? Mournful circumstance, in which “ we have not power to hate the most formidable enemy of our Coun“ try! Leave us therefore to our unhappy destiny; and do not desire us “ to make it more unhappy by an action that may cast a blemish upon “ our virtue.”

The Ladies made no answer but by their tears and intreaties: Some D. Hal. B. embraced her knees; others beseeched Volumnia to join her prayers to 8. p. 514.
 theirs; all conjured Veturia not to refuse her Country this last assistance.
 Overcome at length by their urgent solicitations, she promised to do as they desired, if the Senate agreed to it. Valeria gave advice to the Consuls, of what the women had projected. The matter was proposed to the Senate, and was long debated. Some feared lest Coriolanus should detain all those Ladies, who were of the best families in Rome, and by that means make the gates be opened to him, without so much as drawing his sword: Others were even for securing his mother, wife and chil- P. 515.
 dren, as so many hostages that might bring him to a better temper: But the majority approved of the new deputation, saying, that the Gods, who had inspired Valeria with this pious design, would give it success;
 and that no treachery was to be apprehended from a man of Coriolanus's character, proud indeed, severe and inflexible, but not capable of violating the law of Nations.

This opinion having prevailed, the very next day all the most illustrious of the Roman Ladies repaired to Veturia's house. There they presently mounted a number of chariots, which the Consuls had ordered to be made ready for them, and, without any guard, took the way to the enemy's camp.

Year of
R O M E
CCLXV.
Bel. J. C.
Four hundred eighty-seven.

Twenty-
second Consulship.
Plut. p.
230.

D. Hal. B.
8. p. 516.

p. 517.

p. 518, &
seq.

§. IV. CORIO LANUS, perceiving from afar that long train of chariots, sent out some horsemen to learn the meaning of it. They quickly brought him word, that it was his mother, his wife, and a great number of other women, and their children, coming to the camp. He doubtless divined what views the Romans had in so extraordinary a deputation; that this was the last expedient of the Senate; and, in his own mind, he determined, not to let himself be moved. But he reckoned upon a savage inflexibility that was not in his nature: For, going out with a few attendants to receive the Ladies, he no sooner beheld Veturia attired in mourning, her eyes bathed in tears, and with a countenance and motion that spoke her sinking under a load of sorrow, but he ran hastily to her, and, not only calling her, Mother, but adding to that word the most tender epithets, embraced her, wept over her, and held her in his arms to prevent her falling. The like tenderness he presently after expressed to his wife, highly commending her discretion in having constantly staid with his mother, since his departure from Rome: And then, with the warmest paternal affection, he caressed his children.

When some time had been allowed to those silent tears of joy, which usually flow in abundance at the sudden and unexpected meeting of persons so dear to each other, Veturia entered upon the business for which she came. To avoid giving umbrage to the Volsi, Coriolanus had called the principal officers to be witnesses of what passed between his mother and him. That she might engage her son to have the more regard to her request, she began with telling him, that all those women, whom he knew to be of the best families in Rome, had, during his absence, done every thing in their power, to give comfort to her, and Volumnia his wife; she added, that, touched with the calamities of the war, and apprehending the fatal consequences of the siege of Rome, they were come, with united supplications to beg a peace at his hands: and she conjured him in the name of the Gods not to refuse that favour to his Country.

Coriolanus answered, that he should offend those Gods, whom he had invoked to be witnesses of his faith given the Volsi, if he granted her so unjust a demand. That he could not think of betraying the interests of a people who had not only honoured him with a place in their Senate, but had also trusted him with the command of their army: That he had found at Antium more honours and wealth than he had lost at Rome by the ingratitude of his fellow-citizens; and that nothing would be wanting to his happiness, if she would only prevail with herself to forsake Rome, and, in the country of the Volsi, share with him all the advantages of his glorious fortune.

The officers, present at this conference, testified, by a murmur of applause, that they were highly pleased with his answer. Veturia, in her reply to it, assured him, that she would never require any thing of him, that could bring a blemish upon his honour; but added, that without acting acting inconsistently with his Obligations to the Volsci, he might mediate a peace between the Romans and them.—“ No, my son, I do not ask of thee to betray a people who have given thee so generous a reception, and even confided their arms to thy conduct. Nor do I wish that thou shouldst make a separate peace for thyself without the consent of the whole nation. Veturia is incapable of urging her son to any base action. Grant us only a truce for a year, that in this interval, a solid peace may be negotiated, an alliance that shall be firm and durable, and equally advantageous to both Nations. You, who are versed in publick affairs, can have no difficulty to persuade the Volsci, that a peace upon such fair conditions as they may now be certain to obtain, is preferable to a war, the final event of which is still uncertain. But if, elated by the success they have had under your guidance, and imagining that fortune must always favour them, they refuse to listen to your remonstrances, what hinders you from publickly resigning your commission of General? Let all be open: No disguise, no breach of trust, no treachery to your new friends: But then, beware, my son, of impiously continuing an enemy to those, with whom you have a yet more near relation.—Nor let the apprehension of appearing ungrateful to your benefactors restrain you from complying with my request. Have not the Volsci been sufficiently recompensed by the many signal and important services you have done them? Liberty was their sole ambition; you have not only procured them liberty, but have raised them to so high a pitch of prosperity, that they are now considering whether it will be more adviseable totally to suppress the Roman power, or to live with us upon a foot of equality, the two Nations under one and the same government. Can you imagine, that thus benefited, thus exalted by your aid, they will resent, as an injury, your not sacrificing to them your own country, your not imbruing your hands in the blood of your fellow Citizens?—You will tell me, perhaps, that you bate your country. But are you not unreasonable in so doing? When the Romans unjustly condemned you to banishment, was Rome in its natural state? Was it governed by the laws of our forefathers? Was not the Republick agitated by a violent storm? Were not the members of it distempered? Not all indeed; for they were not all of one mind. It was only the baser and more corrupt part of the Citizens that voted against you, and these incited by the pernicious counsels of their Leaders, those enemies to all good men. But had it been otherwise, had all the Citizens unanimously combined to banish you, as a man dangerous to the State on account of his mischievous politicks, would it be therefore allowable for you to revenge yourself in this manner? Many others, whose intentions, in the administration of publick affairs, were no less upright than yours, have been as unjustly and hardly treated as you; (you will find few good Magistrates whose shining merit has not excited envy;) and yet those worthy men suffered their disgraces with temper, considered them as

Year of
R O M E
CCLXV.

B.C. J. C.
Four hundred eighty-seven.

Twenty-
second Consulship.

Year of
R O M E
CCLXV.
Bef. J. C.
Four hundred eighty-seven.

Twenty-
second
Consulship.

“ in the number of those evils to which, by the condition of humanity, “ they were inevitably exposed; and removing into foreign countries, “ carried thither no resentment, no malice against their own. Who was “ ever more injuriously treated than Tarquinius Collatinus? When with “ an honest zeal, and with all his power, he had assisted in delivering “ Rome from the tyranny of the Tarquins, he was himself banished “ thence, upon a false accusation of plotting to re-establish that tyranny.
“ He retired to Lavinium, and there passed the remainder of his days in “ tranquillity, without ever attempting any thing that could give credit “ to the calumnies so maliciously vented against him.

“ But, if you will have it so, I shall suppose that every man who suf“ fers an injury, be it from friends or enemies, his countrymen or stran“ gers, has a right to revenge himself. Those, who by their unjust “ usage of you provoked your anger, have you not sufficiently punish“ ed them? Our colonies expelled from their settlements by your arms;
“ the cities of our allies forced and plundered; the Roman lands pillaged
“ and laid waste; Rome itself invested, terrified with the apprehension “ of famine, and of the whole variety of miseries incident to a City be“ sieged: How is it, that all this has not been sufficient to assuage thy “ thirst of vengeance? O Marcus, at thy first entering the Roman ter“ ritory, did it not come into thy mind, This is the country that gave me “ birth; here I was nourished in my infancy; here I was brought up?
“ And couldst thou have the heart so lay it waste? When thou sawest
“ the walls of Rome from afar, was it possible to forget, that within those “ walls were thy household Gods, thy mother, thy wife, thy children?
“ Yet none of these reflections had any power to move thee. The most “ amicable offers, repeated offers from the Senate, by Ambassadors, “ men of the highest worth and chosen from among thy friends, have “ been rejected by thee with scorn. The intercession, the earnest in-“ treaties, of the whole body of the Priesthood, those sacred ministers of “ Religion, have had no power to move thy compassion. No; to sa“ tisfy thy boundless revenge, Rome, thy native City, must be sacked,
“ and its inhabitants reduced to slavery. A frenzy, a madness of anger “ that transports thee! Offended Gods are appeased by supplications, “ vows and sacrifices: Shall mortals be implacable? Will Marcus set “ no bounds to his resentment?—But, be it, that thy enmity to thy “ country is too violent to let thee listen to her petition for peace, yet “ be not deaf, my son, be not inexorable to the prayers and tears of “ thy mother. Thou darest the very appearance of ingratitude to“ wards the Volsi; and shall thy mother have reason to accuse thee of “ being ungrateful? Call to mind the tender care I took of thy in“ fancy and earliest youth; the alarms, the anxiety, I suffered on thy “ account, when, entered into the state of manhood, thy life was almost “ daily exposed in foreign wars; the apprehensions, the terrors, I under“ went when I saw thee so warmly engaged in our domestick Quarrels,
“ and with heroic courage, opposing the unjust pretensions of the fu“ rious

" rious Plebeians, My sad forebodings of the event have been but too " well verified. Consider the wretched life I have endured, if it may be " called life, the time that has passed since I was deprived of thee. O
 " Marcus, refuse me not the only request I ever made thee; I will never " importune thee with any other. Cease thy immoderate anger, be re" conciled to thy country, this is all I ask; grant me but this and we " shall both be happy. Freed from these tempestuous passions which " now agitate thy soul, and from all the torments of self-reproach, thy " days will flow smoothly on in the sweet serenity of conscious virtue:
 " And, as for me, if I carry back with me to Rome the hopes of an " approaching peace, an assurance of thy being reconciled to thy coun" try, with what transports of joy shall I be received! In what honour, " in what delightful repose, shall I pass the remainder of my life! What " immortal glory shall I have acquired! And, if it be true, that there " are different places for our souls; after death, I shall be in no danger " of descending to those subterraneous and gloomy caverns where the " wicked are confined. Nay, the Elysian fields, that delicious abode " allotted for the virtuous, will not be the place of my habitation, but " the pure and sublime region of the air, which is said to be inhabited " by the children of the Gods. My soul shall there publish the praises " of thy piety and affection to me, and never cease importuning the Gods
 " to grant thee a full recompence of all thy merit.

Year of
 R O M E
 CCLXV.
 Ber. J. C.
 Four hundred eighty-seven.

Twenty-
 second
 Consulship.

" But I give myself up too much to these pleasing views. What will " become of me, if thou continuest implacable? Dost thou believe,
 " that, covered with the shame of a contemptuous denial, I will live
 " till thy arms have decided our doom? That I will wait that dismal
 " day, when I shall see my son either led in triumph by his country" men, or erecting trophies on the ruins of that City where he was born?
 " No, Marcus, be assured, that if I cannot move thee to compliance, I " will here put an end to my life in thy presence: Thou shalt not march " to Rome, without treading over the body of her who bore thee. And if " this has not power to stop thy fury, yet consider at least, that, by thy " bringing slavery on thy country, thy wife and thy children must inevita" bly fall under the same calamity, or avoid it by a speedy death."

Carionius made no attempt to interrupt Veturia while she was speaking; and when she had ceased, he still continued in a deep silence. Anger, hatred, and desire of revenge, balanced in his heart those softer passions which the sight and discourse of his mother had awakened in his breast. She perceiving his irresolution, and fearing the event, thus renewed her expostulation:

" Why dost thou not answer me, my son? Is there then such a great" ness of mind in giving all to resentment? Art thou ashamed to grant " any thing to a mother who thus intreats thee, thus humbles herself to " thee? If it be so, to what purpose should I longer endure a wretched " life?" As she uttered these last words, interrupted by sighs, she

Plut. p.
 31.

Year of
R O M E
CLXV.
Bef. J. C.
Four hundred eighty-seven.
Twenty-
second Consulship.
D. Hal. B.
S. p. 523.
Plut. p.
231.
D. Hal. B.
S. p. 524.

threw herself prostrate at his feet; his wife and children did the same; and all the other women, with united voices of doleful accent, begged and implored his pity.

The Volscian officers, not able unmoved to behold this scene, turned away their eyes: But Coriolanus, almost beside himself to see Veturia at his feet, passionately cried out: Ab! mother, what is it you do? And, tenderly pressing her hand in raising her up, he added, in a low voice, Rome is saved, but your son is lost.

And now, taking his mother and his wife aside to a private conference, it was agreed between them, that he should immediately retire with his army out of the Roman territory; that nothing should be done by the Senate or People in favour of his return to Rome till a peace was concluded; that he should employ all his credit to bring the Volsci to reasonable terms of accommodation; and that, in case their past success made them obstinate, he should then lay down the command of their armies, which would probably be a means to bring them to a better temper. After this the women took their leave of him, and he turned his thoughts wholly to obtain an honourable peace for his country.

Fame carried to Rome the news of the Ladies success, before they could arrive there themselves; so that crowds of people came out and met them with grateful acclamations. A decree, allowing them to chuse their own reward, was presently passed with the unanimous consent of both orders. The Ladies, when they had consulted together, agreed to ask nothing but permission to erect, at their own expence, in the place where they had overcome the obstinacy of Coriolanus, a Temple to Women's Fortune. The Senate highly applauded their disinterested nobleness of spirit, but would not suffer them to pay either for the Temple or the Statue that was to be worshipped in it. These were erected at the publick charge; and Valeria, who had counselled so fortunate a deputation, was the first Priestess of this sanctuary.

Early the next morning after Coriolanus's conference with his mother, he broke up his camp, and peaceably marched his army homewards. No-body had the boldness to contradict his orders, though many were exceedingly dissatisfied with his conduct, while others excused it, being more affected with his filial respect to his mother than with their own interests. As soon as he was arrived in the territory of the Volsci, he made a present to the soldiers of all the spoil that had fallen to his share during the whole campaign, and then dismissed them. This liberality increased their affection to him, so that they made his apology wherever they went.

But Tullus, who had long been jealous of the esteem and credit which his rival had gained with the soldiery, no sooner saw him returned to Antium, than he laid hold of the fair occasion which that return afforded to work his destruction; accusing him, in a full assembly of the Citizens, of having basely betrayed the Volsci; and commanding him to deliver up his communion, and give an account of his conduct in the war.

Coria-

Coriolanus did not refuse a trial, but insisted upon being tried by the General Council of the Nation, and not by the Antiates alone, among whom his enemy had too many dependants devoted to his will. This contest was a while obstinately carried on, till at length the Volscian, impatient to compass his design, and having suborned some Assassins, sent a summons to the Roman to appear in judgment on a certain day to clear himself of treason. On the day appointed, Tullus mounted his tribunal, and, having first charged his adversary with various crimes against the State, exhorted the people to employ violence, if the accused did not instantly abdicate his office. Coriolanus would have answered to the charge, and many of the assembly were disposed to hear him candidly; but when he began to speak, his voice was immediately drowned by clamours from Tullus's faction; and the most audacious of them crying out, Down with him, kill him, kill him, the furious rabble in a few moments stoned him to death.

Year of
R O M E
CCLXV.
Bef. J. C.
Four hundred eighty-seven.
Twenty-
second Consulship.

D. Hal. B.
8. P. 528.

Such was the end of this great man, according to Dionysius and Plutarch, who likewise agree in telling us, that the nation of the Volsci in general were not pleased with the murder of the hero, but much regretted the loss of him, and, after a pompous funeral, erected a stately tomb to his memory. Dionysius adds, that the Romans themselves, both men and women, on the first news of his death, went into mourning for him; but Plutarch will have it, that the men did nothing that expressed either honour for his memory, or resentment against him, yet suffered the women, at their own request, to wear mourning ten months, the longest mourning allowed by the laws of Numa.

Plut. p.
233.
D. Hal. B.
8. P. 530.

Livy says nothing of the mourning of men or women at Rome, for their countryman. He seems to give no credit to the story of the murder, but rather to believe the report of Fabius (whom he styles By far the most ancient of the Latine Historians) that Coriolanus lived long, and in his last years was frequently heard to say, That exile, always grievous, was much more so in old age *.

B. 2. c. 40.

* FABIUS's report is not incredible. Coriolanus had rejected all the offers of advantage to himself made him by the Senate, had been deaf to all the solicitations of his best friends, and had only yielded to his mother; and filial piety, in those days, was a high point of virtue. And accordingly both Dionysius and Plutarch tell us, that those of the army who disliked his retreat from before Rome, did not look upon him as treacherous, but thought his action pardonable; he being pressed to it by such affecting motives. Add to this, that the hearts of the soldiers were gained to him by his liberality; and the whole nation indebted to him for extraordinary services. It may therefore easily be supposed, that they did not refuse him a quiet retreat in their country; and if we consider his haughty and unforgiving temper, and his inextinguishable hatred to the Roman Tribunes and the popular party, these will sufficiently account for his not seeking, or even desiring to return to Rome.

According to CICERO (in Lat.) CORIO- LANUS killed himself.

It may be proper, in the close of the history of this famous Roman, to mention, that, though DIONYSIUS (whom PLUTARCH copies) has been followed, in the text, in what he says of CORIOLANUS's Consent to be tried by the People, and of his Defence, at his Trial, against the accusations of the Tribunes; yet from the character of this Patrician, so haughty, obstinate, and untractable, LIVY's account seems more credible. Not a word in the Latine Historian of any such Consent, or Defence, or even Trial. He affirms, that CORIOLANUS did not appear on the day appointed for his Trial, and was condemned in his absence.

Dr. Madaison, in his Treatise on the Roman Senate, (p. 21.) prefers the authority of DIONYSIUS to that of LIVY. "Where these (says he) happen to differ, it cannot be difficult to decide, which of them ought to have the preference; nay, it is already decided by the Judgment of all the best Criticks; who, upon the comparison, have universally preferred the diligence and accuracy of DIONYSIUS to the haste and negligence of LIVY."

To call in question the Judgment of all the best Criticks must be an extreme presumption. I shall therefore only say, that if so mighty an authority had not decided in favour of DIONYSIUS, I should, in many instances, prefer (with regard to the history of the earliest times of Rome) the brevity of LIVY to the ample and circumstantial accounts, and seeming accuracy of DIONYSIUS: because I should suspect, that the abundance of the Greek Historian was in no measure owing to his Diligence, but to his Baldness in supplying from himself what he could not find elsewhere to make out his story. Several passages, I think, might be produced from his Roman Antiquities to justify this suspicion. We shall see by and by, whether his account of CORIOLANUS's affair will not alone be sufficient. At present I shall proceed to observe, that LIVY not only differs from DIONYSIUS, with relation to the facts above mentioned, but seems to have known nothing of that Assembly of the People by Tribes (the first assembly of the kind) which the Greek Historian reports to have passed sentence of banishment against CORIOLANUS. PLUTARCH makes the same report, and doubtless on his countryman's authority; and, I believe, that, on the same authority, and on that alone, all the learned moderns, who have treated of the Roman Comitia, have, without scruple, admitted the fact. Nevertheless, there are some considerations which make it difficult to believe, that the Roman People voted by Tribes, when CORIOLANUS was condemned to banishment.

I. First, The SILENCE of LIVY, who says not one word of Comitia Tributa, on occasion of CORIOLANUS's affair, nor till he comes to VOLERO's Bill (which was twenty years after) for chusing the TRIBUNES in those Assemblies. He speaks particularly, and fully enough of the trials of Menenius and Servilius before the People, the one fifteen, the other sixteen years posterior to the banishment of CORIOLANUS; but on neither of these occasions does he say the least word of Tribes: yet one would think, he could hardly have forbore mentioning, if it were true, what DIONYSIUS relates; namely, That those Consuls were tried in Comitia Tributa, and that every one of the Tribes gave sentence against Menenius, the son of their greatest benefactor; and not one Tribe voted against Servilius.

It is almost incredible that LIVY, in writing of the times, when so important a change is pretended to have been made in the constitution of the Republick, should pass it over, without the least notice, if History did really afford any proof of that change being then made.

Whether COMITIA TRIBUTA, Assemblies of the People, upon which the SENATE was to have no controul, should be introduced for the Trial of SENATORS, in Capital Causes, was surely a question of much greater moment to the SENATE, than whether the Plebeians should be suffered to chuse, in such assemblies, their own proper advocates, and legal protectors, the TRIBUNES: yet we find LIVY very ample upon upon the dispute and struggle occasioned by VOLERO's Bill, and wholly silent as to any contest about Comitia Tributa, in the affair of CORIOLANUS.

Is it in any degree probable, that the Senators would have struggled with the Tribunes and the People, almost to a civil war, (as both Livy and Dionysius report) to hinder the TRIBUNES from being elected in Comitia by Tribes, if they had already consented to let Senators and Consulars be tried for their lives in such assemblies?

II. NOT only the SILENCE of LIVY concerning Comitia Tributa before VOLERO's time, but likewise what he SAYS, in speaking of VOLERO's Bill, seems to furnish good reasons to question the truth of Dionysius's date of the introduction of those Comitia. In Book II. chap. lx. Livy has these words:—"Thus with various fortune in war, and furious discord both at home and abroad, passed this year^a, made memorable chiefly by the COMITIA TRIBUTA. The affair was more considerable for the victory itself, than for the benefit got by it. For neither the Plebeians acquired, nor the Senators lost so much strength, as the COMITIA themselves lost Dignity, by the exclusion of the Senators from the Council." [Varia fortuna belli, atroci discordia domi forisque ANNVM exactum INSIGNEM MAXIME COMITIA TRIBUTA EFFICIUNT. Res major victoria suscepti certaminis quam usu. Plus enim dignitatis Comitibus ipsis detractum est, Patribus ex concilio subinovendis, quam virium aut Plebi additum aut ademptum Patribus.]

M. Crevier * thinks it difficult to reconcile this passage of the historian with another, where he makes the first mention of VOLERO's BILL, for choosing the TRIBUNES in Comitia Tributa: "No trivial thing, under a plausible pretext and a harmless appearance at first, was proposed; but which would deprive the Patricians of all power of creating, by the votes of their Clients, such TRIBUNES as they liked." [Haud parva res, sub titulo primâ specie minimè atroci, ferebatur; sed quæ Patriciis omnem potestatem per Clientium suffragia creandi quos vellent Tribunos auferret.]

* See n. 2.
on Liv. l.
ii. c. 56.

If it were a duty incumbent on every reader of an ancient author to make him always consistent with himself, I should, on this occasion, say, That when Livy calls VOLERO's Bill no trivial matter, and a few lines after, a thing weighty in itself, [Res suo molimine gravis,] it is not with reference to its depriving the Patricians of their Influence in the Elections of TRIBUNES: for it appears plainly, that, though they were busy enough in those elections, they had no great influence on the voters; and were far from being able to create such Tribunes as they approved: otherwise, they certainly would not have suffered VOLERO to be two years successively in the Tribuneship. But they neither could hinder his election, nor get into the college any one man who would oppose his measures: By the power therefore of the Patricians, by the votes of their Clients, to create Tribunes, Livy can only mean to intimate, that this was pretended by VOLERO, and offered as the reason for preferring his Bill; the avowed aim of which (whatever might be the secret one) was to put an end to undue influence in the election of Tribunes. And Livy seems to allow this pretence to be specious, and no way unreasonable. For what else can be the meaning of those words, sub titulo primâ specie minimè atroci?

And when the Historian, after saying, annum insignem maxime Comitia Tributa efficiunt, adds, Res major victoria quam usu, plus enim dignitatis, &c. I apprehend his meaning to be, that the difference was really very inconsiderable as to the influence of the Patricians in the People's choice of Tribunes. M. Crevier seems to Loc. cit. doubt, whether there was any difference. Quomodo per Clientium suffragia minus valerent Paucis Tributis Comitiiis, quàm Curitiis, quibus antea Tribuni creabantur, haud satis liquet. And this makes it the harder for him to reconcile Res major victoria quàm usu, with Haud parva res. But M. C. Cæsar, to increase the difficulty, has taken into consideration not only what Livy intimates, but what Dionysius tells us of the difference between Comitia Curiata and Comitia Tributa. The Senators were excluded the Comitia Tributa, according to Livy: and, according to Dionysius (when he speaks of VOLERO's Bill) no previous Senatus Consultum, nor Sacrifices, nor Auspicia (of which the Patricians had the sole management) were necessary to the holding these Comitia, and to the making valid what was determined there; all which were necessary in the other.

Haud parva res.] Hæc non facile conciliari posse videntur cum iis quæ infra de hac eadem re habet Livius in fine c. 60. ubi plis dignitatis Comitiiis per hanc actionem detractum ait, quam virum aut Plebi additum, aut ademptum Patribus. Nec vero mediocriter imminuta videtur hac lege Patrum Potentia. Primo enim Patres ex Comitiis Tributis submovebantur, quod docet noster in illa c. 60. loco quem jam attulimus. Inde est, quòd Comitia hæc habebantur Plebi propria, & leges in iis latæ Plebiscita nuncupabantur. 2º. Dionysius hac ip[s]a de lege agens l. ix. docet iisdem Comitiis necessarium non fuisse ut Senatus auctor fieret. 3º. Nihil in iis opus fuisse sacris aut auspiciis quorum arbitri Patres erant. Græc. Liv. p. 146.

Now, supposing that these were, from the beginning, the distinguishing privileges of the Comitia Tributa, and that Livy had these in his mind, it will not be difficult to see, why he calls VOLERO's Bill haud parva res, and res suo molimine gravis. For the very introduction (under any pretence whatsoever) by full and undisputed authority, of Comitia Tributa, (a new sort of general Assemblies of the People, from which the SENATORS were to be, in all senses, excluded) was doubtless a matter of great moment; tho' the mere transferring the elections of the Tribunes from the Curie to the Tribes was not so. This latter might be res major victoria quàm usu.

Dionysius tells us, that VOLERO, in his second Tribuneship, before the bill was passed, added to it these clauses, That the Ædiles should be elected in Comitia by Tribes, and that these ASSEMBLIES should have power of concluding all matters, the cognizance and determination of which belonged to the PEOPLE. [πάντα τὰ ἄλλα, ὅσα ἐν τῇ πόλει καὶ ἐν τοῖς δήμοις ἐκτελεῖσθαι δεῖται, τὰς ἐκκλησίαις ἀποδοῦναι. Et quicquid aliud apud POPULUM agi decernerique oporteret.] An addition, says the Historian, which imported nothing less than an abrogation of the power of the Senate, and a transfer of it to the People.

D. Hal. L. ix. p. 600.

7 505.

The very learned author of a late work, intitled, ELEMENTS OF THE ROMAN LAW, p. 203. speaks, as if he thought, that the clause Quicquid aliud, &c. had passed with the rest of the Bill into a Law. But Dionysius does not expressly say this: he seems rather, in the close of his story, to confine the matter of the Law to the Election of Tribunes and Ædiles in Comitia Tributa. And, had he expressly said, that the Bill was passed with that clause, yet the thing would be absolutely incredible; because, in that case, the electing of Consuls, and of all the Curule Magistrates; and the determination of all matters cognizable by the Comitia Censuriata would have been transferred to the Comitia Tributa; which no-body has ever imagined.

But to return to Livy's words, ANNUM INSIGNEM MAXIME COMITIA TRIBUTA EFFICIUNT, I shall leave it to the readers consideration, whether, as the Historian never mentions Comitia Tributa, till he comes to the year when VOLERO preferred his Bill, those words do not import, that the use of Comitia Tributa was first introduced into the Republick in that year. If the leading men of the Plebeians had formed the project of bringing Comitia by Tribes into use, for various sorts of business, they could not have thought of a more easy and natural way of introducing such Comitia, than by demanding them at first, only for the electing of Tribunes; nothing having a greater appearance of reason, than that the Plebeians should be quite free in the choice of their own proper advocates and protectors. And this I take to have been the real fact :

COMITIA TRIBUTA were introduced, under that pretence, by the Tribune VOLERO, to revenge himself amply on the Patricians for the affront he had received from them; and not twenty years before, by the Tribune Suinnius, for the trial of CORIOLANUS, as Dionysius reports.

III. The many improbabilities and inconsistencies, and the long elaborate speeches in DIONYSIUS's account of the first introduction of Comitia by Tribes, furnish ground to suspect, that his principal aim in that account was to get an opportunity of displaying his own talent of oratory; and not to instruct his readers by a true relation of facts. Whoever peruses attentively what he has written of the dispute between the SENATE and the TRIBUNES, concerning CORIOLANUS, will, I think, observe, that there were three points in question.

1. WHETHER an Assembly of the People could legally take cognizance of a criminal accusation, brought against a Senator, or any Patrician?

CORIOLANUS at first declares, that he is accountable to the CONSULS only, and D. H. l. I. that he will in no instance, in nothing, [πρὸ ὅδινος πρᾶγματος] submit himself to the ^{vii. p. 443.} judgment of the People. Yet, when he finds that the majority of the Senate are of a different opinion, he consents to be tried by the People; provided he be accused of nothing but the greatest of all crimes, aiming at the TYRANNY. Nay, in the end, he consents (according to Dionysius) to be tried on this article in an ^{p. 463.} Assembly of the People, where the Tribunes, whom he had just before reviled and insulted, are to be Lords President; [and where the Consuls and Senators (according to some learned writers) could not be present.] ^{p. 467.}

APPIUS CLAUDIUS pretends, that the SENATE is the only court where a Patrician can legally be brought into judgment: and, to support this opinion, he is furnished by the historian with the most senseless arguments that can be imagined. ^{p. 453, & seq.}

THE CONSULS, and Valerius, and the majority of the Senate, have more reason ^{p. 460, &} and temper. They do not deny, that a Patrician may be brought into judgment before the People: they only insist on the necessity of a previous Decree of the Senate, ^{seq.} authorizing the Assembly of the People to try and judge the accused.

2. THIS therefore was the second Point, Whether, granting the people to have the prerogative of judging Patricians, they could legally exercise it in any particular cause without a previous SENATUS CONSULTUM, authorizing them to hear and judge that Cause. The Consuls say, no: the Tribunes say, yes; founding their claim on the VALERIAN LAW for appeals to the People, in case of oppression by the Nobles; which law would be rendered vain if the oppressors had the power of hindering, by the refusal of a Senatus Consultum, the complaint from being brought by appeal before the People.

Nevertheless, the Tribunes do at length, with regard to the particular cause of CORIOLANUS, consent to ask a Senatus Consultum, authorizing the People to try him. This being obtained,

3. THE third point in question was, concerning the Form of the Assembly, in which the accused should be tried. But it is to be remarked, that (according to our historian) this question does not come into dispute, till the very hour when the people are assembled to hear the cause.

The Consuls and Patricians, perceiving the purpose of the Tribunes to have the people vote by Tribes, remonstrate against it, and make a mighty clamour. They urge the established custom of the People's voting by Centuries, on all affairs, referred to them by the Senate. Nevertheless, after some time spent in altercation, they yield the point to the Tribunes; a point of greater moment than any they had before disputed.

THE unlikelihood of these facts (not to say the falsity of the relation) would have appeared in a stronger light, if our diligent and accurate Historian had, on occasion of this his pretended Introduction of Comitia Tributa, declared the distinguishing privileges and properties of these Assemblies. But, instead of instructing us fully in those Points, he gives us a description of the Comitia by Centuries, which he had already given in his IVth Book; and of the Comitia Tributa says nothing but,

1. THAT in these Assemblies the vote of a poor man was equal in value to the vote of a rich man. And,

2. THAT all [the Citizens] had votes. (For this is intimated in the Reason he gives for thinking that in this dispute the Tribunes were more in the right than their opponents, viz. That the cognizance of crimes against the publick equally belonged to all.)

Now the first of these does in no wise distinguish the Comitia Tributa from the Comitia Curiata.

And the second seems not to be true.

Taylor's Elem. of Civ. Law,
p. 198. Indeed the learned Writer, just now mentioned, speaking of a TRIBUNE's right to summon the People to the COMITIA TRIBUTA, adds, in a parenthesis, (where the Patricians also might be present and vote, if they pleased; but could not be compelled, nor were they SUMMONED.) And it is expressly asserted by Lælius (apud A. Gell. xv. 27.) That the Patricians were not summoned to the Councils called by the Tribunes. [Is qui non universum populum sed partem aliquam adesse jubet, non Comitia sed Concilium edicere debet. Tribuni autem neque ADVOCANT Patricios, neque ad eos referre ulla de re possunt: ita ne Leges quidem propriè, sed Plebiscita appellantur, quæ Tribuni Plebis ferentibus accepta sunt.] But this same Lælius (whoever he was) does not say, that the Patricians might be present and vote if they pleased. And it would seem from Livy's words, above cited, [Patribus ex concilio submovendis] that the Senators at least, if not all the Patricians, were absolutely excluded from the Comitia Tributa, when held for the election of Tribunes. Manutius, as to this point, speaks confidently, in his comment on the following words from Livy, L. I. c. 17. Patres decreverunt ut cum populus regem jussisset, id sic ratum esset, si patres auctores fierent: hodieque in legibus magistratibusque rogandis usurpatur idem jus, vi adempta. Priusquam populus suffragium ineat, in incertum Comitiorum eventum Patres auctores fiunt.

On this passage Manutius (cap. ix.) writes thus: Non iis Comitiiis quæ Plebeius magistratus habebat, quæ Tributa dicebantur, sed iis quæ Patricius, hoc est Centuriatis & Curiatis, patres auctores fiebant. Qui enim credibile est, auctoritate patrum Comitia Tributa confirmari oportuisse, cum PATRES (ut Lib. II. Livius docet) iis Comitiiis quibus Plebeii magistratus crearentur VOLERONTIS, (Tribuni Plebis) LEGE SUMMOTI SINT? Vero igitur similis est, non de omnibus Comitiiis, sed tantum de centuriatis & curiatis, quibus adesse Patriciis licebat, Livium intellexisse.

We see here that Manutius not only is clear, as to the exclusion of the Senators from the Assemblies where the Tribunes were chosen; but, by the words quibus adesse Patriciis licebat, intimates, that there were Comitia quibus adesse Patriciis non licebat, and that all the Patricians were excluded from the Assemblies held by the Plebeian Magistrates, i. e. by the Tribunes and Ædiles.

And this is agreeable to the Definitions given of Plebiscitum and Plebs in the Institutes.

L. i. T. 2.
§. 4. PLEBISCITUM est, quod Plebs, Plebeio magistratu interrogante (veluti Tribuno) constituebat. PLEBS autem à POPULO eo differt quo species à genere: nam appellatione POPULI universi cives significantur, connumeratis etiam Patriciis & Senatoribus. PLEBIS autem appellatione sine Patriciis & Senatoribus cæteri cives significantur.

BUT,

But to return to Dionysius. Though he gives us little instruction concerning the Comitia Tributa, when he first speaks of them; yet when we come to VOLERO's Law for chusing the Tribunes in those Assemblies, he mentions two or three particulars in which Comitia Tributa differed from Comitia Curiata. A previous Senatus Consultum was requisite, before the latter could enter upon business; and, when they had done, their determinations could not be ratified, till, after due enquiry, it was found that neither the Gods, nor the Birds had any thing to object. But in the Comitia Tributa, no Decree of the Senate, no Sacrifices, no approving Birds, were necessary; and all business was dispatched in one day.

Legem promulgavit [Volero] de Electione Tribunorum, eam quidem ex Curiatis, quæ eo nomine a Romanis appellantur, in Comitia Tributa mutans. Quodnam autem sit horum Comitiorum discrimen, ego declarabo. Curiata Comitia oportebat, præcedente S. Cto, & suffragiis a Plebe curiatim latis, atque post hoc utrumque signis divinis avibusque non adversantibus, tunc demum rata esse: Tributa vero Comitia sine S. Cto, atque sine sacrificiis, nullisque avibus addicentibus, uno die a Tribulibus peragi. D. Hal. Lib. ix. p. 598. D. Tayl. Trans.

It is to be remarked, that Dionysius, on the present occasion, omits mentioning, not only what Livy intimates — the Exclusion of the SENATORS from the COMITIA TRIBUTA, — but several properties of those Comitia, which the Learned have enumerated, and which (if they really belonged to those Assemblies, from the time of their first institution) so diligent and accurate an Historian ought not to have passed over in silence.

Perhaps it will be agreeable to the reader, if I here insert some Extracts, from the valuable Work abovementioned, concerning the Roman Comitia, and the difference between LEX and PLEBISCITUM. For though the matters are; most of them, treated in the foregoing sheets, and particularly in a long Extract, from Mr. KENNET's Roman Antiquities, which is given in B. I. chap. vii. yet the reader will, by a repetition, here, of such particulars as I shall have occasion for, in what I have further to say on the present Question, be spared the trouble of turning back to find them: and there are, in what I shall transcribe from the valuable Work, some excellent hints and observations not mentioned any where before in this History.

- “ A FAIR account of the several sorts of Roman Law will give us a competent view of the Roman constitution. Dr. Taylor's Elem. of the Civil Law, p. 178. J. 1. 2. 4.
- “ LEX is, quod Populus Romanus, senatorio magistratu interrogante, constituit:
- “ PLEBISCITUM, quod PLEBS, plebeio magistratu.
- “ The three essential differences between Lex and Plebiscitum are,
- “ 1. The enacting Parties; POPULUS on the one hand, and PLEBS on the other.
- “ 2. The Legislator, or person proposing; a member of the Senate in that instance, and a Tribune in this. And,
- “ 3. (What is not expressed above) the difference of the Comitia, or Assembly in either case. [Of each of these in their order.]

I.

“ POPULUS ROMANUS — PLEBS.

- “ The people of Rome, taken collectively, was called POPULUS. From which PLEBS differed, as species a genere, says Justinian, rather as pars a toto. p. 179. J. 1. 2. 4.
- “ Every Roman was by birth either a Patrician or a Plebeian. The former are generally supposed to descend from the better class of citizens at the first establishment of the constitution; the sons and lineage of those whom Romulus called to his Council, and whom he named Patres, either ab ætate, or ab auctoritate.

“ ritate. The descendents of the rest, the Plebeii, were for some time—excluded “ from all honours.—They came by degrees to share in most parts of the admini“ stration, but still continued a different class of people, with different rights and “ distinction of character. So that the best way of conceiving this division would “ be, to consider the Patricians and Plebeians as two factions in the state, blended “ indeed very frequently in regard to honours, rank and condition, but still sepa“ rated by descent and family interests. For instance: the distribution of the Ro“ mans into Senatores Equites & Plebem, was not a distribution of species, or sort, “ but rank, order or degree. It was a verse of Ausonius, I think, “ Martia Roma triplex, Equitatu, Plebe, Senatu.

“ where Plebeians are not such as lately were opposed to Patricians (for the Equites “ were Patricians or Plebeians indifferently, and so were the Senators) but those, “ whose Census or estate was below the the Census required for Equites:

Hor. 1.

“ Si quadringentis jex septem millia desint,

Epist. 1.

“ Plebs eris —————

58.

“ So again, when the Romans were divided into Nobiles and Novi, this is also a “ distinction of rank, not nativity, and affects not the distinction of Patricians and “ Plebeians. Nobiles were such whose ancestors had borne particular offices, whe“ ther they were Patricians or Plebeians. So that many Plebeians were Nobiles, “ and many Patricians not so. —————

P. 180.

“ If it be asked, whether this distinction of Populus and Plebs be uniformly “ maintained, I answer, that neither in this nor in any other instance were the “ Romans such slaves to language as not to depart from some settled rules upon “ may occasions. Thus Populus (properly the whole people of Rome universally) “ is yet, in the following instance, opposed to Plebs, or a part of itself:

Cic. x.

“ LEPIDUS IMP. ITER. PONT. MAX. SENAT. POP. PL. Q. R. S. D.

Fam. 35.

“ And, on the contrary, Populus sometimes stands for Plebs, as distinguished “ from the other division of the Roman people:

Hor. 2.

“ Primores Populi arripuit, Populumque tributum.

Sat. 1. 69.

I.

“ The second difference, was the officer who made the proposal. It was a “ Magistrate who proposed the Lex: the Plebiscitum, a Tribune only. And as “ magistracies and offices among the Romans were pretty numerous, be it remem“ bered, that it was one of the Magistratus Majores, or the Magistrates of a high“ er order only, such, namely, penes quos erant majora Reip. auspicia.

“ These were either ORDINARY, as Consul, Prætor, Censor, or EXTRAORDI-“ NARY, as Interrex, Dictator, Decemviri Legibus Scribendis, Trib. Mil. Cos. Pot.
 “ Triumviri R. P. C. —————

III.

P. 185.

“ The third difference between Lex and Plebiscitum, though not commonly “ expressed in the definitions of them, is the difference of that court or assembly, “ at which each of these were enacted.

“ The Assemblies or Comitia of the Romans, were Curiata, Centuriata, Tributa.
 “ In the two former were the Leges enacted, in the latter the Plebiscita.

“ COMITIA CURIATA.

“ It is sufficient to understand in general, that Romulus divided his people into “ Three Tribes; and each Tribe into Ten Curie. During the reign of the five “ first Kings, the Comitia Curiata were the only Assemblies of the R. P. Here
 “ they chose Magistrates, enacted Laws, determined upon Peace and War, &c.

COMITIA CENTURIATA.

“ Under the former distribution, the vote of the meanest man was as effective “ as that of the best. Servius the sixth king desirous to throw the balance into “ the scale of the more valuable part of the people, cajoled the lower sort, by “ telling them, that, to ease their burden of being taxed to the exigencies of the “ publick in the same proportion with the rich, he desired them to bring in a true “ state of their condition, family, age, &c. upon oath. Having got this know“ ledge of his subjects, he distributes them afresh according to their substance and “ condition. He divides them therefore into six classes, which consisted of 193 “ Centuries.

“ Class I. Consisted only of Senators, Patricians, and men distinguished by “ their worth and riches. In this class were 18 Centuries of horse, and 80 Cen“ turies of Foot; in all 98, &c.—

“ In both Assemblies, whether Curia or Centuriata, the question was not car- p. 185.
 “ ried by a majority of single voices, but by a majority of Curia or Centuries.
 “ [Whatever was voted by a majority of the Curia, was referred to the SENATE.]

“ Ο, τι ταῖς πλείοσι δόξαι φράτριας, τὸ ἐπὶ τῇ Βουλῇ ἀνέφερον. D. Hal. 11. 14.

“ (This Senate was composed of a few, and those of the better sort.—The “ Comitia was the popular Assembly of all the Roman citizens universally.)—
 “ I descend from generals and come to consider minutely the matter of Tribes, “ of Curia, and of Centuries.

“ The three Tribes, into which I observed Romulus had divided the original “ people of Rome, were either Rhamnenses, such as came with him from Alba: Ta- “ tiones such as came in, under Tatius the king of the Sabines: or lastly, Luceres, “ possibly that multitude that flocked in from all quarters, upon Romulus's invi“ tation.

“ But this division of the Romans into Tribus Πρῶται, as D. Hal. calls them (for “ it regarded the original, the stock, the descent of the constituents) did not pre“ vail long: there ensued under Servius another, which was a Local Distribution, “ and which the same author accordingly calls Τοπικῆν. He divided, for instance,
 “ the city into four Wards, or Regions, which he called Tribes also: Suburana, “ Esquilina, Collina, Palatina; and denominated his people thus digested, not from “ the race they sprang from antiently, but the place they inhabited now. And “ this was also a more equal division. For the Luceres, besides being the more “ numerous, were daily increasing by a conflux of adventitious people, which “ the other were not.

“ The division of the Romans into Tribes and Curia resembles much the Athe- Vid. supr.
 “ nian distribution into ΦΥΛΑΙ or Tribes, which were again made up of several P. 25, 29, “ distinct Fraternities, called by them ΦΑΤΡΙΑΙ. 90.

“ I would have it denoted that the subdivision of the Athenian Tribes was two- p. 186.
 “ fold; the one a civil and political one, namely δῆμος: whereas the other of “ φάτριάι partakes more of a religious nature, as there was a temple, a place of “ worship (φράτριον) and also rites and sacrifices appropriated to each fraternity.—
 “ By what we can guess at this distance, the former (δῆμος) might resemble the “ wards of a city in a local consideration: the latter a separation into parishes, “ or, perhaps, companies or fraternities, distinct in place and habitation, but “ united in one common interest.

“ The Roman disposition was much of the same nature, but more simple;
 “ where the distribution into Curia seems to answer both the purposes last men“ tioned.—

“ —When we are asked, what became of the Comitia Curia after the institution “ of the Centuriata, namely, when the votes of the people came to be collected “ not by fraternities or companies, but by a new distribution of the same people “ according.

p. 187. " according to their rank, consequence, and substance.—I answer in general, they
 II. A. 21. " were still retained, as we say, dicis causâ, or for form's sake, possibly, quod in iis § 11. " maior esset sacrorum auctoritas. So CICERO. Prima illa comitia tenetis, centuriata " et tributa: curiata tantum auspiciis causâ remanserunt.

" The conclusions of the Comitia Centuriata were still ratified here in shew,
 " this being the older and more constitutional Assembly of the two; and it was " easily conducted, thirty lictors or publick officers representing the thirty Curia.
 " And so Cicero seems to distinguish between the vera Comitia Curjata, and those II. 21. " ad speciem atque ad usurpationem vetustatis per triginta lictores auspiciis causâ § 12. " adumbrata.—

" It must not be forgot moreover, that in process of time the number of the " Tribes grew up from four to five and thirty, (the first being called Urbanæ, the " additional ones Rusticæ) without a correspondent enlargement of the Curia.
 " So that there was not a Roman who did not belong to some Tribe, and some " Century, but not necessarily to some one of the Curia.—

" For some time the Tribes², with their Curia, comprehended the People of " Rome in one manner of distribution, and the six Classes, with their Centuries
 " in another, without any mixture or relation: but, as Sigonius gathers from " Livy, afterwards these two distributions were united or blended together. Which " may be thus comprehended, viz. by conceiving the Roman people distributed
 " (as they were) into xxxv Tribes, each Tribe into six Classes, and every Class " into the appointed number of Centuries. Every class, which before took in " all the people of Rome, of that lot, or distinction, was now broke into xxxv
 " shares according to the number of the Tribes.——

p. 188. " It may be useful to take a short review of the manner of passing Laws at
 " Rome.——

" The person, who had a Law to propose, first wrote it over at home, and " shewed it his friends, before he proposed it, that there might be nothing in it
 " contrary to the form and necessary ingredients of such a proposal.

" Next followed a proclamation appointing a day to meet upon. There was " always a necessary interval of Tres Nundinae, or twenty-seven days, between this " proclamation, and the day of Assembly: That the Tribus Rusticæ, which came " from Rome to market, might be acquainted with the contents of the Law.——

p. 189. " It was not lawful to hold this court upon the very day of the Nundinae; but " it was held commonly, upon the day after. For the Nundinae were Dies nefasti.
 " —The same number of days was observed in summoning those Comitia, which " were held for the election of magistrates: that the candidates might have time to " apply, and the people to form their judgment.——

² By the Tribes, here spoken of, are meant, he says, that, " after the institution of the I presume, the four City-Tribes; that these " Comitia Centuriata—the votes of the peocomprehended, (not all the Roman People, " ple come to be collected, not by fraternias the six classes with their centuries did, but) " ties or companies, but by a new distribu-the people who inhabited Rome, or belonged " tion of the same People according to their to the Curia; for the learned Writer has just " rank, consequence, and substance," the observed, that it was not necessary that every " like distinction is to be remembered; be-Roman should belong to some one of the Curia, " cause the people of whom the fraternities or as it was, that he should belong to some " companies were composed, made but a part Tribe or Century. And so when in p. 186, " of the Assembly by Centuries.

" The

“ The same rule was observed in all causes that were heard by the People.—

“ If the proposer was of the Magistratus Majores, he commonly laid it before the Senate for their approbation: The Tribunes laid their Plebiscita before the People, without consulting the Senate.

“ When they were assembled, a crier proclaimed the Law after a clerk, that read it to him:

“ Then the proposal was supported or opposed, either by the magistrates, who had this right inherent in their office, or by private people, who had first obtained this leave from the magistrate.—

“ If any private man spoke, it was done before the magistrate spoke, that the latter might have no influence in swaying the former.

“ This was called Legem suadere or dissuadere.—

p. 190.

“ It was now the proper time for the interposition of the TRIBUNE, who by his VETO had a power of putting a stop to all business, which was called Legi intercedere. If nothing of this kind interfered, after some religious ceremonies, they proceeded to what was called Sortitio, which was thus: After the establishment of the classes and centuries, it prevailed for some time, that the centuries of the first class, which was a balance for all the rest, were called to give their votes first, which frequently determined the whole process. For, if they concurred in opinion, it was needless to take the sense of the rest.—If there was a necessity, the others were called in their order, till a majority of the centuries was obtained. This method after some continuance was altered, and the centuries not called out by any pre-eminence, but by lot. A box (urna or stella) was produced, and the names of the xxxv Tribes, upon billets or tickets, thrown in; and, the box being shaken, each tribe voted in the order, in which they were drawn out. And not only the Tribe, but the Century under that Tribe, was determined in the same method^b. For we have lately seen the centuries thrown in the Tribes, and involved in that distribution. The Tribe which was first drawn was called the Prerogative Tribe, and the Century in that Tribe, the Prerogative Century. And the person first called, Honoris causa, in that century, was called Primus.—

p. 191.

“ The lots being drawn for the Tribes and Centuries, the proposer of the law directed every man to repair to his Tribe or Century by these solemn words: SI VOBIS VIDETUR, DISCEDITE QUIRITES.

“ The votes were given for some time by word of mouth.—But about the year 614, A. Gabinus carried a question—That every man should vote in the election of officers, not by word of mouth, but by ballot. Two of these were given to every voter, the one inscribed A. i. e. ANTIQVO, the other U. R. i. e. UTI ROGAS. Two years afterwards, L. Cassius Trib. Pl.—proposed a law that such ballots should be used also in the courts of Judicature, inscribed A. i. e. ABSOLVO; C. CONDEMNO; N. L. NON LIQUET.—

p. 192.

“ Next to this A. 621, C. Papirius Carbo introduced them into the Comitia for the purpose we are now considering:—

“ —After the receipt of their billets, [from the Distributores, called also Diribitores and Divisores] they [the voters] were to proceed over an extempore stage of planks, raised on purpose, and called, from their likeness, Pontes; in number thirty-five, or 193, according as the Comitia were Tributa or Centuriata. From the straightness of the way I should conclude, they voted viritim.—

^b Mr. Kennet seems to differ from Dr. Taylor in this particular, making the Prerogative Tribe and the Prerogative Century only to be determined by lot, the rest to be jure vocatae, because they were called out according to their proper places. Fide sup. p. 94, 95.

“ A.

p. 193. " As at one end of the bridge they received their billets from the hands of the
 " Dirigentes, so at the other they returned them to the officers called Rogatores, " who were placed there with boxes or urns to receive them. But as both these " offices lay open to corruption,—they were sometimes chequed by inspectors, " Custodes, placed over them; sometimes people of the first character, to prevent " collusion, would execute these offices in their own person.—

" The people [the voters] after they had given their votes were immediately in" closed behind rails or Cancelli, set up for that purpose (to prevent confusion in " the Assembly, or any foul play) and called with great simplicity, from their " likeness to sheep-pens, OVILIA.—

" After each Tribe (or Century) had passed by, the suffrages or votes of that " Tribe (or Century) which had been marked with dots or points, were cast up :—
 " Hence in Horace :—Omne tulit punctum.—

p. 198. " The power of this officer [the Tribune of the Commons] consisted in two " things, in prohibendo and in rogando. In virtue of the former, he had a place in " the Senate, but no vote, and by his single negative, or Veto, by the single Veto
 " of any one of the number, all proceedings were stopt.
 " In virtue of the other, viz. Rogando, he had a right to summon the people " to the Comitia Tributa (where the Patricians also might be present and vote, if " they pleased, but could not be compelled, nor were they summoned) and there
 " propose a question, which, if it passed into a Law, was therefore called Plebiscitum,
 " i. e. Scitum Plebis.

Festus in V. " Scite Plebis appellantur ea, quæ Plebs suo suffragio sine Patribus jussit, Plebis
 " magistratus rogante.

" For sciscere, scire &c. like νομίζω of the Greeks, is the same with statuere.—

p. 199. " These Laws at first bound only themselves, not the Patricians, and were not " properly Laws, but owed their strength chiefly to compact and connivance,
 " rather than proper authority, which they had not, ob defectum majestatis.
 " Afterwards—they bound the whole People.——

The learned Writer gives " the history of these proceedings as they are related " by some who seem [he says] to have considered them most accurately" [and he refers to Functus de senect. L. L. pag. 445, as if he borrowed the history from him.]

" A. U. C. 260. Secessio in Montem Sacrum. The constitution of the Tribunitial " Power, and a Decree. Ut id ratum esset, quod Plebs ad se per Trib. Pleb. latum
 " jussisset, Livy 11. 33.

" A. U. C. 306. A second secession in Montem Aventinum M. HORATIUS Bar-
 " batius, and L. Valerius Potitus Coss. the year of the abdication of the Decemviri.
 " LEX HORATIA, ut quod Tributum Plebs jussisset, Populum teneret. Qua Lege
 " Tribunicis Rogationibus telum accerrimum datum est, Liv. 111. 55.

" A. U. C. 415. Publius Philo Dictator. A law to explain and amend the act " of 306, where the word was Populum; viz. that the Plebiscita should oblige all " the Quirites. Liv. viii. 12. This Dictator is sometimes call'd Publius, and this " Law LEX PUBLILIA.

* [There seems to be some mistake here; for Livy does not mention in 11. 33. nor, I believe, any where else, a Decree made A. U. C. 260. Ut id ratum esset, &c.

A.

- “ A. U. C. 467. LEX HORTENSIA. Hortensius Dictator; Secessio in Janiculum.
 “ [Epit. Liv. lib. xi.] The Patricians had attempted to frustrate the Lex Horatia.
 “ And now the people were pacified with the ratification of it, by the Lex Hortensia.
 “ Tribuni neque advocant Patricios, neque ad eos referre ulla de re possunt: ita ne “ Leges quidem proprie, sed Plebiscita appellantur, quæ Tribunis Pl. ferentibus accepta
 “ sunt. QUIBUS ROGATIONIBUS ANTE PARTICIUM NON TENEBANTUR, DONEC
 “ Q. HORTENSIVS DICTATOR EAM LEGEM TULIT, ut eo jure, quod Plebes sta- “ tuisset omnes Quirites tenerentur, Gell. xv. 27.
 “ Q. Hortensius Dictator, cum Plebs secessisset in Janiculum, legem in Esqueto tulit, “ ut quod ea jussisset, omnes Quirites teneret, Plin. xvi. 10.
 “ This history is, in some parts of it, controverted by other writers.
 “ Thus Plebiscita became Laws.—

p. 200.

“ To close with the “ COMITIA TRIBUTA.

“ We have seen the distinction between the Comitia Curiata, and the Comitia Centuriata of the Romans:—it is proper to consider the third sort, the Comitia Tributa.
 “ The account given of each of these by a writer in A. Gellius stands thus:

“ Quam ex generibus Hominum suffragium feratur, Curiata Comititia esse; quum ex “ Censu & Ætate, Centuriata; quum ex regionibus & locis, Tributa, xv. 27.

“ Forgetting therefore, that there ever were such Assemblies as the Curiata, we “ find the sense of the Roman People ordinarily taken in that Council, which “ Servius established by a digestion of his subjects according to age, quality, and “ condition, and called it the Comitia Centuriata. It was in this they held the “ elections of magistrates, the trials of offences, the deliberations about peace and “ war; and here were all matters adjusted relating to legislation, to adoptions, and “ to last wills and testaments. In a word, it was the only Assembly for transacting “ publick business.

“ Upon this account it was never called but by the officers of the first distinction, “ and held with very extraordinary rites and solemnities, viz. with those kinds of “ religious services, which were appropriated to the Patricians, to the exclusion “ of the other part of the subjects.

“ Penes quos igitur sunt auspicia more majorum? nempe penes Patres. Nam plebeius “ quidem Magistratus nullus auspicio creatur. Nobis adeo propria sunt auspicia, ut “ non solum quos populus creat Patricios Magistratus, non aliter, quam auspicio, creet:
 “ sed nos quoque ipsi sine suffragio populi auspicio interregem prodamus, & privatim au- “ spicia habeamus, quæ isti ne in Magistratibus quidem habent, Liv. vi. 41.

“ 1. This was therefore one great and essential difference between the two As-“ semblies [the Centuriata and the Tributa.]—

“ Hence it was, that the Patricians being seized of the auspices, and many reli- p. 201.
 “ gious rites, would frequently disappoint the commons (who had an interest in “ a bill, or a point to carry) under a pretence of religion; and make an adjourn“ ment, in order to gain time for canvassing. It was called Obnunciare when “ they reported the auspices to be unfavourable.—

“ But the Comitia by Tribes had nothing of all this, were opened with little or “ no ceremony, were not disturbed by the report of any bad omens, and did not “ admit of adjournment.

“ But other differences we find many and material.

“ 2. In the one case the Senate was to be consulted, in the other it needed not.—

“ 3. Besides the difference between Lex and Plebiscitum, CAPITAL CRIMES, “ and those of a higher nature, were cognizable in the Comitia Centuriata ONLY;
 “ in the other [the Tributa] the punishments never extended beyond fine and “ banishment.—

“ 4. The general sense of the people (universally) was better had, when the suffrages of every individual were equally valid. When Rome voted by her Centuries, the balance was with the better sort: and that multitude which composed her lowest Century was very rarely consulted.—

§ 222.

“ The thought of this Assembly [the Comitia Tributa] was first struck off by the people in the case of CORIOLANUS, A. U. C. 262. The Roman Comitia we have seen to be held principally upon these three occasions.

“ 1. For the trial of Roman citizens.

“ 2. For the election of magistrates and officers.

“ 3. For the establishment of new laws, and the abrogation of old ones.

“ When the cause therefore of CORIOLANUS came on, who was the idol of the better sort, and the aversion of the lower, it was impossible to convict him upon the plan of Judicature which then prevailed. But Dionysius will speak for me.”

This brings us about again to the question which gave occasion to the making these Extracts, from the learned Writer's Treatise.)

Well, what says Dionysius?

He tells us in the passages * referred to by the learned Writer, “ That early in the morning of the day appointed for the trial, a more numerous crowd of people from the country appeared in the Forum, than had ever been seen there before: That the Tribunes called them to an Assembly by Tribes, and divided the Comitium, or place of Assembly into portions by extended cords, in order to range the Tribes distinct and separate one from another: and that THEN for the first time the Roman people gave their suffrages by Tribes, the Patricians opposing it, and declaring that Comitia by Centuries ought to be held according to the ancient custom.”

* Επειδὴ οἱ τῆς τρίτης ἀρχῆς, ὁ μὲν ἐκ τῶν ἀρχαίων ὄχλος, ὡς καὶ πρὶν, συναλεθὼν ἐς τὸ πλῆθος, ἵκντο ἐπὶ κατὰ τὸν ἀρχαῖον, οἱ δὲ δέμαρχοι συναλύνοντες τὸ πλῆθος ἐπὶ τῇ Φυλετικῇ ἐκκλησίᾳ, ἡρώδης τῆς ἀρχῆς προσχωροῦσαν, ἐπὶ αὐτῇ ἐκκλησίᾳ αἱ φυλαὶ συνέσταντο κατ' αὐτὰς. Καὶ ΤΟΤΕ ΠΡΩΤΟΝ ἰσχυρὸν Ῥωμαίων ΕΚΚΛΗΣΙΑ κατ' ἀρχαῖον [omnino cum Lapo & Gelenio κατ' ἀρχαῖον] ψήφισαν ἐ ΦΥΛΕΤΙΚῇ· πλὴν οἱ ἐκκλησιασμένοι τῶν Πατρικίων, ὥστε μὴ τότε γίνεσθαι, καὶ τὸ ἀρχαῖον ἀξίωμα συνάγει ἐκκλησίαν, ὡς πρὶν αὐτῶν κατὰ τὸν αὐτὸν τρόπον.

Quum autem dies trigundini instaret, turba ex agris, quanta nunquam ante, in urbem conflavit, & summo mane forum occupavit, Tribuni vero plebem ad Tributa Comitia vocarunt, & Comitii loca funibus undique clauserunt, in quibus singulae Tribus distinguere, & alie ab aliis separatæ erant futuræ. Et tunc primam P. R. Tributis Comitiiis vicinæ suffragia tulit, multum recitantibus Patribus, & impedire volentibus ne hoc fieret, atque Centuriata Comitia more patrio habenda censentibus.

And a little below :

Οἱ μὲν οὖν ἐκ συναγωνιζομένων Μαρτίου — ἔξαιον κατὰ τὸν ἀπὸ τῶν Τριακονταίων ἐκκλησίαν, ἵππο-λαρχοῦντες τὰ ἴχνα μὲν ἀπὸ τῆς πρώτης κλίσεως

ἐπὶ τῇ ὁρτῇ καὶ ἐπιπύκνιστά Λόχων ἀπολαύσειναι τὸν ἀνδρα, οἱ δὲ μῆτις, ἐπὶ τῆς διυτέρας ἢ τρίτης. Οἱ δὲ δέμαρχοι ταῦτα ὑπορώμενοι, καὶ αὐτῶν τῶν Φυλετικῇ ἐκκλησίᾳ ὄντες οὕτως συναλύνοντες, καὶ τῇ ἀρχῇ ἐκείνῃ ποιῆσαι κυριότητα, ὥστε μὴ οἱ πατέρες τῶν πλεόντων μειονεκτῶσι, μὴ οἱ Φυλετικοὶ τῶν ὀπλιτῶν ἀτιμωτέρων ἔχοντες χάρας, μὴ οἱ ἀπὸ τῶν εἰς τὰς ἐσχάτας κλήσεις τὸ δημοτικὸν πλῆθος ἀποκλείνται τῶν ἰσῶν ψήφου, ἰσὺς τε οἱ καὶ ἐκκλησιασμένοι πάντες ἀλλήλους γινώσκουσιν, μὴ κλίσου τὸν ψήφου ἰσογυνῶσι κατὰ φυλὰς.

Mercii igitur Coriolani propugnatores—poscebant [Centuriata] Comitia, quæ ex censu fiebant; sperantes fore ut fortasse æ primæ classis nonaginta & octo Centuriis, firminus, a secunda saltem, aut tertia, absolveretur. At Tribuni hoc suspicati, & ipsi Tributa Comitia habenda esse putarunt, & id iudicium illis committendum, ut neque pauperes deteriore essent conditione, quam divites, neque Tribules minus honoratum locum quam milites graviter armati, haberent; neque Plebs in ultimas rejecta Classēs a suffragiorum æqualitate excluderetur, sed æquo suffragiorum & honorum jure omnes inter se fruerentur, & pariter vocati suffragia Tributum ferrent.

Then

Then he tells us the old story: that in the Comitia Centuriata the Centuries of the first class, which were the majority of the whole, and which consisted of the richest citizens, always voted first, and then the Centuries of the second class, and then the Centuries of the third class, and so on; and that the lowest classes seldom voted. And that, for these reasons, the friends of Coriolanus were for Comitia Centuriata, hoping that he would be absolved by the Centuries of the first class alone, or, at least, by those of the second and third. But the Tribunes suspecting the same, were therefore for Comitia Tributa; an Assembly where every citizen had a vote, and all votes were of equal value.

It is this representation of the case by Dionysius which has led the learned Writer to say (as above) that Coriolanus was the idol of the better sort—and that it was impossible to convict him upon the plan of Judicature which then prevailed. But surely no Motive could be more unluckily invented by the Historian than what he has given the Tribunes for desiring Comitia Tributa at this time; namely, the apprehension that Coriolanus would be acquitted, if he were tried by the Centuries. This motive, I say, was invented without any wit, and probably for want of memory. He forgot that he had told us, in the beginning of the story, that the flaming anger of Coriolanus against the Plebeians had a particular cause, over and above the causes of anger that were common to the Patricians in general; that the Plebeians had put a personal affront upon him, when he stood candidate [not many months, perhaps not many weeks before] at the last election of Consuls. The people, that is, the CENTURIES, had rejected him, because of his daring enterprising spirit, and the apprehension they had of his attempting the destruction of the Tribunitian Power; and especially because they were terrified with the multitude of Patricians that appeared in his favour, and shewed more zeal for his promotion, than they had ever shewn in behalf of any candidate*. And this affront was before he had provoked the people by his project of starving them into a surrendry of their newly-acquired privileges.

It is plain therefore, that he was not the idol of the better (i. e. the richer) sort, of which the majority of the Centuries consisted; and that it was very possible to convict him upon the plan of Judicature which then prevailed.

The learned Writer has remarked, that “The Patricians and Plebeians were p. 179. “two factions in the state, blended indeed very frequently, with regard to honour, “rank and condition, but still separated by descent and family-interests.” Coriolanus was probably the idol of the younger Patricians, and perhaps of some of the elder; but, if he had been the idol of all the Patricians, these would have been overpowered by

* Εἶχε γὰρ τῆς ἐξ τῶν κοινῶν ἰσχυροτάτης, καὶ ἰσχυρῆς κατὰ γένεσιν, ἐξ αὐτῶν ὡς ἐξ αὐτῶν τῆς δημοτικῆς ἰσχυροτάτης γὰρ αὐτῶν μετῴντι ταῖς ἰσχυρῆς καὶ ἀρχαῖς, καὶ τῆς πατρικῆς ἰσχυροτάτης συνεπιβουλίας, ἰσχυροτάτης δὲ ὁ δῆμος ἐκ τῆς αὐτῆς τῆς ἀρχῆς, τῆς τε λαμπρότητος τῆς ἀνδρείας καὶ τῆς τόλμης δι' ἐλαφρείας ἔχων, μὴ τι διὰ ταῦτα ἐπιτίσιον περὶ τῶν δημόρων κατέλυτον, καὶ μάλιστα διότι συνελάμβανεν αὐτῶν πάντη προθυμία τὸ τῶν πατρικῶν πλῆθος, ὡς ἔστιν τῶν πρώτων, ταύτης τε ὡς τῆς ὑβριδος ὁρῶν ἐπὶ τῆς αὐτῆς, καὶ τῆς μεταβολῆς τῆς πολιτείας εἰς τὸν ἐξ ἀρχῆς κόσμον ἀποκαταστήσει προθυμότερος, &c.

Nam præter publicas criminationes, quandam etiam privatam ac novam causam habe-

bat, ob quam plebeios meritò odisse videbatur, illam videlicet injuriam recens acceptam. Proximis enim comitiis illi consulatum petenti, & patricios suffragantes habenti, Plebs adversata magistratum illum dari non est passa, quod illius viri claritatem, & audaciam suspectam haberet, ne forte propterea aliquid rerum novarum moliretur, & tribunitiam potestatem everteret; præcipue vero quod timeret Patriciorum multitudinem, quæ nulli candidato tanta animi alacritate unquam antè fecerat, quantam erga ipsum tunc demonstrarat. Ille igitur ob hanc contumeliam irâ percitus, & mutatam rei publicæ formam in pristinum statum restitueret cupiens, &c.

the Placitum ^a in the COMITIA CENTURIATA. For we may observe, that the great points which the Commons carried against the Nobles, in the early days of the Republic, were carried in Comitia by Centuries: As, particularly, The LAW for electing the TRIBUNES in COMITIA TRIBUTA. And the LEX HORATIA which gave the PLEBISCITA, made in COMITIA TRIBUTA, the Force of LAWS binding the whole Roman People.

And doubtless it was in Comitia Centuriata that Coriolanus (in his absence) and Menenius (after trial) were condemned, and Servilius, (after trial) acquitted.

The learned Writer tells us (as we see above) that "CAPITAL CRIMES were cognizable in the Comitia Centuriata ONLY: in the other [the Tributa] the punishments never extended beyond fine and banishment." Yet, according to

Dionysius, the Comitia Tributa, in the first years after their introduction, were employed in nothing, that appears, but trying CAPITAL CAUSES. For though CORIOLANUS was only banished, the Historian intimates ^b, that it was not for want of power in the Assembly, or want of inclination in the Tribunes, to take away his life, but because these Magistrates feared that the people would acquit him rather than come into a sentence of death against him. (And to this may be added, that perpetual banishment was a capital punishment.)

And so likewise, by the Greek Historian's account, both Menenius and Servilius were, in Comitia Tributa, tried for their lives: though one was only fined and the other acquitted. And Livy says expressly, that Menenius was tried ^c for his life, and condemned, though the sentence was afterwards changed to a fine.

Now, if Livy's report be true, we must agree, either that Menenius was not tried in Comitia Tributa, as Dionysius pretends; or that those Comitia took cognizance of Capital Crimes, which is generally denied.

BUT that the reader may the better judge what dependence is to be had on the authority of the Greek Historian, with regard to the point in question, I shall give a short summary of his account of Coriolanus's affair, as far as it concerns Comitia by Tribes.

THE thought of trying CORIOLANUS in Comitia Tributa is first started by BAUTUS (now Edile) in a private conference between him and the Tribune SICINIUS; and we may suppose the intention of proceeding in that method to be, for some time, a secret known only to the Tribunes and Ediles.

But this secret is seemingly betrayed by Decius, one of the Tribunes chosen by the rest to be their speaker, in their conference with the Senate. The Tribunes had in a private meeting with the Consuls yielded so far to their pressing instances, as to consent to ASK a Senatus Consultum, authorizing the people to bring Coriolanus into judgment before them. Decius's task, therefore, is to convince the Fathers of the reasonableness of what is demanded. In the close of his argumentation he is made to speak of "summoning the accused to a just and legal trial, where the whole People, divided by Tribes, may give their votes, after being sworn ^d."

^a — Ἐγνωσαν [οἱ δῆμοι] ὅτι ἐν τῇ ψήφῳ τῶν αὐτῶν τῶν ἐλευθέρων ἀνδρῶν, ἢ αὐτοὶ κατὰ τὴν αἰσῶν ἐμὴν ὄντις.

— Cognoverunt [Tribuni] totam reipublice potentiam in suffragiis positam esse, quam facile obtinebunt, quod numero nos vincant. D. Hal. puts these words into the mouth of Coriolanus, L. vii. p. 436.

D. Hal. L. ^b Ἀνδρες ὁ δῆμος τῶν ψήφῳ τῶν φυλάδων, τὰ μὲν ἐπιγράφει τῇ δυνάμει αὐτῶν, κατὰ δὲ οὐκ αὐτοὺς, τὸ μὴ αὐτοὺς αὐτῶν ἀνδρῶν, ἀλλὰ αὐτοὺς τῶν αὐτῶν.

Tribuni litem exilio perpetuo aestimant, & tribus in suffragia miserunt, quia (ut existimo) verebantur ne is absolveretur, si eum morte multandum proposuissent.

^c In multa temperarunt Tribuni: quom capitis anquississent, duo millia æris damnato multam edixerunt. Liv. L. ii. c. 52.

^d Ἐπὶ δὲ αὐτῶν ὅτι καὶ νόμιμον, ἐπικατέμνηται, ὡς τὴν ἀπασαν ἢ πολλὰς μισθώσας κατὰ φυλάς, ἵκεται ἐπὶ τὴν ψήφον.

Not to dwell on the legal Trial, authorized by neither Law nor Custom, the secret, I say, seems to be betrayed by Decius: but that it was only whispered or muttered to himself, and not really discovered, is plain.

1. First, Because in the debate, no notice is taken of it, though a much more material point, than what they dispute about.

2. Because the arguments, used on both sides, necessarily imply, That the Trial of the accused before the people, which the Tribunes demanded, could mean nothing but a Trial in Comitia by Centuries.

For with what propriety could Decius plead the Law of Valerius Poplicola for appeals to the People, if by the People was to be understood an Assembly of the People by Tribes? Poplicola's Law could regard such Assemblies of the People only, as were, at that time, constitutional and in use; at which time neither Comitia Tributa, nor even Tribunes had ever been heard of.

And when Valerius (brother of Poplicola) makes himself advocate for the popular D. Hal. L. cause, and is represented reasoning thus:—As the people create the supreme annual magistrates, enact laws, abrogate laws, decree peace and war (and these are the most important affairs of the Republic)—why not suffer them also to be judges in criminal causes, and especially, when a citizen is accused of aiming at the destruction of the publick liberty? What sense or truth is there in this discourse, if Valerius, by the People, did not mean the People in Comitia by Centuries? For to these Assemblies, and to these only, belonged the prerogatives which he mentions. vii. p. 462.

And when Appius Claudius challenges Decius to name an instance, since the Valerian Law was enacted, of a Patrician brought into judgment before the People: How extremely foolish would this challenge have been, if by the People he had meant Comitia Tributa, a tribunal which hitherto had not existed? p. 457.

3. Because by the peculiar privilege of Comitia Tributa, the Senatus Consultum, which the Tribunes with so much ardor solicit for, was not necessary to the holding an Assembly of that sort; as Dionysius himself declares, in speaking of Volero's Law; and as the learned Writer observes, in what has been cited from him.

4. Because we find that the Consuls and Patricians were surprized and disconcerted, when, on the day of trial, they perceived the intention of the Tribunes to make the people vote by Tribes. They are represented as warmly contesting the matter with the Tribunes, and yielding at last with great reluctance. And this is a clear proof, that the Senatus Consultum, which the Fathers had granted, (and which the Consuls are said to have read to the Assembly just before entering on the Trial) did not authorize the People to try Coriolanus in Comitia Tributa, a Plebeio Magistratu habita. And if so, and if Dionysius is to be credited, what will follow? That a most important change in the constitution of the Republick was effected, not only without a Law, or a Plebiscitum, but without so much as a Senatus Consultum to authorize it. Is this credible? Would the Consuls have dared to consent to such an innovation, without authority from the Senate, at least? Or is it probable that the Senate would have taken upon them to authorize it, without the approbation of the established legislature, the Comitia Centuriata?

BUT in Dionysius's relation there are other particulars which destroy its credit.

1. First his representing CORIOLANUS and his friends, as struck dumb, quite at a loss for an answer to a charge, known by the whole Assembly to be false. I mean the charge of his sharing the spoil which he got in the territory of Antium, among τὰς μὲν φρατρίδας ὑπερφροσύας ἰδοὺ, περιελευσάμεναι τῆς βουλῆς, &c.

τὰς δὲ φιλιππίας, μὴτι περὶ τοῦ μακτοῦ γινώμιθ, &c. D. Hal. L.
ix. p. 598.

his dependants and creatures only; whereas he distributed it among all his soldiers, and those soldiers were present to testify it.

2. After citing, in his fourth book, the authorities of Fabius, and Cato, and Vennonius (whom he calls an author worthy of credit) in proof, that there were thirty Tribes at least, in the time of K. Servius Tullius, he now speaks of twenty-one only, as voting at the trial of Coriolanus. This is not like a diligent and accurate historian; and it has puzzled the commentators. The Jesuits are fully persuaded that there were but twenty-one Tribes at this time; which they think evident from the story of the trial. Sigisnius is of the same opinion. But Manutius having faith in Fabius, Cato, and Vennonius, and supposing Dionysius to have the same, declares for thirty-one: but then he is at a loss to guess, why only twenty-one voted at the trial, and is angry with Dionysius for not clearing up the matter. To save the historian's credit, he is willing to believe, that ten of the Tribes were hindered from coming, by the Tribunes, who suspected them of being inclined to favour the accused. M. Dacier speaks as if he were sure, that this was the case. Nevertheless, from what Dionysius himself says, no such solution of the difficulty can be admitted. For he tells us expressly that all the citizens were summoned to hear the cause. And one of the reasons which he gives, why the Tribunes would have the people vote by Tribes, is, that from those Comitia no citizen was excluded, and the vote of every the meanest Roman was of equal value with that of the most noble. And he adds, "That, in this, the Tribunes had more reason on their side, than the opponents; for that the cognizance of state-crimes belonged equally to every citizen; and that a cause, referred to the judgment of the People, ought not to be determined by a faction of the Patricians." [Nor, for the same reason, by a faction of the Plebeians, which it would manifestly be, if ten Tribes were excluded from voting, because suspected of differing in opinion from the Tribunes.]

And methinks it is time lost to seek a solution of this difficulty, unless some very zealous and able friend of the historian could find a way to make sense of what he says, after telling us, that twelve Tribes voted against Coriolanus, and only nine for him. He adds, "So that if two Tribes had acceded to the nine, the accused would have been absolved by the EQUALITY of votes, according to the law in that case provided." It is unlucky here, that no supposable different reading can reduce this passage to be an object of human understanding. What has been offered by some commentators in defence of the historian's singular manner of expressing himself, it would be inexcusable to repeat.

But now, to crown all, these Comitia Tributa, of which the historian has said so much, prove, at last, to be Comitia Curiata, if we may regard what he tells us (L. ix. p. 603.) in speaking of the contest about Valerius's bill. He represents the Tribune Laelius or (Laelorius) putting the Patricians in mind of the articles of accommodation on the Mons Sacer; and then of "two laws, enacted, not a great while ago, by the people; one whereby the Senate were to authorize the people to try any Patrician they pleased, at their Tribunal; the other that the people's votes [at such trials] should no longer be taken in Comitia Centuriata, but in Comitia Curiata."

It

D. H. L. — Γενέσθω [εἰ ἐπιτρέχει] ἡμέραν ἢ ἑπτά τῶν ἡμερῶν, ὅταν πολλοὶ ἱσχυροὶ ἢ τὸ ἈΠΑΝΤΑΣ ἔχουσιν τοὺς ΠΟΛΙΤΑΣ, ὡς ἐπὶ τῶν μεγίστων ἀπορροαμάτων.

Diem dixerunt [Tribuni] quæ die ænem hoc iudicio imponituri erant, OMNESQUE CIVES rogarunt ut ad eam diem adessent, quod de rebus maximis essent cognituri.

Ἐξελθὼν δὲ ταῦτα τῷ νόμῳ ἐπαδεδίωκετο, ὡς ὁ δῆμος ἐπικύρῃσι ἔσθ' αὐτῶν, τὸν τι περὶ τῶν ἀπορροαμάτων τῆς μεταγωγῆς, ὡς ἰδὼκεν ἡ βουλὴ τῷ δήμῳ τὴν ἐξουσίαν κρῖναι. ὅς ἂν αὐτοῖς ἐξῆναι τῶν πατρικίων, καὶ τὸν ἐπὶ τῆς ἀπορροατικῆς.

It is this passage, I believe, (for I can observe no other of the sort) which occasions Manutius to say, (Cap. 2. de Com. Rom.) Torquet me non leviter & illud in ejusdem Dionysii libro vii. [ix.] quod Curiata Comitia non distinguit a Tributis; nam in judicio Coriolani in quo Tribus suffragium tulisse, & ipse & Plutarchus tradunt, Curias tamen & Curiatam Concionem nominat:—qua ratione Curias admisceat, non intelligo, aliud enim esse populum Curiatim, aliud Tributim citare, &c.

Whether Manutius refers to the passage which I have cited from Lib. ix. or not; it is plain that he has been teized and tormented by some inconsistencies of our historian, in relation to his Comitia by Tribes. And, I think, it is as plain, that Manutius was indiscreet, to let his repose be disturbed by so light a cause.

φρίας, ὡς οὐκ ἔτι τὴν λαχίτην ἐκλήσαν, ἀλλὰ τὴν
κuriatim ἐπὶ τῶν ψηφῶν κυρίαν. D. Hal. L. ix.
p. 603.

His autem commemoratis, leges ostendit quas populus non multo ante tulorant, alteram de judiciis translatis, ut scilicet senatus pote-statem populi dedisset judicandi quoscunque de patriciis vellet; alteram de suffragiis ferendis, ut non amplius penes Centuriata, sed penes Curiata Comitia suffragia esse voluerit.

CHAP. XIV.

§. I. The Romans gain some victories over the Volsci and Hernici. §. II. Sp. Cassius (now a third time Consul) concludes an alliance with the Hernici upon terms which displease the Senate. §. III. He proposes the AGRARIAN LAW. §. IV. The opposition of the Nobles to the passing of this law. The Consul Virginius and even the Tribunes oppose it. §. V. The artful conduct of the Tribune Rabuleius to draw an advantage to the People from the dispute between the Consuls. §. VI. Cassius to get his law passed brings great numbers of Latines and Hernici to Rome to vote for it. His Colleague orders them to leave the City. §. VII. The Senate, to quiet the contention, decree a Partition of the conquered lands, but defer the execution of their decree. §. VIII. Cassius is arraigned before the People for treason.

§. I. THE Volsci soon experienced a great change in their affairs by the want of Coriolanus to command their troops. In conjunction with the Æqui they made a new incursion into the Roman territories, but the latter refusing to submit to Attius Tullius as their General, there ensued between these confederates a quarrel that was followed by a bloody engagement, in which, says Livy, the good fortune of the Romans destroyed two hostile armies. The Consuls had notice of this event, and were posted but four miles from the field of battle, yet their cowardice was such, that they made no advantage of the accident, but marched back to Rome, where they were received by the People with shoutings and reproaches.

Sensible of the disadvantage of wanting skilful and courageous Captains at their head, the Romans chose two Consuls, for the next year, of known bravery and ability in war, Aquilius Tuscus and Sicinnius Sabinus: Aquilius

Plut. p.
233.

B. 2. c. 40.

D. Hal. L.
viii. p. 531.

Year of R.
266. Bet.
J. C. 486.
23d Century.

D. Hal. L. lius gained a victory over the Hernici: and the Volsci were totally routed *
 vin. p. 532, & 534.

Year of §. II. TO these Consuls succeeded Spurius Cassius (who had been twice R O M E before in the same station, and had obtained a triumph) and Proculus Vir- CCLXVII ginus, a man of approved courage. It fell to Virginus's lot to make Bet. J. C. war with the Æqui; but these, not being prepared for fighting, retired Four hun- with their effects into their Towns; so that the Consul (who probably was dred eigh- not in a condition to undertake sieges) when he had a while ravaged the ty-five. open country returned with his army to Rome.

Twenty- fourth Consulship. Cassius marched against the Volsci and Hernici, both which nations took D. Hal. L. the same measures as the Æqui, to avoid a battle: but growing impatient
 vin. p. 536. of the devastations made on their lands by the Consul, they successively sent Ambassadors to him to ask peace. The Volsci were the first suitors.
Dionysius tells us, that Cassius readily granted their request on their paying a certain sum of money and furnishing his soldiers with such cloaths and provisions as they stood in need of.

And he adds, that, laying aside the presumptuous thought of being on a foot of equality with the Roman Republick, they, by the treaty of peace, agreed to become her subjects.

The Hernici, thus abandon'd by their allies, sued to the Consul not only for peace, but an alliance with Rome, offering to submit to such just and reasonable conditions as he should prescribe. Cassius, after exacting a month's pay for his troops and some provisions, referr'd the Ambassadors to the Senate for the treaty of peace. The Senate decreed to admit the Hernici into the friendship of the Roman People, but left it absolutely to the Consul to adjust the conditions.

The treaty * made by Cassius with these neighbours was, mutatis mu- tandis, a transcript of that concluded in his second Consulship with the Latines, which, that the reader may better understand the passage of the History we are upon, it may be proper here to insert.

* Livy says, that in the war with the Vol- sci there was no advantage gained on either side, non Volscis æquo Marte discessum est.

† This has not the least degree of probability, as will hereafter be shewn; it is more likely that the Volsci disdained an alliance with the Romans; unless by the Volsci the Historian means only two cantons of them which had formerly been in alliance with the Republick.

‡ The record of this treaty seems to have been preserved to the time of Augustus. For Livy, B. 2. c. 33. speaking of the bravery of Coriolanus in the war against the Volsci, the same year that this treaty was made with the Latines, says, that the glory of the Consul Cominius, who commanded in this war, was so much eclipsed by the gallant behaviour of Coriolanus, that if the treaty concluded with the Latines by Sp. Cassius, in the absence of his colleague, and engraven on a pillar of brass, had not been a lasting proof that Co- minius conducted the war against the Volsci, his share in that expedition would have been totally forgotten.

As to the treaty of friendship and alliance now made with the Hernici, (according to D.
Hal.) in the third Consulship of Cassius, Livy says nothing of it, but tells us that Cassius took from the Hernici two thirds of their lands, and that it was afterwards objected to Cassius as a crime, that he had left them one third, when he might have taken all, which is totally incredible, the Hernici, according to his own account, not being reduced to that degree of subjection till one hundred and ninety years after this time.

“ Let

“ Let there be peace between the Romans and all the Latine States, while Heaven and Earth endure. They shall neither make war themselves, nor raise foreign enemies against each other, nor shall either of the contracting parties suffer such enemies to pass through their territories to attack the other. Each shall with all its forces defend the other when attack’d from abroad; and when a war is carried on at their joint expence, they shall equally share the spoils of the enemy between them. All disputes about private contracts shall be judged and decided in ten days, in the courts of that nation, where the contracts shall have been made. Nothing shall be added to, or rescinded from this treaty but with the consent of all the Romans and all the Latines.”

Year of
R O M E
CCLXVII.
Ref. J. C.
Four hundred eighty-five.
Twenty-
fourth
Consulship

Though a treaty in this form did not import an admission of the People with whom such treaty was made, to the right of Roman Citizenship; yet, that by some act this right was granted to the Latines and Hernici, we learn from Dionysius; but it ought to be observed, that the Jus Civitatis was little more than an honorary title, except to those who removed to Rome, settled there, and conform’d to the laws and religion of the Romans. Such only had the right of suffrage and the other substantial privileges of the proper Citizens.

Cassius, at his return to Rome, demanded a triumph; and, tho’ he had no spoils nor prisoners of war to adorn it, had taken no town by assault, nor had fought any pitched battle, his demand was readily granted by the Senate; who nevertheless, Dionysius would have us believe, inwardly accused him of arrogance for making the request. And the same Historian represents the most ancient and most considerable of the Fathers, as suspecting the Consul of some mischievous design when they learnt from him, that by his treaty with the Hernici he had put them upon the same foot with the Latines, though they had not the same title to the favour of the Republick. Yet it seems, what piqued them most was his pride, in that, after the Senate, declining to settle the conditions of the treaty themselves, (as he desired they would do) had refer’d that matter wholly to him, he did not shew the Senate the like respect, by a second application to them, but finished the affair without their farther participation. But all these objections to the conduct of Cassius, if they were ever made before Dionysius made them, seem to have had no place at the time. The Greek Historian having resolved to adopt the improbable and ill supported tale of Cassius’s aspiring to be King of Rome, prepares his reader to give credit to it, by previously blasting the Consul’s character with the charge of inordinate pride and ambition, discovered in the instances abovementioned. But, to proceed in our story, (which, in substance, is thus related by Dionysius.)

D. Hal. 6
p. 517.

§. III. THE very next day after his triumph, Cassius, according to custom convened the People to give them an account of his conduct in the war: and on this occasion he enumerated the services he had done the Republick in his former Consulships. He reminded the assembly that during his first he had in battle vanquished the Sabines, those rivals of

p. 538.

to pass the Law in question, were yet very unwilling that they should be obliged for it to a Patrician; and Cassius himself, by one part of his project, furnish'd the Tribunes with a plausible pretext for opposition. Dionysius is of opinion, that had his law imported no more than that the lands should be divided among the native Romans only, he would probably have succeeded in his enterprize; but that, to secure to himself creatures and adherents abroad as well as at home, for promoting the views of his ambition (this is the construction put upon it by the Historian) he was for admitting the Latines and Hernici, lately made Citizens of Rome, to a share in the distribution; and that, to make the Roman People relish this part of his scheme, he insinuated to them, that it would be a means more effectually to secure them in the possession of their portion of the lands; for that those two nations being united with them in one common interest, would be a support to them in case of any after-attempt to dispossess them; and though their estates would not then be so considerable, yet it was better to have smaller estates with secure possession, than greater with uncertainty of holding them.

It was this article in favour of the Latines and Hernici which the Tribunes laid hold of, to defeat the whole design of Cassius, or rather to get the management of the affair out of his hands.

§. V. ONE day when he and Virginus were disputing before the People, Rabuleus, an artful Tribune, stepping forth, told the Assembly he had something to offer which he believed would put an end to the contest. Silence being presently made, he thus addressed himself to the two Consuls, "The law in question, does it not consist of these two articles, A distribution of the publick lands in favour of the Roman Citizens, and the admission of the Latines and Hernici to share with them in that distribution?" The Consuls answered in the affirmative. And you Cassius, continued the Tribune, are for having the People confirm both these articles, is not this your desire? It is, said Cassius. Rabuleus then asked Virginus whether he had any objection to the first article. Virginus answered that he had not, and that he only opposed the second. Hereupon the Tribune turning to the People, "You see, said he, that our Consuls are agreed as to the main point, which concerns your interests: let us be content with this, and leave the other article to be considered of hereafter."

§. VI. THE Assembly highly applauded this motion, so that Cassius not knowing what to say, and being quite ashamed of his ill success, dismissed the Assembly. He went home, and pretending sickness, stirred no more abroad for some days. He spent this time in contriving new expedients to compass his point. Finding that his party grew daily weaker, he, in order to strengthen it, sent privately for a great number of Latines and Hernici to come and give their suffrages for the ratification of the law proposed in their favour. Crowds of those new Citizens immediately flocked to Rome; which Virginus observing published an edict, commanding all persons who were not settled inhabitants to de-

Year of ROMAN CCLXVII.
Bet. J. C.
Four hundred eighty-five.
Twenty-
fourth
Consulship.

D. Hal. B.
S. p. 270.

Year of ROME CCLXVII. Part J. C. Four hundred and eighty-seven. Twenty-fourth Consulship. part from the city without delay. Cassius opposed this edict by another, which required all persons, who were enrolled Citizens, to remain in Rome till the question of the Law was decided.

§. VII. THE Senate apprehensive lest the competition between the two factions should grow into a civil war, [and doubtless perceiving that the opposition of the Tribunes to Cassius's proposal was not from any dislike to it, but from their jealousy of his popularity] assembled extraordinarily to consult measures, both to quiet the present contention, and to prevent any future attempts of the Tribunes to obtain a division of the publick lands among the People.

D. Hal. B. 3 P. 541. Appius Claudius, who was the first called upon to give his opinion, declared himself loudly against the partition proposed. He said, that if the Plebeians were suffered to live in idleness at the expence of the State they would become not only useless but burthensome to it: that the State would in a short time have neither land nor money; that it would be shameful for the Patricians, after having accused Cassius of male-administration, and of endeavouring to corrupt the people by a pernicious proposal, to give a sanction to that proposal by their consenting to it, as to a thing just and beneficial to the Republick; and he begged them to consider, that should they grant the distribution demanded, the People would not hold themselves obliged to the Senate, but to Cassius only, who would seem to have forced the Senate to such compliance: and he then moved, that some of the most considerable members of the House might be appointed commissioners to take an exact account of such lands as belong'd to the publick; and that whatever part of them should be found to have been usurped by private persons either by force or fraud should be instantly resumed: That when the commissioners had measured these lands and mark'd them by proper boundaries, one part of them should be sold, and especially those lands about which there was any contest between private men, that the purchasers might have an unquestionable title to produce against whoever should thereafter lay claim to them: That of the remainder of those lands leases should be granted for five years, and the rents employ'd in providing corn and pay for the soldiers in time of war. He added, "It is no wonder, indeed, if the Plebeians had rather the publick lands should be divided among all the Citizens, than possess'd by a few, and these the most impudent of men. But the regulation which I have now proposed will hinder the People from thinking any more of the partition proposed by Cassius; for they will undoubtedly find it more eligible to receive corn and pay from the publick, during the campaign, than to have the property of a slip of land, which they must cultivate with the sweat of their brow, subject at the same time to pay taxes out of the produce of it, for the support of the war."

Anius Sempronius Atratinus, who spoke next, highly applauded what Appius had said; adding however, that the worthy Senator had omitted some things which seem'd very proper to be consider'd. "I perceive" (said Sempronius) he thinks as I do, that the Latines and Hernicks have

“ have no just pretence to a share in those lands which Rome had con-“ quer’d before her alliance with them ; and that each nation has an ex“ clusive right to dispose of its own proper territory and conquests : But “ when this reasonable answer is given to the demand of those new Citi“ zens, it should, in my opinion, be at the same time signified to them, “ that they shall have their just portion of whatever lands shall be here“ after conquer’d by our joint forces. The appointment of commission“ ers to take account of the publick lands, and fix their boundaries, I “ much approve ; and I doubt not but the Plebeians, when they shall see “ the revenue of those lands applied to the necessities of the State, will “ become more quiet and tractable. Yet I think there is one thing more “ which ought to be put into our decree, in order perfectly to conciliate
 “ the People to us. You remember, that when the Consul Virginus “ was asked by Rabuleius the Tribune, whether he had any objection to “ a division of the publick lands among our native citizens, he answer“ ed, No ; that his sole objection to the proposed Law was the admission of “ the allies to a share in the distribution. And you know that it was this “ answer, which drew the Tribunes over entirely to our side, and brought “ the People to a temper of more moderation. How then can it suit “ with the honour and prudence of the Senate wholly to recede from “ that concession ? Must we not suppose that the People will be much “ more enraged by our breach of promise, than they would have been
 “ by a flat refusal at first of their request ? My opinion therefore is, that “ it should be given in charge to the persons, whom you shall appoint “ to survey the lands, to examine what portion of them it may be pro“ per to leave out for the uses of the publick, and what portion it may “ be advisable to distribute among the Plebeians. When the commission“ ers have made their report, you yourselves will judge, whether the “ lands allotted to the People shall be divided among all the Plebeians, “ or only among those who have at present no land or very little. But “ with regard to these several regulations, as the magistracy of the pre“ sent Consuls is near expiring, I think they should all be referred to the “ care of their Successors, to act therein, as they shall judge best for the “ good of the State. An affair of this importance is not to be adjusted “ in a short time. Our present Consuls, being at variance, cannot be sup“ posed so proper judges of what is fit to be done, as those who shall “ come after them will be, provided (according to our hope) they live in “ concord.

“ I might add, that, in many affairs, procrastination is beneficial, far “ from being dangerous ; a single day may produce notable changes ; nothing is “ more conducive to the welfare of a state than a good understanding between its “ Magistrates. You have my advice : if any one has a better to offer, let “ him speak.”

The Senate unanimously approved these amendments to Appius's motion, a decree was drawn up to this effect : “ That ten of the oldest “ Consulars should be named to measure the lands, and determine what “ part

Year of
 R O M E
 CCLXVII
 Bel. J. C
 Four hundred eighty-five.
 Twenty-
 fourth Consolship.

D. Hal. E..
 8. P. 544

"part of them should be left in the hands of the People, and that part should be distributed among the People: with regard to the allies and the new conquests, if any future conquest of Land should be made in a war, where they served in conjunction with the forces of the Republick, they should have their proportion according to the terms of the treaty concluded with them: and the ten Comites, who should be chosen at the next elections, should name the ten Comitiastrors, be charged with the care of distributing the lands, and make all the other necessary regulations."

It is pretty evident from this Senatus Consultum, as well as from the close of Cicero's speech, that the Senators had not the least intention to do any thing in favour of the People, with regard to the lands in question. It served however to still for the present the clamours of the poor, and put a stop to any further proceedings for passing Cicero's proposal into a Law.

§. VIII. AND no sooner had Quintus Fabius and Servius Cornelius, the Comites for the new year, entered upon their magistracy, than Cicero Fabius son of Quintus, and L. Valerius (nephew of the famous Poplicola's) two very young men, but both at that time Quæstors, brought in accusation of high crimes and misdemeanours, and even of high treason against Cicero, before an assembly of the People.

1. The first article of their charge was, That in his second Consulship he had granted to the Latins, not only the right of citizenship, which was enough in reason, and what would have been sufficient to content them, but a third part of the booty which should be taken in any war where their forces acted in conjunction with those of the Republick.

2. That whereas it would have been a sufficient indulgence to the Hernici, seduced by the Roman Army, to take no part of their Lands from them, he had chose to put them upon the foot of Friends rather than Subjects, Citizens rather than Tributaries; and these two were to have a third of the spoils and land acquired in any military expedition: So that if the Romans should be desirous to reward the services of any other of their neighbours, as honourably as they did those of the Latins and Hernici, they could not possibly do it, without relinquishing to them their own third, reserving nothing for themselves.

3. That, when he had formed a scheme for disposing of the publick lands, without the consent of the Senate or his Collegue, he attempted by force to get his Agrian Law passed; a Law mischievous and unjust in a double respect: for, whereas it should have been preceded by a Senatus Consultum, so that the Largess (if the Senate approved it) might have been the common act of all the Fathers, he had made it the act of his sole bounty; and (which was worst of all) his law itself, by which he pretended to divide gratis the publick Lands among the Citizens, would in reality deprive the Romans of their acquisitions to give them to strangers; who, though they had no title to any part of them, were to have two thirds.

4. That

4. That when the Tribunes would have rescinded this article, he was as deaf to their remonstrances, as he had been to the advice of his Collegue, the Senate, and all the best Citizens of Rome.

The Quæstors having appealed to the knowledge of the assembly for the truth of these allegations, proceeded next to their proofs of his secretly aspiring to the Tyranny.

THEY set forth, that the Latins and Hernici had furnished him with money, and prepared arms; and that the most audacious of their youth, flocking to Rome, had put themselves into his train; assisted at his dark counsels; and been his instruments and agents in many particulars.

These things being proved by the testimony of a great number not only of Roman Citizens, but of men well born and of fair characters from the Cities of the Albans; and the People being fully convinced that Cassius was guilty, they had no regard to any thing he said in his elaborate Defence. In vain did his three sons, with his other relations and friends, by the most humble supplications intercede with the assembly in his behalf: Nor had the remembrance of his noble exploits, for which he had been justly raised to the highest dignities, any effect to procure his pardon.

Nay such a hatred they had to the very name of King, that they observed no moderation in their sentence against him, but would have his punishment capital. And to this they were likewise carried by another motive; for as he was the ablest General of his time, they feared lest, if they only banished him, he should prove a second Cinæus.

The Quæstors, after sentence pronounced, led him away to execution. This eminent Senator, who had been thrice Consul, and honoured with two triumphs, was cast headlong from the top of the Tarpeian Rock; and the Patricians had the satisfaction of destroying by the hands of the Plebeians a determined champion for the Patrician cause.

SUCH is the account which Dionysius has transmitted to us of the treasonable design of Cassius, his measures to accomplish that design, the defeating of those measures by the joint Powers of the Senate and the Tribunes; and the arraignment, trial, condemnation, and execution of the delinquent presently after the expiration of his Magistracy. One would hardly expect, that after such a detail of the articles of impeachment, the accusers, the witnesses, the matter of their evidence, the irresistible force of it, the intercession of Cassius's relations in his favour, and the manner of his execution, the Reader should at last leave his Reader at liberty to reject the whole of this detail as a mere fiction. Yet this he does. He informs us, that, according to some Authors, to whom many give credit, and who were worthy to be believed, Cassius was neither try'd by the People, nor executed by their order: That no-body knew any thing of his treasonable designs, till his own father, moved by a suspicion he had entertained of him, made a strict enquiry into his conduct; that the father by his industry having discovered the whole truth, repaired to the Senate-house; that presently after, when the Son by his command was come thither, he accused him before the Senators: and that when these had condemned him, he took him to his own house, and there put him to death.

This tradition being as well authorized as the other, and the matter of it, as our Historian observes, suiting very well with the manners of the Romans in those days, he thinks it ought not to be rejected as improbable; however he is of opinion, that the other is more credible, and he gives his reasons.

1. Cassius's house was demolished [presently after his death:] Which fact the Historian thinks well supported by another fact, namely, that, in his time, there was no house standing in the Place, where Cassius's house was said to have stood five hundred years before.

2. Cassius's goods were confiscated, and sold for the use of the publick; and part of the money so raised was employed to erect statues of brass to Ceres: and these facts Dionysius believes to be true, because, by the inscriptions upon certain statues of Ceres, it appeared, out of whose estate the money came that paid for them.

Now, says our Historian, if Cassius's father had been living, Cassius would have had no property. The property of the son's house and goods would have been in the father; and the People would never have confiscated the estate of the Father for the crime of the son, especially if the father had been the accuser and punisher of his son.

“ For these reasons, says he, I am more inclined to adhere to the other tradition, but I have related both, that my readers may chuse as they like.”

NOW with my readers' leave, I shall conclude this chapter with some arguments which perhaps may induce them to think, that Cassius was neither publicly nor privately convicted of aiming at the Tyranny, but was murdered by the Nobles either secretly, or by a mob which they excited to do it, in revenge for his honest attempt to strip them of their usurpations. And I am the more inclined to examine this matter, because I conceive that many readers must naturally carry along with them a prejudice against the Agrarian Law (so often the great subject of dispute between the two orders at Rome) if they have first been made to believe, that the original author of it contrived it as a means to raise himself to the Tyranny.

AND first I shall observe, that the two traditions being equally authorized, and destroying one another, we have no reason from authority alone to believe either. Nor indeed does either Dionysius or Livy seem to

* Pliny L. 34. c. 4. and Florus L. 1. c. 26. follow the tradition of Cassius's being condemned and put to death by his own father; and Livy L. 2. c. 41. speaks of it as well authorized, but thinks it more credible that he was tried and sentenced by the People. As to what Dionysius says of the father's accusing his son to the Senate, the Latine historian is wholly silent: Nor does he mention any particulars of the supposed trial of Cassius before the People. He seems to consider nothing as certain in this matter, but that Cassius was condemned by somebody in the Consulship of Q. Fabius and S. Cornelius; that is to say, that he was then killed.

prefer

prefer that which they adhere to before the other, on any account but the greater credibility of the fact.

And it unluckily happens, that the only reasons which Dionysius produces for thinking the publick trial more credible than the private one, are mentioned by Livy as arguments used in favour of the private trial, by those who adopt this tradition: For the demolition of Cassius's house, the sale of his goods, and the employing part of the money to erect a statue or statues to Ceres, are common to both traditions: And those who believe Cassius to have been privately put to death by his own father, cite the inscription on a statue of Ceres as a proof, that it was the father himself who demolished his son's house, consecrated his goods to Ceres, and applied a part of the money to erect a statue to that Goddess: For, as Livy informs us, the inscription was this, *Given by the Cassian family. And indeed a statue with such an inscription seems much less absurdly employed to prove that the father gave the statue, than that the Cassian family was plundered by the People of the money which paid for it.

It is remarkable that Dionysius avoids telling us expressly what the inscription was, and only says, it shewed plainly at whose expence the statue was erected.

But as to this statue, or these statues of Ceres, most ridiculously referred to by both sides, as proofs of what they contend for, there is a very easy way of accounting for the inscriptions upon them; and it is amazing that it should never come into the mind of Dionysius, that the family of Cassius might probably give these statues in his second Consulship, when he performed the ceremony of dedicating the Temple of CERES, Bacchus, and Proserpine, which the Dictator Posthumius had vowed, during the Latine war: for that Cassius had this honour is related by the Greek historian himself in his 6th book.

We see then, that the very demolition of Cassius's house, and the sale of his goods, in consequence of his being convicted of treason, are factually wholly destitute of proof: For I presume that neither the void piece of ground, nor the inscriptions on the statues of Ceres (the only vouchers produced) afford even the smallest degree of evidence.

COME we now to the probability of the trial and condemnation of Cassius by the People, as represented by Dionysius. And, on this occasion, I cannot forbear saying, that the Greek Historian seems to delight in publick trials, as giving him an opportunity to make speeches for the parties concerned, and to furnish evidence in the cause. He has related at large the trial of Coriolanus, described his behaviour in the assembly of the Tribes, and given us the discourse he made in his defence, as things certain: Yet Livy (as has been before observed in the end of Chap. xiii.) without any hesitation asserts, that Coriolanus did not appear upon the summons from the Tribunes, and was condemned in his absence for default. And certainly this seems more probable, than that he should speak and act so much out of character, as he is represented to do by Dionysius: And the whole trial,

Year of
R O M E
CCLXVIII.
Bef. J. C.
Four hundred eighty-four.

Twenty-
fifth Consulship.

B. 2. c. 41.
* Ex Cassia familia datum.

D. Hal. p.
415.

Year of
R O M E
CCLXVIII
Bet. J. C.
Four unused eighty-four.
Twenty-
fifth Consulship.

as he has given it, is but a very lame story. Nor has he discovered any great skill in forming Articles of impeachment against Cassius.

It there be nothing to engage us to believe the facts of his publick trial and condemnation but the probability of them; and if these facts be no more probable, than that the charge brought against him by the Quæstors, consisted of the article mentioned by Dionysius; the whole is doubtless a mere invention to blacken the author of the Agrarian Law. For,

1. The first article of the impeachment is, That in the treaty concluded with the Latines, in his second Consulship, he had been too favourable to them, in granting them, besides the right of citizenship, a Third of the spoils that should be taken in any war made by the joint forces of the two states. Now, whatever fault was committed in making this treaty, the Senate were as guilty of it as he; for the treaty was not made by Cassius alone, but by him and the Senate together. He was detained at Rome by the Senate, purposely to be their minister for negotiating the alliance which, at that time they were very willing to make with the Latines, who had lately obliged them by many extraordinary services and marks of affection, as we learn not only from Livy but from Dionysius himself.

* See p.
245.

Nor in the treaty * is there any mention of a Third of the spoils. The Latines were to have an equal share. Their share did not come to be only a Third, till after the treaty of Rome with the Hernici; and then only in case of a war carried on by the united armies of the three nations.

2. And this shews the impertinence of the argumentation which Dionysius puts into the Mouths of the Quæstors under the second article, which regards the Hernici, concerning the future inability of the Republick to reward the services of any new friends. For it is evident from the tenor of the two Treaties with the Latines and Hernici, that in all wars in which Rome was aided by her allies were they more or fewer, the practice then was, that each should have their share of the booty in proportion to the number of troops they furnished for the campaign.

And whereas the Quæstors are represented speaking of the Hernici as of a people subdued, it appears by their overtures to the Consul, as well as by the long wars they afterwards maintained against the Republick, that this was far from being their case. What they proposed to Cassius were peace and an alliance with Rome upon just and reasonable conditions.

Nor is there the least reason to believe that Cassius, who would enter into no treaty of peace or alliance with them, of his own outhority, but referred them to the Senate, did, presently after, in virtue of his full powers, grant them the conditions complained of, without the privity and approbation of the Senate. Add to this, that the treaty was in reality a very advantageous one for Rome, and by which the Senate thought fit to abide. So that this second article is as ill contrived as the first.

3. The third article, which accuses Cassius of originally designing to exclude the other Magistrates and the Senate from any share in the glory of conferring a benefit on the people, is invented with no more wit than the foregoing. For, by the Greek Historian's own account, the Consul, before before he mentioned the matter to the people, moved it in the Senate: So that if the Senate and the Magistrates would have concurred with him, they might have had their share in that glory.

And it was surely a very ill judged accusation to bring against Cassius before the People, that he had dared to propose, in their favour, a law which the Nobles had not approved.

And as to his designing to give, by his Agrarian Law, two thirds of the publick lands to the new Citizens, it is a senseless charge, unless we can suppose, that those of the Latines and Hernici who came to settle at Rome were twice the number of the old Citizens.

4. And if it were true, that Cassius, against the remonstrances of the Senate and the Tribunes, was steady in insisting, that the new Citizens should have a share in the division of the publick lands; he, in this, did but follow the constant policy and practice of Rome, from the foundation of the state; and to exclude those new Citizens from a share of the publick lands, in case of a distribution, would in effect have been a violation of the treaty of alliance.

CONCERNING the secret machinations of Cassius to attain to the Royalty, the reader sees, that from the facts pretended to be proved, supposing them true, it will not follow that the Latines, the Hernici, and the Roman Plebeians desired a King, or that the Consul aspired to make himself a King; and the Historian himself seems to think the evidence of the treason defective, when he represents the People as immoderately severe in sentencing Cassius to death.

But, is it not surprizing, that Dionysius, or those from whom he took his accounts, should be so well informed of the crimes whereof Cassius was accused, at his supposed trial, and yet know nothing, or wholly suppress what they knew of his elaborate Defence? The total silence of the ancient writers upon this head, when, from what has been observed concerning the weakness of the pretended charge, it is plain that Cassius had much to say, and much to the purpose, furnishes an additional argument to those that have been offered, for believing that the whole process is a mere invention, a legend, a fable, (composed by some aristocratical writer) of which the moral intended to be inculcated on the Roman readers is obvious.

AS to the other tradition of Cassius's treason being discovered by his own father, when no-body else suspected any thing of the matter, and his being executed privately by his father at home, we have already observed that, in the time of Dionysius and Livy it was a tale which (like that of the publick trial) wanted the necessary support from History or Monuments to give it a claim to credit: But as neither the Greek nor the Latin Historian have mentioned any particulars of the discovery, said to be made by the father, of his son's treasonable practices, we cannot, as in the other case, draw arguments from the pretended process itself to disprove its reality. However, I shall finish this digression with offering some reasons, why, supposing Cassius to have been formally accused before the People or before his fed the Capitol) to raise themselves to the Tyranny. (B. 6. c. 14, & seq.) These imputations seem to have been invented merely to destroy two men, who by their compassion for the poor, and their great liberality to them, had made themselves more popular, than perhaps wise politicians thought it convenient that any man should be in a free State. It is not pretended that Mælius was tried and convicted. A Dictator was created on purpose to destroy him by a stroke of power. The plenty of corn which he had provided, and with which he fed the hungry Citizens gratis, during a famine, was a reproach on the senators and on Milonius their superintendant of provisions, for neglect of duty: and, by cutting him off as a traitor, they made to themselves a pretext for seizing his stores, and thereby shunning the trouble and expence of purchasing corn from abroad. And the People were so easily persuaded of Mælius's treason, that they afterwards banished Alula, the Dictator's General of the Horse, as guilty of murder in slaying their benefactor.

Nor indeed does it appear that any one Roman ever aimed at being (under any name or title whatsoever) sovereign and perpetual Lord over his fellow Citizens, before the times of Marius and Sylla, when luxury, avarice, and corruption, having got the ascendant in Rome, opened the way for inordinate ambition to execute the most detestable schemes against the publick liberty.

As to Manlius, Livy tells us, that he could not, from any writings, satisfactorily learn who were his accomplices, nor how far his schemes went; nor could find, that, at his trial before the People, his accusers objected to him any thing that indicated a design to raise himself to the Royalty, except some seditious words, his largesses, and his false charge against the Senate of secreting the gold, which they had collected to redeem the Capitol, when Brennus besieged it. Nay, Livy is not sure that Manlius was tried and condemned by the People. Some Authors, he says, report that Quintus were appointed to judge him. And perhaps neither of these accounts deserve credit. Manlius was zealous to have the debts remitted to the insolvent poor; and that was sufficient to engage the usurious Patricians to contrive his murder. I conclude these observations with remarking, that the Tribunes are represented as consenting and instrumental to the destruction of Cassius and Manlius, both eminent Patricians, but not to that of Mælius, who was a Publianus.

Twenty-
four Consuls.

CHAP. XV.

§. I. The People regret the death of Cassius. The Senate find means to divert them a while from the pursuit of the AGRARIAN LAW. §. II. The war with the Volsci breaking out afresh, the Tribune Mænius protests against any levies for the service, till something effectual be done in that affair. The Consuls, by a stratagem, get the better of his opposition. §. III. The Senate endeavour to obtain the Consulship for Appius Claudius. The Tribunes, to hinder it, excite such a tumult, that there is no possibility of proceeding in the election. The Republick falls into an Interregnum. Sp. Lartius, being Inter-rex, quiets the contention between the two parties. §. IV. Leilius, one of the Tribunes, opposes the necessary levies for a war with the Æqui and Veientes. Appius Claudius suggests a stratagem to the Senate, by which they carry their point against Leilius.

§. I. BY whatever means the destruction of Cassius was effected, certain it is, that the People very soon regretted the loss of him, and not without sufficient reason. For notwithstanding the late Decree of the Senate for the nomination of Decemvirs, to take account of the lands

Livy, B. 2.
c. 42.
D. H. B.
p. 343.

Year of ROME CCLXVIII. B.C. 100. Four hundred and eighty-eight. Year of ROME CCLXIX. B.C. 99. Four hundred and eighty-nine. Year of ROME CCLXX. B.C. 98. Four hundred and ninety. Year of ROME CCLXXI. B.C. 97. Four hundred and ninety-one. Year of ROME CCLXXII. B.C. 96. Four hundred and ninety-two. Year of ROME CCLXXIII. B.C. 95. Four hundred and ninety-three. Year of ROME CCLXXIV. B.C. 94. Four hundred and ninety-four. Year of ROME CCLXXV. B.C. 93. Four hundred and ninety-five. Year of ROME CCLXXVI. B.C. 92. Four hundred and ninety-six. Year of ROME CCLXXVII. B.C. 91. Four hundred and ninety-seven. Year of ROME CCLXXVIII. B.C. 90. Four hundred and ninety-eight. Year of ROME CCLXXIX. B.C. 89. Four hundred and ninety-nine. Year of ROME CCLXXX. B.C. 88. Five hundred. Year of ROME CCLXXXI. B.C. 87. Five hundred and one. Year of ROME CCLXXXII. B.C. 86. Five hundred and two. Year of ROME CCLXXXIII. B.C. 85. Five hundred and three. Year of ROME CCLXXXIV. B.C. 84. Five hundred and four. Year of ROME CCLXXXV. B.C. 83. Five hundred and five. Year of ROME CCLXXXVI. B.C. 82. Five hundred and six. Year of ROME CCLXXXVII. B.C. 81. Five hundred and seven. Year of ROME CCLXXXVIII. B.C. 80. Five hundred and eight. Year of ROME CCLXXXIX. B.C. 79. Five hundred and nine. Year of ROME CC. B.C. 78. Six hundred. Year of ROME CC I. B.C. 77. Six hundred and one. Year of ROME CC II. B.C. 76. Six hundred and two. Year of ROME CC III. B.C. 75. Six hundred and three. Year of ROME CC IV. B.C. 74. Six hundred and four. Year of ROME CC V. B.C. 73. Six hundred and five. Year of ROME CC VI. B.C. 72. Six hundred and six. Year of ROME CC VII. B.C. 71. Six hundred and seven. Year of ROME CC VIII. B.C. 70. Six hundred and eight. Year of ROME CC IX. B.C. 69. Six hundred and nine. Year of ROME CC X. B.C. 68. Seven hundred. Year of ROME CC XI. B.C. 67. Seven hundred and one. Year of ROME CC XII. B.C. 66. Seven hundred and two. Year of ROME CC XIII. B.C. 65. Seven hundred and three. Year of ROME CC XIV. B.C. 64. Seven hundred and four. Year of ROME CC XV. B.C. 63. Seven hundred and five. Year of ROME CC XVI. B.C. 62. Seven hundred and six. Year of ROME CC XVII. B.C. 61. Seven hundred and seven. Year of ROME CC XVIII. B.C. 60. Seven hundred and eight. Year of ROME CC XIX. B.C. 59. Seven hundred and nine. Year of ROME CC XX. B.C. 58. Eight hundred. Year of ROME CC XXI. B.C. 57. Eight hundred and one. Year of ROME CC XXII. B.C. 56. Eight hundred and two. Year of ROME CC XXIII. B.C. 55. Eight hundred and three. Year of ROME CC XXIV. B.C. 54. Eight hundred and four. Year of ROME CC XXV. B.C. 53. Eight hundred and five. Year of ROME CC XXVI. B.C. 52. Eight hundred and six. Year of ROME CC XXVII. B.C. 51. Eight hundred and seven. Year of ROME CC XXVIII. B.C. 50. Eight hundred and eight. Year of ROME CC XXIX. B.C. 49. Eight hundred and nine. Year of ROME CC XXX. B.C. 48. Nine hundred. Year of ROME CC XXXI. B.C. 47. Nine hundred and one. Year of ROME CC XXXII. B.C. 46. Nine hundred and two. Year of ROME CC XXXIII. B.C. 45. Nine hundred and three. Year of ROME CC XXXIV. B.C. 44. Nine hundred and four. Year of ROME CC XXXV. B.C. 43. Nine hundred and five. Year of ROME CC XXXVI. B.C. 42. Nine hundred and six. Year of ROME CC XXXVII. B.C. 41. Nine hundred and seven. Year of ROME CC XXXVIII. B.C. 40. Nine hundred and eight. Year of ROME CC XXXIX. B.C. 39. Nine hundred and nine. Year of ROME CC XL. B.C. 38. One thousand. Year of ROME CC XLI. B.C. 37. One thousand and one. Year of ROME CC XLII. B.C. 36. One thousand and two. Year of ROME CC XLIII. B.C. 35. One thousand and three. Year of ROME CC XLIV. B.C. 34. One thousand and four. Year of ROME CC XLV. B.C. 33. One thousand and five. Year of ROME CC XLVI. B.C. 32. One thousand and six. Year of ROME CC XLVII. B.C. 31. One thousand and seven. Year of ROME CC XLVIII. B.C. 30. One thousand and eight. Year of ROME CC XLIX. B.C. 29. One thousand and nine. Year of ROME CC L. B.C. 28. Two thousand. Year of ROME CC LI. B.C. 27. Two thousand and one. Year of ROME CC LII. B.C. 26. Two thousand and two. Year of ROME CC LIII. B.C. 25. Two thousand and three. Year of ROME CC LIV. B.C. 24. Two thousand and four. Year of ROME CC LV. B.C. 23. Two thousand and five. Year of ROME CC LVI. B.C. 22. Two thousand and six. Year of ROME CC LVII. B.C. 21. Two thousand and seven. Year of ROME CC LVIII. B.C. 20. Two thousand and eight. Year of ROME CC LIX. B.C. 19. Two thousand and nine. Year of ROME CC LX. B.C. 18. Three thousand. Year of ROME CC LXI. B.C. 17. Three thousand and one. Year of ROME CC LXII. B.C. 16. Three thousand and two. Year of ROME CC LXIII. B.C. 15. Three thousand and three. Year of ROME CC LXIV. B.C. 14. Three thousand and four. Year of ROME CC LXV. B.C. 13. Three thousand and five. Year of ROME CC LXVI. B.C. 12. Three thousand and six. Year of ROME CC LXVII. B.C. 11. Three thousand and seven. Year of ROME CC LXVIII. B.C. 10. Three thousand and eight. Year of ROME CC LXIX. B.C. 9. Three thousand and nine. Year of ROME CC LXX. B.C. 8. Four thousand. Year of ROME CC LXXI. B.C. 7. Four thousand and one. Year of ROME CC LXXII. B.C. 6. Four thousand and two. Year of ROME CC LXXIII. B.C. 5. Four thousand and three. Year of ROME CC LXXIV. B.C. 4. Four thousand and four. Year of ROME CC LXXV. B.C. 3. Four thousand and five. Year of ROME CC LXXVI. B.C. 2. Four thousand and six. Year of ROME CC LXXVII. B.C. 1. Four thousand and seven. Year of ROME CC LXXVIII. B.C. 0. Four thousand and eight. Year of ROME CC LXXIX. B.C. -1. Four thousand and nine. Year of ROME CC LXXX. B.C. -2. Five thousand. Year of ROME CC LXXXI. B.C. -3. Five thousand and one. Year of ROME CC LXXXII. B.C. -4. Five thousand and two. Year of ROME CC LXXXIII. B.C. -5. Five thousand and three. Year of ROME CC LXXXIV. B.C. -6. Five thousand and four. Year of ROME CC LXXXV. B.C. -7. Five thousand and five. Year of ROME CC LXXXVI. B.C. -8. Five thousand and six. Year of ROME CC LXXXVII. B.C. -9. Five thousand and seven. Year of ROME CC LXXXVIII. B.C. -10. Five thousand and eight. Year of ROME CC LXXXIX. B.C. -11. Five thousand and nine. Year of ROME CC XXX. B.C. -12. Six thousand. Year of ROME CC XXXI. B.C. -13. Six thousand and one. Year of ROME CC XXXII. B.C. -14. Six thousand and two. Year of ROME CC XXXIII. B.C. -15. Six thousand and three. Year of ROME CC XXXIV. B.C. -16. Six thousand and four. Year of ROME CC XXXV. B.C. -17. Six thousand and five. Year of ROME CC XXXVI. B.C. -18. Six thousand and six. Year of ROME CC XXXVII. B.C. -19. Six thousand and seven. Year of ROME CC XXXVIII. B.C. -20. Six thousand and eight. Year of ROME CC XXXIX. B.C. -21. Six thousand and nine. Year of ROME CC XL. B.C. -22. Seven thousand. Year of ROME CC XLI. B.C. -23. Seven thousand and one. Year of ROME CC XLII. B.C. -24. Seven thousand and two. Year of ROME CC XLIII. B.C. -25. Seven thousand and three. Year of ROME CC XLIV. B.C. -26. Seven thousand and four. Year of ROME CC XLV. B.C. -27. Seven thousand and five. Year of ROME CC XLVI. B.C. -28. Seven thousand and six. Year of ROME CC XLVII. B.C. -29. Seven thousand and seven. Year of ROME CC XLVIII. B.C. -30. Seven thousand and eight. Year of ROME CC XLIX. B.C. -31. Seven thousand and nine. Year of ROME CC L. B.C. -32. Eight thousand. Year of ROME CC LI. B.C. -33. Eight thousand and one. Year of ROME CC LII. B.C. -34. Eight thousand and two. Year of ROME CC LIII. B.C. -35. Eight thousand and three. Year of ROME CC LIV. B.C. -36. Eight thousand and four. Year of ROME CC LV. B.C. -37. Eight thousand and five. Year of ROME CC LVI. B.C. -38. Eight thousand and six. Year of ROME CC LVII. B.C. -39. Eight thousand and seven. Year of ROME CC LVIII. B.C. -40. Eight thousand and eight. Year of ROME CC LIX. B.C. -41. Eight thousand and nine. Year of ROME CC LX. B.C. -42. Nine thousand. Year of ROME CC LXI. B.C. -43. Nine thousand and one. Year of ROME CC LXII. B.C. -44. Nine thousand and two. Year of ROME CC LXIII. B.C. -45. Nine thousand and three. Year of ROME CC LXIV. B.C. -46. Nine thousand and four. Year of ROME CC LXV. B.C. -47. Nine thousand and five. Year of ROME CC LXVI. B.C. -48. Nine thousand and six. Year of ROME CC LXVII. B.C. -49. Nine thousand and seven. Year of ROME CC LXVIII. B.C. -50. Nine thousand and eight. Year of ROME CC LXIX. B.C. -51. Nine thousand and nine. Year of ROME CC LXX. B.C. -52. Ten thousand. Year of ROME CC LXXI. B.C. -53. Ten thousand and one. Year of ROME CC LXXII. B.C. -54. Ten thousand and two. Year of ROME CC LXXIII. B.C. -55. Ten thousand and three. Year of ROME CC LXXIV. B.C. -56. Ten thousand and four. Year of ROME CC LXXV. B.C. -57. Ten thousand and five. Year of ROME CC LXXVI. B.C. -58. Ten thousand and six. Year of ROME CC LXXVII. B.C. -59. Ten thousand and seven. Year of ROME CC LXXVIII. B.C. -60. Ten thousand and eight. Year of ROME CC LXXIX. B.C. -61. Ten thousand and nine. Year of ROME CC LXXX. B.C. -62. Eleven thousand. Year of ROME CC LXXXI. B.C. -63. Eleven thousand and one. Year of ROME CC LXXXII. B.C. -64. Eleven thousand and two. Year of ROME CC LXXXIII. B.C. -65. Eleven thousand and three. Year of ROME CC LXXXIV. B.C. -66. Eleven thousand and four. Year of ROME CC LXXXV. B.C. -67. Eleven thousand and five. Year of ROME CC LXXXVI. B.C. -68. Eleven thousand and six. Year of ROME CC LXXXVII. B.C. -69. Eleven thousand and seven. Year of ROME CC LXXXVIII. B.C. -70. Eleven thousand and eight. Year of ROME CC LXXXIX. B.C. -71. Eleven thousand and nine. Year of ROME CC XXX. B.C. -72. Twelve thousand. Year of ROME CC XXXI. B.C. -73. Twelve thousand and one. Year of ROME CC XXXII. B.C. -74. Twelve thousand and two. Year of ROME CC XXXIII. B.C. -75. Twelve thousand and three. Year of ROME CC XXXIV. B.C. -76. Twelve thousand and four. Year of ROME CC XXXV. B.C. -77. Twelve thousand and five. Year of ROME CC XXXVI. B.C. -78. Twelve thousand and six. Year of ROME CC XXXVII. B.C. -79. Twelve thousand and seven. Year of ROME CC XXXVIII. B.C. -80. Twelve thousand and eight. Year of ROME CC XXXIX. B.C. -81. Twelve thousand and nine. Year of ROME CC XL. B.C. -82. Thirteen thousand. Year of ROME CC XLI. B.C. -83. Thirteen thousand and one. Year of ROME CC XLII. B.C. -84. Thirteen thousand and two. Year of ROME CC XLIII. B.C. -85. Thirteen thousand and three. Year of ROME CC XLIV. B.C. -86. Thirteen thousand and four. Year of ROME CC XLV. B.C. -87. Thirteen thousand and five. Year of ROME CC XLVI. B.C. -88. Thirteen thousand and six. Year of ROME CC XLVII. B.C. -89. Thirteen thousand and seven. Year of ROME CC XLVIII. B.C. -90. Thirteen thousand and eight. Year of ROME CC XLIX. B.C. -91. Thirteen thousand and nine. Year of ROME CC L. B.C. -92. Fourteen thousand. Year of ROME CC LI. B.C. -93. Fourteen thousand and one. Year of ROME CC LII. B.C. -94. Fourteen thousand and two. Year of ROME CC LIII. B.C. -95. Fourteen thousand and three. Year of ROME CC LIV. B.C. -96. Fourteen thousand and four. Year of ROME CC LV. B.C. -97. Fourteen thousand and five. Year of ROME CC LVI. B.C. -98. Fourteen thousand and six. Year of ROME CC LVII. B.C. -99. Fourteen thousand and seven. Year of ROME CC LXX. B.C. -100. Fifteen thousand.

§. II. THO' the Fabian family was at this time odious to the Commons, on account of the late behaviour of the Consul Quintus, and his brother Cassius, who when Quæstor had been very instrumental in the destruction of Cassius, yet the Senate had influence enough, at the new elections, to get that same Cassius chosen to the Consulship, with Lucius Æmilius, a man entirely devoted to their faction. During the year of these Magistrates the attention of the publick was wholly employed on the war with the Volsci of Antium, from whom Æmilius suffered a terrible defeat with great slaughter of his men. Strengthened afterwards by a chosen body of troops which his Collegue sent to his assistance, he gained some advantage over the enemy: but as in the former action he had lost the better part of his army, he was ashamed to return to the city at the end of the Campaign, and therefore staid in his Camp till the expiration of his Magistracy. Cassius, who had been employed to defend the territories of the Latines and Hernici, came to Rome and held the Assembly for the new elections, where his younger brother M. Fabius, with Lucius Valerius (late Collegue of Cassius) were raised to the Consulship by the influence of the Senate, who had engaged them to stand for it. The People would have named to that Magistracy certain Consulars who did not seek it; but the President refused to receive suffrages for any but candidates.

The new Consuls having asked some recruits to supply the place of those which had been slain, the last year, in the battle against the Volsci of Antium, the Senate passed a decree for it: nevertheless, the poor Plebeians refused obedience, complained of the cheat put upon them in relation to the Agrarian Law, and implored the protection of their Tribunes bunes against the oppression of the Nobles. Four of the Plebeian Magistrates, either gained by the Senate, or, for prudential reasons, unwilling to foment contention at home, while the State was distressed by the present war, gave no heed to the clamours of the multitude: but the fifth, named Caius Menius, loudly protested, that he would never betray the Plebeians, nor suffer the Consuls to levy troops, till they had first brought the Senate's decree, for the partition of the lands, into an Assembly of the People, and had named commissioners for putting it in execution. The Consuls, to surmount this difficulty, erected their tribunal without the City, in some field near it, where the Tribune, whose power and functions were confined within the walls of Rome, could give them no opposition. From thence they summoned those of the Citizens whom they judged fit for the service, to come and enlist themselves. If any Plebeian so summoned refused to appear, orders were immediately given to demolish his farm-house and cut down his trees.

This unexpected exercise of the consular power had the designed effect upon the People. They now eagerly ran and presented themselves before the Consuls to receive their commands. Two armies were presently formed, one to march against the Veientes, the other against the Volsci. The Consuls, dissident of the good-will of their troops, agreed to act only upon the defensive; and M. Fabius, who had to do with the Veientes, observed the agreement: but Valerius came to a desperate and bloody battle with the Volsci, without much advantage to either side. The friends of Valerius at Rome gave out, that it was through want of affection in the soldiers to their General, he had not gained a compleat victory; the soldiers in all their letters laid the fault upon the incapacity of their Leader.

In the mean time Rome was alarmed with spectres and prodigies of all sorts, and these, together with the little success of the Roman arms, were found by the Pontifices to be owing to the anger of the Gods, who had been served by impure hands. Opimia, an unfortunate Vestal, was buried alive for incontinence, and the Gods made propitious by expiatory sacrifices.

§. III. WHEN, after the return of the Consuls to Rome, the Comitia were held for electing new Magistrates, a warm contest arose between the two orders. The Patricians were for placing at the helm certain brisk active young men, who were the most unpopular, and particularly they engaged Appius Claudius, (the son of that Appius who was looked upon as the bitterest enemy of the People) a man bold and arrogant, and very powerful by means of his numerous friends and clients, to stand one of the candidates. On the other hand, the Plebeians called out for some of the elder Senators, whose probity the publick had experienced, and who they believed would have no views, but the welfare of the state. Each party remained obstinate in its purpose. Whenever the Consuls convened the centuries for the election, the Tribunes, in virtue of their prerogative, by the word Veto dissolved the Assembly: and when the Tribunes called the People together for the same end (the first instance of their assuming this power) the Consuls, as having the sole right to preside at the election of Magistrates,

Year of
R O M E
CCLXX.

Bel. J. C.
Four hundred eighty-two.

Twenty-
seventh
Consulship

D. Hal. B.
8. P. 555.

p. 556.
Liv. B. 2.
c. 42.

D. Hal. B.
8. P. 557.

Year of ROME CCLXX. P. 549. B. 2. c. 41. strates, withstood and hindered the proceeding. The Patrician and Plebeian Magistrates mutually reviled each other, and being surrounded with throngs of botheaded fellows, they grew so furious in their disputes as not to abstain from blows; nay they seemed to be just upon the point of having recourse to arms, and beginning a civil war.

The Senate, who had neither the will to yield to the People, nor the power to force them to submission, held long debates about the proper measures to be taken. Some Senators declared for naming a Dictator who, vested with sovereign and absolute authority, should expel the factions from the City, and, in case the Consuls had taken any wrong step, correct the error; and that, having restored order in the commonwealth, he should hold the Comitia, and propose the worthiest men for the Magistracy: But others (fearing, perhaps, that the People in their present temper would not submit even to the dictatorial authority, but rather run into open rebellion) thought a gentler course the more advisable, namely, to create Inter-Kings, as was practised during the regal State upon any vacancy of the Throne. The greater number of the Fathers coming into this opinion, the short lived Magistracy was given to M. Sempronius Atratinus, and the powers of all the other Magistrates ceased. Sp. Lartius, who succeeded Sempronius, held the Comitia for the appointment of Consuls. It would seem that the two parties had compromised their differences, agreed upon the men who should have the saces, and proceeded to an election, only for form sake; for they unanimously concurred in

Year of ROME CCLXXI. P. 550. B. 2. c. 42. naming to the consular dignity C. Julius Iulus, a known favourer of the Plebeians, and Q. Fabius Vibulanus, a warm partizan of the Nobles. Fabius had been Consul three years before, and had * defrauded his soldiers of the spoil taken from the enemy; yet the People acquiesced in this his second promotion through the extreme joy they had in keeping Appius Claudius out of the Magistracy.

Twenty-eighth Consulship. D. Hal. B. 2. p. 558. L. Hal. B. 2. c. 43. The new Consuls, after surmounting some opposition, from the discontented Plebeians, to the Levies, marched against the Vientes who had pillaged the territory of Rome: and this expedition, which terminated in making reprisals, was the sole exploit of their year.

These petty wars were the ordinary expedients used by the Consuls, to divert the People from their complaints, and to give them at the enemy's cost, a subsistence that might make them forget their old claims. But this same People, by thus living almost continually in arms, became still more fierce and untractable, and the first interval of peace abroad was sure to revive discord at home.

D. Hal. B. 2. p. 559. §. IV. THE civil feuds broke out afresh at the next election of

* Dionysius says, that Fabius had not by any act disabled the Commons in his former Consulship; but in this he makes a blunder; for he himself had told us, that Fabius sold the spoils, the Prisoners, every thing that he took from the Volsi, and put all the money into the hands of the Quæstor, to be sent to Rome. And Livy is very express upon this part of Fabius's conduct, as what made him extremely odious to the People. B. 2. c. 42.

chief Magistrates. After much struggling the two parties came to an accommodation upon the same foot as the year before; each named its Consul. The People chose Sp. Furius; and the Senate Cæso Fabius *, the man, who, when Quæstor, is said to have destroyed Cassius.

The Æqui and Veientes having renewed their incursions on the lands of the Republick, the Consuls summoned the People to take arms; a Tribune, named Sp. Icilius, warmly opposed the enrollments; and he loudly declared that he would make the like opposition to all the decrees that should issue from the Senate, let the matter of them be what it would, till the Senatus-consultum, relating to the publick lands, was put in execution; that it was just the same thing to him whether the country was possessed by foreign enemies, or by domestick usurpers. In the mean while, the Veientes and Æqui continued with impunity to ravage the territory of Rome. In this perplexity, Appius Claudius represented to the Fathers, that the Tribunitian power was formidable only by the union of the Tribunes; that as the opposition of a single Tribune, which could suspend the execution of the Senate's decrees, had the same force with regard to the resolutions of his Collegues, endeavours should be used to create a division among the Tribunes, and privately to engage some one of them to enter into the Senate's interest. This advice was approved and followed; the Senators applied themselves to gain the friendship of Icilius's Collegues, and they succeeded with all the four. These, when they had first attempted in vain to dissuade him from pursuing the affair of the Agrarian Law, interposed their Veto; and, by their assistance, the Consuls compleated the Levies *.

* We must suppose that Icilius ceased his opposition to the Levies; otherwise his Collegues betrayed the prerogative of their own office.

C H A P. XVI.

§. I. The Troops commanded by Cæso Fabius, not liking their General, will not suffer him to gain any honour in the campaign. §. II. M. Fabius (a second time) and Cn. Manlius Cincinnatus are elected to the Consulate. They obtain a signal victory over the Hetrurians, chiefly by the bravery of the Fabii, who, from this time, become popular. §. III. Cæso Fabius (a third time) and T. Virginus are chosen Consuls. Cæso defeats the Æqui and Veientes. §. IV. The Fabian family undertake alone to guard the frontiers against the Veientes. Cæso, as soon as he has resigned the fasces (to L. Æmilius and C. Servilius) joins the rest of his family in quality of Pro-consul, a new invented dignity. §. V. The Romans carry on the war against the Æqui, Volsci, and Veientes. Æmilius, after a successful campaign against the last, is refused a triumph. He seeks to revenge himself on the Senate. §. VI. In the succeeding Consulship (of C. Horatius and T. Menenius) all Hetruria declares war against Rome. The miserable fate of the Fabii. The Hetrurian Arms prevail. But the next year's Consuls (A. Virginus and P. Servilius) give the enemy an entire overthrow.

Year of
R O M E
CCLXXII.

Bef. J. C.
Four hundred eighty.

Twenty-
ninth Consulship.

* The Veientes, according to
Livy, B. 2.
c. 43.

D. Hal. B.
9. p. 560,
561.

§. I. FURIUS, who conducted the war against the * Æqui, as he had the good-will of his soldiers, made a successful Campaign: But the troops of Fabius, who warred against the Veientes, (strengthened by great numbers of volunteers from the other Hetrurian States) chose rather to lose their own honour than gain him any glory. After a battle, in which they behaved themselves bravely (so long as their lives were in danger) and even routed the enemy, they refused to pursue them and take their camp, lest by making the victory compleat they should procure Fabius a triumph at his return to Rome; and, not content with this, they struck their tents the following night, and began their march towards the City. The Consul, finding it impossible to govern them, put the best face he could upon the matter, sounded a retreat, and returned with them.

Year of
R O M E
CCLXXIII.

Bef. J. C.
Four hundred seventy-nine.

Thirtieth
Consulship.

p. 562.
* A second
time.

§. II. NOTWITHSTANDING the extreme hatred which the soldiers had thus shewed to Cæso Fabius, the Senators had influence enough to continue the Consulship in the Fabian family. Marcus Fabius, brother of Cæso, was elected to that dignity * with Cn. Manlius. Much depended on the wisdom and unanimity of these two Magistrates; for the Republick was now threatened by a prodigious army of Hetrurians, who were encouraged to the war by the divisions in Rome, and the spirit of mutiny that had appeared among the Roman soldiers in the Field.

Penitificius, one of the Tribunes, would, on this occasion, have renewed the old complaint, and hindered the necessary Levies: But the Fathers successively repeated the artifice of Claudius; and forces were raised to the number of 20000, which were equally divided between the two Consuls. They both passed the Tiber, and incamped near Veii at a small distance from each other, keeping quiet within their intrenchments. This inaction was owing to their distrust of their own soldiers, whose behaviour, the last year, was not forgotten.

p. 563.

At this time happened an accident which employed the divination of the Augurs who attended the Consul Manlius. Lightning fell upon his tent, overturned the sacred Heartb, damaged his arms, killed his war horse, and some of his servants. Those Diviners declared that his camp would be taken by the enemy; upon which prediction he quitted it the same night, and joined his army to that of Fabius. The Hetrurians seized the deserted camp, and, concluding that Manlius had carried ill fortune along with him, did not doubt but they should soon be masters of the other. They came confidently, therefore, and insulted the united armies in their intrenchments, calling them women and cowards, and daring them to come out and fight. Hereupon those very soldiers, who but a little before had plotted together not to fight upon any account, now gathering in crowds about their Generals tents, murmur'd, clamour'd, and almost mutiny'd, because they were not instantly led to battle. Fabius laid hold of this opportunity to reproach them with their former behaviour, and, to increase their ardour, by expressing a diffidence of

p. 564.

Livy, B. 2.
c. 45.

D. Hal. B.
9. p. 565.

their their courage and honour. He added, "I am determined, not to give Year of the signal for battle before you have all sworn that you will return Con- R O M E querors to Rome; you once deceived your General, but you will never cclxxiii.

be able to deceive the Gods." He had hardly ended, when a certain Bel. J. C.
Plebeian named Flavoleus, now Tribune of a Legion, and a man in great Four hunesteem among the Troops, stepping forth, Do you suspect us, Consuls? dred seven-Hear then the oath which I am going to take! And you, fellow-soldiers, do you ty-nine. follow my example! Then, lifting up his sword, he swore by his Falx (the Thirtieth most solemn oath then used by the Romans) that he would never return Consulship.
to Rome till the enemy was vanquished. Officers and soldiers, every man Liv. B. 2.
in the army took the same oath; after which, the Generals no longer c. 45.
distrusting them, gave the signal for marching, and led them out of the D. Hal. B.
Camp. 9. p. 567.

The Hebrurians did not decline a battle: it was fought with great ob. p. 568.
stinacy on both sides. Manlius, who led the right wing of the Roman army, and his Colleague's brother, Quintus Fabius, who commanded the left, were both killed; nevertheless the victory fell to the Romans. And it Liv. B. 2.
was chiefly owing to the signal bravery of the Consul Marcus Fabius, and c. 46, 47.
his brother Cæso.

Marcus, at his return to Rome, declined the honours of a triumph, D. Hal. B.
which had been decreed him by the Senate; so deeply he was affected 9. p. 570.
with the death of his brother Quintus, and his Colleague Manlius. He solemnized their obsequies, made funeral orations on both, and, by giving to them the great praises which they deserved, secured to himself much greater; and, in pursuance of the resolution he had formed, from the beginning of his Consulship, to conciliate to his family the affections of the People, he divided the wounded soldiers among the Senators to be taken care of, assigning the greater number of them to the Fabii, who did not fail, on this occasion, to distinguish themselves by their humanity.
From this time (says Livy) the Fabii became popular, yet not by any arts B. 2. c. 47.
but what tended to the good of the Republick.

§. III. CÆSO FABIVS (that very General who the year before last Year of had been so grossly affronted) being now, with the hearty good-will of R O M E the Commons as well as of the Nobles, raised to the Consulship (with cclxxiv.
T. Virginius) postponed all other business, to attempt a speedy and per Bel. J. C.
fect restoration of concord between the Nobles and the Plebeians, towards Four hunwhich there seemed already to be some advances. He was hardly en- dred seven-tered on this Magistracy, when, in that view, he declared it to be his ty-eight.
opinion, that the conquered lands rightfully belonged to those men Thirtieth whose sweat and blood they were the purchase, and earnestly exhorted his Consulship.
Senate to prevent any new endeavours of the Tribunes to obtain the c. 48.
passing of the Agrarian Law, by freely making an equal distribution themselves of those lands, among the poor Plebeians. But the Conscript Fathers rejected

* This was Cæso's third Consulship, and, ver been out of the hands of one or other of for six years past, the consular fasces had ne- the three brothers.

Year of
R O M E
cclxxiv.
Bel. J. C.
Four hundred seventy-eight.

Thirty-
first Consulship.
D. Hal. B.
9. P. 573.

p. 573.
Liv., B. 2.
c. 42, 49.

D. Hal. B.
9. P. 573.

Year of.
R O M E
cclxxv.
Bel. J. C.
Four hundred seventy-seven.

Thirty-
second Consulship.
* A second
time.
p. 574.

his motion with scorn; and some of them went even so far as to say, that, intoxicated with too much praise, that active genius, and those quick parts, which had once distinguished him, were dulled and impaired.

He had better success in his military expeditions. He marched an army against the Æqui, and by the terror of his presence dispersed them without fighting. After this he hastened to the relief of the Consul Virginus, who, with the troops under his command, was surrounded by the Veientes, and, without timely assistance, must have surrendered at discretion. He delivered his Colleague out of danger, and made the enemy retire.

§. IV. NOR was this the only remarkable service that Cæso Fabius did the Republick in his third Consulship. The Romans being infested by the Veientes and other Hetrurians, who made frequent and mischievous incursions into the territory of Rome; and the Senate being greatly at a loss how to put a stop to them; Cæso, to remedy this evil, formed a project worthy of his affection for his Country. He assembled all the men of his own name and family, and proposed to them, that the Fabii should alone, at their proper expence and hazard, take upon them to secure the frontiers against the Veientes. Those generous Patricians gladly consented to the motion, and the affair being communicated to the Senate, was there approved and applauded. Early the next morning all the Fabii appeared under arms before Cæso Fabius's door. They were 306 in number, of different branches, but all originally sprung from the same stock. The whole City, men, women, and children, ran in crowds to see them, and made vows to Heaven for their preservation. Marcus Fabius, who had last year gained the battle of Veii, put himself at the head of the band, which was followed by about 4000 clients and vassals of the family: and he led them all to the banks of the Cremera, a little river which runs into the Tiber. There they built a fort in a steep place, surrounded it with a double ditch, and erected towers at certain distances. Their manner of making war was this: they divided their forces into four parts, of which one staid to guard the fort, while the other three marched into three several parts of the enemy's Country and pilaged it; and nothing could be more successful than their first expeditions.

In the mean time L. Æmilius * and C. Servilius were chosen Consuls at Rome. Cæso Fabius had no sooner resigned the Falces to them, but he desired permission of the Senate to join his family. The Conscrip't Fathers readily consented; and to gain him the more respect created for him a new office. He was made PRO-CONSUL, a title which gave the person honoured with it a power over the troops he commanded, equal to that of a Consul; but no other authority.

§. V. THE Republick being threatened with a war on the side of Hetruria, and the Æqui and Volsci beginning to ravage the Country of the Latines, the Consuls raised three armies. Æmilius led one against the

the Veientes, who were strengthened by other Hetrurians; Servilius another against the Volsci; and S. Furius (with the title of Pro-consul) the third against the Æqui. The Æqui fled at the approach of Furius. The Volsci repulsed Servilius, and forced him to keep within his camp. The Veientes were defeated by Æmilius, and sent a deputation to him to beg peace. Æmilius referred the Deputies to the Senate, and the Senate in return left it to him to settle the conditions of the treaty. Hereupon the Consul shewed the Veientes great indulgence. He granted them peace without taking any part of their lands from them, or exacting any money, or even demanding hostages. This proceeding highly offended the Senate, insomuch that they rejected his request for a triumph. Nevertheless, as he was a man of merit, he was invited to employ his troops and skill in succouring his Colleague, who was embarrassed with the Volscian war; and, upon this condition, the Fathers promised to receive him again into favour. But Æmilius, exceedingly piqued at the refusal he had met with, instead of marching to assist Servilius, returned to Rome, disbanded his own army, and recalled that which Furius conducted against the Æqui. He then complained to the People of the proceedings of the Senate, who, he said, was dissatisfied with his having expedited the peace, for no other reason, but their desire to stave off the execution of the Cassian law. Thus the angry Consul conveyed his own resentment into the minds of the People; and from that time the Tribunes renewed their invectives against the Senate, and their demand of the partition of the conquered lands.

Year of
R O M E
ccclxxv.
Bel. J. C.
Four hundred seventy-seven.

Thirty-
second Consulship.
D. Hal. B.
p. 575
576.

§. VI. SUCH was the situation of affairs at Rome, when C. Horatius and T. Menenius entered upon the Consulship. The Fabii still kept their post upon the Cremera, though after the peace with the Veientes, they had, for some time, but little opportunity of exercising their courage. But at length it was put to a fatal trial. It has been already observed, that Veii was one of the twelve Lucumonies, or petty States of Hetruria. All the other Lucumonies being much dissatisfied with that treaty, which the Veientes had made with Rome, gave them to understand, that they must either break with the Republick, or sustain a war against the rest of the Hetrurian powers united. The Veientes, in this dilemma, chose the former, and, in pursuance of that resolution, sent to the Fabii to require them to demolish their fort, and quit the frontiers. Hereupon hostilities were immediately renewed, and all Hetruria took arms against the Romans.

Year of
R O M E
ccclxxvi.
Bel. J. C.
Four hundred seventy-six.

Thirty-
third Consulship.
p. 577.

The Fabii had their usual success in every expedition and in every engagement, till one day they were unfortunately surprized in an ambush, out of which the most intrepid courage could not secure them a safe retreat. The Veientes lodged a whole army of Hetrurians in covered places, and posted centinels on all the eminences, to give notice, when they should sally out of their Ambush. Then they drove some herds of cattle into a plain at a good distance from the Cremera, as it were to feed them, under a guard that appeared to be inconsiderable. This was enough

p. 578.
Livy, B. 2.
c. 50.

YET enough to tempt the Isuri; who marched out of their fort in a great ROME body, and left no more men in it than were necessary to defend it from a surprise. They advanced in good order; and, upon their approach, the herdsman and their guard fled. Whilst some of the Fabii pursued the runaways to take them prisoners, others seized the booty; and a small number of them continued drawn up in order of battle. Immediately the Hetrurians came out of their ambush, surrounded and cut in pieces all those who were busied in driving together the cattle, dispersed about the plain. As for those of the Romans who kept their ranks, and formed a regular body, they used all their efforts to gain some eminence, where, having the advantage of the ground, they might at least sell their lives dear. But in this attempt they fell into another ambush, and were quite encompassed with enemies. Nevertheless, they did not lose their courage. Drawing themselves up into a close compact body which faced every way, they renewed the fight with more vigour than ever, still bearing forwards towards a hill which they had in view. They slew many of the Hetrurians, disengaged themselves from the rest, and gained the top of the hill. Here they passed the night without any provisions, and still beset by an army of enemies. The next morning, those of the Fabii who had been left to guard the fort, being informed of the danger their relations were in, flew to their relief, leaving but a very small number behind them. As soon as the Hetrurians perceived them advancing in the plain, they detached against them some strong parties, which cut them all off to a man. Not long after, those who were on the top of the hill, being more pressed by hunger and thirst, than by any thing else, came down with the rapidity of a torrent, to break their way through the enemy, of whom they made a dreadful slaughter. The Hetrurians, astonished at their losses, ceased the fight for some hours, and offered these brave men to let them pass, if they would throw down their arms, and give their words that they would abandon the fort. But these conditions were deemed shameful by the Fabii; they chose rather to run the hazard of dying all together with glory, than to secure their lives by an action which the thought would reflect dishonour on their family. The Hetrurians, finding them obstinate, avoided a close engagement; and, for some time, only showered darts and stones upon them. But, at length, perceiving that their swords were most of them broken, and their bucklers split, they then, and not till then, ventured to attack them, man to man. The Fabii now desperate threw themselves with fury into the midst of the Hetrurian battalions, and, to arm themselves anew, snatched away the weapons of their enemies. Nay some, who lay upon the ground half dead, rose up, and came to yield their last breath in the midst of the battle. In conclusion they were all slain. The Hetrurians cut off their heads, and, carrying them in triumph upon the tops of their lances, shewed them to those few of the Fabii who had staid in the fort. The latter, at this sad sight, gave themselves up to despair. They did not stay to fight from the ramparts; but aiming only to sell their lives dear, sallied out upon the enemy, with-

without observing any order. These likewise were all cut to pieces; so that of the 306 Fabii, not ^a one escaped. The Romans gave the name of Porta Scelerata, or, the Accursed Gate, to the Gate Carmentalis, through which the Fabii had passed when they went out of the City; and the day of their defeat was ever after reckoned among the unlucky days, whereon it was forbidden to begin an important enterprize.

Year of
R O M E
CCLXXVI.
Bef. J. C.
Four hundred seventy-six.

The Consul Menenius, who had received orders to march against the Hetrurians, might, if he had used dispatch, have delivered the Fabii in their distress. He was but thirty furlongs from the field of battle when they were cut in pieces. But, perhaps, (as it was believed by many at Rome) he designedly, and out of envy and jealousy, gave them up to destruction. He had incamped his army on the side of a hill, without securing the top of it. The victorious Hetrurians, seizing the favourable opportunity, which his want of skill afforded them, got above him, attacked him from the higher ground, gave him an entire defeat, and took his camp. Thence they advanced as far as the Janiculum, which overlooked Rome, and pitched their camp on the top of it. They then passed the Tiber, and in a manner blocked up the City. But then the Consul Horatius, who had been commissioned to act against the Volsci, being called home, came to a battle with the Hetrurians near the Temple of Hope, about a mile from Rome. The success of this action was pretty equal on both sides; but in a second, near the gate Collina, the Consul gained some small advantage, which revived the Roman courage. Nevertheless the enemy did not decamp from the Janiculum, and the lands having been left unsown the last year on account of the enemies irruptions, a famine began to be felt in the City. The meaner sort got together in companies, threatening to plunder the granaries of the rich; and the Tribunes encouraged their clamours and mutinies, by laying the present scarcity to the chief of the Senate. The Conscript Fathers did every thing possible for the relief of the poor; but the case was such, that the People must either starve, or drive the enemy farther off.

Thirty-
third Consulship.
D. Hal. B.
9. p. 581.

p. 582.

p. 583.

They marched out, therefore, under the conduct of their new Consuls, A. Virginius and P. Servilius, and gave the Hetrurians an entire overthrow; nevertheless when, by the dead bodies which were brought to Rome to be burnt, the Senate saw what numbers of Romans had perished in the action, they refused the Consuls the honour of a triumph.

Year of
R O M E
CCLXXVII.
Bef. J. C.
Four hundred seventy-five.

^a Livy, following some more ancient Historians, says, that only one of the name was left at Rome, a youth not fourteen years of age, who afterwards repaired the family, and perpetuated it; a mere fiction, according to Dionysius, and without any shadow of probability: for it is not to be imagined, that of so considerable a number of men one only had children; and we shall find, ten years after this time, that is, in 286 of Rome, a Fabius in the Consulship.

N. B. According to Dionysius there was a different account of the destruction of the Fabii, but he rejects it with contempt as wholly incredible.

Thirty-
fourth Consulship.
p. 584.
585.

C H A P. XVII.

§ I. Menenius, one of the last year's Cen's, is cited by the Tribunes to appear before the People, and answer for his conduct in relation to the Fabii. He is condemned in a fine. §. II. His successor Servilius is prosecuted as soon as he has resigned the fasces, but is honourably acquitted. War is carried on with success against several of the neighbouring States. §. III. The Censors, L. Æmilius and Vopiscus Julius, are publicly called upon by the Tribune Genucius, to name the Commissioners for the Partition of the Lands. Finding that the Censors shun meddling in that affair, he begins a criminal process against their predecessors Manlius and Furius, for having neglected the naming of those Commissioners. The trial is prevented by the sudden death of Genucius.

Year of
R O M E
ccxxxviii.
Bef. J. C.
Four hundred seventy-five.

Thirty-
fourth
Consulship.
D. Hal. B.
9. p. 586.
Liv. B. 2.
c. 52.
D. Hal. B.
9. p. 587.

§. I. PEACE abroad, and plenty in the City, being restored, the civil feuds, in relation to the Agrarian Law, presently revived. The Tribunes, not able to carry their point against the body of the Senate, turned their rage against some particular Senators, who had opposed their pretensions. Thus Menenius (the son of Menenius Agrippa) was accused before the People, by the Tribunes, Q. Corfidius and T. Genucius, of having connived at the destruction of the Fabii when he might have prevented it. He was tried for his life; and neither the earnest solicitations of the Patricians, nor his own merit, nor the remembrance of his Father's, could save him from being condemned by the People almost unanimous. The Tribunes, however, changed the penalty to a fine of 2000 Askes in money, [about six pounds sterling] a very exorbitant sum (says Dionysius) if we consider, that in those times men [of the first rank] earned the necessities of life by the labour of their hands; and that Menenius's sole patrimony was his Father's poverty. His friends would have paid the fine for him, but he would not suffer it. Unable to support his disgrace, he shut himself up in his house, where grief and vexation threw him into a distemper that soon put an end to his life.

Liv. B. 2.
c. 52.

Year of
R O M E
ccxxxviii.
Bef. J. C.
Four hundred seventy-four.

Thirty-
fifth Consulship.

§. II. THE Tribunes fell next upon Spurius Servilius, who had succeeded Menenius in the Consulship, and had gained the late victory over the Hetrurians. Scarce had he resigned the fasces to P. Valerius and C. Nautius, when a criminal process was commenced against him by the Tribunes Cedicius and Statius, for having lost the flower of his army in that action, by pursuing the enemy too far, and rashly attacking their intrenchments; and they produced both officers and common soldiers to witness the temerity of the General, and the fatal consequences of it. This was the crime pretended by the Tribunes. Perhaps the real and only crime both of him and of Menenius was the having omitted, during their their Consulships, to name Commissioners for making the desired partition of the lands.

Servilius did not endeavour, like Menenius, to ward the stroke by deprecations, or by employing the intercession of the Fathers, but, when he came to his trial, relying on his innocence and the good-will of the People, he thus addressed them: "If, Romans, I am summoned to this tribunal, to give an account of my conduct in the late war, I am willing and prepared to do it. But, if you have already pronounced Sentence against me, and I am brought hither only to be delivered up to the executioner, to what purpose should I say any thing in defence of my actions? Here is my body; do with it what you please." He said no more; and for a few moments there reigned a perfect silence in the Assembly: but the multitude calling out to him, to take courage and say what he pleased, he then proceeded to a justification of his conduct in all its parts, exposed the unreasonableness of expecting great and important victories over powerful enemies without considerable loss of men to the Conquerors; and in conclusion bitterly reproached both the Tribunes and the People with their condemnation of Menenius, and with his death, the destruction of a man, whose father had procured them those very Magistracies and laws by which they were enabled to be so wantonly cruel.

The noble confidence of the accused, together with the testimony of his Collegue Virginus, who highly extolled his conduct in the battle, and ascribed to him all the glory of the success, dispersed the storm that threatened him; and this the more easily, as the People were now heartily ashamed of the sentence they had passed against Menenius. Servilius was unanimously acquitted; and he soon after not only cleared his character from all blemish, but added a new lustre to it. A notable victory which the Consul Valerius, in this same year, obtained over the Hetrurians and Sabines, was imputed chiefly to the bravery and conduct of Servilius, who had served in quality of his Lieutenant.

A. Manlius, who, with L. Furius, was raised to the Consulate for the new year, led the victorious army against the Veientes. But these enemies durst no longer appear in the field. They shut themselves up in Ves, where, being soon straitened for provisions, they sued for peace. The Senate, to whom the Consuls referred their Deputies, granted them a truce of forty years, and, in reward of Manlius's successful, but unbloody expedition, they decreed him the honour of an ovation.

And now the Tribunes with much warmth renewed their pursuit of the great affair; nor did the condemnation of Menenius, nor the danger of Servilius deter Manlius and Furius from opposing with all their might the measures of the Plebeian Magistrates, for which opposition they were impeached very soon after they had resigned the fasces to *L. Aemilius and Vopiscus Julius.

Year of
R O M E

CCLXXXVIII.
Bef. J. C.
Four hundred seventy-four.

Thirty-fifth Con-
sulship.
D Hal. B.
9. p. 587.
& seq.

Livy. B. 2.
c. 52.
D. Hal. B.
9. p. 591.
& seq.

Year of
R O M E
CCLXXXIX.
Bef. J. C.
Four hundred seventy-three.

Thirty-
sixth Consul-
ship. p.
594. Livy, B. 2.
c. 53.
* A third time Consul.

Year of ROME CCLXXX. Ref. J. C. Four hundred seventy-two. Thirty-seventh Consulship. D. Hal. B. 9. p. 395. § III. CN. GENUCIUS, one of the Tribunes, a daring enterprising Man, and no bad speaker, called upon the new Consuls to name Commissioners for executing the Senate's decree, in relation to the publick lands. Æmilius and Julius, to elude this demand, alledged, that the Senatus-consultum in question did not regard them; that they had not been charged with the distribution of the lands; that the decree regarded those Consuls only to whom it was addressed, the immediate successors of Cassius and Virginus; that the Senatus-consulta were not permanent laws, nor of force any longer than during the Magistracies of those to whom their execution was committed.

The Tribune, enraged at this evasive answer, would gladly have attacked the Consuls directly; but as he foresaw it would be no easy matter to ruin them, while actually invested with the Sovereign Power, he turned his resentment upon Manlius and Furius, whose offices were but just expired. He cited them before the assembly of the People, to answer for their injustice in having neglected to name Commissioners for distributing the conquered lands pursuant to the Senate's decree: he said, the only way to engage the present Consuls to execute that decree was the letting them foresee, by the punishment of their predecessors, what would be their own fate if they neglected their duty: and having sworn by all that was most sacred, that he would not desist from the prosecution, he named a day for the trial.

Manlius and Furius, though they went about humbly soliciting the favour of the Plebeians, yet, by artful discourses to the younger Senators, endeavoured to engage these to defend them against the Plebeians by ways of violence. They exhorted the young men "never to aspire to the Consul's Fasces, the Robe of Magistracy, or the Curule Chair; which, they said, would be only the decorations of their funeral: That a Consul was now but a Serjeant of the Tribunes to execute their will; and in case any Consul found himself inclined to exercise his proper authority, or to assert that of the Senate, he would do well to set before his eyes the banishment of Coriolanus, and the death of Menenius."

The Senators, inflamed by these speeches, no longer held publick but private Councils; in which it was determined absolutely to rescue the accused; and, of many wicked expedients proposed, the most audacious and most wicked was the most approved.

When the day for the trial came, Genucius did not appear in the Forum. It was imagined at first, that the Patricians had found means to deter him from his purpose, and that he had deserted the cause: but presently some, who had been waiting at his door, brought word that he was found dead in his bed. The Plebeians on this report, like soldiers whose General is slain, immediately dispersed themselves; and the Tribunes were of all the most terrified; finding by the example of their Colleague, that the law, which made their persons sacred, gave them no security. On the other hand, the Patricians exulted in a most extravagant manner. None of them seemed sorry for what had happened. Nay, those those who had not been even accomplices in the murder, affected to be thought principals; and it was openly said, that the Tribunician Power ought by such methods to be kept down^a.

^a This is Livy's account. Dionysius (B. 9. p. 596.) makes the death of Genucius to have happened the day before that which was appointed for the trial. He adds, that the Tribune's body being exposed to public view in the Forum, and there being on it no marks of poison or other violence, a notion prevailed universally, that his death was a stroke from the Gods, who disapproved his enterprise: whereupon the prosecution was dropped; and the Tribunes became quiet with regard to the Agrarian Law.

Year of
R O M E
CCLXXX.
Bef. J. C.
Four hundred seventy-
two.
Thirty-seventh Consul-
ship.

C H A P. XVIII.

§. I. The haughty and imprudent behaviour of the Consuls after the Death of Genucius, in relation to P. VOLERO. The People rise; and the Consuls hide themselves. §. II. VOLERO is chosen a Tribune of the People. He proposes a Law for electing the Tribunes in Comitia by Tribes. The Disputes on this Head are interrupted by a Plague. §. III. The Senate get the Consulship for Appius Claudius and T. Quinctius. These differ about the means to defeat VOLERO's project. §. IV. VOLERO renews the proposal of his Law in an Assembly of the People. Quinctius, by soft words, disposes the People to reject it: But Appius, by a Speech, full of pride and heat, ruins the effect of what his Colleague had said. The Tribune Lætorius orders Appius to be led to prison. A scuffle ensues. Night puts an end to the Disorder. §. V. The tumult is renewed the next morning. Quinctius by prudent management quiets it, and prevails with the Senate to let VOLERO's Law pass.

§. I. THE Consuls, flushed with this ill-gotten victory, and resolving to make the People feel their power, began now to use an extreme and (at this time) most imprudent rigour in raising soldiers for the war. Whatever Citizen did not appear, upon the summons, to give in his name, was sure to be severely punished, right or wrong, and some they even caused to be whipped by the lictors. Nor in all these proceedings did they meet with any Opposition from the Tribunes, confounded and struck mute by what had happened to Genucius.

Wrathful murmurings (the prelude to revolt) presently arose among the Plebeians, more provoked by the silence of their own Magistrates, than the tyranny exercised by the Consuls, “That their liberty was gone: That the Tribunician authority had expired and been buried with Genucius: That the Commons, deprived of all assistance, must now themselves provide for their defence against the Nobles; and that this was not very difficult to do: That, though the Consuls were attended by 24 Lictors, these Lictors were all Plebeians: That imagination only made the consular Power formidable: That nothing was in reality weaker or more contemptible, if men would but learn to despise it.”

N n 2

While

D. Hal. B.
9. p. 596.
Livy, B.
2. c. 55.

Year of
R O M E
CCXXX.
B.C. J. C.
four hundred seventy-
two.
Thirty-
seventh Consul -
ship.
Livy, B.
2. c. 55.
D. Hal. B.
9. P. 597.

While with such speeches the People were exciting one another to resistance, the Consuls summoned a certain Plebeian named Publius Volero, who had been a Centurion, and was esteemed a good officer, to enlist himself for a common soldier. The young man, full of spirit, boldly refused. Instantly the Consuls sent a Lictor to seize him.---Help me, TRIBUNES! cried out Volero.---The Consuls, seeing no-body come to his aid, bid the Lictor dispatch, tear off his cloaths, and scourge him. Volero checked the haite of this officer by a blow on his face that knocked him down: and then, turning to the Consuls, he said, Since our Tribunes had rather see a Roman Citizen scourged in their presence, than be themselves murdered in their beds by you, I APPEAL TO THE PEOPLE. All the Lictors were now commanded to fall upon him at once; but, he getting into the thickest of the crowd, and calling out aloud, I appeal to the People; I implore your aid; assist me. Citizens! assist me, fellow-soldiers! no protection is to be expected from the Tribunes; they themselves have need of your protection; the multitude with a desperate fury attacked the Lictors, beat them, broke the fasces, and made the Consuls experience, that authority without strength is a vain thing: They were forced to fly for refuge to the Senate-house. Hither they summoned the Fathers, and complained to them of the audaciousness of Volero, and the insolent violence of the People. On the other hand, the Tribunes, who had hitherto been quiet, began now to make a mighty noise; they demanded justice upon the Consuls, for that, in contempt of the Lex Valeria, and of an appeal to the People, they had offered to scourge a Citizen, a Roman of free condition, as if he had been the vilest slave: A new subject of fierce dispute between the two orders in the Republick: But the elder and wiser men of the Senate, not thinking it prudent to contend with the head-strong rashness of the Commons, prevailed with the rest of the Fathers to drop their resentments; and so the tempest subsided for the present.

§. II. VOLERO, fearing the Power of the Consuls, and knowing that the Tribuneship, if he could get it, would be his best Security against their fury, stood for the office of Tribune. To engage the voices of the People in his favour, he boasted publicly, that, if ever he were invested with that Magistracy, he would take such methods, that the Plebeians should never more be oppressed by the Nobles. The multitude readily granted him their Votes; and he entered upon the exercise of his office in the Consulship of L. Pinarus and P. Furius. It was universally expected, that, to revenge himself on the last year's Consuls, who had treated him so ill, he would immediately commence a prosecution against them before the People; but he soon discovered, that, though a man of mean birth and education, he was capable of views far more extensive and important to the interest of his Party, than a mere personal revenge. Without letting fall so much as one disrespectful word against the late Magistrates, he turned his force against the whole body of the Patricians, and undertook to deprive them of the influence they had in the election of the Tribunes of the People.

Livy, B.
2. c. 56.
Year of
R O M E
CCXXXI.
B.C. J. C.
four hundred seventy-one.
Thirty-
eighth Consul-
ship.

The

The Tribunes had hitherto been chosen in Comitia by * Curia. As those Assemblies consisted only of such Citizens as resided in Rome, or belonged to the thirty Curia, Volero thought (or pretended to think) that the Senators, by the multitude of their friends, clients, and immediate dependents, had a greater influence there, than was consistent with the people's intire liberty of chusing their own protectors. Moreover, it was the prerogative of the Senate to give a previous consent, before those Assemblies could be held, and none but Patricians could preside in them. Nor was this all; for the Augurs, before any thing could be validly done, were to declare that the Auspices were favourable. Now it often happened, that these ministers of religion, Patricians by birth, did, to serve the interest of their order, either put off the holding of the Comitia, or annul the election of such Tribunes as were very obnoxious to the Nobility, under pretence that the omens were inauspicious.

Volero moved, therefore, that for the future the election of the Tribunes should no longer be in Comitia Curiata^b, but in Comitia Tributa; Assemblies

^a In what Mr. Vertot says on this occasion, and on some others, of the difference between the several sorts of Comitia, he seems to be defective in the manner of expressing himself. He commonly tells us, that in the Comitia by Tribes and by Curia every man's vote was taken singly (qu'on recueilloit les voix par tête) but that in the Centuriate Comitia the voices were counted by Centuries. From which way of speaking one would be apt to imagine, that in the two first named sorts of Comitia all affairs were decided by the majority of the Citizens assembled. But this was not the case. No question whatsoever was decided in any of the three sorts of Assembly by the plurality of single votes. The opinion of the plurality of the Citizens in each Curia, Tribu, and Century, determined the sense of that Curia, Tribu, and Century. But it was the majority of the Centuries, of the Tribes, or of the Curia, that decided the question in debate. And though, perhaps, it never happened, it was very possible to happen, that in the Comitia by Tribes, and by Curia, as well as in those by Centuries, a great majority of single voices should lose their point. For example; in the affair of Coriolanus, nine Tribes only voted for him, and twelve against him; he was therefore cast. Nevertheless, it does not hence follow, that the majority of the Roman Citizens were against him. For, if in each of those nine Tribes which voted for him, the Citizens were unanimous, and if in each of those twelve which voted against him, the Citizens were divided, and only a bare majority against him, it will hence follow that he must have had a very great majority of single voices in his favour, notwithstanding his being condemned.

^b The words of Dionysius are—τυναξαγὰν τὸν δῆμον εἰς ἐκκλησίαν, νόμον εἰσφέρει περὶ τῶν δημοκρατικῶν ἀρχαιρεσίων, μετὰ τὸν αὐτὰ ἐκ τῆς φρατρίακῆς ψηφοφορίας, ἣν οἱ Ῥωμαῖοι κατὰ τὴν καλῆσιν, ἐπὶ τὴν φυλετικὴν. Lib. ix. p. 598.

And, ten years after this time, when the law for creating DECENVIRS to form a body of Laws, &c. is in agitation, the Consuls and other eminent Patricians reproach the Tribunes with their unhallowed Magistracy, because elected in COMITIA TRIBUTA, and not, as formerly, in COMITIA CURIATA, preceded by religious ceremonies. “The Power, which you extorted from the Senate [at the treaty of re-union] have you not lost it by the change of the Comitia? For you enter on this Magistracy, without any previous Senatus-consultum; you are not chosen by the CURIAE; no sacrifices precede the holding of your Comitia; there is nothing of piety towards the Gods, or justice towards men in this Magistracy of yours. And yet you will pretend to law-making; which is one of those things, to the due performance whereof, sacrifices and religious worship were always held to be necessary.”

Εἰ δ' ἐν αὐτῇ καὶ πρότερον ἦν τις ὑμῖν δύναμις, ἣν ἐκ τῆς δικαίας βιασάμενοι ἡμᾶς ἐλάβετε, ὑποκατακλινόμενης ἐκείνης πλεονεκτήματι τῆς βουλῆς, ἔχει καὶ

Year of
R O M E
CCCLXXXI.
Bef. J. C.
Four hundred seventy-
one.

Thirty-
eighth Consul-
ship.
D. Hal B.
9 p. 598.

Year of
R O M E
CCLXXXI.
Bef. J. C.
Four hundred seventy-
one.

Thirty-
eighth Consul-
ship.

*Apud Hudf.
Dionys.

blies where the People's own Magistrates might preside; where all the Citizens of the country Tribes, as well as the inhabitants of Rome, would have a right of voting; and which would not be subject to any decrees of the Senate, or the influence of the Augurs.

καὶ ταύτην τὴν ἀπαλλέκτε τῇ μεταβολῇ τῶν ἀρχαρχεσιῶν; οὐτε γὰρ βούλη; βούμα ὅμω; ἀ-ποδοκίμωσι ἐπὶ τῇ ἀρχῇ, οὐτε αἱ φράτριάων ψῆφον ὑπὲρ ὅμων ἐπὶ φέρουσιν, οὐτε ἱερὰ προ-βουτε τοῖς θεοῖς πρὸ τῶν ἀρχαρχεσιῶν; αἱ λατ-ριαι; ἔχουσιν ἐπὶ ἀλλοτρίοις, οὐτε ὅλλο τῶν πρὸς τοῖς θεοῖς εὐσεβίαν, ἢ πρὸς ἀνθρώπων; οὐδὲν οὐδὲν ἐπὶ τῇ ἀρχῇ; τῶν ὁμετέρων γίνεται; τίς οὐκ ἂν ἐπὶ μέτεσι τῶν ἱερῶν καὶ σεβασμῶν δευμένη; [ἐπὶ [ἐπὶ, Cod. Vat.] καὶ ὁ νόμος ἦ, ἐξ ἀπαιτίας ταύτων ἀπαίτων. Lib. x. p. 630.

It is manifest that the words of these several passages, as they stand in Dionysius, do import, that the Tribunes, till this time, were chosen in Comitia by Centuries. Nevertheless the fact is disputed. For,

In the former of these passages, Glarian reads κενταριάων; instead of ἀρχαρχεσιῶν, and, in the latter, reads λαοὶ instead of φράτριάων; being of opinion, that the Tribunes, until Volero's Law, were chosen in Comitia Centuriata. And Dr. Hudson conforms his translation of the latter passage to Glarian's reading. Mantius likewise is of opinion, that the Tribunes were, at first, elected in Comitia by Centuries.

—“ Non modo Consules, qui de patribus primo creabantur, sed et TRIBUNOS PLEBIS CENTURIATIS COMITIIS ESSE FACTOS ex Livii, Lib. ii. et Dionysii, Lib. ix. plane constat; tametsi Tribunorum creationem post annos xvii a centuriatis ad Tributa, Voleronis lege esse translatam iidem Livius & Dionysius narrant. Cap. x. de Com. Rom.”

Though Mantius cites here the authorities of Liv. Lib. ii. and Dionys. Lib. ix. in support of his opinion, there is nothing in the Books referred to, nor I believe in any other books of those Historians, that can support it. Whatever good reasons the learned Critics abovenamed might have to believe that the Centuries, and not the Curiae, chose the Tribunes till Volero's Law, it seems demonstrable, that Dionysius did not mean to say so. For,

1. He relates (in Lib. vi. p. 410.) that the φράτριάων which were called Curiae, elected the first Tribunes after the treaty of accommodation on the Mons Sacer.

Νεμπείας δὲ ὁ δῆμος εἰς τὰς τότε ἔσας φρα-τριάς, ἢ ὅπως βέλεται τις αὐτὰς προσαγορεύειν, ὡς ἐκεῖνοι καλεῖται Curiae, ἀρχόντας ἐνιαυσιαίως ἀποδοκίμωσι, &c.

Plebs vero divisa, in φρατριάς, quæ tunc erant, five quocunque alio nomine velit quis eas appellare, quas illi curias vocant, annuos magistratus creavit, &c.

2. If Dionysius thought that the Centuries had chosen, to the Tribuneship, the Prosecutors of Coriolanus (men so angrily zealous against the Senate and all the Patricians) with what appearance of reason could he impute to those Prosecutors an apprehension, that the Comitia Centuriata would absolve him, should he be tried at that Tribunal; an apprehension so strong as to put them on devising a new sort of Comitia for the Trial? This argument, I confess, is not decisive; because Dionysius does not always give himself the trouble to seek an appearance of reason.

3 But what leaves no room to doubt of the Historian's meaning is this, That, but a few lines before his first mention of Volero's Bill, he tells us, that the contempt, which this man had shewn of the consular authority, was “ the principal cause which induced the Poor, the lowest of the People, to abuse him to be one of their leaders, [i. e. one of the Tribunes] he himself being of mean birth, and educated in great poverty,” ἢ δὲ ἄλλο τι μᾶλλον ἀποδειχθεὶς ὑπὸ τῶν πεινῶν δῆμον προάτης [ὅτι ὑπὸ τῶν πεινῶν τῶν δῆμον προάτης Sylb. & Port.] γένος τε γὰρ ἐκ τῶν ἐπιτυχόντων ἦν, καὶ τεθραμμένος ἐν πολλῇ ταπεινότητι καὶ ἀπορίᾳ. Lib. x. p. 597-8. Hac potissimum de causa ab infima plebe tribunus est creatus (nam erat ignobili genere natus, et in magna humilitate ac egestate educatus.) Hudson.

Now the Poor, the lowest of the people, (the sixth Class) had but one vote, of 193, in the Comitia Centuriata; and, should we extend the meaning of the words τῶν πεινῶν δῆμον to the Centuries of the fourth and fifth Classes, this will not remove the difficulty, because (as has been often mentioned) the Centuries of the first Class, consisting of the richest Citizens, made the majority of the whole: consequently the Tribunes were not chosen in Comitia Centuriata, if Dionysius's Authority is to decide the Question.

The Plebeians in general were highly pleased with this proposal, and warmly declared for passing it into a Law. The Consuls, on the other hand, the Senate, and the whole order of Patricians, opposed it with all their might. It became the common, and the only subject of dispute between the two parties; so that the affair of the Agrarian Law was for a while intirely dropt.

Year of
R O M E
CCLXXXI.
Bef. J. C.
Fourhun-
dred seventy-
one.

A dreadful pestilence which raged both in the city and in the country, interrupted the course of this furious contest. Each man being taken up with his particular losses and his own preservation, less attention was given to the business of the publick. But, this calamity proving as short as it was violent, the Tribunes quickly resumed the prosecution of the law proposed by Volero; and the People, believing they could not succeed without his assistance, continued him in the Tribuneship for the following year, in spite of the opposition of the Senate and of the whole Patrician party.

Thirty-
eighth Consul-
ship.
D. Hal. B.
9. p. 599.

§. III. THE Senate finding how strongly bent the Plebeians were upon carrying their point, and how necessary it would be to set up against Volero some man of intrepid resolution, and who was not to be terrified by the clamours and menaces of the multitude, pitched upon Appius Claudius, and raised him to the Consulate without his participation. He had been so far from making interest for that high post, that he had not so much as appeared in the Assembly on the day of election; he was proud, but without ambition, not less zealous than his father had been for the interest of the Senate, and more obstinate and inflexible. The Senate gave him for a Colleague T. Quinctius, a man naturally mild and insinuating, and who had found means to get the love of the People, though he was looked upon to be one of the principal Leaders of the other party.

Livy B. 2.
c. 56.
D. Hal.
ibid.

The new Consuls, as they were of different characters, so were they of different opinions. Appius hoping for no peace in the City, but by leading the Plebeians into the field, advised, that upon some pretence (not difficult to find while Rome was so hated by her neighbours) a new war should be immediately undertaken.

Year of
R O M E
CCLXXXII.
Bef. J. C.
Fourhun-
dred seventy.

Quinctius was against commencing any war without necessity. He said, it was to be feared, that the force which must be employed to compel those Plebeians who refused to serve, would exasperate the multitude to a desperate fury (as in the preceding Consulships :) in which case either the fire must be extinguished by the blood of Roman Citizens, or the Consuls must debase themselves to the ignominious task of courting and soothing the very lowest of the People. As Quinctius was this month in possession of the chief authority, his Colleague could do nothing without him.

Thirty-
ninth Consul-
ship.
D. Hal. B.
9. p. 600.

In the mean time Volero proposed his Law anew, and, in concert with his Colleagues, added these articles to it: That the Aediles should likewise be chosen in Comitia by Tribes, and that these Assemblies should have cognizance of all affairs which the People had a right to determine; an addition * (says Dionysius) which tended directly to destroy the authority of the Senate, and

* Vid.
supr. p.
10 232.

Year of R O M E C C I X X I I .
 Bef. J. C. Four hundred and seventy.
 Thirty-fifth Consulship.

to establish that of the People upon its ruins. The Consuls, upon this new alarm, convened the Fathers. Appius declared for arming all those Citizens, who wished the preservation of the ancient form of Government, and for treating as enemies to the state all opponents. Quintilius advised the gentler methods of reasoning and persuasion to bring the People to a sense of their true interest: The majority of the Senate coming into his opinion, the Consuls repaired to the Comitium, and desired of the Tribunes, that they would permit them to speak to the Plebeians assembled, and would name a day. With some difficulty they obtained both requests. When the day came, and the Forum was filled with a promiscuous crowd of Patricians and Plebeians, whom the Magistrates of the different orders had brought thither to support them respectively, Quintilius (leave to speak first asked and granted) made so artful, so pleasing, so engaging an harangue to the multitude, against the proposed law, that it is probable they would have rejected it, if Appius had not spoken after him.

D. Hal. B. 9. p. 601. But this Consul, who understood no way of treating men but with a high hand, instead of taking advantage of the impression which his Colleague's discourse had made in the minds of his audience, fell into invectives, which had the very same effect as the harangues of the Tribunes. He upbraided the People in the most harsh and offensive terms with their secession upon the Mons Sacer, deserting their Generals, to whom they had sworn obedience; carrying away the military standards; employing against their country those very arms, which were put into their hands for its defence: He added, that it was no wonder, if fugitive bankrupts and perjured soldiers, after being re-admitted into the city, ran every day into new disorders and excesses. That the most sacred Laws were infringed, the Consular power despised, and the dignity of the Senate debased; and that no remedy to these evils could be hoped so long as the Tribuneship, the root of all, subsisted.

And he concluded with telling them, that, as to the present affair, it was his firm determination for ever to withstand the passing of so iniquitous a Law as was then proposed, and of any Law whatsoever which had not first passed the examination and approbation of the Senate; and that he hoped to make them know during his Magistracy, if they were yet ignorant of it, what was the extent of the power of a Consul.

Livy, B. 2. c. 56. Valero, notwithstanding this provocation, still confined his discourse to the matter and merits of the Law in question, forbearing all personal attacks. But Lætorius, another of the Tribunes, fell ^a at once to railing against the Claudian family, which he termed the most haughty and most cruel enemies of the Plebeians; and he added, that the Patricians had given

^a Dionysius represents Lætorius as a long-winded Orator, who answers what Appius had said against the Commons with an ample panegyrick upon them, then makes an investive against Appius and his family, and then closes all with swearing, that he will carry his point or die.

them,

them, in Appius, not a Consul, but an executioner to rend and torture them. Words failing the rough soldier to keep pace with his angry and impetuous thoughts, he said, "Romans, I am not so ready at speaking as at doing. Come hither to-morrow. I will get the Law passed, or die upon the spot before you."

Year of
R O M E
CCLXXXII.
Bef. J. C.
Four hundred fe-
venty.

The next day the Tribunes possessed themselves of the Temple [the capitol, according to Dionysius.] The Consuls and Patricians repaired to the Assembly to hinder the passing of the Law. Lætorius bids his Viator clear the place of all who have not the right of voting: The young Nobles keep their ground: He gives orders to lay hold on some of them: Appius cries out, "A Tribune has no authority but over the Plebeians: He is not a Magistrate of the People, but of the Commons": I myself, though Consul, have no power, by the custom of our ancestors, to remove any Citizen from a publick Assembly; the form of dismissing it having always been, Depart, Romans, if you please." Si vobis videtur, discedite Quirites.

Thirty-
ninth Consul-
ship.

The Tribune, no match for the Consul at points of Law, instead of answering, sends a Viator to arrest him; Appius sends a Liçtor to seize the Tribune, crying aloud to him, at the same time, that he is but a private man, without any authority, or real magistracy. The sacrosanct person of the Tribune was just going to be insulted, when the enraged Plebeians all united at once against the Consul. Appius nevertheless stood the storm; and, as fresh crouds of Citizens flocked to the Forum from all quarters, the commotion would probably not have ended without bloodshed, if Quinctius, the other Consul, had not exerted all his soothing arts to quiet the tumult. Requesting some Consulars to force Appius out of the Assembly (if they could not persuade him to go) he endeavoured by intreaties to assuage the fury of the Plebeians, and begged of the Tribunes to dismiss the Assembly, and allow their own anger some leisure to cool. Time (he said) would not diminish their strength, but add wisdom to it. That the Senate would certainly yield to the People, and the Consul to the Senate.

Quinctius found it difficult to appease the multitude; the Consulars much more difficult to appease Appius. At length the Assembly of the Commons was dismissed; and the Consuls convened the Senate. Anger and fear, for a while, alternately dictated different counsels; but, in proportion as those passions subsiding gave place to reflection and reason, the Fathers became more and more averse from all further strife; and Quinctius had the thanks of the House for having quieted the tumultuary contest. They intreated Appius not to insist on retaining to the consular dignity any higher prerogatives than were compatible with concord in the State. He, unconvinced by all their remonstrances, "called Gods and Men to witness, that the Republick was betrayed through cowardice; that a Consul was not wanting to the Senate, but a Senate to the Consul:

B.2.c.57-

* Non POPULI sed PLEBIS eum magistratum esse. Livy, B. 2. c. 56.

Year of " That they were going to submit to Laws more destructive than even R O M E " those enacted on the Mons Sacer." Overcome, however, by the una-cclxxxiii.
 Bef. J. C. nimity of the Fathers, he acquiesced. The Law was quietly passed. Lex Fourhun- silentio perferitur^a.

dred seventy.

Thirty-
 ninth Consul-
 ship.

Liv. B.
 c. c. 53.

And now the Tribunes were chosen, for the first time, in Comitia by Tribes; and, according to Piso the Historian (quoted by Livy) the Commons, from the same time, began^b to have five Tribunes, and not before. The names of the five now elected were C. Sicinius, L. Lumitorius, M. Duilius, Sp. Idilius, and L. Mecilius.

^a The Greek Historian (B. 9. p. 603, 604, 605.) is somewhat more circumstantial than the Latins with regard to the commotion. He represents it as lasting many days. He says, that after the fray between Appius and Laetorius, in which the latter received a hurt, the Tribunes and People possessed themselves of the Capitol, and kept guard there night and day to the great terror of the Fathers. And he adds, that Quinctius, at length, prevailed with the Tribunes to refer the matter in dispute wholly to the judgment of the Senate. That there (the Tribunes present) Valerius, being called upon the first to declare his opinion, began with advising a mutual forgiveness and oblivion of all injuries done in the late scuffle; and then said, That since the Consul Appius would not permit the Law in question to be proposed to the People, without a previous decree of the Senate, he thought the Senate should take it into consideration, and make a decree thereupon. This advice was approved. Quinctius put the question: Appius spoke warmly against the Law: The Tribunes answered him: the majority of the Senate declared for the Law; and a decree was made conformable to the Sense of the House; which decree the People joyfully received; and by their suffrages the Law was enacted. Καὶ ὁ ὄντως ἀγαπῶν δειξάμενος τὸ συγχώρημα τῆς βουλῆς, ἐπέψησεν τὸν νόμον.

^b If Piso's report be true, many particulars, related by Dionysius and Livy concerning the Tribunes, must be fabulous: It may be observed, that Pighius has in no year, preceding this, inserted more than two in his Calendars.

C H A P. XIX.

- §. I. The Consuls lead two armies into the field against the Æqui and Volsci. Appius's Troops, that he may have no claim to a TRIUMPH, refuse to fight the enemy. He punishes them with the utmost severity, and returns to Rome. §. II. The affair of the Agrarian Law being revived the next year, he opposes the Tribunes with more heat than ever. They cite him before the People as an enemy to the publick liberty. He kills himself. §. III. The Tribunes resume the affair of the Conquered Lands, but drop it again till the close of the next Consulship, when no Plebeian appears in the Comitia, where T. Quinctius and Q. Servilius are chosen to that dignity. These Consuls, to keep things quiet at home, busy the People in various wars. §. IV. The domestick dissensions begin afresh in the Consulship of T. Æmilius and Q. Fabius. Æmilius favours the People in relation to the Agrarian Law. Fabius, without promoting that affair, falls upon an expedient to stop their complaints. §. V. He then takes the field, and reduces the Æqui to ask peace. The war is renewed to the advantage of the Romans. §. VI. A most dreadful Plague rages in the City. The Æqui and Volsci appear before Rome, but soon retire; and the Romans, the next year, give them an intire overthrow.

§. I.

§. I. THE Æqui and Volsci, during these divisions at Rome, had, according to their old custom, made inroads upon the territories of the Republick. The Legions raised to take revenge upon those enemies were divided between the two Consuls.

Year of
R O M E
CCLXXXII.
Bef. J. C.
Four hundred seventy.
Thirty-
ninth Consul-
ship.
D. Hal. B.
9. p. 605,
606.
Livy, B.
2. c. 58.

Appius marched against the Volsci, and carried with him into the field the same cruel and tyrannical spirit which had actuated him in the City, and to which he now abandoned himself the more absolutely as he had no Tribunes to controul him. The victory which the Commons had gained over him made his hatred to them exceed even that of his father. Though singled out by the Patricians, as the only man qualified to withstand the Tribunes, yet in his Consulship they had passed their Law, which his predecessors, with less vigorous efforts than his, had obstructed. Stung with these reflections, anger and indignation incited him to exercise towards the soldiers a rigour that had more the appearance of revenge, than of necessary discipline. Yet so obstinate a spirit of opposition to him had they imbibed, that no acts of severity could make them submissive. They did every thing slowly, lazily, negligently, contumaciously. Neither fear nor shame had any power with them. If he bade them march faster, instantly they took care to slacken their pace; if, when they were employed in any work, he urged them to dispatch, they presently became languid, though of their own accord they had been active before; their arms grew stiff. Whenever he was near, they kept their eyes on the ground, muttering curses as he passed by; insomuch that, though unconquered by the hatred of the Placians, it sometimes staggered him. Finding that no examples of punishment had any influence on the soldiers, he forbore speaking to them any more; but charged the centurions with having corrupted his army, and scoffingly called them Tribunes of the Commons, and sometimes Voleros.

The Volsci, having intelligence of all this, pressed the closer upon the Romans, in hopes of their acting the same part towards Appius, as formerly towards Cæso Fabius. And in truth they were disposed to act a worse, as they hated Appius much more than they had done the other. They did not only resolve, like Fabius's army, not to conquer, but they resolved to be conquered. The Consul had no sooner drawn them up for battle, than they turned their backs to the enemy, fled shamefully to their intrenchments, nor made any resistance till they beheld the slaughter of their rear, and the Volsci approaching to break into their Camp. Then exerting their strength courageously they repulsed the victorious Volsci; yet would do no more. They would only save the Camp, and shew their General, that they could have conquered if they had pleased. Some even exulted in the loss and disgrace they had suffered. The haughty and fierce spirit of Appius not broken by all this, but eagerly bent to punish it with rigour, he gave orders for the soldiers to assemble before his tribunal. His Lieutenants and military Tribunes, who dreaded the consequence, ran to him, begged of him not to

Year of hazard his authority by putting it to such a trial, since its whole force
 R O M E lay in the consent of those who were to obey; they represented to him,
 E. C. 221. that the soldiers in general declared, they would not assemble; that many
 E. C. J. C. called out aloud to decamp and quit the territory of the Volsci; and that Fourhun- certain appearances gave great reason to apprehend some dreadful blow ded se- from the victorious enemy, who had already been once at the foot of the venty. rampart. Appius, yielding at length to their remonstrances, (though the guilty got nothing by it but a delay of punishment) put off the Assembly, and issued orders to decamp the next morning. At break of day the signal for marching was given by sound of trumpet. The Volsci, as if roused by the same signal, fell upon the hindmost ranks of the army, as soon as it was in march: the terror and confusion, hereby caused, spread to the foremost; no orders could be heard, no troops formed for fighting; soldiers threw away their arms, Ensigns their colours; the only thought of every one was to escape by flight; the Volsci ceased to pursue, before the Romans ceased to run; nor did these rally till they came upon the lands of the Republick.

Thirty-
 ninth Consul-
 ship.

Then Appius, who during the rout had in vain called upon his men to face about, pitching his Camp where he could not be molested by the enemy, once more summoned the army to attend him. Seated in his Tribunal he upbraided them (and not without reason) with their breach of discipline and shameful behaviour; asked the Ensigns, who appeared without their colours, what they had done with them? the unarmed soldiers, what they had done with their arms? Giving full scope to his natural severity, he caused the guilty Centurions, Ensigns, and those of the private soldiers who had double allowance of provisions, to be first scourged and then beheaded; and the rest of the soldiers he decimated, that is, put every tenth man of them to death, lots determining, who should be the sufferers.

The time for electing new Consuls drawing near, Appius, universally hated by the multitude, and inwardly vexed, because he had acquired no glory, led back the wreck of his army to Rome.

In the other army, commanded by Quintius against the Æqui, the scene Liv. B. had been far different; an amiable competition between the General and •. 60. his soldiers; the strife, which should give the other the greater proofs of good-will and affection? Quintius, naturally mild and gentle, had yielded to his disposition with the more pleasure, as he observed the bad effects of his Collegue's cruel severity. The Æqui, apprised of this concord between the Consul and his troops, durst not shew themselves. Without opposition they suffered their lands to be plundered and ravaged. A richer booty had never been brought from that country; and Quintius gave all to his men. To this liberality he added praises, not less pleasing to soldiers, than rewards. They returned home in perfect good humour with their General, and, on his account, even softened towards the Patricians: the Senate (they said) had to them given a Father, to the other army a Master.

“ Thus,

“ Thus, with various fortune in war, and furious discord both at home and abroad, passed this year, chiefly memorable for the Comitia by Tribes. The affair was more considerable on account of the victory itself, than any real benefit, got by the victory. For neither the Plebeians acquired, nor the Patricians lost so much strength, as the Comitia themselves lost dignity, by the exclusion of the Patricians from the council.”

Year of ROME
CCLXXXII.
Bef. J. C.
Four hundred seventy.

§. II. L. VALERIUS and Tib. Æmilius (chosen to succeed Quintus and Appius in the Consulship) had scarce entered upon their office when the Tribunes of the Commons revived the affair of the conquered lands.

Thirty-ninth Consulship.

Addressing themselves to both the new Magistrates, they conjured them to make good the promises given by the Senate in the Consulship of Cassius and Virginus; and they succeeded with both. Æmilius favoured them (says Dionysius) from a spirit of revenge against the Senate, who had formerly refused a triumph to his father, when he returned victorious from a war with the Æqui. And, as for Valerius, he was glad of the present opportunity to soothe the People, who could not easily forgive him the part he had acted, when Quæstor, in the destruction of Cassius, the ablest Statesman, and greatest Captain^b of his time, and the first author of the Agrarian Law.

Y. of R.
283. Bef.
J. C. 496.
40th Consulship.
B. 9. P.
607.

Secure

^a Varia fortuna belli, atroci discordia domi forisque annum exactum, insignem maxime Comitum Tributa efficiunt. Res major victoria suscepti certaminis quam usu. Plus enim dignitatis Comitibus ipsis detractum est, Patribus ex Concilio submovendis, quam virum aut Plebi additum, aut ademptum Patribus. What is said here of the Exclusion of the Patricians from the Assemblies by Tribes, is not to be understood generally of all such Assemblies; for the Patrician Magistrates held Assemblies by Tribes as well as the Plebeian. However, it appears by this passage of Livy, that to the Assemblies by Tribes for the election of Tribunes the Patricians were not to be admitted. Manutius cites the passage as decisive for this.

^b Perhaps the reader, when he calls to mind Coriolanus, will wonder why the Historian makes Cassius the greatest General of his time; and I cannot resolve the difficulty, otherwise than by supposing, that he speaks only of the time when Cassius was killed; that he was then the ablest General in the Republick. By the way, it is somewhat surprising, that, when the Romans were so grievously distressed by Coriolanus, they made no use of the abilities of Cassius: we hear nothing of him during all that war. Why did not they raise him to the Consulship when they most wanted such a General?

And this naturally leads me to mention another difficulty which frequently occurs in the Roman story. The Consuls were always chosen in Comitia by Centuries; and the Patricians are often represented as having all power there. Thus, for instance, Livy, on occasion of the contest about Volero's bill:—Plebs Voleronem tribunum reficit. Patres ad ultimum dimicationis rati rem venturam, App. Claudium, Appii filium, jam inde à paternis certaminibus invisum infestumque plebi, consulem faciunt. Liv. L. 2. c. 56.

One would imagine, from these words, that the creation of the Consuls was as much in the power of the Senate and Patricians, as the creation of the Tribunes was in the power of the Commons. Yet we find, that in the Comitia Centuriata the Plebeians often prevailed to have those Candidates promoted, whom they liked best, and who were known to favour the popular cause. May we not resolve this difficulty, by saying, that the Commons were always masters in the Comitia Centuriata, when they pleased to exert their strength; but that, generally speaking, they had so much respect for the old Patrician families, as to leave to them the Nomination of persons to fill those Magistracies, to which no Plebeian could lawfully be admitted? That nevertheless, when any matter, which greatly concerned

Year of ROME 507. Ref. J. C. Four hundred forty-nine. Fortieth Consulship. D. Hal. B. 9. p. 607. Secure of the two Consuls, the Tribunes brought the affair before the Senate, and in gentle, but pressing terms, urged the Conscripſt Fathers to suffer the nomination of Decemvirs for regulating the partition of the lands. The Consul said nothing upon the subject, but asked the opinions of the rest of the Senate, beginning with Æmilius's Father. This ancient Consular declared, he thought nothing could be more unjust, than that a few private men should possess the publick estate; that those usurpers ought to be very well content with having held the lands several years without molestation. That, not to speak of the natural right which all the Citizens of a state have to share in what belongs to the publick, the Senate was particularly engaged by their own decree, made 17^e years ago, to divide the conquered lands among the People. He added, That the poor Plebeians dreaded the thoughts of having children, to whom they could leave nothing but their own wretchedness for an inheritance; instead of cultivating each the portion of land concerned the interest of the whole Plebs and body, was depending, they then took advantage of their superiority to have one popular Patrician, at least, in the Consulship. The Tribunes with their insolent Veto, and the Senate, with their Knawish Augurs, could throw obstructions in the way of each other's purposes at these Elections. And it seems, as if they therefore frequently compromised the matter. Let us have one Consul (said the Tribunes) such as we like, and you shall name whom you please for the other. Thus, in the instance just mentioned, the Colleague given to Appius was T. Quinctius, a popular man: otherwise, it is highly probable, that the Plebeians would have opposed and hindered the Election of the other, their known and avowed enemy.

Nothing, here said, will account for the neglect shewn of the abilities of Cassius when they were most wanted; because he is represented as a man agreeable to both parties, till his proposal of the Agrarian Law. But doubtless, with regard to the Consuls of the year 263, the case was, that the Plebeians departed from their usual complaisance for the Senate, as thinking the interest of the Plebeian order particularly concerned at that time in the choice of the governing Magistrates. (See p. 212.) And the same was doubtless the case, when Consuls were chosen for the present year. For I apprehend that both Valerius and Æmilius were known to be favourers of the people before their election to the magistracy; and that the reasons, assigned by Dionysius, why they sided with the Tribunes in relation to the Agrarian Law, are mere conjectures of his own. To believe that Valerius took part with the People from the motive mentioned in the text, we must first believe the story of Cassius's being impeached before the People by Valerius and his brother Quaſtor, which, I think, has been shewn to be a groundless tale. It does not appear that Valerius had any hand in the death of Cassius.

And as to Æmilius's resenting the refusal, his father had received eight years before, (in his second Consulship 275) from the Senate, of a Triumph, I conceive the refusal itself to be fabulous, as likewise all that Dionysius says of the petitioner's anger, and his immediately revenging himself by declaring for the Agrarian Law: I conclude, I say, the whole to be fabulous, not only because Livy says nothing of these things, but because we find Æmilius the father raised a third time to the Consulship in 280, and as warm against the pretensions of the People, as the Senate could wish him. And it seems very probable that both father and son (in imitation of the Fabii, (see p. 250.) now sided with the Tribunes in order to recover to the family the good-will of the Plebeians, which they must have lost in the former part of the Father's third Consulship; during which the Tribune Genucius was murdered, and the Plebeians insulted in the person of Volero. That Æmilius the father presently repented of what he had done in relation to Volero and made his peace with the Tribunes, there seems good ground to believe, since we find that stormy affair hushed at once, each party dropping their complaints.

i. e. The year 267, when the decree was made, and the present year 283, inclusive.

that

that belonged to him, they were obliged to work for subsistence, like slaves, on the estates of the Patricians; and that this servile way of life was not very proper to form the courage of a Roman. “My opinion therefore is, that our Consuls do now execute the Senate’s decree, the execution of which has been hitherto delayed on account of the unquietness of the times, and that they name Decemvirs, to make the partition of the conquered lands.”

Appius opposed this advice. He said, that the People could lay the blame of their misery upon nothing but their own intemperance and prodigality; that the Consuls had frequently divided among them the booty got in the territories of their enemies, and, upon a thorough inquiry, it would appear, that those who had received the greatest share of it were the poorest. That till their manners were mended no largesses could free them from poverty. That it would be very monstrous if the Senate should grant rewards to men who had behaved themselves so shamefully in the field, as they had done the last year when under his command. That it never was the intention of the Senate to divide the lands among the People; that their sole view in granting the Senatus-consultum, which Æmilius spoke of, was to put off the affair, in order more easily to quiet the commotion, raised by the Consul Cassius: That his immediate successors in the magistracy, to whom the decree was directed, had taken no notice of it, as thinking the partition in question would be mischievous to the Republick. That afterwards, during fifteen years successive, the Consuls of none of those years, though in continual danger from the resentment of the People, had thought themselves authorized to name Decemvirs in virtue of a decree directed only to the immediate successors of Cassius and Virginus. He added, “Nor have you therefore, Valerius, nor you, Æmilius, any authority to name Decemvirs for the partition in question, the Senate having given you no commission to do it. As to those who have usurped the publick lands, whether by force or fraud, if such men there be, let them be summoned to appear before the Consuls, and let their titles be legally tried and determined. There is no want of new Laws for this, we have Laws already written; and they are not obsolete; time has formed no prescription against them.”

Year of
R O M E
ccclxxxiii.
Bef. J. C.
Four hundred sixty-nine.

Fortieth
Consulship.
D. Hal. B.
9. p. 608.

The

^a It should be 14 years, the year of Cassius, the year of his immediate successors, and the present year being excluded by the context.

^e Mr. Vertot, I know not why, always speaks of the resumption of the lands either as a thing impracticable; or as not to be executed without ruining the Senate and all the great men; objections never made by those who opposed the AGRARIAN LAW. Appius Claudius himself, tho’ against the partition, declares for the resumption; and so did his Father in Cassius’s time, as likewise Sempronius, who are the only persons mentioned by Dionysius, as then speaking on the subject in the Senate.

Tho’ the younger Appius now declares for the resumption, as Mr. Vertot himself (following Dionysius) relates, yet Mr. Vertot represents this Appius saying, that the Senatus-consultum was granted only to give the People time to see the injustice, and even impossibility of what they demanded, pour donner le tems au peuple de reconnoître l’injustice & même l’impossibi-

Year of
R O M E
ccxxxviii
Bef. J. C.
Fourhun-
dred
sixty-
nine.

The majority of the Senate came into the opinion of Appius; so that the request of the Tribunes was rejected; who thereupon, enraged at their disappointment, turned their thoughts wholly to revenge themselves on the author of it; and they agreed to bring him to trial^a for his life before the People. They named a day for it, and exhorted all the

Fortieth
Consul-
ship.
D. Hal. B.
9. p. 610.

possibilité de leurs prétentions. This impossibility can relate only to the resumption; the partition admitted of no difficulty. And what made the resumption so difficult? We have the Abbot's reasons, where he speaks of this affair in the time of Cassius: Quelque apparence d'équité qu'eut la proposition de Cas-sius, on ne pouvoit en faire une loi sans ruin-er tout d'un coup le Senat & la pro. ci. de l'Etat, & sans exciter une infinité de procès en garantte parmi toutes les familles de Rome. Why? Les Patriciens qui s'en étoient emparés [par les esconquises] les avoient enfermées de murailles: on avoit élevé au dessus des bâtiments des troupees d'éclaves faits des prisonniers de guerre les cultivoient pour le comte des Grands de Rome, & déjà une longue Prescription couvroit ces Usurpations. Les Sénateurs & les Patriciens n'avoient gueres d'autres biens que ces terres du public, qui étoient passées successivement en disferentes familles par succession, par partage, ou par ventes. Tom. 1. p. 268. 3d Ed.

I cannot find any authority Mr. Veret has for saying that the Senators and Patricians had hardly any estates but what they had got by usurping the lands belonging to the publick. But, when he speaks of their usurpations being covered by long prescription, he seems totally to forget the time of which he is writing, the year 267 of Rome. By his own account (p. 64.) these usurpations did not begin till after the Regifuge (in 244 of Rome) 23 years before Cassius proposed the Agrarian Law. And there is no reason to believe that these usurpations began till after the year 257, when Tarquin died; which Livy makes the date whence the Aristocra-tical domination commenced, and which was just ten years before Cassius proposed the A- grarian Law. The Republick was reduced to a very low condition after the banishment of Tarquin, by the desertion of all her Allies; nor, till the defeat of the Latines in 257, had the quiet possession of land enough for the Patricians to form out of it such considerable estates for themselves, as Mr. Ver- et supposes them to have. So that his difficulties arising from sales, and conveyances, and inheritances, and long prescription, are all a dream.

^a Ἐπειδὴ ἔχοντο πολλὰ βουλευσάμενοι, δὴ καὶ τοὺς Ἀππίου ἐπαγαγόντες ἅπαντες ἐχόντες τὸ τιμή-μα. καὶ μετὰ ταῦτα ἐς ἑκατὸν τὴν ἡμέραν κατήγεσσαντες, παρεκαλοῦντες ἅπαντας εἰς τὴν ἀγορὴν ἐπὶ τῇ ἡμέρᾳ, ὡς δὲ τότε τὰς ἀγορὰς αὐτὸν ἦν. D. H. L. ix. p. 610.

When any Magistrate designed to impeach a person of a crime before the whole people, he ascended the Rostra, and, calling the people together by a crier, signified to them, That upon such a day he intended to accuse such a person of such a crime: This they termed Reclamare: The suspected party was obliged immediately to give sureties for his appearance on the day prefixed, and, in default of bail, was committed to prison.

On the appointed day, the Magistrate again ascended the Rostra, and cited the party by the crier; who, unless some other Magistrate of equal authority interposed, or a sufficient excuse was offered, was obliged to appear, or might be punished at the pleasure of the Magistrate who accused him. If he appeared, the accuser began his charge, and carried it on every other day, for six days together, at the end of the indictment mentioning the particular punishment specified in the Law for such an offence. This intimation they termed Inquisitio. The same was immediately after expressed in writing, and then took the name of Rogatio, in respect of the people, who were to be asked or consulted about it; and Irrogatio, in respect of the criminal, as it imported the mulct or punishment assigned him by the accuser. This Rogatio was publicly exposed three Nundinae or market-days together, for the information of the people. On the third market-day, the accuser again ascended the Rostra, and the people being called together undertook the fourth turn of his charge, and, having concluded, gave the other party leave to enter upon his defence, either in his own person, or by his advocates.

At the same time as the accuser finished his fourth charge, he gave notice what day he would have the Comitia meet to receive the bill; the Comitia Tributa to consider of mulcts, and the Centuriata for capital punishments.

But

the Citizens to be present. The articles of the impeachment, according to Dionysius, were to be, 'That he had given pernicious advice against the People; raised sedition in the State; offered violence to the sacred persons of the Tribunes; and, when commander of the army, had suffered an ignominious defeat and a terrible slaughter of his soldiers. Never, says Livy, was a man, whom the Commons so much hated, summon'd to appear in judgment before the People: Nunquam antè tam inivisus PLEBI reus ad iudicium vocatus POPULI est; nor did ever the Patricians exert themselves so much in behalf of any man as of Appius, the defender of the Senate, the asserter of its dignity, its support, its bulwark against all Tribunician and Plebeian tumults, and now exposed to the rage of the Commons, only for having been too warm in the contention.

Appius himself was, of all the Patricians, the only man who despised the Tribunes, and the Commons, and the impeachment. Neither the menaces of the Plebeians, nor the intreaties of the Nobles, could move him to depart from his accustomed manner of speaking, and soften the asperity of his style. Once he pleaded his cause, but more like an accuser, than a person accused; the same resolute, haughty, disdainful look he was wont to have; the same spirit in his discourse, full of reproaches and invectives: insomuch that many of the Plebeians feared him no less now when arraigned at the Bar, than they had done when he was Consul. His intrepidity and steadiness so astonished and disconcerted the Tribunes, and the Commons, that, of their own motion, they adjourned the cause to another day. Before this came, Appius * put an end to his own life. When his son, who brought the dead body into the Forum, was beginning to pronounce a funeral oration on the deceased, the Tribunes endeavoured to silence him; but the people more moderate and equitable interposed, and would not suffer that so great a man should be hindered from receiving that customary honour; and Livy adds, that they heard him praised, when dead, with as willing an ear, as they had heard

But, in the mean time, there were several ways, by which the accused party might be relieved; as first, if the Tribunes of the Commons interposed in his behalf; or if he excused himself by voluntary Exile, Sickness, or upon account of providing for a Funeral; or if he prevailed with the accuser to relinquish his charge, and let the cause fall; or if upon the day appointed for the Comitia the Augurs discovered any ill omens, and so forbad the Assembly. Kennet, Part II B. III. chap. XIX.

Vobismet ipsis, Pontifices, et vestris liberis, ceterisque civibus, pro vestra auctoritate, et sapientia consulere debetis. Nam, cum tam moderata judicia populi sint à maioribus constituta: primùm ut ne pœna capitis cum pecunia conjungatur; deinde ne, nisi pro dicta die, quis accusetur: ut ter antè magistratus accuset, intermissa die, quam multam irroget, aut judicet: quarta sit accusatio trinùm nundinùm pro dicta die, qua die iudicium sit futurum: tam multa etiam ad placandum, atque ad misericordiam reis concessa sunt: deinde exorabilis populus, facilis suffragatio pro salute: denique etiam, si qua res illum diem aut auspiciis, aut executione sustulit: tota causa iudiciumque sublatum est. Hæc cum ita sint in re, ubi crimen est? ubi accusator? &c. Cic. pro Dom. 17.

VOL. I,

* Livy reports that he died of some distemper, and Dionysius says, that it was so given out by his friends, but that in truth he killed himself.

The Greek Historian does not admit that Appius ever pleaded his cause before the People.

P p him

Year of
R O M E
ccclxxviii.
Bef. J. C.
Four hundred sixty-nine.

Fortieth
Consul
ship.

Livy, B.
2. c. 61.

Ibid. &
D. Hal. B.
9. p. 611.

Year of R O M E him accused, when living; and that a numerous crowd of them attended his obsequies.

ccxxiv. §. III. THE Romans, during the remainder of this year, were employed in revenging themselves on the Æqui and Sabines, who, taking advantage of the civil feuds at Rome, had made incursions on the territory of the Republick.

Forty-first Consulship. D. Hal. B. 3. p. 611. Liv. B. 2. c. 52. Liv. B. 2. c. 53. In the following Consulship of Aulus Virginus and T. Numicius, the business of the Agrian Law was resumed. An alarm from the Volsci suspended the prosecution of it, but, in the end of the year, it was again set on foot. And the multitude, who looked upon themselves as oppressed by the great, to shew their resentment, absented themselves from the Assembly, where T. Quinctius * and Q. Servilius were chosen Consuls for the next year. They were raised to that dignity by the sole voices of the Patricians and their clients, who, notwithstanding all these divisions, constantly adhered to the party of their Patrons.

To prevent the breach from growing wider, the new Consuls, during all their year, busied the people in various wars. Servilius had great success against the Sabines; yet his glory was not equal to what Quinctius gained by his victories over the united forces of the Æqui and Volsci. In the heat of a battle, and when he was like to be worsted through the enemies superiority in numbers, to encourage his left wing to exert themselves, he told them that his right wing was victorious, and by that means he made his left really so. He then hastened to the right wing, and informed them of the advantages which his left had gained, and, by this artful conduct, he put the enemy intirely to the rout. He defeated them a second time, and then took from the Volsci the City of Antium, with its whole Territory.

time Conf. Liv. B. 3. c. 1. D. Hal. B. 3. p. 613. §. IV. THE complaints of the Commons and the dissensions at Rome began afresh in the Consulship of Tib. Æmilius and Q. Fabius. (The latter was son of one of those three famous brothers who had commanded in the Fort upon the Cremera.) We have already seen that Æmilius in his first Consulship had declared for the Partition of the Lands: the affair was now again debated in the Senate: Æmilius persisted in his former opinion. But the majority of the Senators, and especially those who were in possession of the publick lands, complained much of the liberality of Æmilius, whom they reproached with making his Court to the People at the expence of others. His Colleague Fabius, to quiet the dispute, proposed an expedient which at first displeased neither Party. It was to send a considerable number of the poorest Plebeians to people the City of Antium, which had been almost depopulated by the last war; and to divide among them some adjacent lands, taken from the Volsci. This advice being received with applause, T. Quinctius, A. Virginus, and P. Furius, were without delay commissioned to settle the colony. But, when the poor Citizens were to give in their names to those Triumvirs to be inrolled, few of them appeared. To send them to such distant habitations (they said) was banishing them from their country.

And

And they chose rather to live at Rome in indigence, with the hopes of one day getting a share of the publick lands, than to be actually in possession of land elsewhere; so that the Triumvirs, to make up the number appointed for the colony, were forced to receive a mixed crowd of Latines, Hernici, and Volsci.

§. V. AND now Fabius marched an army against the Æqui, and Æmilius another against the Sabines. The expedition of the latter had nothing remarkable in it; but the Æqui submitted to Fabius, first bought a truce very dear, and then obtained a peace, on the condition of being subject to the Republick.

Nevertheless, the next year in the Consulship of Sp. Posthumius and *Q. Servilius, some of the Æqui joined the old inhabitants of Antium (who being deprived of their lands had taken refuge among them) and ravaged the Territory of the Latines. These faithful Allies of Rome were not allowed to arm in their own defence, nor would the Romans send their troops to defend them. The Senate chose rather to appoint a deputation to the Council of the Æqui; and Fabius, who had made the peace with them, was at the head of the embassy. He perceived by the indirect answers they made to his demands, that they had no intention to give the Republick satisfaction, but only to amuse him. Under pretence therefore of visiting their temples and publick buildings, he examined their magazines of arms and provisions, some of which he found full, and others filling. The report he made at his return of the preparations for war, which the Æqui in conjunction with the fugitive Antiates were carrying on, induced the Republick to chuse two Consuls for the next year, whose names were formidable to those two Nations, *T. Quinctius who had conquered Antium in his second Consulship, and Q. Fabius, who had forced the Æqui to sue for peace in his first. Fabius, who was ordered to march against the Æqui, tried first in vain to reduce them by negotiation. The two Consuls then joined their forces, and came to a bloody battle with the enemy, near Algidum, fifteen miles from Rome, but with little advantage to either side.

In the following Consulship of A. Posthumius and Sp. Furius, men little skilled in the business of war, the latter commanded the army against the Æqui, while the former staid behind to cover the Country. Furius incamped imprudently, engaged rashly with the enemy, and was defeated; after which he was so closely besieged by them in his camp, that not a man could go out to give notice at Rome of his danger. However, the Senate had advice of it, and, in so great a distress, resolved upon an expedient, never used but in cases of extreme peril. They gave up the Roman Government absolutely into the other Consul's hands, by these words: Let the Consul take care that the Republick suffer no detriment. Vi-deret Consul nequid Respublica detrimenti caperet. Posthumius, who received this commission, made all take arms who were able, and gave T. Quinctius the command of the army, with the title of Proconsul. As soon as Quinctius came within sight of the invested camp, the

Year of
R O M E
CCLXXXVI.
Bef. J. C.
Four hundred sixty-six.

Forty.
third Consul-
ship.
Livy, B.

3. c. 1.
D. Hal. B.
9. p. 616.
Y. of R.
287. Bef.
J. C. 465.
44th Con-
sulship.

* A second
time
Conf.
D. Hal. B.
9. p. 617.

Y. of R.
288. Bef.
J. C. 464.
45th Con-
sulship.

* A third
time
Conf.
D. Hal. B.
9. p. 618.

Liv. ibid.
c. 2.
Y. of R.
289. Bef.
J. C. 463.

46th Con-
sulship.
D. Hal. B.
9. p. 619.
& seq.

Livy, B.
3. c. 4.

Year of Æqui left the attack, and retired in haste; but Furius had before made ROM E a sally, in which his brother L. Furius and two Cohorts, consisting of cccxxxix. a thousand men, had been surrounded by the enemy and all slain, having Def. J. C. chosen rather to die fighting, than surrender their arms. The Consul, be-Four hundred ing now equal in numbers to the enemy, acted upon the offensive, and five- obliged them to retire into their own Country. Posthumus likewise at-three. tacked a considerable body of their pillagers loaded with spoil, and made a great slaughter of them: And by these successes Rome was again in tranquillity.

§. VI. BUT the next year, when P. Servilius Priscus and L. Æbu- Consal- tius Eius held the Consulship, a dreadful Plague swept away a multi-Livy, B. tude of the Roman Citizens of both orders. The dead were so nume-
 3. c. 5. rous, that the living threw them into the Tyber, without burial. Upon
 Year of the news of this mortality, the Æqui and Volsci entered into a league ROM E against Rome, which they proposed to besiege. They began the war cccxc. with committing hostilities in the territories of the Latines and Hernici.
 Def. J. C. Their allies applied to the Roman Senate for succour; but their de-Four hun- puties found Æbutius breathing his last, and Servilius not far from dred- death. However the latter made himself be carried to the Senate-sixty- House, whither some of the Senators likewise, half dead, were carried
 two. in litters: but all they could do, was to give leave to the Allies to arm and defend themselves, and to promise them assistance in better times.
 Forty-se- The Latines and Hernici, not in a condition to take the field, shut them-venta selves up in their towns, and left their country open to the ravages of Consal- the enemy, who at length appeared before Rome. Both the Consuls were Livy, B. now dead, and the greater part of the Tribunes; the Plague had carried
 9. p. 623. off one fourth part of the Senators, and the rest with the other Nobles Livy, B. were most of them sick. The care of the Republick had devolved upon
 3. c. 6. the Ædiles.

D. Hal. B. Notwithstanding so many calamities, the Romans seemed to have lost 9. p. 624. nothing of their wonted steadiness. They crept to the ramparts, and put a good face upon their affairs. Those of the Senators who were able mounted the guard and stood Centinels; and the City was strong on every side. The Æqui and Volsci at length abandoned their ^b project of a siege, and marched their forces towards Tusculum.

Livy, B. In the mean time, the Plague still raging, the People turned their
 3. c. 7. thoughts to divine assistance; all made their vows upon the altars; the women swept the Temples with their hair, and continued prostrate in the

^a It is not absolutely certain in what month of the year the Consuls entered upon their Office, from Brutus to this time. Livy tells us that Servilius and Æbutius entered upon the Consulship the first of August. It will appear in the sequel of this History, that, down to the 600th year of Rome, the Consular years began in different months, sometimes in July, sometimes in December, and sometimes in March. Afterwards they began the first of January, and continued so to do as long as the Republick lasted. Reuillé.

^b Livy represents the enemy as quitting the enterprise through fear of the infection; D. Hal. as repulsed by the Romans.

presence of the Gods. From this time (says Livy) the pestilence gradually abated; and the Citizens recovering health and strength began to apply themselves to affairs. Several Inter-Kings were successively appointed to govern the State. Valerius, the third day of his administration as Inter-Rex, named Lucretius Tricipitinus and T. Veturius Geminus Consuls. They entered on their Magistracy before the middle of August.

Year of
R O M E
ccxci.
Bef. J. C.
Four hun. dred
sixty-one.

Dionysius reports, that one of the Tribunes would have immediately revived the affair of the conquered lands; but that the People chose to defer it to a more convenient season, being now intirely bent to revenge the insults they had suffered from the Æqui and Volsci the last year. Even those Citizens, whom the Laws exempted from going to war, neglected their privileges, and voluntarily enlisted themselves for the service; so that the Consular Armies were presently formed. It was Lucretius's fortune to engage with the confederates, and give them a dreadful overthrow; they lost 13460 men in the battle and in their flight after it; and they were soon after defeated again by the forces of the two Consuls united. And thus the Republick was restored to her former flourishing condition.

Forty-
eighth Consul-
ship.
Livy, B.
3. c. 8.
D. Hal. B.
9. p. 625.

C H A P. XX.

§. I. During the absence of the Consuls from Rome, Terentius Arsa, one of the Tribunes, proposes to the People, that there should be an establishment of FIXED LAWS to be the RULE to the Magistrates in deciding causes between man and man. §. II. Q. Fabius, Governor of the City, warmly opposes it. Terentius suspends the pursuit of his design, and, after the arrival of the Consuls at Rome, drops it intirely. §. III. But the affair is revived in the succeeding Consulate of P. Volumnius and S. Sulpitius. Great contests about it. A stop put to the dispute by prodigies and ill omens. §. IV. The Law is again proposed. The contending parties come to blows. Quinctius Cæso, the son of Quinctius Cincinnatus, is cited before the Commons for the violent part he had acted in those scuffles. §. V. His uncle T. Quinctius and his father L. Quinctius plead for him. He is falsely accused of murder. The decision of the cause is deferred to another day; before the coming of which, Cæso banishes himself.

§. I. WHILE Veturius and Lucretius were in the field, pursuing the advantages they had gained over the Æqui and Volsci, a certain Tribune of the Commons, named C. Terentius^a Arsa, took the favourable opportunity of the absence of those Magistrates to propose a new Law of great importance to the People, and tending much to diminish the power of the Nobles.

During the Regal State of Rome the sole will of the King had been instead of Law in all private causes. As the Consuls succeeded to the regal power, they likewise succeeded to the prerogative of distributing justice,

D. Hal. B.
10 p. 627.

^a Livy calls him Terentillus.

Year of by themselves or their Patrician Substitutes. A few, and but few, Rules
 R O M E of Law were written; and these were in the sacred books to which Patri- ccxcxi. cians only had access. The People in general, wholly occupied in culti-Ref. J. C. vating the lands, and rarely coming to town but on market-days about
 P. 2. 2. 2. their domestick concerns, or to be present at the Comitia and other pub-and lick Assemblies, holden only on those days, were intirely ignorant of the 5. 6. 9. science of Law.

Terentius, in his harangue to the People, urged with great vehemence that the Consular Authority was excessive, and insupportable in a free City. That the Consuls, independent and uncontrolled themselves, turned all the terror and penalties of the Laws against the Plebeians. That the State, by the erection of the Consular Magistracy in the place of the Regal, had only got two Kings instead of one. "But, (he added) to put " an end to this despotick sway of the Consuls, he would prefer a bill for " empowering five of the best men in the Republick to form a body of " Laws, whereby those Magistrates should themselves be governed, so " that for the future they should not give their will for Law, nor exer" cise any authority over their fellow Citizens, but what those very Citi" zens should intrust them with."

§. II. THE Nobles (says Dionysius) were terribly alarmed with the danger of being constrained to have regard to Laws in their administration of the publick affairs. Q. Fabius,^a who had been twice Consul, was at this time Governor of the City. He convened the Senate, and inveighed in such terms against both the bill and its Author, that the Consuls themselves, had they been present, could not have fallen upon the Tribune with greater fury, or employed more dreadful menaces.
 He charged Terentius with taking advantage of the absence of the Consuls to strike at the very being of the Republick; adding, "That if,
 " the year before, while the Plague made such havoc in the City, and " foreign enemies laid waste the territory of Rome, the Gods, in their " wrath, had permitted a man, like him, to be in the Tribuneship, the " commonwealth must have sunk under her heavy calamities: That,
 " doubtless, after the death of the Consuls he would have preferred bills
 " for abolishing the Consular Government, and, in case of failure in that " enterprise, have come at the head of the Æqui and Volsci to besiege
 " and assault the City."—Then, addressing himself to the other Tribunes, and softening his style, he earnestly intreated them to engage their Collegue to suspend the prosecution of his design, till the arrival of the Consuls. The Tribunes complied, and even did more than was asked; for they prevailed with Terentius (as we shall presently see) to drop the business in reality, though in appearance it was only deferred. The Consuls were sent for home.

Lucretius brought with him to Rome a prodigious booty; and the

1. 1. 1.
 ibid.
 6. 10.

^a Mr. Vertot calls this Fabius a man invincible attached to the Laws and Constitution of the Republick. We shall find him, by and by, one of the Decemvirs who attempt to establish themselves in a perpetual Tyranny.

whole

whole was exposed, during three days, in the Campus Martius, that every man who had been plundered by the enemy might take back his own. This procedure gained the Consul much good-will, and all agreed that he deserved a triumph for his successful Campaign. The triumph was however postponed, he himself judging the affair of Terentius's bill (then depending) to be of more importance. Several days was this debated in the Senate and before the People. At length (says Livy) the Tribune yielded to the Majesty of the Consul and desisted; and then Lucretius and his army received their due honours. (Veturius had only an ovation.)

§. III. TRANQUILLITY continued not long. For no sooner were the Consuls elect, P. Volturnus and S. Sulpicius, entered upon their office, than all the five new Tribunes (of whom Virginus was the warmest) exerted their utmost efforts to get Terentius's bill passed. Superstition put some stop to the progress of this important affair. Earthquakes gave the alarm; and then fiery meteors, and other phænomena, purely natural, the vulgar considered as forerunners of greater calamities. And when fear had once taken possession of their minds, spectres were seen by some, supernatural voices heard by others. That a Cow had spoke was a tale which had found no credit the last year, but now it was believed; and the more easily on account of a new prodigy (which no-body questioned, and which had no example on record) a shower of raw flesh, of which, as it fell, some greedy flocks of birds caught a part, and the rest lay long on the ground without corrupting, or having any ill smell.

Recourse was presently had to the Sybilline books; and the Duumvirs (two Patricians) who had the care of them, and perfectly understood them, discovered there, that Rome was by these prodigies threatened with an invasion from strangers, and that the Romans would do well to avoid civil discord. To support the prediction, hasty tidings came from the Hernici, that the Æqui and Volscei, in concert with the new colony of Antium, were preparing to attack the Republick. The Tribunes laughed both at the prediction, and at the important news; and accused the Senators (not without reason) of inventing both, to stave off the affair of Terentius's bill. And when the Senate had ordered^b Levies to be made for the war, and the Consuls, erecting their Tribunal in the Forum, would have ^a Mr. Vertot understands Terentius's bill to have consisted of two distinct articles, the first for a limitation of the Consular Authority, which article he supposes to have been dropped intirely; the second, for introducing and establishing a body of written Laws. I cannot perceive that any other limitation of the Consular Prerogatives was intended by Terentius, than what that body of fixed Laws, proposed by him, would necessarily put to it, and what the Decemviral Laws of the 12 Tables did actually put to it a few years after.

^b Dionysius says nothing of the intelligence from the Hernici, or the consequent order for Levies of soldiers. He represents (B. 10. p. 629.) the Senate and Tribunes as gravely conferring about the measures proper to be taken for guarding the State against the unknown dangers threatened by the bad omens. He

Year of
R O M E
CCXCII.
Ref. J. C.
four hundred
sixty.
Forty-
ninth Consul-
ship.
D. Hal. B.
10. p. 628.
Livy, B.
3. c. 10.

Year of have performed their Commission, the Tribunes interposed. If the Lic-
 ROM. tors laid hold of any Citizen, who refused to give his name, the Tribunes, aided by the multitude, set him free.

§. IV. NOR did these Plebeian Magistrates use more violence to hinder the Levies, than the Nobles did to hinder the passing of the Law; which was constantly proposed every comitia day, and was now couched in words to this effect: "That the People, in lawful Comitia, should " depute ten persons venerable for their age and prudence, and whose " sole ambition was true glory, to form a body of Laws for regulating
 " both publick and private affairs; that these Laws, when compiled,
 " should be proposed to an assembly of the People; and, when approved
 " and enacted by the People, should be fixed up in the Forum, to the " end that every man might know what were his own rights, and what
 " the rights of the annual Magistrates."

As, in these assemblies, headstrong temerity and violence prevailed, and there was no room for sober and deliberate counsel, the elder Senators seldom appeared there; and the Consuls for the most part kept away for fear of exposing the dignity of their office to affronts. The conduct of the opposition to the Tribunes they generally left to the young, rash, audacious Nobles. Conspicuous among these was Quinctius

He adds, that the assembly agreed upon the expediency of concord in the administration of the publick affairs; but could not agree upon the means to effect that concord. Must the Nobles yield to the Tribunes, or the Tribunes to the Nobles? The Consuls and the chief Senators alledged that the Tribunes, by attempting innovations in the Government, ought to be deemed the authors of all the civil feuds. On the other hand the Tribunes charged the Consuls and the Patricians with being the sole causes of the disturbances, by their unreasonable opposition to a wholesome bill, which tended only to establish a just equality among the Citizens. Finding their remonstrances ineffectual, they had recourse to the People.

The same Historian reports, that, in the assembly to which the Tribunes proposed the Law, there were many of the elder Senators as well as of the younger, who delivered studied speeches against it, and that the debate lasted several days; till the Tribunes, vexed at the loss of so much time, refused to hear any more remonstrances, and appointed a day for coming to a final determination upon the question, and, when they had exhorted all the Plebeians to be then present, in order to give their suffrages by TRIBES, they dismissed the assembly. That, after this, the Consuls and most considerable men of the Patricians inveighed in very sharp terms against the Tribunes, and protested that they would never suffer the introduction of new Laws, which had not first passed the approbation of the Senate. They said, (p. 630.) "that Laws were a sort of compact " between all the members of a State, and " not rules dictated by one part of it only.

 " That when a part, the ignoble and worse
 " part, took upon them to prescribe Laws
 " to the noble and better, destruction must " inevitably be the consequence. What " right (said they) have you Tribunes to " enact Laws or to abrogate Laws? your " authority is but an emanation from that " of the Senate. The purpose of your insti" tution was only to succour the poor Ci" tizens when oppressed; and this privi" lege was granted conditionally that you " should attempt nothing farther, and you " have forfeited this privilege by the " changes you have made with regard to " the Comitia held for your elections, &c." Vid. sup. p. 277. The Historian adds, that after these expostulations they had recourse to violence, and that Cæso was their chief instrument, &c.

Cæso,

Cæso, a person of high birth (being the son of Quintius Cincinnatus) approved courage in war, and of an extraordinary size and strength of body. With these advantages he had the talent of oratory. The Republic could not boast of a braver soldier, or a readier speaker. This youth, when incircled with his band of Nobles, as if his strength and eloquence had invested him with all consular, and even dictatorial power, stood forth the bulwark of the Senate; and not only sustained the most stormy efforts of the Tribunes, but frequently drove them and all their Plebeians out of the Forum. Whoever offered to resist did not fail to be severely treated, stripped of his cloaths and sent away naked: so that the Tribunes plainly saw their bill was lost, if Cæso were suffered to go on at this rate. Four of them he had quite disheartened by his overbearing violences; but Virginus, who had a spirit not easy to be daunted, cited him to trial before the People, on a capital accusation. Cæso, rather enraged than terrified by this affront, became more insolent and audacious than ever in the war he made upon the Plebeians and their Tribunes. His accuser, during the interval between the summons and the day for trial, gave him free scope to hurt himself, and frequently proposed the Bill, not in hopes of passing it, but to provoke the young man to furnish, by new misdemeanors, more matter for his impeachment, which he failed not to do; and every odious thing, done or said by any of the other young Patricians, was imputed to Cæso; who, nevertheless, continued forcibly to hinder the passing of the Bill into a Law. At length Virginus, addressing himself to the Plebeians assembled, “ You see, Romans, that it is impossible for you to obtain the Law you so much desire, while Cæso continues a Citizen of Rome. But why do I speak of that Law? He stands in the way of your liberty; and, in pride, surpasses all the Tarquins that ever lived. This youth, so audacious and violent while only a private Citizen, must doubtless make an excellent Magistrate. What think you? shall we patiently wait till we see him Consul or Dictator?”

At these words, many from among the multitude, and especially those who had been roughly treated by Cæso, vehemently called out to the Tribune to persist in the prosecution of the delinquent, and to do his utmost to bring him to condign punishment.

§. V. THE day for the trial came; and the Plebeians in general, by their warmth and earnestness, seemed to think that their liberty depended on the condemnation of Cæso. Urged therefore by necessity he, with much inward indignation, went about soliciting the favour even of the

Year of
R O M E
CCXCII.
Bef. J. C.
Four hundred
sixty.
Forty-
ninth Consul-
ship.
Livy, B.
3. c. 11.
D. Hal. B.
9. p. 630.

^a This is Livy's account.

Dionysius, p. 631, says nothing of the timorous and submissive behaviour of Cæso; but, on the contrary, that, when he was called upon to plead, he refused to own the jurisdiction of the Assembly, offering at the same time to submit himself to the judgment of the Consuls, whom he regarded as his only lawful Judges.

And this Historian introduces no other advocate pleading for Cæso, but his own father L. Quintius Cincinnatus, into whose mouth he puts the substance of all that Livy imputes to other speakers.

Year of meanest among them. His relations and friends made themselves his R O M E advocates to the Assembly; yet they did not attempt to clear him of the CCXCII. violences laid to his charge, but answered the invectives of the Tribunes Def. J. C. against him by expatiating on his real merit. His uncle T. Quinctius, af-Four hun- ter recounting the honours which he himself and others of the Quintian dred Ex- name had acquired by their exploits, affirmed, that neither his family nor 27. even the Roman State had ever produced a finer genius, or a warrior of Forty- more consummate bravery than Cæso; whom, when he served under him, ninth he had often seen behave himself so gallantly in fight, that he had mar-Consul- ked him for the prime soldier in the army. Sp. Furius (who had been ship. Consul in 289) bore testimony to the successful valour which Cæso had exerted, when sent by his uncle Titus to rescue him and his army out of imminent danger. Lucretius, one of the last year's Consuls, covered with fresh laurels, shared his glory with Cæso, enumerating his many valiant deeds both in expeditions and in pitched battles; and he admonished the assembly to make it their choice, that a young man of so excellent natural endowments, and who could not but be a valuable possession to any State to which he should belong, might rather be a Citizen of Rome than of any other City. He added, that increase of years would gradually diminish in him that indiscreet ardour and too forward boldness which gave offence, and that experience would teach him the only thing he wanted, prudence. And he pressed them therefore that they would suffer to grow old among them so great a genius, whose faults were decaying and virtues ripening.

L. Quinctius Cincinnatus pleaded likewise for his son, not by extolling his merit (for he feared lest that would serve only to exasperate his enemies) but by humbly intreating the Assembly to impute his errors to his youth, and to forgive them for the sake of his father, whom no man could accuse of having injured them in any instance by word or deed.

D. Hal. B. Virginus, perceiving that the multitude were softened towards the ac-
 2 P 231. cused by these intercessions, and the merit of the intercessors, and fearing that, if Cæso escaped with impunity, the young Nobles would become more insolent than ever, answered Cincinnatus, "That his son was the " more inexcusable, for his having had the example of so good a father,
 " whereby to regulate his conduct, and having totally neglected to fol" low it." He added, "You, Lucius Quinctius, are doubtless in a great " measure ignorant of the crimes and misdemeanors of this unworthy
 " son, who is no less a reproach to you, than a plague to his Country:
 " but, that you may be better acquainted with his character, please to " hear a relation of one of his noble deeds, and compare it with those " his exploits in war that have gained him so much glory; and let the As" sembly judge whether it be adviseable to shew indulgence to such a " Citizen."

Then calling upon one Volscius (who stood prepared to act a part which had been concerted between them) he bid him recount what he knew

Def. P.
 122.
 123, P.
 3 C. 123.

knew of Cæso's behaviour. Volscius,^a directing his speech to the People, said, "I could have wished it had been in my power sooner to bring my complaints for the death of a most dear brother whom Cæso murdered. It was in the Consulship of L. Æbutius and P. Servilius, when Rome was afflicted with the Plague. Returning home one evening, my brother and I, from a friend's house, where we had supped, we met Cæso with some of his libertine companions, who together had been making a debauch. They at first attacked us with abusive language, such as young men full of wine are wont to employ when they would insult poor Citizens whom they despise. My brother answering one of them as a man of spirit would do, Cæso instantly knocked him down, and with his fists and his feet so bruised him, that he (not perfectly recovered of the epidemick sickness with which he had been seized) remained half dead upon the ground. I had him conveyed home in mens arms, he died presently after, and it was judged that he died of the blows he had received. I could not carry my complaints to the Consuls, they dying the same year of the Plague. Their successors L. Lucretius and T. Veturius were a long time in the field. At their return I cited Cæso several times to appear before them: but instead of justice I got nothing from him but blows."

Year of
R O M E.
CCXCII.
Bef. J. C.
Four hundred
sixty.
Forty-
ninth Consul-
ship.

This story blew the People up to such a rage, that some of them seemed disposed, without examining into the truth of the fact, to kill Cæso upon the spot. The Consuls, and even the Tribunes themselves, gave a check to this extravagance. But Virginius commanded to lay hold on Cæso and carry him to prison, there to be detained, till he should be brought to trial for his life on Volscius's accusation. The Patricians forcibly opposed the execution of this order, and Tit. Quinctius remonstrated to the Assembly, that it was utterly illegal to do violence to the person of any Citizen unheard and uncondemned, though he were accused of a capital crime. Virginius answered, that he had no intention to punish Cæso before condemnation, but that his person ought to be secured in prison to the day of trial, that the Roman People might have it in their power to inflict due punishment on a murderer. The other Tribunes, being appealed to, took a middle way; they agreed that Cæso should not be imprisoned, but should give security to appear in judgment on the day appointed. It was referred to the Senate to name the sum in which each surety shall be bound; and Cæso was held in arrest in the Forum, during the deliberation of the fathers on this matter; they fixed the sum at 3000^b Asses. It being left to the Tribunes to determine the number of the sureties, they demanded ten; and accordingly ten were bound for

D. Hal. E.
9. p. 633.
Livy, B. 3.
c. 13.

^a Dionysius makes this Volscius to be one of the present Tribunes. Livy says he had some years before been Tribune. According to Pigbius there was a Volscius among the Tribunes in the Consulship of Æbutius and Servilius, when the pretended quarrel is said to have happened.

^b About 9l. 13s. 9d. Arbutnot.

Year of Cæso's appearance, and he released. This was the first instance of security
 R O M E given to the Publick for appearance. Cæso that very night left Rome and CCXCII. retired into Hetruria.
 Ref. J. C.

Four hundred six- When the day, fixed for the trial, came, it was urged, that, Cæso having
 17. banished himself, all proceedings ought to be stopped; Virginus nevertheless held the Comitia: but the other Tribunes, being appealed to, dismissed the Assembly. The surety-money was however rigorously exacted.

Forty- Quintilius Cincinnatus would not permit the other sureties to be sufferers; and, to satisfy the whole demand, sold the better part of his estate, retiring ninth to a poor cottage on the further side of the Tiber, where with his own hands Consul- he cultivated a few acres of land, which, from his name, were afterwards ship. called the Quintian Meadows.
 D. Hal. B. 10. p. 633.
 Livy, B. 3. c. 13.

C H A P. XXI.

§. I. The Patricians continue steady in their opposition to the Bill, and conduct themselves in that opposition with more art than they had hitherto done. The Tribunes, not able to carry their point, spread false reports, injurious to the Senate and the whole body of the Nobles.

D. Hal. B. 10. p. 634.
 Livy, B. 3. c. 14.
 §. I. THE Tribunes, elated by their new victory, believed themselves now secure of getting Terentius's Bill passed. They imagined, that the Patricians, intimidated by the banishment of Cæso, would infallibly stoop to them; and they flattered themselves the more readily with this hope, because the elder Senators (who kept pretty much out of sight) seemed to yield to them the possession of the Government. Vain was their hope; they were totally disappointed. For the younger Nobles, and especially the late companions of Cæso, had lost nothing of their boldness; their anger against the Commons was augmented, and they had learnt to guide its fury more artfully than before. Whenever the Law was proposed, and the Tribunes, by attempting to remove them from the Assembly, had furnished them with a pretext for violence, they attacked those Plebeian Magistrates in such a manner, that no one of the assailants could be singled out as more guilty than any other. The People complained, that, instead of one Cæso, they had now to do with a thousand. In the intermediate days, when the Law was not in question, no men more peaceable and gracious than these young Nobles; they courteously saluted the Plebeians, accosted them familiarly, invited them to their houses, frequented the Forum to assist them in their causes, and even permitted the Tribunes unmolested to hold Councils of the Commons, and do any business they pleased, that of the Law only excepted: nay, without so much as throwing out a word of contradiction, they suffered those Plebeian Magistrates to be rechosen, for the coming year, to the same office; condescensions and compliances by which they gradually softened the multitude and blunted the edge of their zeal for the

the Law : and by this various management they effectually defeated every attempt to get it passed, throughout the whole year of Volumnius and Sulpicius.

These Consuls gave place to P. Valerius and C. Claudius (brother of Appius who killed himself) but the Bill continued to be the sole object of the publick attention. The more the young Nobles insinuated themselves into the affections of the Plebeians, the more did the Tribunes endeavour to instil into the minds of the same Plebeians suspicions of those Nobles, by loading them with calumnies. They gave out, " That there was a conspiracy on foot ; that Cæso Quintilius was actually in Rome ; that measures were concerted to murder the Tribunes and massacre the Commons. That the elder Nobles had commissioned the younger to suppress the Tribunician Power, that so the Republick might be restored to the same form of Government in which it was before the Secession."

This is Livy's account (and it is all that he says) of the management of the Tribunes to render ineffectual the artifices of the young Patricians with regard to the Plebeians ; and there is nothing incredible or extraordinary in this account. When discord prevails, and faction runs high in a City or a State, such slanderous reports, lies of a day, are common*. But Dionysius (incited perhaps by his passion for speech-making, or a desire to please the Claudian family) has expatiated on this matter, and given us a long tale, the most material circumstance of which seems equally incredible and ridiculous ; and the introduction to his tale is very well suited to it. Rome, says he, was threatened with a more terrible war from the neighbouring powers, than it had ever yet sustained. And this danger it was brought into by its intestine divisions, conformable to the prediction of the Sybilline oracles, and the forewarnings of heaven by the last year's prodigies, the spectres, miraculous voices, shower of raw flesh, &c. [What the Cow said was spoken the year before.]

The Tribunes, perceiving that the Consul Claudius had inherited the implacable hatred of his family to the Commons, and was prepared to oppose their demands with all his power ; and finding the faction of the young Nobles too strong to be quelled by force, especially since these, by their caresses and soothing arts, had conciliated to them many of the Plebeians, and cooled their ardour for passing the Law ; they, in order to strike a terror into the Plebeians [so gained] and to get the better of Claudius, impudently contrived the following stratagem. Having first alarmed the multitude, by spreading abroad various rumours, all importing mischief that hung over the State, the five Tribunes, sitting in the Forum from morning to night, and seeming full of anxious care,

* Mr. Rollin thinks it not improbable that the Tribunes had received some imperfect information of the conspiracy which presently after broke out, and of which Herdonius the Sabine was the conductor ; and that, by their hatred to the Patricians, they were carried to suspect these, their domestick adversaries, of the mischievous designs formed by a foreign enemy.

Year of held consultations, to which they admitted no other person. This part ROME acted for some days, they forged a letter, and caused it to be delivered to CCXIII. them in the sight of all the People, by a person unknown. On reading Bef. J. C. the contents they start from their seats, strike their foreheads with their
 F. J. J. hands, put on looks of extreme surprise and sorrow, and, when by all this they have drawn about them a numerous crowd (earnest to know what the letter contained). "Romans, says Virginus, the Commons of "Rome are in the utmost peril. If the Gods, protectors of innocence, "had not interposed, we had been inevitably undone. Be pleased to "remain here till we have acquainted the Senate with our intelligence,
 "that so all may unite in taking measures for the preservation of the Re-
 "publick." This said, away they went to the Consuls. While the Consuls assembled the Senators, various were the discourses and imaginations of the People in the Forum, concerning the contents of the letter. The Emissaries of the Tribunes, following their instructions, put about reports expressly contrived for the occasion. The rest believed and spoke each man according to his fears. Some said, the letter doubtless imported that Cæjo Quinctius had been chosen General of the Æqui and Volsi, and was coming with a numerous army to attack Rome. Others knew for certain, that Cæjo's business was only to crush the Commons of Rome, deprive them of their privileges, and abolish the Tribuneship; and that with the universal consent of the Patricians he had undertaken to do this by the means of a foreign army. No (said others) not all the Patricians are in the conspiracy, but the younger of them only; and many affirmed that Cæjo was not coming, but was already in the City, though concealed, and was actually contriving with his associates to seize the fortresses and all the advantageous posts.

The Senate being assembled, Virginus, in the name of the whole College of Tribunes, delivered himself in words to this effect:

"Many rumours, Conscript Fathers have of late prevailed in the City
 "concerning some great evil with which we are threatened; but, as they "were uncertain and devoid of proof, we durst not report them to you,
 "lest our so doing should raise a commotion, and you should think us "more hasty and rash than prudent. We did not however neglect these "rumours, but used our best endeavours to discover the ground of them.
 "At length the Divine Providence, perpetual Guardian of this Repub"lick, has brought to light the hidden counsels of impious men. We "have just received a letter from strangers, who have shewed, that they "have a true affection for us, and whom we shall hereafter name to you.
 "Our foreign intelligence agrees exactly with the rumours at home.
 "The danger presses; measures to ward it must be immediately taken;
 "but we resolved (as was fitting) to lay the matter open to you, before we "informed the People of it.

"Know then, that there is a conspiracy formed against the Commons
 "of Rome, by persons of distinction; among whom, it is said, there are "some, not many, of the elder Senators; that the greater number of
 "the

“ the conspirators are Knights not yet received into the Senate, and “ whom it is not yet time to mention by name. They have resolved “ (so were are informed) to take the opportunity of some dark night to “ attack us in our sleep. Breaking into our houses, they are to cut the “ throats of the Tribunes, and of all those Plebeians who have distinguish-“ themselves by a zeal for the liberty of the People. And, when we “ are once taken off, they think they shall easily prevail with you to re“ voke, by an unanimous decree, all the concessions you have made to “ the Commons. And, as they saw, that a considerable number of so-“ reign soldiers would be necessary for the execution of this design, they “ have associated in their enterprise one of your exiles, Cæso Quinilius, “ and have made him the chief conductor of it, a man whom, though “ convicted of sedition and murder, some, here present, rescued from “ punishment by contriving his escape from Rome. To him the con“ spirators have promised magistracies and honours, and other rewards, of “ his noble exploits. He, on his part, has engaged to bring to their as“ sistance, of the Æqui and Volsci, such a force as they want. In a short “ time he is to be here with some of the most daring of them, whom “ he is to introduce into the City, not all together, but secretly one by “ one, or in small numbers successively. The rest are soon to follow, “ and, when we the Tribunes are slain, fall without mercy upon every “ poor Plebeian, who shall offer to defend his liberty.

Year of
R O M E
CCXCIII.
Bef. J. C.
Four
hundred fifty-
nine.
Fiftieth
Consul-
ship.

“ In this extremity of danger we have recourse to you, Conscript Fa- “ thers, and conjure you, by all that is most sacred, not to abandon us “ to the rage and cruelty of these our wicked enemies; but to aid us “ in taking due vengeance on the authors of so detestable an enterprise.
 “ The first thing we humbly intreat of you is (and nothing can be more “ reasonable) that by a Decree you authorise us Tribunes to take infor“ mations against the conspirators. It is surely fitting, that, in such an “ inquisition, the persons whose lives are threatened by the plot, should “ be the inquisitors. If there be any man here, who shall oppose this “ demand, he must either be out of his wits, or deeply engaged in the “ conspiracy.”

The Senators were greatly astonished at this relation, and no less perplexed by the Tribunes request: They laid their heads together, but could not resolve what answer to make. They feared to grant what the Tribunes demanded, and they feared to refuse it. Claudius, the Consul, suspecting some deceit, delivered them out of their Dilemma. Rising up, he thus answered, “ You are extremely mistaken, Virginus, if you ima“ gine that any member of this house is so foolish, or such an enemy to “ the People, as to be against an inquiry into the Plot you speak of (if “ any such plot their be) or against admitting the Tribunes into the “ number of the inquisitors. But, to tell you my mind freely (and I “ have no apprehension of being thought one of the conspirators) I look “ upon this whole matter as a pure invention and stratagem of your “ own, to revenge yourselves on us for our opposition to your Bill. If “ there

D. Hal. E.
10. P.
637. &
169.

Year of R O M E CCXCIII. Bef. J. C. Four hundred fifty-nine Fiftieth Consulship.

“ there be any plot on foot, you are the plotters. The result of those “ long and close consultations you held in the Forum was this notable “ scheme. You were first to alarm the People with rumours of impend“ ing danger, and by this prepare their minds to receive implicitly any “ dreadful story you should afterwards please to give out. Then a per“ son unknown was to deliver to you, in publick, a letter, containing “ intelligence of a conspiracy against the Commons of Rome. Thus fur“ nished with matter of complaint, you were to come to Senate, be “ very angry, and demand a Decree empowering you to sit inquisitors “ on this important affair. Thought you, If the Patricians reject our “ request, we can take occasion from thence to make them very criminal in the “ eyes of the People, who, exasperated to the pitch of fury, will be ready to “ execute whatever we shall prompt them to; on the other hand, if the Pa- “ tricians grant our request, we will then charge with treason all those of “ them, old and young, who have shewn the most resolution in opposing our “ measures. The fear of a condemnation will either make them promise never “ more, to oppose us, or compel them to leave the City. And thus we shall re- “ duce our adversaries to a very inconsiderable number.

“ Such, Conscript Fathers, was the stratagem formed against the most “ worthy of our Senators, such the snares laid for the innocent Knights.
 “ And that what I say is true a few words will evince.—Tell us, Virgi- “ nus, and you, the rest of the Tribunes, all in such imminent peril, “ Who are those strangers from whom you received your intelligence?
 “ Where do they dwell? How came you acquainted with them? And “ how came they to be so well acquainted with our councils and designs?
 “ Why delay to tell us who they are? Why promise to name them here“ after? You ought to have done it already. And where is that man, “ who brought you the letter you talk of? Why don't you produce “ him, that we may examine him, and thereby know whether what you “ say have any foundation of truth, or be only (as I suspect) a tale of “ your own forging? And then as to your domestick intelligence, which “ agrees so perfectly well with your foreign, what was it? Who gave it “ you? What makes you conceal your proofs, and not rather display them “ before us? But, in truth, it is not easy to prove what never was, nor “ is, nor will be.

“ Conscript Fathers, the thing speaks itself. The Tribunes have for“ med a plot against us, and they would cover their fraud, by pretending “ that we have formed one against them. You may thank yourselves “ for this. You encouraged them to it, by arming those frantick Ma“ gistrates with such power, as you suffered them to assume, when they “ condemned Cæjo Quintius, the brave defender of the Nobles, upon a “ false accusation. Since that time they keep no measures. They no “ longer point their wrath at this or that particular Senator, but at the “ whole body of the Patricians; they are for driving every honest man “ out of Rome. My advice is, that you keep a very watchful eye upon “ these Tribunes, as upon seditious men, the contrivers of mischief. And

“ I

“ I shall make no difficulty to warn the People, as I warn you. I shall freely tell them, that they have nothing to fear, but from the malicious devices of their own deceitful Magistrates, who, under the cloak of friendship, are their greatest enemies.”

Year of
R O M E
CCXCIII.
Bef. J. C.
Four hundred fifty-nine.

The whole Senate highly applauded this discourse of Claudius; they would listen no more to the Tribunes; and the Assembly broke up. Virginius with his Collegues hastened back to the People (who in the Forum waited their return) and inveighed most bitterly against the Consuls and Senators. Claudius presently appeared, and, by repeating what he had just said in the Senate-house, convinced all the sober-minded, sensible men of his audience that the pretended plot was a mere forgery. The weaker sort however continued to believe it true; and as for the profligate and ill-intentioned part of the multitude, men greedy of novelties, they did not care whether it were true or not: all they wanted was a pretext for sedition.

Fiftieth
Consul-
ship.
D. Hal. E.
10. p.
639.

SUCH is the story, Dionysius has given us, of the deep-laid scheme, the wonderful contrivance of the Tribunes to prevent any farther opposition to their Bill. They gravely and pathetically request of the Senate to erect them into a court of inquisition for examining into the treasonable practices, and disposing of the liberties and lives of the Roman Senators and Knights. And the ground of this modest demand is a letter which they pretend to have received from some strangers, advising them of a plot formed by the Nobles of Rome against the Commons. The Senators, though they lay their heads together, are embarrassed, and much at a loss for an answer. But, the Consul Claudius being a man of deep penetration, and a ready wit, it comes into his mind to ask the Tribunes, Who sent the letter? and who brought it? and they won't tell; and so there's an end of the matter.*

* Mr. Vertot is so fond of this story, that he has given himself the pleasure to improve it. Dionysius imputes to the Tribunes no other aim in their device, but to terrify the Plebeians, and make them entertain a suspicion of those young Nobles who affected popularity. And, when he introduces Claudius as an Orator displaying the malice of the Tribunes, the worst charge he puts into his mouth against them is a design to compel, by fear of condemnation, the most vigorous opponents of their bill, either to desist from their opposition or to leave the city. But Mr. Vertot roundly asserts, that the Tribunes secretly formed the dreadful design of cutting off at one stroke the better part of the Senate, and of involving in the same ruin all the Patricians, who on account of their credit or riches were odious to them and suspected by them: Ils formerent secretement l'affreux dessein de faire perir tout d'un coup la meilleur partie du Senat, & d'envelopper dans leur ruine tous les Patriciens qui leur étoient odieux & suspects par leur credit ou par leurs richesses. The Abbé forgets that in those days the Romans were not so thirsty of civil blood. They could be very angry with one another, and belie one another, and box and kick, but were not disposed to murder in their quarrels. And it is not a whit more probable that the Tribunes projected such a terrible slaughter of the Nobles, than that the Nobles projected a massacre of the Tribunes and the other principal men of the Plebeians. Nay, if we may judge of the honesty of the parties, by the cause in dispute, the Tribunes will have the advantage. For their bill, which the Patricians opposed by illegal violences, was a very good bill, and tending much to the benefit of the commonwealth.

C H A P. XXII.

§. I. The Capitol is surpris'd by a foreign enemy, the Plebeians refuse to arm in order to retake it. Valerius the Consul overcomes their obduracy, and the Capitol is recovered.

Year of
R O M E
CCXCIII.
Bef. J. C.
Four hundred fifty-nine.
Fiftieth
Consul-
ship.
Livy, B. 3.
c. 15.

§. I. IN the midst of these intestine quarrels and commotions, the Capitol and the Fortrefs adjoining to it were one night surpris'd and seized by 4500 men, outlaws and slaves, under the conduct of a certain Sabine named Appius Herdonius. He put to the sword all the Romans he could find there, who refused to join him in his enterprize. Those who escap'd ran down into the Forum with the utmost speed of fear, crying out, To arms! to arms! The enemy is in the City. The Consuls, not knowing, whether this sudden evil came from foreign or domestick foes, from the discontent and enmity of the Commons, or a plot of the slaves, were both afraid to arm the Plebeians, and afraid to leave them unarmed; nor could they bring the multitude, struck with consternation and affright, under any Government; sometimes their endeavours to appease the tumult made it more stormy. They gave out arms, but not to all indifferently, to such only as they could most confide in, a number sufficient for defence, till it could be known what enemies they had to deal with; and, full of anxiety, they pass'd the remainder of the night in posting guards at all the proper places. Day-light discover'd both whence the war came, and who was the conductor of it. Herdonius from the Capitol cried out, Liberty to all slaves! I have undertaken the cause of the miserable, to restore the exiles to their country, and to remove the heavy yoke of servitude from the necks of those who bear it. It would be my choice, that the Roman People should themselves do this. But, if they refuse, I will bring hither the Æqui and Volsci, and leave nothing unattempted to accomplish my purpose. The mystery being now somewhat explained, the Consuls and Senators became very uneasy with the apprehension lest the enterprize should have been concerted with the Sabines and Veientes, whose forces would presently appear to support it; and lest the Æqui and Volsci, eternal enemies of Rome, should now come, not to plunder the frontiers as formerly, but to assault the City. But their greatest dread was of their slaves at home, no man knowing but he had an enemy in his own house. It was dangerous to trust them, and dangerous to shew a distrust of their fidelity. Affairs seem'd in so desperate a condition, that even concord among the Citizens would scarce be sufficient to preserve the State; and, while such heavy calamities hung over it, no-body fear'd any thing from the Tribunes or the Plebeians. The evils of which these were wont to be the authors were of a gentle kind, and ever occasioned by the absence of all other evils; and the terror of a foreign enemy seem'd now to have laid asleep the animosity of the Commons. Nevertheless,
it

it was this that bore heaviest upon the Republick when thus inclining to a fall. For, as the Consuls had at first doubted whether the alarm from the Capitol were not some stratagem of the Tribunes in favour of their Bill, so the Tribunes suspected the same alarm to be a contrivance of the Nobles to defeat the Bill. They bawled out, No invasion! An imaginary war! A trick to make us forget the Bill! The Bill once passed, those clients and guests of the Patricians will steal away more silently than they came! Instantly they send to the People to quit their arms and assemble upon the affair of the Law. In the mean time the Consuls convene the Senate; and the Fathers are now struck with more fear by the Tribunes than they had been by the nightly invasion of the enemy. Word is brought that the soldiers have laid down their arms and quitted their posts. The Consul Valerius rushes out of the Senate-house, hastens to the Forum, expostulates with the Tribunes “on their madness in calling the People from their arms to attend to Law-making, while the enemy is over their heads. Are you then in confederacy with Herdonius? He who could not intice our slaves to join him, has he drawn you to his party?” Then, turning to the People, he urges them with motives from Religion, “their reverence for Jupiter, Juno, Minerva, all the Gods and Goddesses now prisoners to a foreign enemy, nay in captivity to slaves. O Father Romulus, inspire thy People with the same spirit which animated thee, when thou didst bravely recover the Citadel from the Sabines! Move them to march in the same path, by which thou didst conduct thy army! lead them on! As far as a mortal can follow a God, I will be the first to follow thee and tread in thy steps.” He concluded, with declaring, “that he then called every Roman to arms; and that, without regard to the bounds of the Consular Authority, or the extent of the Tribunician, or the Leges sacratae, he would treat every Citizen who disobeyed his orders, as an open enemy to his country. That the Tribunes, who had forbid them to fight against Herdonius, might, if they pleased, command them to take arms against Valerius the Consul: but that he should make no scruple to do by those Magistrates as the founder of his family had done by the Tarquins.”

All this was of no effect. The Bill! The Bill! Let us pass the Bill! Yet the Tribunes were not able to proceed in this affair; nor could the Consul prevail with the People to march to the Capitol. Night put a stop to the contention. During the night, fear of the armed Citizens, whom the Consuls had at their devotion, kept the Tribunes quiet. These out of the way, the Senators went diligently about among the Plebeians, admonishing and intreating them to consider “into what extremity of danger they brought the Republick. That the contest was not now between the Nobles and the Commons; that both Nobles and Commons, the Citadel, the Temples of the Gods, the tutelary Gods of the State, the domestick Gods of every private Citizen were just upon the point of being yielded into the power of foreign enemies.” While

Year of
R O M E
CCXCIII.
Bef. J. C.
Four
hundred fifty-
nine.
Fiftieth
Consul-
ship.

Livy, B.
3. c. 17.

Year of the Senators were employed in these attempts to bring the multitude to R O M E reason, the Consuls, lest the Sabines and Volscians should come suddenly CCXCIII. and attack the City, busied themselves in posting guards to defend the Bef. J. C. gates and walls. At day-break a body of men appeared in the field ad-Four hun- vancing towards Rome. These at first could be no other than enemies, dred they must be the Æqui and Volsci: However, to the great joy of the City, fifty- they were soon discovered to be Tusculans, coming to the assistance of the nine. Romans their allies.

Fiftieth
 Consul-
 ship.
 Livy, B.
 3. c. 19.

+ Popli-cula.

The news of the Capitol's being surpris'd, and of the dissensions in Rome, having the night before reached Tusculum, Mamilius, the chief Magistrate of the place, had represented to the Council, that they could never hope from the Gods so fair an opportunity of obli-ving a powerful and neighbouring State, and had persuaded them to prevent all application from the Roman Senate for succour. These forces, admitted within the walls, marched straight to the Forum, where Valerius (having left his Colleague to defend the gates) was drawing up his men in order, for battle.
 He had prevailed with the Plebeians (in spite of all the clamours and remonstrances of their Tribunes) to insist themselves, and take the military oath, by giving them his solemn promise, "that, the Capitol once recovered, and the City restored to quiet, if they would then suffer themselves to be informed of the deceitfulness of the Tribunes, and the mischiefs concealed under their specious Law, he, for his part, calling to mind his ancestors, and that surname, † together with which they had transmitted to him an hereditary concern for the interests of the People, would give no disturbance to the Councils held by the Commons."

And now the Romans and their auxiliaries, rivals for the glory of re-taking the Capitol, briskly advanced, and forced their way up the hill, notwithstanding the enemy's advantage of the ground. They had reached the Portico of the Temple, when Valerius, fighting in the foremost rank, received a mortal wound. Volumnius, a consular person, who saw him fall, instantly covered his body, took his place and his charge, and kept the men so warmly and intently engaged in the attack, that they gained the victory before they perceived, that they had lost their General. Great was the slaughter of the invaders, the temple polluted with their blood, Herdonius * himself slain, the prisoners punished suitably

* Livy's relation (brief as it is) of this adventure has been followed in the text. He calls Herdonius a Sabine, but says nothing of his character, his rank, or the situation of life he was in, when he undertook to seize the Capitol; or of the ultimate end he proposed to himself in that enterprise: nor does he inform us how, or from whence Herdonius collected such a number of exiles and slaves, or what made it so easy for him to possess himself in the night of the Temple and Citadel.

Probably the Latine Historian had not sufficient light into these particulars. But Dionysius, who is rarely ignorant of any thing knowable or unknowable, tells us, 640, that the Sabine Herdonius was a man of distinction in his own country for his birth and riches; that those who followed him in his undertaking were his own clients and domesticks, to the number of about 4000, and that he purposed to destroy the Roman Power. However, the Historian cannot say, whether by this

ably to their respective ranks of freemen or slaves. The Tusculans received the publick thanks. The Temple was purified: and the People are said to have cast farthings into the house of Valerius, in order to his more pompous funeral.

Year of
R O M E
CCXCIII.
Bef. J. C.
Four hundred fifty-
nine.

this destruction Herdonius meant to make himself tyrant of Rome, or to subject Rome to the Sabines, or only to acquire a great name by his exploits. When he had prepared a sufficient quantity of arms, provisions, and all things necessary for the expedition, he embarked his 4000 men on some river-boats, which gliding down the Stream of the Tiber, he arrived at Rome about midnight, when all was quiet; landed on the bank of the river next the Capitol, and not above a furlong from it. That, the gate Comentalis, at the foot of the hill, being always, by the express command of an oracle, left open, he there entered, and, silently mounting the steep ascent, seized the Temple and Fortrefs. That he hoped, when possessed of this strong place, to be joined by the exiles, the slaves, the insolvent debtors, and all the worst part of the Roman populace, whose wretchedness, he thought, held them ready for any change that could be proposed: He placed great confidence in the discord reigning at Rome, imagining that the Plebeians would not unite with the Patricians to oppose him. And, in case these hopes failed, he resolved to invite to his assistance a numerous army of Sabines and Volsci, and other neighbouring nations, who would be glad of an opportunity to shake off the insupportable yoke of the Roman Government. Herdonius was disappointed in every expectation. Neither the exiles, nor the slaves, nor the debtors, nor the indigent populace of Rome, repaired to him. Nor had the strangers, on whose aid he so much depended, the time necessary to prepare for the war: for the whole affair was over in three or four days.

Upon this relation, given by Dionysius, I shall only observe, that his well born, wealthy, and powerful Sabine, so much at ease at home, must have been somewhat mad to embark in such an enterprise without a previous approbation of it by the Governors of his own nation; any preparation on their part to assist him in it, or even any promise of assistance from them, or from any other of the neighbouring States; and without having any intelligence with the discontented in Rome. And then, for his collecting so many boats on the Tiber as would hold 4000 men, with the provisions necessary for their subsistence, and his stealing down the stream with his fleet, from Sabinia into the middle of Rome, without being discovered in his passage, or till he reached the Capitol, these things are absolutely wonderful.

As to what passed in Rome, while Herdonius possessed the Capitol, the Greek Historian reports, p. 641, that, when the Plebeians, at the instigation of their Tribunes, refused to arm, unless the Terentian Law were first enacted, the Consul Claudius declared, there was no need of their assistance; and exhorted the Patricians to march with their clients against the enemy; and, if more strength were wanted, call to their aid the Latines and Hernici, or even promise liberty to the slaves and employ them, rather than solicit succour from unworthy Citizens, who, when the State was in such calamitous circumstances, revived old quarrels: But that his advice was not approved by his Collegue or the Senators, who thought it expedient to yield to the times.

That Valerius, to gain the multitude, swore to them, that if they behaved themselves well in the present exigence, so as to restore quiet to the City, he would suffer the Tribunes to propose the Law, and would take care, that what the People determined should be put in execution before his Consulship expired.

The Plebeians hereupon enlist themselves readily for the war, and march with alacrity under Valerius to the attack of the Citadel; in describing which attack the Historian is as particular and circumstantial as if he had been there, but by his detail makes that appear impracticable, which he says was effected. See p. 642.

Fiftieth
Consul-
ship.

C H A P. XXIII.

§ I. The Consul Claudius shows little regard to the promise given by Valerius to the Plebeians. § II. L. Quinctius Cincinnatus, elected to succeed Valerius, by various arts makes the Tribunes desist from the pursuit of their Bill. § III. Virginus and his Collegues are rechosen to the Tribuneship. The Senate are for continuing Quinctius in the Consulship; but he rejects the motion with indignation.

Year of
R O M E
CCXCIII.
Erf. J. C.
Four hundred fifty-
nine.

Fiftieth
Consul-
ship.

Livy, B.
3. c. 19.

§ I. THE enterprize of Herdonius thus defeated, and peace restored, the Tribunes without delay called upon the Senators to perform what Valerius had promised; and they pressed Claudius to free the manes of his Collegue from the guilt of treachery, by suffering the People without molestation to proceed on the affair of the Law. Claudius, to elude this demand, insisted on the necessity of a new Consul in the place of Valerius, before that business could regularly be brought into debate. The time passed in disputes on this head till the month of December, when, the Centuriate Comitia being held for the election, L. Quinctius Cincinnatus, through the indefatigable industry of the Nobles, was appointed to the consular fasces². It was a thunderstroke to the Plebeians to see themselves fallen under the government of a Magistrate of great personal merit, great credit, and highly provoked against them by their banishment of his son Cæso, and who had three other sons in magnanimity nor inferior to Cæso, in prudence surpassing him.

Cincinnatus had no sooner entered on his office, than he began to bluster like a man angry with every body, and determined to be a severe reformer of manners. He sharply reproved the Senators for their meanness of spirit, and want of resolution, in suffering the same men to be continued in the Tribuneship from year to year, men who with noise and foul language lorded it over the State, as if it were some disorderly house which they kept. “Courage, constancy, every virtue civil and military was driven from Rome with my son Cæso. Bablers, sowers of sedition, reign here like Kings with perpetual and absolute sway. What? Did you march your Troops, (with reverence for Caius Claudius and the dead Valerius be it spoken) did you march up to the Capitol, before you had cleared the Forum of those enemies, Virginus and his Collegues? Did Virginus deserve less punishment for not being in

² According to Dionysius, (p. 641) Quinctius was at his farm, actually following the plough, and much astonished, when his election to the Consulship was notified to him. But it is not probable that so worthy a Patriot, living so near the City, should be less forward to assist in recovering the Capitol from Herdonius, than the Tusculans. Nor is it likely, if he came to Rome on that occasion, that he should be ignorant of the universal combination of the Nobles to raise him to the Consulship, or that he left the City before his election.

Livy says nothing of the plough till Cincinnatus is chosen Dictator.

“ the Capitol, than Herdonius for having seized it? By Hercules, he de- Year of “ served greater. Herdonius declared himself your enemy; he put you R O M E “ upon your guard. Virginus, by denying there was any war, would CCXCIII.
 “ have dishonoured you, exposed you naked and defenceless to your ^a slaves Bef. J. C.
 “ and exiles. What a shame in the sight of Gods and Men, that the Four hun-“ Tatians should be before us in arming for our defence; that it should nine.
 “ be doubtful whether Mamilius the Tatian General, or our Consuls, Fiftieth “ recovered the Capitol! And this is what you, Tribunes, call succour- Consul-“ ing the Plebeians, exposing them to be slaughtered by the enemy! ship.
 “ Jupiter, the most High, the All-good, was not worthy to be rescued, “ when beset by slaves and exiles; but your persons are sacred and in“ violable! And do you flatter yourselves, that, thus covered over with “ crimes against Gods and Men, you shall pass your Bill this year?
 “ Unfortunate was the day, when I was chosen Consul, more unfortu“ nate than that in which Valerius was slain, if you even offer to prefer “ your Bill. But no more of that at present, I now give you notice, “ that my Colleague and I intend to march the Legions against the Æqui “ and Volsci. I know not by what fatality it so comes to pass, but the “ Gods are ever more favourable to us in war, than in peace.”

The Consul quite stunned the multitude by this menacing speech. A winter campaign was a dreadful thought. The Patricians began to lift up their heads; their affairs seemed to be upon the recovery. Claudius, who had spirit enough to join in a bold enterprise, but not the sort Livy, B. of courage necessary to form one, readily suffered his Colleague to take 3. c. 20. the lead on this occasion, yet he talked as big as if he had been the author of the measure; he would do wonderful things, yes, he would shew himself to be a Consul. The Tribunes scoffed at them both. And where (said they) will you get the army, which you are to lead into the field? We shall suffer no levies to be made. “ We need none (answered Quintius.) “ The troops which Valerius enlisted for retaking the Capitol, all swore “ to rendezvous at the Consul’s command, and not to disband them- “ selves without his permission; and we strictly injoin every soldier, “ who took that oath, to appear in arms to-morrow at the Lake Regillus.” To which the Tribunes replied, “ That the oath did not “ bind the soldiers to his obedience, who was then only a private man.” However, this evasion did not satisfy the consciences of the People. That contempt for the Gods, so prevalent in our age, says Livy, had not in those days began to make its appearance. Men did not by interpretations contrive to make oaths and laws suit their private desires, but suited their manners to their oaths and to the laws.

The Tribunes, finding their cavil about the oath would not do, turned their thoughts to prevent, by some other means, the march of the troops from the City: For Quintius talked of the expediency of passing the ^a From this expression it would seem that some who had run away from their Roman the slaves, whom Herdonius commanded, were Masters.

Year of whole winter in the field. And, the more to terrify both the Commons R O M E and their Magistrates, he declared, and often repeated, " that [at his CCXCIII. " return from the war] he would hold no Comitia for electing Consuls :
 Bef. J. C. " that the State was too much distempered to be cured by ordinary re-Four hun- " medies : that it needed a Dictator, who would make all Disturbers d ed ery- " of the peace feel the weight of an authority from which there lay no nico. " appeal."

Fiftieth
 Consul-
 ship.
 Livy, B.
 3. c. 23.
 B. 3. c.
 21.

The Senate were at this time assembled in the Capitol. Thither ran the Tribunes, with the Plebeians, all in a consternation, at their heels. The multitude with loud voices called out sometimes upon the Fathers, sometimes upon the Consuls to compassionate their case. Quintius would listen to no intreaties, till the Tribunes had promised to abide by what the Senate should judge fit to be done. Then he reported their petition to the Fathers, who thereupon made a Decree, " That the Tribunes " should no more prefer their Bill this year, and that the Consuls should " not lead an army from the City : " and the Decree declared farther, " that, in the judgment of the Senate, to continue the superior Magi- " strates in their office after the expiration of their year, and to re-elect " the same Tribunes, were both contrary to the welfare of the Repub- " lick."

D.Hal.B. Thus were all commotions calmed for the present ; and Quintius, du-10.p.645. ring the remainder of his Consulship, kept things quiet by a patient, can- did, and equitable conduct in hearing and deciding causes between man and man, to which business he chiefly applied himself.

Livy, B. But, notwithstanding the Senate's Decree before-mentioned, and the
 3. c. 21. warm remonstrances of the Consuls, Virginus and his Collegues pre- vailed to get themselves re-chosen by the People to the Tribuneship. The Senate, to be even with them, were for continuing Quintius in the Consulship [not doubting to carry his re-election in the Comitia by Cen- turies.] Never did Quintius, during his whole administration, exert more spirit, or express a more vehement anger than on this occasion.

* Livy tells us, that what contributed to frighten the Plebeians into submission was a rumour spread, " That the augurs had been " directed to repair to the Lake Regillus, in " order to consecrate a place for holding " Comitia, where every article which had " been carried at Rome in favour of the " Commons by Tribunician violence would " be abrogated : since the Consuls would " there be masters, and the Tribunes, whose " right of opposition did not extend beyond " a mile from the City, would, if they came " there, be upon the foot of private men."

Dionysius says nothing of this ; nor does it seem probable that the People should be alarmed with the apprehension of a design which certainly could never take place. For, had it been practicable to any purpose, it would long before have been put in execu- tion.

The only struggle in the minds of the Peo- ple, at this time, seems to have been between the military oath and the winter campaign ; and, to the honour of the soldiers, the oath carried it ; they had recourse to intreaties for avoiding the cold. Perhaps the character of Quintius, and his manner of life, had no small share in bringing the Plebeians to sub- mission, for the present. It is observable how much more tamely they could suffer themselves to be hector'd by this plough- man Consul, than by an Appius Claudius.

“ Little cause to wonder, Conscript Fathers, that the Plebeians make light “ of your authority ! You trifle with your own Decrees. What ? Are “ you in competition with the multitude, to try which shall surpass
 “ the other in levity and inconstancy ? Is this the contest in which vic“ tory is to give the Victors the chief power in the Republic ? The “ headstrong multitude have broken through your Decree, and there“ fore you will do the same ! An excellent example truly you have “ chosen to follow ! For my part, I shall not imitate the Tribunes ; I “ will not suffer myself to be re-elected to my office. And I exhort
 “ you, Caius Claudius, to restrain the Roman People from such licentious “ proceedings.” The Fathers, hereupon, issued an edict, “ forbidding “ all persons to name Lucius Quinctius at the next elections, for one of “ the Consuls ; and declaring, that, if any one did, his vote should not “ be admitted.”

The Comitia being held, they gave the consular fasces to Q. Fabius * ^{3d time.} Vibulanus and L. Cornelius Maluginensis. ^{Year of}

Upon advice that the Æqui and Volsci were making great preparations for war, the new Consuls summoned the allies to furnish their contin- ^{R O M E} gents of troops for the service. An army was formed, one third Romans, ^{CCXCIV.} two thirds Latines and Hernici. Fabius had the conduct of it, and intirely ^{Bef. J. C.} routed the enemy near Antium. ^{Four hundred fifty-eight.}

In the mean time a body of the Æqui surprized the Citadel of Tus- culum in the night. This news, which was carried first to Rome, and ^{Fifty-first} thence to the camp before Antium, affected the Romans as much as if ^{Consul-} the Capitol had been again seized. Mindful of the friendly part which ^{ship.}
 the Tusculans had lately acted in the affair of Herdonius, Fabius with all ^{Livy, B.} expedition marched to their relief. The enemy, to hinder succours from ^{3. c. 22,} coming to the City, had incamped an army not far from the walls.
Fabius with only a part of his forces kept that army in play, sending the remainder to assist the Tusculans to recover their Citadel. This war lasted several months. Famine compelled the Æqui to submit ; and the Tusculans made them pass unarmed and naked under the yoke. After which the Consul pursued them in their return homeward, and cut them all off to a man. * Cornelius, who had staid at Rome to guard it from any sudden attack, now marched the troops under his command from the City ; and the two Consuls, taking different roads, invaded, plundered, and laid waste the lands of the Æqui and Volsci.

At Rome the Tribunes complained that these wars were protracted merely to keep off the affair of the Law ; and they loudly declared that nothing should hinder them from going through with what they had undertaken. Nevertheless Lucretius, præfect of the City, prevailed

* According to Dionysius. p. 648, Antium ber of authors report this ; but that he does revolted this year, and was subdued by Cor- not find it in any of the earliest.
nilius. And Livy says, that the greater num-

Year of with them to defer the business till the arrival of the Consuls. ^a The ROME Consuls returned from the war, and entered the City with their armies CCXCIV. in
 B.c. J. C.

Four hundred fifty-
 eight.

Fifty-first
 Consul-
 ship.

^a Livy tells us, B. 3. c. 24, that, at this time, a new source of civil contention arose in the Republick: that the Quæstors cited M. Velsius Fictor to trial before the People, on the charge of his having given false testimony against Cæso: that the Tribunes put a stop to the prosecution, refusing to let the Comitia be held for that trial, unless they were first held for enacting their Law, and that both these affairs were put off to the return of the Consuls: that no steps were taken with regard to either before the Consuls of the new year had entered on their office: that then Cæso's uncle, Titus Quinctius (who had been thrice Consul) and Marcus Valerius, men of more weight than their predecessors, were the Quæstors: that, because Cæso, the glory of the Roman youth, could not be restored either to his family or to his country, Quinctius, from a spirit of justice, and from an affection for his kinsman, made war upon the false witness, who had deprived him, tho' innocent, of the liberty of pleading in his own defence. Is quoniam neque Quintiæ familiæ Cæso, neque reipublicæ maximus juvenis restitui posset, falsum testem, qui dicendæ causæ innoxio potestatem ademisset, justo ac pio bello persequetur. C. 25.

What Livy means to say by this I know not. For, by his own account, Cæso ran away to avoid a trial on Volsius's accusation: and, as to the crimes and misdemeanors with which the Tribunes had charged him, neither his uncle nor his own father had pretended that he was innocent. And, according to Dionysius, Cæso would not own the jurisdiction of the Court.

Notwithstanding the great weight of these Quæstors, the opposition of the Tribunes stop'd the prosecution once more. But the next year, when the father of Cæso was Dictator, the Tribunes, intimidated by his absolute power, durst not oppose the bringing Velsius to trial; and he was convicted, condemned, and banished to Lanuvium, Liv. c. 29.

Dionysius says nothing of all this, nor indeed has it any shadow of probability, if, as the Greek Historian relates, Velsius was all the time one of the Tribunes; which, according to Livy, he was not.

Mr. Verræ has followed Dionysius in making the accuser of Cæso one of the Tribunes, and yet has followed Livy in representing the accuser of Cæso as tried, convicted, and banished in that very year, when, according to Dionysius, p. 648, he was in his fourth Tribuneship.

Both Mr. Verræ and Mr. Rollin, founding themselves wholly on a passage in Cicero's Oration pro domo sua, relate, that in the short Dictatorship of Quinctius Cincinnatus, (when Velsius is said to have been banished) Cæso was recalled from banishment. Cicero's words are these: At verò, ut annales populi Romani, & monumenta vetustatis loquuntur, Cæso ille Quintius, & M. Furius Cætilius, & M. Servilius Ahala, cum essent optime de Republica meriti, tamen populi incitati vim, iracundiamque subierunt, damna- tique Comitibus Centuriatis, cum in exilium profugissent, rursus ab eodem populo placato sunt in suam pristinam dignitatem restituti. One would imagine from the total silence of Livy and Dionysius, as to the recalling of Cæso, that those Annales and Monumenta, of which Cicero speaks, were wholly unknown to them, or that they considered them as of no authority. Nor perhaps is the Orator much to be regarded, when, to serve a present turn and his own private interest, he brings precedents from ancient history of cases like his own. It is plain that neither the Latin nor the Greek Historian have taken him for their guide. But what seems decisive against the authority of Cicero, in this instance, is his saying, that Cæso was condemned in Comitia by Centuries, which is expressly contradicted by the whole History of those times. The Tribunes did not pretend to hold Comitia by Centuries, and yet they held the assembly for the trial of Cæso. If Cicero be right, and Cæso, a young Patrician, was condemned by the Centuries, it will afford a strong presumption, that all the Trials of CONSULARS in the COMITIA- RY TRIBES, which Dionysius has recorded, are mere fables.

Father Catrou, not finding that Cæso was recalled, or that any motion was made for recalling him, either when his uncle was Quæstor, or when his father was Dictator, concludes, that he was dead; or perhaps he gathers this from these words of Livy, Quoniam neque Quintiæ familiæ Cæso, neque Reipublicæ restitui posset. But there seems no need to have recourse to the supposition of Cæso's death, to account for his not being in triumph; and, because the Tribunes now said nothing of the Law, it was generally believed, that they were deterred from that pursuit: But in truth, a far different reason occasioned their silence. As the year drew towards a close, they had their thoughts wholly intent on getting themselves elected a fourth time to the Tribuneship; and, in spite of the most vigorous opposition from the Consuls, they carried their point.

Towards the end of this year the Æqui sued for peace, and the Senate made a treaty with them, importing, that they should keep possession of the towns and lands they then held, and be exempt from paying tribute to the Republick, but, like the other allies, furnish her with as many auxiliary troops as she occasionally should require.

ing recalled: for the same Tribunes who had prosecuted him were still in office, and the Bill, which had given occasion to Cæso's violences and misdemeanors, was still depending; and it is not to be imagined that the Tribunes would suffer his return to Rome, before that affair was determined. If I might have leave to conjecture, I should say, that Cæso was never recalled, that he was guilty not only of the misdemeanors with which the Tribunes charged him, but likewise of the murder of which Volsius accused him, and that this Volsius did not get the surname of Fictor from his having given false evidence, but that false evidence was in after times imputed to him by the Historians, merely on account of his surname, which meant nothing worse than The Potter.

Year of
R O M E
CCXCIV.
Bef. J. C.
Four hundred fifty-eight.
Fifty-first
Consul-
ship.
Livy, B.
3. c. 24.
D. Hal. B.
10. p. 648.

C H A P. XXIV.

§. I. L. Quinctius Cincinnatus is named to the Dictatorship; he rescues the Roman army out of extreme danger; and the 16th day after his promotion resigns his office. §. II. The Tribunes oppose the necessary levies for a war with the Æqui. They are at length induced to wave their opposition, but do it conditionally, that the Commons may be permitted to augment the number of their Tribunes to TEN.

§. I. IN the beginning of the new administration of L. Minucius and C. Nautius, Virginus and his Collegues pressed forward the affair of the Law, to bring it to a conclusion. Yet they allowed the Consuls two months time to consider of it, and expose to the People the mischiefs latent under it, if any such there were; after which it was to be proposed in Comitia and put to the vote. This concession made all quiet in the City. But the tranquillity did not last long; for the Æqui, breaking the treaty they had made the year before, invaded and plundered the territory of the Tusculans, allies of the Roman Republick, and, loaded with spoil, retired with it to the hill Algidus (about 12 miles from Rome) where they incamped. The Senate dispatched three Ambassadors thither to complain of the injury, and demand restitution. Gracchus Cluilius, General of the Æqui, had pitched his tent under a large oak for the sake of the shade. There! said he to the Ambassadors, deliver your errand to that tree! I have other business to mind. They returned to Rome and reported the reception they had met with. Instantly

Year of
R O M E
CCXCV.
Bef. J. C.
Four hundred fifty-seven.
Fifty-second
Consul-
ship.
Livy, B.
3. c. 25.
D. Hal. B.
10. p. 648.
& seq.

Year of the Senate ordered one of the Consuls to march against Gracchus, and R O M F. commissioned the other to enter the frontiers of the Æqui and lay the CCCCV. country waste. The Tribunes at first obstructed the Levies, and per-
 Bef. J. C. haps would have continued so to do, but for a second invasion. A nume-Four rous army of Sabines advanced almost to the very walls of Rome; and hundred the devastations they made could not patiently be endured by the People.
 fifty-se- Regardless of the dissuasions of their Tribunes, they now readily offered ven. themselves for the service. Two armies were presently raised. The Sa- Fifty- bines retired; Nautius marched into Sabinia, and did more than make second reprisals on the enemy. Minnius, who led his forces against the Æqui, Consul- had neither the success nor the courage of his Colleague. He pitched ship. his camp not far from the enemy, but kept close within it through fear.^a Livy, B. When the Æqui perceived his cowardice, it gave them the boldness to
 3. c. 26. attack his camp in the night; but they found it too strong to be forced.
 The next day therefore they drew lines about it, in order to starve their enemies into a surrender at discretion. Before the Romans were quite inclosed, five horsemen found means to make their way through the quarters of the Æqui, and carried the news to Rome. Quintus Fabius, Governor of the City, immediately dispatched a messenger to the Consul Nautius, to inform him of the distress his Colleague was in. Nautius leaving his army to the care of his Lieutenants repaired to Rome in all haste.
 He arrived there in the night, and without delay had a conference with the chief of the Senate, who all agreed to have recourse to the usual expedient in great exigencies, a Dictator: whereupon the Consul, with universal approbation, named L. Quinctius Cincinnatus to that important dignity, and then returned to his army.

Ibid. The persons, deputed to give Quinctius notice of his nomination to the Dictatorship, found him busily employed about his farm, either following the plough, or digging a ditch. After the common mutual salutations they desired him to put on his gown, and hear their commission to him from the Senate. What is the business, said Quinctius in surprize;
Is all well? Then, turning to his wife who was in the field with him, RACILIA, Go fetch my gown. Make haste. The dust and sweat wiped from his face, and the gown put on, the deputies straight saluted him DIC-TATOR, invited him to Rome, and informed him of the perillous condition of the army. A barge belonging to the publick was ready to convey him to the City. His three sons, his other relations and friends, and the greatest part of the Senate received him at his landing. With this attendance, and with four and twenty Lictors walking before him, he was conducted to his house. Crowds of Plebeians likewise put themselves in his train, but they were not very glad to see him; for they thought him cloathed with too much power, and feared the use he might make of it.
 They kept watch all that night.

^a Dionysius says nothing of the cowardice of Minnius, but represents him as rashly pursuing the enemy, who, by artfully re- treating before him, drew him into a disad- vantageous situation, and then blocked him up in his camp.

Quintius the next morning, before day-break, went to the Forum, and there named, for his General of the Horse, L. Tarquinius, a Patrician of distinguished bravery, but who, being too poor to keep a horse, had till then never served but in the infantry. Thus all the hopes of the Republic lay in an old man, called from the plough to command in chief, and a foot soldier, raised to be General of the Horse.

Year of
R O M E
CCXCV.
Bef. J. C.
Four hundred fifty-seven.
Fifty-second
Consul-
ship.

The Dictator, by proclamation, ordered a suspension of all process in the courts of justice, the shops to be shut up, and all the Citizens, able to bear arms, to be before sun-set in the field of Mars, each with five days provisions, and twelve stakes for a palisade. Whoever through age was disqualified for the service, was to dress the provisions for the soldier who lived nearest him, while he furnished himself with the stakes and got ready his arms.

All these commands punctually executed, and the forces drawn up in good order, not only for marching, but fighting, if need should require, the Dictator, at the head of the Infantry, and Tarquinius, at the head of the Cavalry, led forth the army. No alacrity was wanting either in the commanders, or their men. Quicken your pace, soldiers, said the leaders, let us come up with them this very night. Expedition! a Roman Consul and his army besieged! three days invested! who knows what may happen in a day or a night? A single moment often decides in great events. The Generals had the pleasure to hear the soldiers, and those who bore the colours, mutually call upon each other, Faster, Ensigns! Soldiers, keep up! And thus by midnight they reached the Algidus.

Quintius made a halt, as soon as he perceived he was near the enemy. And when, by riding about, he had taken such a view of their camp as the obscurity of the night would permit, he ordered his men to heap all the baggage together in one place, and then return into their ranks with their stakes they had brought from Rome. This done, he extended his forces and invested the camp on his side of it: after which, on an appointed signal given, the soldiers all together gave a shout, and then fell every man to work to cut a trench before him and plant his stakes. The shout reached beyond the camp of the Æqui to that of the Consul. Sudden terror seized the one, universal joy the other. Nothing among the Roman soldiers but mutual congratulations on the arrival of succour. No time to be lost! cried Minucius. Not only succour is come, but our fellow Citizens are actually in conflict with the enemy. I know it by the shout. To arms, to arms, I'll lead me, soldiers. Out sallied the legions to action, and by their shouts gave notice of it to the Dictator. The Æqui were just going to make an effort to interrupt the works the Dictator had begun, when the alarm from the other side obliged them to turn their chief strength that way, lest the Consul should break through their camp. His attack kept them in play till the morning, so that Quintius had the rest of the night free to go on with his fortification. Having finished it by day-break, he straight led out his forces to assault that of the enemy. A new conflict began; the former continued. The

Æqui,

Year of Æqui, now pressed on both sides, hopeless of defending themselves, ROME hopeless of relief, ceased the fight, and had recourse to supplications. CCXCV. They begged of the Dictator, they begged of the Consul, not to place Æqui victory in slaughter, but to suffer them to go off disarmed. The Consul referred them to the Dictator. Quintius contemptuously answered them, that he did not want their blood, he would let them go; but that, by passing under the yoke, they should at length make confession, that the Æqui were a conquered People. But first, said he, send me hither in chains your General Gracchus, and ten other of your principal officers [with these he meant to adorn his triumph] and you shall evacuate the City of Corbio. All was submitted to.

Liv. B. 3. The Dictator gave the ^a plunder of the enemy's camp to the soldiers c. 29. & he had brought with him from Rome, not suffering those of the Consul to D. Hal. B. take any part of it. "You soldiers, said he, who were just going to 10. p. 652. "fall a prey to our enemies, you shall have no share of their spoils." Then, turning to the Consul, "And you, Minucius, till you begin to "have the spirit of a Consul, shall command these legions in quality "only of a Lieutenant General." Minucius abdicated the Consulship, and, in obedience to order, continued ^b with the army. Such respect, such ready submission to superior merit, and superior authority, were paid in those days, that the consular troops, less affected with the disgrace they suffered, than with the benefit they had received, decreed to the Dictator a golden crown of a pound weight, and at his departure saluted him by the title of their Patron.

Quintius returned to Rome and had there a magnificent triumph; after which, tho' he might have retained his High Office six months, he resigned it the sixteenth ^c day from his promotion to it.

Livy, In the end of the year the Tribunes began to stir again in the affair ibid. of the Law: but as two armies were absent (for the Consul Nautius made war against the Sabines) the Senate carried it, that no Bill should be preferred to the people; nevertheless, in the election of Tribunes, the Commons prevailed to have the same men, who had held the Tribuneship four years successively, appointed a fifth time to that office.

D. Hal. B. §. II. THE consular fasces were transferred to C. Horatius and Q. 10. p. 652. Minucius. In the beginning of their administration, they had nothing to & seq. do abroad; but the Tribunes, with their Bill, found them sufficient Liv. B. 3. c. 30.

^a Dionysius reports (p. 652.) that Quintius, after plundering Corbio, caused the most valuable part of the enemies spoils to be conveyed to Rome, giving the remainder only to his soldiers, and that the Senate would have enriched him out of the booty; but that he declined the offer, and chose rather to owe his subsistence to the labour of his hands.

^b According to Livy, Quintus Fabius was soon after sent from Rome to succeed Minucius in the command of the army.

^c The reader will observe that Quintius defeated the Æqui, and took their camp the third day from his nomination to the Dictatorship. The greater part of the remainder of the 16 days, we may suppose, was spent in taking possession of Corbio, plundering it, and placing a garrison there. This, according to Dionysius, p. 651, was done by way of revenging the ill treatment which the Tusculans had suffered from the Æqui.

employment

employment at home; yet it was not long before the dispute on this head gave place to another: for news came, that the Æqui had in the night surpris'd the Roman garrison of Corbio, and taken the place by assault. The Senate without delay ordered an army to be rais'd, and led to the Algidus. No Levies! said the Tribunes; the Bill is the important point, the business that must be first settled. Neither Consuls nor Senate would hear of the Bill. Both sides continued obstinate, till a second alarm was given from abroad. The Sabines made an incursion into the Roman territory, and advanced almost to the city walls. The Tribunes then, seeing a necessity of arming, began to treat with the Senate. As they had been constantly baffled, though in office five years successively, they judg'd, that it was for want of a sufficient number in their college, and therefore resolv'd to seize the present occasion to get it augmented. "On one condition, said they, we shall consent to your raising troops. The thing will be of little consequence to you, and will please the Commons very much; perhaps make them easy as to all their other demands. Allow them to have, for the future, TEN Tribunes instead of only five."

In the debates of the Senate on this motion, Caius Claudius oppos'd it with great warmth. He said, "that to grant the Commons more Tribunes would have no good effect upon them, it would only make them more untractable and insolent. The partition of the lands, Terentius's Bill, and every project for diminishing the authority of the Senate, and increasing the power of the People, would presently be revived: and, in short, that an augmentation of the number of Tribunes would have the worst consequences imaginable." But Quintilius Cincinnatus, whose judgment had greater weight with the Senate than that of Claudius, consider'd the matter in a different light, and was of opinion, that what the Plebeians sued for, as a favour, would turn to their disadvantage when obtained; because it would be easier to sow division among Ten Tribunes than among five, and he therefore exhorted the Fathers to a concession. His advice prevail'd. The request was granted, but conditionally, that the Tribunes then in office should not be rechosen. To this the petitioners agreed, and held the Comitia immediately for ^a Dionysius, p. 654, reports, that, when the Tribunes were obstinate in opposing the Levies, all the Senators, by the advice of Quintilius Cincinnatus, took arms and repaired to the Forum, determined to march out (supported only by their clients and adherents) against the enemy; that even the oldest of the Fathers appear'd in armour, but wept and look'd so pitifully, that the spectacle drew tears in abundance from the multitude, and a most ridiculous scene of affliction the Historian, p. 655, most piteously makes of it. He adds, that the Tribunes, seeing the People so melted, and fearing that they should not be able to hinder the [weeping] Plebeians from following the [weeping] Patricians to the war, began then to covenant for an augmentation of the College, &c.

^b Livy's words seem to make the condition general, that the Commons should never, for the future, chuse the same men twice to the Tribuneship, ne postea eosdem Tribunos juberent. If this was the condition, the People did not observe it, as we shall presently see.

The increase of the number of Tribunes to ten was 36 years after the erection of Tribuneship.

the

Year of
R O M E
CCXCVI.
Bef. J. C.
Four hundred fifty-six.
Fifty-
third Consul-
ship.

D.Hal.B.
10.p.656.

p. 657.

Year of the nomination of Ten Tribunes, as having learnt by experience, that they might meet with a disappointment, should they put off the election to the end of the war. Two out of each of the five first Classes were chosen; a method observed ever after.

The commotion thus quieted, troops were raised. Minucius marched to attack the Sabines, but found no enemy in the field. Horatius defeated the Æqui, and retook Corbio.

Fifty-third
Consulship.
D. Hal. B.
10. p. 657.
Livy, B.
3. c. 30.

C H A P. XXV.

§. I. The Tribunes make a new demand in favour of the People; and the Senate, after some struggle, comply. §. II. The Consuls, by an imprudent severity in letting soldiers, give occasion to an unprecedented insult upon their dignity from the Tribunes. §. III. The Agrarian and Terentian Laws are proposed anew. Sicinius Dentatus, an old soldier, makes a notable speech in relation to the former. The Patricians by violence hinder the suffrages from being collected. §. IV. The Consuls lead an army into the field against the Æqui. They order Sicinius Dentatus, at the head of 800 Veterans, upon a desperate enterprise. He remonstrates against it, but obeys, and succeeds so well, as to occasion the total defeat of the enemy by the Consuls. At his return to Rome he prevails with the People to refuse them a triumph; and they are condemned the next year in a fine for misconduct.

Year of §. I. IN the Consulship of M. Valerius and Sp. Virginius, the Tribunes demanded that mount Aventine should be granted to the People, or at least those parts of it which were not occupied by lawful purchasers. L. Icilius, the head of the college, set forth, that the land of that hill belonged to the Republick; that some Patricians had indeed purchased certain parcels of it, but others had got possession of what they enjoyed by mere usurpation, and that the remaining part of it was uncultivated and uninhabited. He proposed therefore, that those Patricians, who could shew good claims to what they possessed, should be confirmed in their possessions; but that those, who had built houses upon the hill, without lawful title to the ground, should be outed; previously reimbursed however what they had expended in building those houses; and, lastly, that all the land uncultivated, or unoccupied by rightful owners, should be given gratis to the Commons, who growing daily more numerous began to want habitations.

There could be no plausible objection to this proposal, and it was a matter of small importance to the Nobles; yet the Consuls, apprehending, perhaps, that, from such a partition of mount Aventine, the Plebeians might take occasion to renew their old pretensions upon the conquered lands, deferred convening the Fathers, whom the Tribunes had desired to consider of the matter, and then refer it to the People. Icilius impatient patient of this delay, sent a command to the Consuls by an apparitor, Year of to assemble the Senate forthwith. The apparitor met with a rough re- R O M E ception. A Licitor by the Consuls orders gave him some blows, and CCXCVII.

drove him away ignominiously. A mighty uproar ensued. Icilius Bef. J. C. caused the Licitor to be seized, and was for having him thrown head- Four hun-long from the Tarpeian rock. The Consuls, not daring to employ vio- dred fifty-lence to rescue him out of the hands of the sacrosanct Tribunes, endea- five.
voured to gain over some one of them, who might put a stop to the Fifty-fury of his colleague: But Icilius had before taken measures to defeat fourth that artifice. He had so warmly represented to his Brethren, that the Consul-strength of their College lay wholly in their union, that they had agreed, ship.
no one among them should oppose what was determined by plurality of voices. Thus the poor Licitor saw himself just upon the point of losing his life, for having obeyed the orders of the Consuls too punctually.
To save him, the Conscrip Fathers had recourse to intreaties; and they seem to have been constrained to a composition with the Tribunes: These released the Licitor, and the Senate, by a Decree, yielded mount Aven- tine to the people; a concession of small importance, as was before observed; yet the measures, used to obtain it, made a very great breach in the consular authority: for the Tribunes kept themselves ever after in possession of the new prerogative, assumed by Icilius and his Colleagues, of convening the Senate.

§. II. THE next year T. Romilius and C. Veturius were Consuls. Year of These Magistrates, apprehending that the present quiet in the City would R O M E soon be disturbed, unless the Republick had a war abroad, resolved to CCXCVIII. lead out an army against the Æqui. * But this their policy they them- Bef. J. C. selves defeated, by the unseasonable rigour with which they proceeded in Four the inrollments. They admitted of no excuses, how allowable soever, hundred and condemned to heavy fines and imprisonment all those who refused fifty-to enlist themselves for the war. Icilius and his Colleagues (who had been four.
continued in the Tribuneship at the new elections) did not fail to take Fifty-the part of the complainants, and, when they found that words were in- fifth Con-effectual, endeavoured by force to rescue the prisoners out of the hands sulship.
of the Licitors; they even went so far in their fury as to bid the Ædiles D. Hal. B.
lay hold on the Consuls, and lead them to prison. The Patricians all 10. p. 660.
united as one man to defend the supreme Magistrates; blows ensued; and, for this time, the Consuls got the better in the scuffle; the Tribunes were routed, and roughly treated. But the triumph of the Nobles was of short duration. The next day, and the following, great numbers of Plebeians flocked from the Country to the City; and the Tribunes then, finding themselves in a condition to deal with their adversaries, held frequent councils, to which they complained most heavily of the insults they

* According to Livy, B. 2. c. 31. it was to succour those affectionate friends of Rome, the Tusculans (whose territory the Æqui had invaded) that the Consuls began to raise an
VOL. I.

army. And this accounts for the Tribunes not opposing the Levies, but only the unreasonable severity of the Consuls in making them.
T t had

Year of had suffered; protesting at the same time, that they would lay down their R O M E office, if they could not be supported in the exercise of it. And now, ccxcviii. encouraged by the Commons, who with great warmth entered into their Bef. J. C. Magistrates resentments, they made no scruple to send a summons to the Four hun- Consuls to appear before an Assembly of the People, and answer for their dred fifty- conduct; the first instance of citing the superior Magistrates to trial, four. during their Magistracy.

Fifty fifth The Consuls refusing to listen to the summons, away went the Tri-Consul- bunes to the Senate, then sitting in debate on these matters, and having slip. first in a plaintive tone set forth "the violence which had been done
 "to their sacred persons, by the Consuls or their adherents," demanded preremptorily, "that those Magistrates might either clear themselves by "oath from having had any hand in that violence, or, if they scrupled
 "to take such oath, appear in judgment before the people;" and they added, "that, for their parts, they would take the votes of the Tribes "upon the affair."

In answer to all this, the Consuls reproached the Tribunes "with hav"ing been the aggressors, and with having carried their insolence to such "excess, as first to attempt imprisoning the sovereign Magistrates of the "State, and afterwards, when they failed in that, to cite them to appear "in judgment before an Assembly of the People; though by Law they "had no right to summon thither even the most inconsiderable of the "Patricians, without a previous Senatus Consultum for that purpose."
 D.Hal.B. And they declared, "that, if the Tribunes were so audacious as to pro-10.p.661. ceed towards collecting the votes of the people, they would arm the "whole body of the Patricians."

These mutual reproaches and menaces lasted the whole day; and the Senate, thinking it equally dangerous to declare either for the Consuls, or the Tribunes, came to no resolution.

§. III. THE Tribunes, finding that nothing was to be expected from the Fathers, called the People together, to deliberate on the proper measures to be taken.

The most turbulent and hot-headed were for retiring in arms a second time to the Mons Sacer, and thence declaring open war against the Patricians, for having broken the treaty which had there been made.

Others, more in number, judged it not adviseable to leave the City, nor equitable to impute to the whole body of the Nobles the violences which some particulars had acted against the sacred persons of the Tribunes; provided that strict justice were done upon the guilty, who had incurred the penalty of death or exile, [and might be punished according to Law, without any previous process.]

Others, again, more moderate, declared against putting any Citizen to death, before trial and condemnation in legal form, and especially, when the question was concerning the Consuls, the supreme Magistrates of the Republick: but they counselled the assembly to discharge their wrath on those who had aided the Consuls, and to punish them according to the utmost rigour of the Laws.

As

As nothing could be immediately agreed upon, a little time diminished the fury of the Tribunes, and at length the conclusion was, that the third market-day they would hold an assembly, to condemn the Consuls in a pecuniary fine. However, before the 27 days were quite expired, they changed their mind; and, having assembled the People, declared, that at the intreaty of several worthy men, to whom it was not easy to refuse any thing, they were willing to forgive the personal injuries they themselves had suffered, but could never pardon those which had been done to the People, and would therefore instantly renew the prosecution of those two important affairs, the Agrarian and Terentian Laws, the publication of which had been so long postponed by the artifices of the Patricians. This said, they fixed a day for a new Assembly to deliberate and decide upon those matters.

Year of
R O M E
ccxcviii.
Bef. J. C.
Four hundred fifty-four.

Fifty-fifth
Consulship.

The People being met at the time appointed, Icilius began with proposing the Agrarian Law; and, when he had himself made a long harangue on the reasonableness of it, notified, that any Plebeian present might speak his mind freely. Upon this several stood forth successively, pleaded the right their services gave them to a share of the conquered lands, and were all heard with pleasure. But nothing so much quickened the zeal of the Assembly in behalf of the Law, as the discourse of * Sicinius Dentatus, a Plebeian, who had served long, and distinguished himself by his exploits in the Wars. He was a man of noble aspect, and, though now 58 years of age, in his full strength of body as well as mind. With a soldierly eloquence he spoke to this effect: "It is now forty years " that I have borne arms, and for the thirty last I have been always in " some command or other. I have been in an hundred and twenty " engagements. I have received forty-five wounds, and all before,
" twelve of them in that single action against Herdennius, the Sabine.
" Fourteen * civick crowns I obtained for having saved the lives of so " many

D. Hal. B.
10. p. 662.

* Siccus
according to Livy.

p. 663. &
seq.

* Of the military rewards in use among the Romans, Mr. Kennet [Part 2. Book 4. Chap. 16.] speaks thus:

The encouragements of valour and industry were much more considerable than the proceedings against the contrary vices. The most considerable (not to speak of the promotion from one station to another, nor of the occasional donatives in money, distinguished by this name from the largesses bestowed on the common people, and termed Congiararia) were first the dona imperatoria, such as

The hasta pura, a fine spear of wood without any iron on it; such a one as Virgil has given Sylvius in the sixth of the Æneids:

Ille, vides? purâ juvenis qui nititur hastâ.

This present was usually bestowed on him, who in some little skirmish had killed an enemy, engaging him hand to hand. They were reckoned very honourable gifts, and the Gods are commonly represented with such spears, on the old coins. Mr. Walker derives hence the custom of our great Officers carrying white rods or staves, as ensigns of their places.

The armillæ, a sort of bracelets, given upon account of some eminent service, only to such as were born Romans.

The torques, golden and silver collars, wreathed with curious art and beauty. Pliny attributes the golden collars to the auxiliaries, and the silver to the Roman soldiers; but this is supposed to be a mistake.

The phalæxæ, commonly thought to be a suit of rich trappings for a horse; but because we find them bestowed on the foot, as well as the cavalry, we may rather suppose them

Year of " many citizens in battle; three mural crowns for having been the first ROME " that mounted the breach in towns taken by assault; one obsidional ccxcviii. " crown; eight other crowns for different exploits; eighty-three golden Bef. J. C. " collars, sixty golden bracelets, eighteen lances (hasta pura) twenty-Fourhun- " dred fifty-four.

them to have been golden chains, of like nature with the torques, only that they seem to have hung down to the breast; whereas the others only went round the neck. The hopes of these two last are particularly urged, among the advantages of a military life by Juvenal, Sat. xvi. 60.

Ut lati phaleris omnes, & torquibus omnes.

The venilla, a sort of banners of different colours, worked in silk or other curious materials, such as Augustus bestowed on Agrippa, after he had won the sea-fight at Actium.

Next to these were the several coronets received on various occasions. As,

Corona civica, given to any soldier who had saved the life of a Roman citizen in an engagement. This was reckoned more honourable than any other crown, tho' composed of no better materials than oaken boughs. Virgil calls it civilis quercus, Æn. vi. 772.

Atque umbrata gerunt civili tempora quercu.

Plutarch has guessed very happily at the reason why the branches of this tree should be made use of before all others. For, the oaken wreath, says he, being otherwise sacred to Jupiter, the great guardian of their city, they might therefore think it the most proper ornament for him who had preserved a citizen. Besides, the oak may very well claim the preference in this case, because, in the primitive times, that tree alone was thought almost sufficient for the preserving of man's life: Its acorns were the principal diet of the old mortals, and the honey which was commonly found there, presented them with a very pleasant * liquor.

It was a particular honour conferred on the persons who had merited this crown, that, when they came to any of the publick shows, the whole company, as well Senate as People, should signify their respect, by rising up when they saw them enter; and that they should take their seat on these occasions among the Senators; being also excused from all troublesome duties and services in their own persons, and procuring the same immunity for their father and grandfather by his † side.

Corona muralis, given to him who first scaled the walls of a city in a general assault; and therefore in the shape of it there was some allusion made to the figure of a wall.

Corona castrensis, or vallaris, the reward of him who had first forced the enemies into trenchments.

Corona navalis, bestowed on such as had signalled their valour in an engagement at sea; being set round with figures like the beaks of ships.

— Cui belli insigne superbum Tempora navali fulgent rostrata Coronâ.
Virg. Æn. viii. 684.

Lipfius fancies the corona navalis, and the rostrata, to have been two distinct species, though they are generally believed to be the same kind of crown.

Corona obsidionalis: This was not, like the rest, given by the General to the soldiers, but presented by the common consent of the soldiers to the General, when he had delivered the Romans or their allies from a siege. It was composed of the grass growing in the besieged places.

Corona triumphalis, made with wreaths of lawrel, and proper only to such Generals as had the honour of a triumph. In after-ages this was changed for ‡ gold, and not only retrained to those that actually triumphed, but presented on several other accounts, as commonly by the foreign states and provinces to their patrons and benefactors. Several of the other crowns too are thought to have been of gold, as the castrensis, the mural, and the naval.

Besides these, we meet with the coronæ aureæ, often bestowed on soldiers without any other additional term. And Dion Cassius mentions a particular sort of coronet made of olive boughs, and bestowed, like the rest, in consideration of some signal act of valour. Lipfius believes these to have succeeded in the room of the golden crowns, after they were laid aside.

* Vide Plutarch, in Coriolano. † Vide Plin. lib. 16. cap. 4. ‡ Aurum Coronarium.

" five

“ five sets of furniture for horses, nine of which I won from so many “ enemies conquered in single combat.—And now, Romans, you know “ my services, and you have heard what have been the rewards of them, “ rewards that sufficiently prove my courage, but make little addition “ to my fortune. No land, no share in conquered countries. Nei“ ther Sicinius, nor any of you Plebeians, the companions of my la“ bours and my glory, are to reap the least benefit from those acqui“ sitions. The Patricians, it seems, by their noble birth, have an inherent “ right to all the publick demesnes. No matter whether they have “ any merit or not. But is this to be endured? Shall they alone enjoy “ the fruits of our conquests? The purchase of our blood? No, Plebeians, “ let us delay no longer to do ourselves justice. Without so much as hear“ ing what the usurpers have to say against it, let us this very day pass
 “ the Law proposed by Idilius. If the young Patricians have the Boldness “ to oppose by violence the collecting of the votes, let our Tribunes make “ them feel what is the extent of their authority.”

Year of
R O M E
ccxcviii.
Bef. J. C.
Fourhun-
dred fifty-four.
Fifty-
fifth Consul-
ship.

Sicinius having thus closed, Idilius highly commended both the speaker and his speech, yet added, that in one thing he must differ from him; for that the People could neither in justice nor in prudence refuse to hear what the Patricians had to say against the Law; and so he adjourned the Assembly to the day following.

§. IV. THE Consuls during great part of the night held conference with the chief men of the Senate, on measures to frustrate the designs of the Tribune. No expedient offered itself, but the old method; which was forcibly to hinder the People from proceeding to vote.

D. Hal. B.
10. p. 666.

The next morning, the Assembly being formed, the Tribunes caused proclamation to be made, that whosoever had any solid reasons to offer against the Law, might, if they pleased, lay them before the People.
 Divers Senators presented themselves one after another; but, the moment they began to speak, such a noise arose from all parts of the Comitium, some applauding, others hooting, as made it impossible to hear what was said. The Consuls, full of indignation, protested warmly against all that should be done in so tumultuous an Assembly: To which the Tribunes answered, that it was no wonder the People should be tired with hearing the same trite and frivolous objections so often repeated. When a great part of the day had been spent in such altercations, the Multitude, quite weary of them, called out, To the Vote. In that instant the Patricians, who, in small companies, had posted themselves in almost all parts of the Comitium, fell all at once upon the Plebeians, and by blows and main force hindered them, from gathering into their respective tribes. The Tribunes exclaim, break through the press, hasten to assist the Plebeians, and rectify the disorder. Vain are their efforts; their own sacred persons are suffered safely to pass whithersoever they please; but, their followers being stopped by the Patricians, they can do nothing, their measures are disconcerted, they are forced to retire.

They

Year of
R O M E
643.
Bel. J. C.
Four hundred fifty-four.

fifth Consul-
ship.
D. Hal. B.
10. p. 667.

They convened the people again the next day, and made their complaints. Most of the young Patricians had been concerned in raising the tumult; but, as it was impracticable to punish all the guilty, only the youth of the Postumian, Sempronian, and Clelian families were singled out for prosecution; and cited to appear before an Assembly of the People.

The best heads in the Senate having consulted together on this occasion, and knowing that the Tribunes had determined to inflict no severer punishment on the criminals than the confiscation of their effects, thought it advisable to acquiesce, not only because they could easily repair the loss to the sufferers, but because they hoped that the multitude, satisfied with this revenge, would drop the pursuit of the Law. When the day came for the trial, the persons accused, not appearing, were condemned for default; their goods were afterwards sold publicly; and the produce consecrated to Ceres. The Senate caused those goods to be bought up with their money by private Hands, and shortly after restored them to the former Proprietors.

p. 668. §. V. IT was not very long before the Tribunes brought on again the affair of the Law for a Partition of the Lands. But their proceedings were now interrupted by sudden advice, that the Æqui had invaded the territory of Tusculum, and threatened the town. The Senate without delay ordered an army to the relief of those dear Allies, the Tusculans; nor could the Tribunes divert the Pebeians from offering themselves to serve in this war. Even Sicinius Dentatus, that zealous advocate for the Agrarian Law, presented himself a volunteer with 800 veterans, who, like himself, had compleated the years of service prescribed by Law, but yet were willing to make another campaign under the particular command of Sicinius, to whom they had, most of them, personal obligations.

p. 669. The army marched from Rome, and advanced towards the * Algidus, the usual haunt of the Æqui, and whither they had retired on the news of the Consuls approach. These Generals, having found the enemy intrenched on the hill, pitched their camp not far from them, fortified it well, and kept close within it, to conceal their strength, which was very considerable. The Æqui took these precautions for a sign of fear, and, imagining the number of the Romans to be small, made several attempts to bring them to an engagement. One day when Romilius commanded in chief, and the Æqui descending from their hill offered him battle, he resolved to accept the challenge. With this view he sent for Sicinius Dentatus, and said to him, “My Colleague and I intend to march against the enemy in the plain, and in the mean time I would have you, with the cohort under your command, ascend by yon narrow winding way to the top of the hill, and attack their intrenchments. They have undoubtedly left but a weak garrison there, and your brave

* According to Dionysius the scene of action was near the city of Antium. But there is probably an error in the Copy; it should be the city of Algidum, which stood upon mount Algidus. Livy says, the Æqui were posted on the Algidus; and this was in the neighbourhood of the Tusculans.

“ veterans

“ veterans will easily make themselves masters of the camp. If the “ Æqui here below, to preserve it, quit the plain, we shall then fall upon “ their rear, and their destruction will be inevitable.” Sicinius answered, “ I am always ready to obey orders. But give me leave to say, that the “ execution of what you now command is not so easy as you seem to “ imagine it. The hill is very high and steep, and I see but one way up “ to it. We shall no sooner be engaged in that narrow pass, but the “ enemy will infallibly pour down upon us; and how shall I be able,
 “ with my body of veterans alone, to sustain their charge from the “ higher ground? You are willing to suppose that the guard of the camp “ is weak. There is no probability of this; and, even granting it certain, “ their very situation alone gives them such an advantage over us, that we “ shall never be able to force them.”

Year of
R O M E
ccxcviii.
Bef. J. C.
Fourhun-
dred fifty four.
Fifty-
fifth Consul-
ship.

Sicinius was going on with his remonstrance, when the Consul in great anger cut him short; bidding him not pretend to act the General, but remember his only business was to obey. He added, “ but, if you think “ there is too much danger in the enterprise, I shall employ some other “ Officer, who, less conceited of his own abilities, may succeed better.
 “ And you, mighty Captain, you that have followed the wars forty years,
 “ that have been in an hundred and twenty battles, and whose whole “ body is covered over with wounds, do you return to Rome without “ having dared to face the enemy, and carry back to the Forum that elo“ quent tongue, which is more formidable to your fellow-citizens than “ your sword is to the Æqui, and the enemies of your country.”

D. Hal. B.
10. p. 670.

Sicinius, irritated by the General's reproaches, answered him boldly, that he found he was resolved either to destroy an old soldier, or to shame him, and for no other reason but his honest zeal for the publick liberty; but that one was much easier to do than the other; that he would march up to the enemy's camp, and win it, or fall in the attempt with all his cohort. These veterans then took their leave of the rest of the soldiers, who looked after them, with weeping eyes, as after men sent to the slaughter. Happily for them they were under the conduct of an old Officer who understood his trade. Sicinius went round about a tedious way, and at length entered a great wood, that seemed to stretch along the hills quite to the enemy's camp. Here having halted a moment, “ Cheer up, my lads; either I am much mistaken, or I shall find “ some path that will lead us more safely to the enemy's camp, than “ that which our General pointed out, and by which we could not “ have approached it without being seen.” He then continued his march, and soon after met with a peasant, who, serving him for a guide, conducted him at length to an eminence, that overlooked the camp, and was not far from it.

During this march the two armies came to an engagement in the plain. They fought a great while with equal courage, and victory did not declare for either side. The soldiers in the camp of the Æqui, not apprehending any danger from behind, were all got to the side next the plain.

P. 671-

Year of
R O M E
ccxcviii.
Bef. J. C.
Four hundred fifty-four.
Fifty-
fifth Consul-
ship.

plain to see the fight. In this juncture Sicinius arrived on the other side, and finding it without Centinels, and quite defenceless, entered the camp at once. Then the veterans giving a loud shout fell upon the Æqui, whose eyes were turned another way. The sudden fright which seized the latter made them imagine their enemies to be much more numerous than they were; so that, without staying to gather up their arms, all that could fled out of the camp, and ran precipitately down to the main body of their army, carrying fear and confusion along with them. Sicinius followed them close, and came thundering upon the rear of that main body, engaged in battle with the Roman army. The Æqui, broken and put to flight, lost 7000 men, the Consuls not giving over the pursuit 'till night.

As soon as it was dark, and the action quite over, Sicinius retired with his veterans to the camp he had before taken. He had not lost one man, nor of the whole number was there one who had received a wound. With mutual embraces they congratulated each other on their good fortune, and all joined in heaping praises on their commander. About midnight Sicinius, full of resentment against the Consuls, formed a resolution to hinder them, if possible, from having the honours of a triumph, at their return to Rome. His companions, to whom he imparted his design, having unanimously approved it, they cut the Throats of the prisoners, killed the horses, set fire to the tents, the arms, and all the baggage, (including the rich plunder which the Æqui had got in the territory of Tusculum) leaving none of those marks of victory which were required from a General when he demanded the TRIUMPH. He then marched away with extreme diligence, arrived at Rome with his cohort, and there gave an account to the people of what had passed, complaining of the inhumanity of the Consuls, who, he said, had maliciously exposed eight hundred veterans to death, in all likelihood, unavoidable, and claiming the whole honour of the victory to himself and his cohort. Not only the People, but the Senate entered with warmth into his resentments, and absolutely refused the Consuls a triumph at their return^a.

And

^a The reader will give what credit he pleases to this account, from Dionysius, of what passed in the Consulship of Romilius and Veturius. Livy makes no mention of the disputes about the Agrarian Law, or of Sicinius's notable speech, or of the decree against the three Patricians, or of Sicinius's exploit in the war against the Æqui. All that the Latin Historian says of the events of this year is to the following effect: That the ten Tribunes revived the affair of the Bill [for an establishment of Laws:] That their pursuit of it was interrupted by news from the Tusculans, of the Æqui having invaded their territory: That the Romans could not refuse assistance to such affectionate allies: That the Consuls defeated the enemy in battle near the Algidus, slew 7000 of them, and got a great booty, which they sold, because money was wanting in the treasury: That this angered the soldiers, and furnished the Tribunes with matter for accusing the Consuls. Liv. B. 3. c. 31.

FATHER Rouillé observes, that the learned, and Glarean in particular, have charged Livy with a faulty negligence, in passing over the dispute about the AGRARIAN Law, Sicinius's speech, and the condemnation of the three families.

As to the Agrarian Law, it seems not improbable that the Tribunes at this time brought it again into agitation in order to terrify

And they had no sooner resigned the Fasces (to Sp. Tarpeius and A. Æternius) but they were cited to appear before an Assembly of the People on a day fixed. Sicinius (whom the People had raised to the Tribuneship) charged Romilius; one of the Ediles charged Veturius. The accusations^a ran upon certain insults, which, during their Consulship, they had offered to the Tribunes; and upon the affair of Sicinius and his veterans; and the People fined them both, Romilius in ten thousand Ases, and Veturius in fifteen thousand. History does not inform us of the reason of the difference which the People made in their fines: It was perhaps because Veturius had the greater hand in the ill treatment of Icilius's apparitor. What favours this conjecture is, that at the same time a Law passed with the consent of both orders in the State, That any Magistrate should have power to lay fines upon such persons as failed of due respect to his dignity: A prerogative reserved before to the Consuls only. But, to prevent any particular Magistrate from abusing and stretching his authority in this point, it was provided by the same Law, that the highest fines for such offences should never exceed the value of two oxen and thirty sheep.

Year of
R O M E.
CCXCIX.
Bef. J. C.
Four hundred fifty-three.
Fifty-
sixth Consul-
ship.
D. Hal. B.
10. p. 673.
Vertot.
D. Hal. B.
10. p. 674.

terrify the Nobles, and thereby facilitate the passing of Terentius's Bill concerning Laws. And perhaps it was this alarm which occasioned the Senate's so readily consenting presently after to let Terentius's proposal take place as to the substance of it. For this sudden compliance is not well accounted for by the Historians. There seems to have been a compromise. Cease your pursuit of the Partition of the Lands, and you shall have a Body of Laws established.

But, as to Sicinius's Speech, the Writers who are most fond of it do themselves, by their disagreement, furnish reasons to doubt. Dionysius, as we have seen, gives this hero 25 sets of furniture, for so many victories in single combats. Pliny, B. 7. Val. Max. B. 3. and Solinus c. 6. allow him only 8. But then, to make him amends, (as Father Rouillé observes) Val. Max. gives him 180 collars instead of only 88, and Pliny above 160 bracelets instead of only 60.

THE REASON why Livy says nothing of Sicinius's exploit in the war, which Veturius and Romilius conducted against the Æqui, is evident: He did not believe one word of it. What he relates is contradictory to Dionysius's account. For, according to the Latine Historian, the Consuls sold all the plenteous spoil of the enemy, and sent the produce to the Treasury; whereas, according to the Greek Historian, Sicinius burnt and destroyed every thing, to the end that the Consuls, having no marks of victory to shew, might be refused a Triumph.

If one considers the singular negligence of the Consuls after the victory, with regard to the enemy's camp, which contained such a rich booty; the monstrous breaches of discipline imputed to that old soldier Sicinius; the injustice which, in burning the spoil, he is guilty of towards the Consuls troops, who expected to share it among them, and with whom he was in terms of affection; and lastly the Senate's approving all this conduct, and taking part with him against the Consuls: I say, if one considers these things, it may incline one to believe, that Dionysius borrowed his account from some Memoirs as authentick as the History of Guy Earl of Warwick.

^a When Livy (B. 3. c. 31.) tells us, that the Consuls by selling the booty for the use of the Treasury [instead of giving it to the soldiers] furnished the Tribunes with matter for accusing them to the Plebeians, he probably means no more, but that the Tribunes took advantage of the anger which this proceeding raised in the minds of the soldiers, to forward a prosecution of the Consuls on another accusation, namely, their violences in the dispute about the Law.

C H A P. XXVI.

§. I. The Senate and People agree to send Deputies to Athens to copy out the Laws of Solon and of the other Lawgivers of Greece, in order to form thereby a body of Roman Law. §. II. In the Consulate of P. Sestius and T. Menenius, the Deputies return from Greece. The People press the nomination of ten Commissioners or Decemvirs, who are to compile the new Laws. The Consuls, to avoid proceeding in this affair, have recourse to various pretences. It is carried in the Senate by a majority, to create Decemvirs; and the Tribunes, after some struggle, consent to let them be all Patricians. §. III. The election is made in Comitia by Centuries. The Decemvirs compose TEN TABLES OF LAWS, which are approved by the whole Roman People.

Year of
R O M E
CCXCIX.
Bef. J. C.
Four hundred fifty-
three.
Fifty-
sixth Consul-
ship.
D. Hal. B.
10 p. 674.
675.

§. I. THE Law before mentioned, concerning fines for disrespect to Magistrates, had (according to Dionysius) been proposed by the present Consuls, Tarpeius and Æternius, to make their court to the People. For these Consuls were * terrified by the ill treatment of their predecessors, whose cause the Senate had but weakly defended, after giving them encouragement to hope an effectual Protection. And by the same terror they were induced to side with the Tribunes in the project for an establishment of Laws, and move it in the Senate. The house was now divided in opinion, and, to the great surprise of every body, Romilius, whom the People had so lately fined, declared for granting to the People the Laws they so much desired. He assigned for the reason of his change the experienced want of resolution in the Senate, to support the Consuls in their opposition to the Tribunes. And, as to forming a body of Laws, he advised the Fathers to send Deputies into Greece, who should copy the celebrated Laws of Solon at Athens, and likewise inform themselves of the Laws and Customs of the other Græcian States; after whose return the Consuls and Senate should appoint Commissioners to make choice of such of the Græcian Laws as were most suitable to the present constitution of the Roman Republick.

This advice of Romilius both prevailed in the Senate, and pleased

* Livy, on the contrary, represents Tarpeius and Æternius as not intimidated in the least by the misfortune of their predecessors, but boldly saying, The Commons and their Tribunes may fine us likewise, if they please, yet they shall not prevail to get their Bill passed: That the Tribunes, then dropping their Bill, and assuming a milder manner than hitherto, desired of the Fathers, “ that they would put an end to the contention, and, if Plebeian Laws were disagreeable the People. Sicinius, his late enemy, protested, that for the future he should ever be his friend. Nay he went further, and in the name of the People remitted him the fine he had been condemned to pay. But, as the money had been consecrated to Ceres, Romilius rejected this favour, as thinking he could not accept it without sacrilege.

“ to them, would at least suffer Legislators “ to be created, partly out of the Nobles, “ partly out of the Commons, for establish- “ ing Laws of equality in point of Liber- “ ty.” That the Senate expressed no dislike to the substance of the proposal, and objected only to the admission of Plebeians into the number of the Legislators: and that, after some struggle, the Tribunes yielded this point. Liv. B. 3. c. 31.

Year of
R O M E
CCXCIX.
Bef. J. C.
Four hundred fifty-three.

A Decree conformable to Romilius's proposal being passed by the Senate, and confirmed by the People, Sp. Posthumius, A. Manlius, and S. Sulpitius were soon after commissioned and sent away to make the collection of Grecian Laws. No foreign enemies disturbed the State this year. Nor, in the following Consulship of P. Horatius and Sextus Quintilius, was there either war abroad, or contention at home: but the Plague afflicted almost all Italy. The Consul Quintilius, four Tribunes of the People, and great Numbers of Citizens of all ranks and conditions died of it. The People, to avoid it, dispersed themselves about the Country. Rome in this general desolation became a desert, and some surprise was to be feared from the Aequi, the Volsci, and the Sabines. But, the pestilence raging among them too with the same fury, their calamity served instead of strength and defence to the Republick.

Fifty-
sixth Consul-
ship.
D. Hal. B.
10. p. 676.
Year of
R O M E
CCC.
Bef. J. C.
Four hundred fifty-
two.

§. II. THE next year, in the Consulship of P. Sestius and T. Menenius, the Plague ceased; and the Ambassadors who had been sent into Greece, returned to Rome. Presently the Tribunes became very urgent for a nomination of Legislators to enter on the great work. The Consuls, unwilling to have their Magistracy the Epoch of an innovation so disadvantageous to the Nobles, put off the business under various pretences. At first, they alledged in excuse of the delay, that, the affair in question being to be settled in the Consulship of their successors, nothing ought to be done in it, till those successors were appointed, nor indeed without their participation. To this the Tribunes made no objection; but it is probable, that their impatience hastened the meeting of the Centuries; for these were assembled before the usual time. They named Appius Claudius (grandson of the first of that name) and T. Genucius to the Consulship. After this election, Menenius, to get rid of the importunity of the Tribunes, pretended sickness, and staid at home. And, as for Sestius, he excused himself by saying, that it would not be decent for him to act in so great an affair, without his Colleague; and he referred them to the Consuls elect. To these the Tribunes applied themselves, and by much sollicitation and fine promises intirely gained them. Appius, in an Assembly of the People, to which he went at the desire of the Tribunes, made a speech upon the reasonableness of establishing Laws equally favourable to all; an establishment which, he said, would put an end to the contention between the two parties, and make Rome, which had been so long divided, as it were, into two States, become one Commonwealth. He added, that, if the election of himself and his Colleague to the Consulship should be offered by any person as an objection to the immediate appointment of Legislators, they were both ready (provided the Senate approved it) to relinquish their pretensions to that dignity.

Fifty-
seventh Consul-
ship.
D. Hal. B.
10. p. 667.
Year of
R O M E
CCCI.
Bef. J. C.
Four hundred fifty-
one.
Fifty-
eighth Consul-
ship.
Livy, B.
3. c. 32.
33.
D. Hal. B.
10. p. 678,
679.

Year of R O M E C C C L. B e f. J. C. F o u r h u n - d r e d f i f t y - o n e .
 Fifty- eighth Consul- ship. D. Hal B. 10. p. 679.
 When the People had first bestowed the highest praise on those two Patricians for this disinterested virtue, they ran in crowds to the Senate-house. Minucius being still sick, or pretending to be so, Sestius alone (whom perhaps the Tribunes had gained by a promise to make him one of the Legislators) convened the Fathers, and proposed the business. After some opposition from the warm advocates for all old customs, the opinion of the Consuls elect prevailed; and, at the motion of Appius, it was agreed, That ten persons to be chosen out of the body of the Senate should for one year, commencing from the day of their nomination, be invested, for the government of the State, with an authority from which there should lie no appeal; and that the Consular, the Tribunician^a, and all the other Magistracies should be suppressed during that space of time.

These Decemvirs were to draw up a Body of Laws extracted from those of Greece, and then communicate the Work to the Senate and People for their approbation and confirmation.

Livy, B. 3. c. 32. The Tribunes contended a while, for the admission of some Plebeians into the number of the Legislators, but at length yielded this point, on condition, that the Decemvirs should not abrogate the Icilian Law [relating to Mount Aventine] nor the Laws regarding the functions and privileges of the Tribunes.

Year of R O M E C C C I I. B e f. J. C. F o u r h u n - d r e d f i f t y .
 Fifty- ninth Consul- ship. D. Hal B. 10. p. 680. Livy B. 3. c. 33.
 §. III. SHORTLY after, a solemn Assembly was held of the whole Roman People convened by Centuries, and when the auspices had been taken, and the other ceremonies of religion performed, they proceeded to the election of the Decemvirs. Appius Claudius and T. Genucius were the first named; it was thought they deserved this honourable preference for the generous abdication they made of the Consulship: then L. Sestius, the Consul who had brought this matter before the Senate against his Collegue's will: Sp. Posthumius, S. Sulpicius, and A. Manlius, the three Deputies who had been sent into Greece; T. Romilius, who had proposed that deputation; and to these were added C. Julius, T. Veturius, and P. Horatius, all Consulars, and men of distinction, but too old, as some say, to oppose with resolution the sentiments of their Collegues. Appius, by the favour he had acquired with the People had the modelling of this Magistracy.

The DECENVIRS agreed among themselves that only one of them at a time should have the fasces, assemble the Senate, confirm Decrees, and act in all respects as supreme Magistrate. To this honour they were to succeed by turns, each enjoying it one whole day, and then resigning it to another; and, while one had the badges of sovereign power, the other nine differed not, in their appearance, from private persons, excepting

^a This is the first instance of suspending the Tribuneship. The functions of the Tribunes had hitherto been always preserved, even under the Dictators, and when all other Magistracies ceased. The reason was, that the Tribunes were not properly Magistrates, but only Protectors of the People against any oppressions by the Magistrates. Plut. Quæst. Rom. p. 283.

that each of them was attended by an officer called Accensus, who walked before him.

They repaired every morning, each in his turn, to their Tribunal in the Forum, to dispense justice, which they did with so much impartiality, that the People, charmed with their conduct, seemed to have forgot their Tribunes. Most of them prayed to the Gods for the continuance of a Government so full of moderation; nay, there were many Plebeians who declared, that, instead of restoring the Consulate and Tribunate, the best thing they could do would be to find ways to make the Decemvirate perpetual.

The People looked upon themselves as chiefly indebted to Appius for the present felicity they enjoyed. And indeed by the good understanding he lived in with his Colleagues, and by his affable behaviour to the People, he acquired universally the reputation of superior merit. From being an austere Patrician who crossed the Plebeians in all their pretensions, he was changed to a very Poplicola: No-body so gracious and condescending as Appius: He could call the Citizens he met by their Names: He saluted even the meanest of the populace, giving them all assurances of his goodwill and concern for their interests.

The Decemvirs applied themselves diligently this whole year to their work, which, when compleated, they exposed in TEN TABLES, fixed up in the Forum; and then with great modesty represented to the People assembled, “ that they did not know they had omitted any thing necessary to the establishment of that equality which ought to be among the members of a free Republick. That nevertheless they would have their fellow-citizens examine the performance carefully, and declare freely what they conceived ought to be retrenched or added; to the intent that the Roman People might, for the future, live under Laws which they might be said to have proposed as well as enacted.” The Decemvirs for some time sat daily in the Forum to receive remonstrances; and whoever had any thing to object against the Laws was readily heard. And when all necessary corrections and amendments had been made, and the People in general seemed to be well satisfied, the TEN TABLES were carried before the Senate, and there approved by an express Decree: Soon after which, the Decemvirs convened an Assembly of the Centuries, where the LAWS, being first read over, were confirmed by the unanimous voices of the whole ROMAN PEOPLE.

* It is said [Plin. B. 34. Cap. 5. Strabo, B. 14.] that the Laws of Greece were explained to the Decemvirs by one Hermodorus of Ephesus, who happened to be at Rome; and that Heraclitus the friend of Hermodorus wrote him a congratulatory letter on the share he had in drawing up the Roman Laws, adding, that in a dream he had seen all the nations of the earth bowing down before these Laws, and worshipping them in the Persian manner.

Year of
R O M E
CCCII.
Bef. J. C.
Four hundred fifty.
First Decemvirate.

D. Hal. B.
10. p. 681.
Liv. B. 3.
c. 34.

D. Hal. B.
10. p. 681.

C H A P. XXVII.

Fragments of the TEN TABLES of Laws beforementioned, as they have been collected and digested by the learned Jesuits Catrou and Rouilli, and also of the TWO TABLES of Laws soon after added to the TEN.

TABLE I.

Of LAW-SUITS.

- Year of
R O M E
CCCII.
Bef. J. C.
Fourhun-
dred & fty.
First De-
cemvi-
- I. LAW. Go immediately with the person who cites you before the Judge.
- II. LAW. If the person you cite refuses to go with you before the Judge, take some that are present to be witnesses of it, and you shall have a right to compel him to appear.
- III. LAW. If the person cited endeavours to escape from you, or puts himself into a posture of resistance, you may seize his body.
- IV. LAW. If the person prosecuted be old, or infirm, let him be carried in a Jumentum, or open carriage. But, if he refuse that, the prosecutor shall not be obliged to provide him an Arcera, or a covered carriage.
- V. LAW. But, if the person cited find a surety, let him go.
- VI. LAW. Only a rich man shall be security for a rich man. But any security shall be sufficient for a poor man.
- VII. LAW. The Judge shall give judgment according to the agreement made between the two parties, by the way.
- VIII. LAW. If the person cited has made no agreement with his adversary, let the Prætor hear the cause from sun-rising till noon; and let both parties be present when it is heard, whether it be in the Forum, or Comitium.
- IX. LAW. Let the same Prætor give judgment in the afternoon, though but one of the parties be present.
- X. LAW. Let no judgments be given after the going down of the sun.
- XI. LAW. When the parties have pitched upon a judge or arbitrator by consent, let them give securities that they will appear. Let him who does not appear in court pay the penalty agreed upon, unless he was hindered by some great fit of sickness, or by the performance of some vow, or by business of state, or by some indispensable engagement with a foreigner. If any one of these impediments happen to the judge or arbitrator, or either of the parties, let the hearing be put off to another day.
- XII. LAW. * Whosoever shall not be able to bring any witnesses to prove his pretensions

* The plaintiff was often disappointed of his demand upon the defendant, and the prosecution declared null, for want of witnesses. In order to remove this inconvenience, the Decempretensions before the Judge, may go and make a clamour for three days together, before his adversary's house.

Year of
R O M E
CCCII.
Bef. J. C.
Four hundred fifty.

T A B L E II.

O F R O B E R I E S.

First Decemvirate.

I. LAW. He that is attacked by a robber in the night, let him not be punished if he kills him.

II. LAW. If the robbery be committed by day, and, if the robber be taken in the fact, let him be beaten with rods, and become the slave of him whom he robbed. If the robber be a slave already, let him be beaten with rods, and thrown down headlong from the top of the capitol. If he be a child, under the age of puberty, let him be corrected, according to the Prætor's discretion, and let reparation be made to the injured party.

III. LAW. When robbers attack any person with arms, if the person attacked has cried out for help, he shall not be punished if he kill the robbers.

IV. LAW. When upon a legal search any stolen goods are found in a house, the robbery shall be punished upon the spot, as if openly and publickly committed.

V. LAW. For robberies committed privately, the robber shall be condemned to pay double the value of the things stolen.

VI. LAW. Whoever shall cut down trees, which don't belong to him, he shall pay 25 Aſſes of braſs, for every tree ſo felled.

VII. LAW. If any one comes privately, by night, and treads down another man's field of corn, or reaps his harveſt, let him be hanged up, and put to death, as a victim devoted to Ceres. But if he be a child, under the age of puberty, let the Prætor order him to be corrected as he ſhall think fit, or let double ſatisfaction be made for the damage he has done.

Decemviri made a Law, which gave the perſon injured leave to go to the door of his houſe whom he intended to proſecute; to repeat the ſubject of his complaint with a loud voice; and even to have recourſe to inveſtives if there was occaſion: and to continue this for three market days together, becauſe the country People came then to Rome, about their buſineſs. Hence came the cuſtom, which continues to this day, of ſending three ſummons, before judgment is given by default. If, after theſe repeated clamours the perſons cited ſtill reſuſed to make reſtitution, the plaintiff had a right to call thoſe in the neighbourhood who heard him, as witneſſes, and go in with them, even by force, into his adverſary's houſe, and there ſeize his own goods wherever he found them. The Law was thus expreſſed: CUI TESTIMONIUM DEI UERIT, IS TERTIIS DIEBUS, OBPORTUM, OBVA-

CULATUM ITO; that is to ſay, ei qui teſtimoniis deſtituitur, liceat, tertiis mundinis, reum ante ædes, convitiis & clamoribus appetere. According to Feflus, portus had anciently the ſame ſignification as domus, or ædes. The word obvagulatum is, ſays Feflus, put for quaſtionem cum convitio, i. e. a demand made with great outcries and inveſtives. In this ſenſe the Civilians interpret the verb wagulo, which they derive from the verb wagio.

Turneb. B. 2. adverſ. cap. 26. and Salmaſus Obſerv. ad jus Attic. & Ro. cap. 30. ſtate this Law in a different manner. Their interpretation of it is this: If the plaintiff cannot produce his witneſſes, let him go to the houſe of him whoſe teſtimony he had a right to expect; and let him require him to bear witneſs for him with great cries, and with injurious reflections, if the witneſs obſtinately perſiſts in the reſuſing it.

Year of ROME CCCII. VIII. LAW. If a robber and the person robbed agree together upon terms of restitution, no farther action shall lie against the robber.

Bef. J. C. IX. LAW. Prescription shall never be pleaded as a right to stolen goods, nor shall a foreigner have a right to the goods of any Roman citizen, by the longest possession.

Four hundred fifty. X. LAW. If any one betrays his trust, with respect to what is deposited in his hands, let him pay double the value of what was so deposited, to him who intrusted him with it.

First Decemviate.

XI. LAW. If any one finds any of his goods in another man's possession, who became possessed of them by a breach of trust, let the Prætor nominate three arbitrators to judge of it. And let the wrongful possessor pay double the value of what he has gained by detaining them.

XII. LAW. If a slave has committed a robbery, or done any damage, with the privity, and at the instigation of his master, let the master deliver up the slave to the person injured, by way of compensation.

T A B L E III.

OF LOANS, AND THE RIGHT OF CREDITORS OVER THEIR DEBTORS,

I. LAW. Let him who takes more than one per Cent. interest for money be condemned to pay four times the sum lent.

II. LAW. When any person acknowledges a debt, or is condemned to pay it, the creditor shall give his debtor thirty days for the payment of it: After which he shall cause him to be seized, and brought before a Judge.

III. LAW. If the debtor refuses to pay his debt, and can find no security, his creditor may carry him home, and either tie him by the neck, or put irons upon his feet, provided the chain does not weigh above fifteen pounds; but it may be lighter, if he pleases.

IV. LAW. If the captive debtor will live at his own expence, let him; if not, let him who keeps him in chains allow him a pound of meal a day, or more, if he pleases.

V. LAW. The creditor may keep his debtor prisoner for sixty days. If in this time the debtor does not find means to pay him, he that detains him shall bring him out before the people three market-days, and proclaim the sum, of which he has been defrauded.

VI. LAW. If the debtor be insolvent to several creditors, let his body be cut in pieces on the third market-day. It may be cut into more or fewer pieces with impunity: Or, if his creditors consent to it, let him be sold to foreigners beyond the Tiber.

T A B L E IV.

OF THE RIGHT OF FATHERS OF FAMILIES.

I. LAW. Let a father have the power of life and death over his legitimate children, and let him sell them when he pleases.

II. LAW.

II. LAW. But, if a father has sold his son three times, let the son then be out of his father's power.

III. LAW. If a father has a child born, which is monstrously deformed, let him kill him immediately.

IV. LAW. Let not a son, whose father has so far neglected his education as not to teach him a trade, be obliged to maintain his father in want; otherwise let all sons be obliged to relieve their fathers.

V. LAW. Let not a bastard be obliged to work to maintain his father.

Year of
R O M E
CCCII.
Bef. J. C.
Four
hundred.
fifty.
First De-
cemvi-
rate.

T A B L E. V.

OF INHERITANCES AND GUARDIANSHIPS.

I. LAW. After the death of a father of a family, let the disposition be made of his estate, and his appointment concerning the guardianship of his children be observed.

II. LAW. If he dies intestate, and has no children to succeed him, let his nearest relation be his heir; if he has no near relation, let a man of his own name be his heir.

III. LAW. When a freed-man dies intestate, and without heirs, if his patron be alive, or has left children, let the effects of the freed-man go to the family of his Patron.

IV. LAW. After the death of a debtor, his debts shall be paid by his heirs, in proportion to the share they have in his inheritance. After this they may divide the rest of his effects, if they please, and the Prætor shall appoint three arbitrators to make the division.

V. LAW. If a father of a family dies intestate, and leaves an heir under age, let the child's nearest relation be his guardian.

VI. LAW. If any one becomes mad, or prodigal, and has no-body to take care of him, let a relation, or, if he has none, a man of his own name, have the care of his person and estate.

T A B L E. VI.

OF PROPERTY AND POSSESSION.

I. LAW. When a man conveys his estate to another, let the terms of the conveyance create the right.

II. LAW. If a slave, who was made free on condition of paying a certain sum, be afterwards sold, let him be set at liberty, if he pays the person who has bought him the sum agreed upon.

III. LAW. Let not any piece of merchandise, though sold and delivered, belong to the buyer, till he has paid for it.

IV. LAW. Let two years possession amount to a prescription for lands, and one for moveables.

Year of
R O M E
CCCCII.
Ref. J. C.
Fourhun-
dred fifty.

First De-
cemvi-
rate.

V. LAW. In litigated cases the presumption shall always be on the side of the possessor: And, in disputes about liberty or slavery, the presumption shall always be on the side of liberty.

T A B L E VII.

OF TRESPASSES AND DAMAGES.

I. LAW. If a beast does any damage in a field, let the master of the beast make satisfaction, or give up his beast.

II. LAW. If you find a rafter or a pole which belongs to you, in another man's house or vineyard, and they are made use of, do not pull down the house, or ruin the vineyard; but make the possessor pay double the value of the thing stolen; and when the house is destroyed, or the pole taken out of the vineyard, then seize what is your own.

III. LAW. Whoever shall maliciously set fire to another man's house, or an heap of corn near his house, shall be imprisoned, scourged, and burnt to death. If he did it by accident, let him repair the damage: And, if he be a poor man, let him be slightly corrected.

IV. LAW. Whoever shall deprive another of the use of a limb shall be punished according to the law of retaliation, if the person injured does not agree to accept some other satisfaction.

V. LAW. If he has only dislocated a bone, let him pay three hundred pounds of brass if the sufferer be a freed-man, and a hundred and fifty if he be a slave.

VI. LAW. For common blows with the fist, and injurious words, the punishment shall be twenty-five Asses of brass.

VII. LAW. Whoever slanders another by words, or defamatory verses, and injures his reputation, shall be beaten with a club.

VIII. LAW. Let him who has once been a witness, and refuses to bear witness again, though a publick person, be deemed infamous, and made incapable of bearing witness any more.

IX. LAW. Let every false witness be thrown down headlong from the Capitol.

X. LAW. Whoever shall wilfully kill a freed-man, or shall make use of magical words to hurt him, or shall have prepared poison for him, or given it to him, shall be punished as an homicide.

XI. LAW. Let all Parricides be thrown into the river, sewed up in a leather bag, and with their heads veiled.

XII. LAW. The guardian who manages the affairs of his ward ill shall be reprimanded; and, if he be found to have cheated him, he shall restore double.

XIII. LAW. A patron who shall have defrauded his client shall be execrable.

T A B L E

T A B L E VIII.

OF ESTATES IN THE COUNTRY.

- I. LAW. Let the space of two feet and an half of ground be always left between one house and another.
- II. LAW. Societies may make what by-laws they please among themselves, provided they do not interfere with the publick laws.
- III. LAW. When two neighbours have any disputes about their bounds, the Prætor shall assign them three arbitrators.
- IV. LAW. When a tree planted in a field does injury to an adjoining field by its shade, let its branches be cut off fifteen feet high.
- V. LAW. If the fruit of a tree falls into a neighbouring field, the owner so the tree may go and pick it up.
- VI. LAW. If a man would make a drain, to carry off the rain-water from his ground to his neighbour's, let the Prætor appoint three arbitrators. to judge of the damage the water may do, and prevent it.
- VII. LAW. Roads shall be eight feet wide, where they run straight; and, where they turn, sixteen.
- VIII. LAW. If a road between two fields be bad, the traveller may drive through which field he pleases.
- Year of
R O M E
CCCII.
Bef. J. C.
Four hundred fifty.
First De-
cemvi-
rate.

T A B L E IX.

OF THE COMMON RIGHTS OF THE PEOPLE.

- I. LAW. Let not privilege be granted to any person.
- II. LAW. Let both debtors who are got out of slavery, and strangers who have rebelled, and returned to their duty, be restored to their ancient rights, as if they never offended.
- III. LAW. It shall be a capital crime for a judge or arbitrator to take money for passing judgment.
- IV. LAW. Let all causes, relating to the life, liberty, or rights of a Roman Citizen, be tried only in Comitia by Centuries.
- V. LAW. Let the People appoint Quæstors, to take cognisance of all capital cases.
- VI. LAW. Whoever shall hold seditious assemblies in the city by night shall be put to death.
- VII. LAW. Let him who shall have solicited a foreigner to declare himself against Rome, or shall have delivered up a Roman citizen to a foreigner, lose his life.
- VIII. LAW. Let only the last laws of the people be in force. [i. e.] let the last supersede all former ones, in the same case made and provided.

TABLE X.

OF FUNERALS AND ALL CEREMONIES RELATING TO THE DEAD.

Year of R O M E CCCII. Bef. J. C. Four hundred fifty. First De- cemvi- rate.	I. LAW. Let no dead body be interred, or burnt, within the city.
	II. LAW. Let all costliness and excessive wailings be banished from funerals.
	III. LAW. Let not the wood, with which funeral-piles are built, be cut with a saw.
	IV. LAW. Let the dead body be covered with no more than three habits, bordered with purple; and let no more than ten players upon the flute be employed in celebrating the obsequies.
	V. LAW. Let not the women tear their faces, or disfigure themselves, or make hideous outcries.
	VI. LAW. Let not any part of a dead body be carried away, in order to perform other obsequies for the deceased, unless he died in war, or out of his own country.

VII. LAW.

= ROGUM ASCIA NE POLITO are the Latin words of this Law, which seems to have passed from the Athenians to the Romans. Salon, and after him Phalerius, forbade the use of joinery, and the ornaments of sculpture, in the building of sepulchres.

^b It was a Law established by Salon, that no more than three robes should be buried or burnt with the corpse; it being customary among the ancients to load the funeral-pile, or fill the sepulchre with rich habits, and all the valuable things the deceased had had in his life-time; agreeable to these lines of Virgil in his sixth Æneid,

—*Tum membra thoro deficta reponunt
Purpureasque super vestes, velamina nota Injiciunt.*

The latter clause of this Law did not hinder the Romans from joining trumpets to fires in the funerals of great men.

^c The Civilians have given us this Law, after Tully, B. 2. de Legib. thus, HOMINI MORTUO OSSA NE LEGITO, QUO POST FUNUS FACIAS, EXTRA QUAM SI BELLUM DOVE HOSTICO, MORTUUS ESCIT. It often happened at Rome, that the friends and relations of the deceased carried off some parts of his body, during the celebration of the obsequies, in order to perform another funeral for him in private. Which multiplied expences, and renewed uselefs grief. The Decemviri therefore forbade this custom. Nevertheless the practice of interring still continued at Rome, even with regard to those bodies which were burnt. The relations and friends of the deceased reserved a small part of his body, a finger for instance, or a bone, and buried it with as much ceremony, as if it had been the whole body. By this means the Romans intended to preserve the ancient custom of burial, without which, says Cicero, the place where the body had been burnt was not consecrated by religion, nor therefore could any one legally build a sepulchre there: Nam priusquam in os injecta gleba est, locus ille, ubi crematum est corpus, nihil habet religionis. Injecta gleba, tum si ille humatus est, si sepulchrum vocatur, ac tum denique multa religiosa jura complentur. The Law makes an exception for those who had died in war, or in a distant country, or who had been devoured by some wild beast, &c. It was lawful to make a funeral pomp for such, in honour of their bravery, and to erect one of those tombs for them, which the ancients called Cænosa-phiea. It was a received opinion, according to the superstition of those times, that these empty sepulchres were retreats for the wandering souls of those who had had no burial. This defect was supplied by throwing three handfuls of earth upon the tomb, and calling the deceased by his name three times. Æneas paid this tribute to the memory of young Polydorus:

Ergo

VII. LAW. Let no slaves be embalmed after their death; let there be no drinking round a dead body; nor let any perfumed liquors be poured upon it. Year of
R O M E
CCCII.
Bef. J. C.
Four hundred
fifty.

VIII. LAW. Let no crowns, festoons, perfuming-pots, or any kind of perfume, be carried to funerals.

IX. LAW. If the deceased has merited a crown in the publick games, by any exploit of his own, or the expertness of his slaves, or the swiftness of his horses, let his panegyrick be made at his funeral, and let his relations have leave to put a crown upon his head, as well during the seven days he remains in the house, as when he is carried to be buried. First De-cemvi-
rate.

X. LAW. Let no man have more than one funeral made for him, or than one bed put under him.

XI. LAW. Let no gold be used in any obsequies, unless the jaw of the deceased has been tied up with a gold thread. In that case the corpse may be interred or burnt with the gold thread.

XII. LAW. For the future, let no sepulchre be built, or funeral-pile raised, within sixty feet of any house, without the consent of the owner of the house.

XIII. LAW. Prescription shall never be pleaded against a man's right to his burial-place, or the entrance to it.

T A B L E XI.

OF THE WORSHIP OF THE GODS, AND OF RELIGION.

I. LAW. Let all persons come with purity and piety to the assemblies of religion, and banish all extravagance from thence. If any one does otherwise, may the Gods themselves revenge it. The Laws of the 11th and 12th Tables were not drawn up till the next year 303, nor passed till 305 of
Rome.

II. LAW. Let no person have particular Gods of his own; or worship any new and foreign ones in private, unless they are authorized by public authority.

III. LAW. Let every one enjoy the temples consecrated by his fore-fathers, the sacred groves in his fields, and the oratories of his Lares. And let every one observe the rites used in his own family, and by his ancestors, in the worship of his domestick Gods.

IV. LAW. Honour the Gods of Heaven, not only those who have always been esteemed such, but those likewise whose merit has raised them thither, as Hercules, Bacchus, Æsculapius, Castor, Pollux, and Romulus.

V. LAW. Let those commendable qualities, by which heroes obtained Heaven, be ranked among the Gods, as Understanding, Virtue, Piety, Fidelity; and let temples be erected to them. But let no worship ever be paid to any vice.

VI. LAW. Let the most authorized ceremonies be observed.

*Ergo instauramus Polydoro funus, & ingens Aggeritur tumulo tellus. Stant manibus aræ, Animamque sepulchro
Condimus, & magna supremum voce ciemus.*
Æneid 3.

Ovid speaks of these monuments, which looked like sepulchres:

Et sæpe in tumulis, sine corpore, nomina ligi.

VII. LAW.

Year of
R O M E
CCCII.
Bef. J C.
Four hundred
fifty.
First De-
cemvi-
rate.

VII. LAW. Let law-suits be suspended on festivals, and let the slaves have leave to celebrate them after they have done their work. That it may be known on what days they fall, let them be set down in the calendars.

VIII. LAW. Let the Priests offer up in sacrifice to the Gods, on certain days, the fruits of the earth and berries: And on other days abundance of milk and young victims. For fear this ceremony should be omitted, the Priests shall end their year with it. Let them likewise take care to chuse for every God the victim he likes. Let there be priests appointed for some Gods, Flamines for others, and Pontifices to preside over them all.

IX. LAW. Let no woman be present at the sacrifices which are offered up in the night, except at those which are made for the people, with the usual ceremonies. Nor let any one be initiated in any mysteries brought from Greece, but those of Ceres.

X. LAW. If any one steals what belongs, or is devoted to the Gods, let him be punished as a Parricide.

XI. LAW. Leave perjury to be punished with death by the Gods, and let it be punished with perpetual disgrace by men.

XII. LAW. Let the Pontifices punish incest with death.

XIII. LAW. Let every one strictly perform his vows: But let no wicked person dare to make any offerings to the Gods.

XIV. LAW. Let no man dedicate his field to the service of the altar; and let him be discreet in his offerings of gold, silver, or ivory. Let no man dedicate a litigated estate to the Gods: If he does, he shall pay double the value of it to him whose right it shall appear to be.

XV. LAW. Let every man constantly observe his family-festivals.

XVI. LAW. Let him who has been guilty of any of those faults which make men execrable, and are not to be atoned for by expiations, be deemed impious. But let the priests expiate such as are to be expiated^a.

T A B L E XII.

OF MARRIAGES AND THE RIGHTS OF HUSBANDS.

I. LAW. When a woman shall have cohabited with a man for a whole year, without having been three nights absent from him, let her be deemed his wife^c.

II. LAW.

^a SACRUM COMMISSUM QUOD NEQUE EXPIARI POTERIT, IMPIE COMMISSUM ESTO: QUOD EXPIARI POTERIT, PUBLICI SACERDOTES EXPIANTO. That is to say, A premeditated crime could not be expiated by the blood of victims, because it implied a formal contempt of the Gods. It therefore was the guilty person's business to repair the injury he had done religion by repentance and legal satisfaction.

^c This Law is quoted by Anlus Gellius, B. 3. c. 2. and by Macrobius, Saturnal. B. 1. c. 3. The Civilians state is as follows: MULIERIS QUÆ ANNUM MATRIMONII ERGO, APUD VIRUM REMANSIT, NI TRI-NOCTIUM AB EO, USURPANDI ERGO, AB-ESCIT, USUS ESTO, i. e. Let a man be absolute master of a woman, who has cohabited with him for the space of one year, provided that, in all this time, she has not been absent from him three

II. LAW. If a man catches his wife in adultery, or finds her drunk, he may, with the consent of her relations, punish her even with death.

III. LAW. When a man will put away his wife, the form of doing it shall be by taking from her the keys of the house, and giving her what she brought. This shall be the manner of a divorce.

IV. LAW. A child born of a widow, in the tenth month after the decease of her husband, shall be deemed legitimate.

V. LAW. It shall not be lawful for the Patricians to intermarry with the Plebeians¹.

Year of
R O M E
CCCCII.
Bef. J. C.
Four hundred fifty.
First De-
cemvi-
rate.

three nights. She then became his wife, yet not in such a manner, as to be a sharer in the husband's goods, or to have a right to his inheritance. So that this was being in a condition much below that of a lawful wife: By which we mean one whose marriage was solemnised with the usual ceremonies.

¹ Cicero declares it as his positive judgment and opinion, That the LAWS of the TWELVE TABLES are justly to be preferred to whole libraries of the Philosophers. Cic. de Orat. B. I.

These Laws being established, it necessarily followed, that there should be disputations and controversies in the courts, since the interpretation was to be founded on the Authority of the learned. This interpretation they called jus civile, though at present we understand by that phrase the whole system of the Roman Laws.

Besides out of all these Laws the learned men of that time composed a scheme of forms and cases, by which the processes in the courts were directed. These were termed actiones legis.

We may add to these the Laws preferred at the publick Assemblies of the People; and the Placita, made without the authority of the Senate, at the Comitia Tributa, which were allowed to be of equal force with other constitutions, though they were not honoured with the title of leges.

And then the Senatus-consulta, and edicts of the supreme Magistrates, particularly of the Prætors, made up two more sorts of Laws, the last of which they call jus honorarium.

And, lastly, when the Government was intrusted in the hands of a single person, whatever he ordained had the authority of a Law, with the name of principalis constitutio.

Most of these, daily increasing, gave so much scope to the Lawyers for the compiling of reports and other labours, that in the reign of Justinian, there were extant two thousand distinct volumes on this subject. The body of the Law being thus grown unwieldy, and rendered almost useless by its excessive bulk, that excellent Emperor entered on a design to bring it into just dimensions; which was happily accomplished in the constituting those four tomes of the Civil Law, which are now extant, and have contributed, in a great measure, to the regulating of all the States in Christendom: So that the old fancy of the Romans, about the eternity of their command, is not so ridiculous as at first sight it appears, since by their admirable sanctions they are still like to govern for ever. Kennet's Antiq. part 2. B. 3. chap. 21.

C H A P. XXVIII.

§. I. The Senate and People agree to have the same sort of government continued for another year. Appius gets himself rechosen to the Decemvirate, and prevails with the People to elect nine men (of whom three are Plebeians) all devoted to his will, to be his Collegues. §. II. The new Decemvirs privately agree to make their authority perpetual. They draw up two new tables of laws. §. III. Their year being expired, they continue themselves in office by their own authority. They convene the Senate in order to obtain a levy of troops to oppose the incursions of the Æqui and Sabines. A sharp debate, in which Valerius and Horatius exert themselves in opposing the measures of the Decemvirs; who nevertheless carry their point. §. IV. Valerius and Horatius, to secure themselves from being insulted by the Decemvirs, keep guards about their persons. Many of the Senators and other principal citizens retire into the country. Appius confiscates their estates. §. V. Fabius with two other of the Decemvirs leads an army against the Sabines. Five other Decemvirs lead five legions against the Æqui. Appius and Oppius stay with a body of troops in Rome. Nothing succeeds in the two camps, the soldiers being resolved not to conquer. Sicinius Dentatus, that old soldier, who had been in 120 battles, publicly gives out at Rome, that the misfortunes of the campaign are owing to the incapacity of the Generals. Appius hereupon contrives, in concert with the Decemvirs, who command against the Sabines, to get him treacherously murdered. The discovery of this murder disposes the soldiers to a revolt.

Year of
R O M E
CCCII.
Bef. J. C.
Four hundred
fifty.
First De-
cemvi-
rate.
D. Hal. B.
10 p. 681,
682.
Livy, B.
3. c. 34.
95.

§. I. THOUGH the Laws contained in the TEN TABLES had been approved in all their parts, both by the Nobles and the Plebeians; yet many persons were of opinion, that several regulations, which would fill two other Tables, ought to be added to the former, in order to make a complete body of Roman Laws. This notion prevailing, it occasioned a proposal of continuing the Decemviral government for one year more: The Senate and the People with equal readiness, though for different reasons, consented to the motion. The people were extremely desirous to keep back the restoration of the Consular authority, and at present they found but little want of the protection of their Tribunes, because the Decemvirs admitted, in some sort, of appeals, allowing causes which had been determined by one of them to be reheard by another. And, as for the Senators, they were glad at any rate to be rid of the Tribunes, those Plebeian Magistrates so odious to them, and whose functions they now conceived hopes of intirely abolishing. Before the holding of the Comitia for electing new Decemvirs, the Senate fell into divisions about that dignity. Some aspired to it out of ambition; others, who had been the warmest opposers of its establishment, courted the office now; but it was only in order to exclude those whose behaviour gave cause to suspect them of some ill designs.

Appius

Appius at first pretended to be weary of a charge so difficult and laborious, and to be very averse to burthen himself with it a second time. But his well known and avowed intimacy with the Dulii and Icili, the leading men among the People; the pains he took to make himself agreeable to the Plebeians; his affability and moderation, so contrary to the pride of the Claudian family; all this gave great uneasiness to his competitors, and rendered him suspicious to his Collegues. These latter, to make sure of his exclusion, appointed him to preside at the new election; and as it was the custom at every election for the president to give out the names of those who stood for the office in question, they imagined, that Appius, after the declarations he had made, could not have the assurance to put his own name in the list of candidates: Besides, excepting an instance or two of some shameless Tribunes of the People, it was a thing unheard of, that he who presided at an election of Magistrates should offer himself for one. Appius nevertheless, contrary to all rules of decency, proposed himself for first Decemvir; and the People, who were now intirely devoted to him, readily gave him their suffrages. The other persons chosen to the Government were such as Appius had favoured and recommended. The first of the number was Q. Fabius Vibulanus, who had been three times Consul, a Patrician indeed of manners hitherto unblameable. After him were named M. Cornelius, M. Sergius, L. Minucius, T. Antonius, and M. Rabuleius, Senators very little esteemed in their own body, but all devoted to the service of Appius, who by his private brigues carried the Decemviral dignity in their favour from the Quinctii, and even from his own uncle Claudius, as likewise from his Collegues in the first Decemvirate. But what most surprised and alarmed the Senate, was, that Appius, forgetting his own glory and that of his ancestors, was not ashamed, out of complaisance to the late Tribunes, to whom he had sold his faith, to propose three Plebeians for Decemvirs, pretending it was but just, that there should be some persons in that College to take care of the interests of the People. Thus he brought in Q. Petilius, Cæso Duilius, and Sp. Oppius, all three Plebeians, excluded by their birth from those prime Magistracies.

§. II. AND now Appius seeing himself, by means of his dissimulation and cabals, once more at the head of the Decemvirate, turned his thoughts wholly to make his domination perpetual. He immediately assembled his new Collegues, who were all obliged to him for their dignities, and, throwing off the mask of a Republican represented to them, that, being intrusted with a commission wherein the Consular authority and that of the Tribunes were united, nothing was more easy than to retain this sovereign power during their whole lives; that the sure means thereto was to assume to themselves the cognizance of all affairs, not suffering them to be carried before either the Senate or the People; to convene those two bodies as seldom as possible; and above all to keep firmly united among themselves: That they ought to have a mutual complaisance for each other; that the whole College ought to interest itself warmly for the particular affairs of each Decemvir; and he added, that he thought they should all bind

Year of themselves by the most solemn oaths, never to interrupt one another in the execution of their particular designs. As this proposal of Appius agreeably flattered the ambition of his Collegues, they readily came into it, and took the oaths that he required. A new conspiracy against the publick liberty.

These Magistrates entered into possession of their dignity on the Ides of May; and to strike immediate terror and respect into the People, they appeared in publick each with twelve Lictors bearing axes among their fasces like those that used anciently to go before the Kings of Rome, and afterwards before the Dictator; so that the Forum was filled with an hundred and twenty Lictors. The People could not see this train and parade of tyranny without indignation. The comparison they made between the moderation of the Consuls, and the haughty behaviour of the Decemvirs, soon led them to regret their old Government. They complained in private, that now ten Kings were set up over them instead of two Consuls. But these reflections came too late, and it was not in their power to undo their own work. The Decemvirs began to reign imperiously, and with a despotick authority. Beside their Lictors, they had each of them, by way of guard, a band of fellows without house or home, most of them infamous for crimes, or loaded with debts. But, what was still more deplorable, there followed in the train of these new Magistrates a crowd of young Patricians, who preferring licentiousness to liberty, made their court in the most abject manner to the dispensers of favours; and, to provide for their own pleasures, did not blush to be Ministers to those of the Decemvirs. There was no longer any safe asylum for beauty and virtue. Those unbridled youths, under shelter of the sovereign power, tore the daughter out of the bosom of her mother with impunity. Nor was property in lands or goods any more secure from the invasions of those creatures and supporters of tyranny; upon the most frivolous pretensions they took possession of their neighbours estates that lay convenient for them. In vain was application made to the Decemvirs for redress, the complainants were treated with contempt, their complaints rejected, and favour and self-interest sat in the place of law and justice. If any citizen, warmed with a remaining spark of the ancient liberty, was so bold as to express his resentment, he was beaten with iron rods like a slave; others were banished; some were even put to death; and confiscation always followed the execution.

The people groaning under so cruel a tyranny, turned their eyes to the Senate, from whence they hoped for liberty. But most of the Senators, dreading the fury of the Decemvirs, were retired into the country. Those who staid in the city were not displeased to find that the severity of the present government made that of the Consuls regretted; and they flattered themselves the People would gladly give up their Tribunes, if they could but be delivered from the domination of the Decemvirs.

C. Claudius, a Consular person, and Appius's uncle, deeply concerned to see his nephew make himself the tyrant of his country, went several times to his house, with an intention to reprove him, and to put him in mind how how much he shamed the memory of his ancestors by so odious a conduct: But Appius guessing at the design of these visits, constantly eluded them, and the veneral old man found by experience, that tyrants never own either relations or friends.

In the mean time the Decemvirs drew up two tables of Laws to be added to the ten that had been promulgated the year before. Among those additional Laws there was one prohibiting alliances between Patricians and Plebeians by inter-marriage; a prohibition which Dionysius conjectures to have been made with a view to perpetuate the divisions between the two orders in the Republick; the Decemvirs being apprehensive, that if the Nobility and Commonalty should ever unite, they would turn against them all that animosity which they had used to express against each other.

§. III. THE body of Roman Law being now completed, and the sole end for which the Decemvirate had been instituted being thereby accomplished, it was reasonably hoped, that the tyranny which the publick groaned under would shortly cease, and the Decemvirs, as soon as their year was expired, be succeeded by Consuls. But the Ides of May came, and not the least appearance of any Comitia for an election of new Magistrates. The Tyrants then shewed themselves bare-faced, and in spite both of Senate and People retained the Government, without any other title but possession and violence. All who gave them the least umbrage were proscribed; and many citizens voluntarily banished themselves from their country, taking refuge among the Latines and the Hernici.

Every body secretly deplored the loss of liberty, but not one citizen in the whole Republick was so generous as to attempt to break her chains. The Roman People seemed to have lost that courage which had formerly made them so much feared and respected by their neighbours. The nations that had submitted to the dominion of the Romans, began now to despise them, and they disdained to be subject to a city which had lost her own liberty. The Sabines, after several incursions in flying parties upon the territories of the Republick, gathered their forces together into one body, and advancing along the Tiber incamped near Eretrum, about twelve miles from Rome; and the Aequi, having first ravaged the lands of Tusculum, came and pitched their camp near the Algidus. These two armies, which seemed to threaten Rome with a siege, much alarmed the Decemvirs. It was absolutely necessary to raise troops; but in what method to proceed in the enrollments, whether in a way of gentleness or severity; and whether they should enlist all indiscriminately or only those who were least disaffected to the Government; these were difficulties which at first perplexed them. Nor were they less unresolved, whether to apply to the Senate, or to the People, for a decree to levy an army in legal form, or whether they should act in this affair by their own sole authority. At length, after many councils held among themselves on this matter, they determined to convene the Senate, believing it easier to engage this body than the other to favour their pretensions; and not doubting but the ccciii.

Year of
R O M E
Bef. J. C.
Four hundred forty-nine.

Second Decem-
virate.
Livy, B.
3. c. 37.
D. Hal. B.
10. p. 684.

Livy, B.
3. c. 38.

Year of
R O M E
ccciv.
Bef. J. C.
Four
hundred forty-
eight.

Third Decem-
virate.

D. Hal. B.
11. p.
687.

Year of People, having lost with their Tribunes the privilege of opposition, would R O M E readily obey a decree of the Magistrates, when it had the sanction of the ccciv. Senate's authority.
 Bef. J. C.

Four hundred for-ty-eight. It was a great surprize to the People to hear proclamation made in the Forum for the Senators to meet. Thanks to our enemies, said they, for this single spark of our ancient liberty. But, when the Decemvirs repaired to the Third—Senate-house, they found no-body there except their own creatures, who Decem- came prepared to act the parts which had been assigned them.

 virate.

Livy, B. The other Senators had thrown up all care of the publick affairs; and
 3. c. 38. were retired, as was said before, to their country-houses. The Decemvirs sent messengers thither to them, appointing another Assembly for next day. Most of them returned to Rome, and came to the Senate-house; but with views widely different from those of the usurpers.

a. 39. & Appius, in a studied discourse, having laid open the necessity of taking
 seq. arms, to repel the incursions of the Æqui and the Sabines, L. Valerius Poti-
 D. Hal. B. tus, without waiting till it came to his turn to give his opinion, presently 11. p. 688. stood up. He was the son of that Valerius who was slain at the head of the Romans fighting against Herdonius, and grandson of the famous Val- erius, surnamed Publicola, one of the chief founders of the publick liberty.
Appius fearing that a man of that family and of the same character with his ancestors, would propose something contrary to the interest of the Decemvirs, sternly commanded him to sit down and hold his peace, telling him, that he ought to wait till Senators older than himself, and more considerable in the Republick, had declared their opinions first. “ You say very “ well (replied Valerius) had I been going to speak upon the business “ which you have proposed; but I have matters of much greater moment “ to lay before this Assembly, and what the Senate, if I mistake not, will “ think to be much more worthy of its immediate attention. Whence is “ it that you have the presumption to impose silence upon me, a Senator, “ a Valerius, standing up for the liberty of the Commonwealth? And yet
 “ if you persist in this your insolence, your accustomed insolence, to what “ Tribunes shall I have recourse? You have deprived us of that succour “ which the laws had provided for every citizen under oppression. But is “ it indeed come to this? And does Valerius, to preserve his rights, want
 “ the aid of the Tribunition power? Well then, since you and your Col“ leagues have usurped that power, together with the sovereignty, shall I “ appeal to you Decemvirs? Shall I implore the assistance of you all? To “ what purpose, when my design is to lay open that conspiracy which you “ have all formed against the publick liberty? Yet to you, Quintus Fa- “ bius, who have been honoured with three Consulates, to you alone I “ will appeal. Rise, Fabius, if you have not lost that spirit which was “ once your glory, rise and succour the oppressed! ’Tis on you that “ the Senate turns its eyes.”

p. 689. Fabius, confounded and overwhelmed with shame, had not power to answer. But Appius and the rest of the Decemvirs, starting up in anger from their seats, cried out once more to Valerius, commanding him silence, and adding adding threats to their injunctions: So extraordinary a proceeding raised a tumult in the Assembly. Many of the Senators were filled with indignation at the haughty manner of the Decemvirs; but no-body was so highly provoked at it as M. Horatius Barbatus. He was grandson of that Horatius who had been Consul with Poplicola. As he had inherited his grandfather's ardent zeal for liberty, and was an intimate friend of Valerius, he could no longer bear the insolence of Appius and his Collegues. He stood up and loudly called them the Tarquins and tyrants of their country:

" You talk to us of a war begun against us by the Sabines, as if the Roman People had greater enemies than yourselves. I would gladly know by what authority you convened this Assembly, and by what right you take upon you to preside in it. Is not the time of your Magistracy expired? Do you not know that the Decemviral power was given you but for one year? We chose you to establish such laws as were fit for a free State to submit to, and you have left no appearance of that equality which was the sole object the Romans had in view. You have suppressed the Assemblies both of the People and of the Senate. There is no longer any mention made of elections, either of Consuls, or of Tribunes: All the annual Magistracies are abolished. It is not the name of King that makes a tyrant. You Decemvirs have totally subverted our Government, to build upon its ruins your own empire and domination. But know, that the blood of Valerius and Horatius, who formerly drove the Tarquins out of Rome, yet runs in the veins of their descendants. We have the same courage and the same zeal for the liberty of our country. The Gods, Protectors of this city, will grant us the same success; and I hope the People, no less jealous of their freedom than their ancestors, will never desert us in so just a cause."

Horatius was going on with his discourse, when the Decemvirs with loud clamours all came and surrounded him, threatening to have him thrown from the Tarpeian rock if he did not instantly hold his peace. But when they perceived that the Senate in general expressed an uncommon resentment at this tyrannical invasion of the liberty of speech, they presently repented of their rashness. Appius, to soothe the minds of the Senators, having first requested and obtained a moment's silence, assured them, that the Decemvirs were far from having the least thought of hindering any one of the Conscript Fathers from freely delivering his opinion: That if he had imposed silence upon Valerius, it was only to oblige him to conform to the ordinary method, which was, that every man should speak in his turn, unless he was particularly applied to by him who presided in the Senate: That, whatever Horatius might imagine to the contrary, the right of the Decemvirs to exercise this authority did still subsist: That their Commission had not been limited by the People to one year, or to any fixed period of time, but was to last till the Tables of Laws were completed and passed in due form; after which they would lay down their Magistracy, and give an account of their administration. Then turning to his uncle C. Claudius, he desired him to speak his mind with freedom. He perhaps flattered himself, that Claudius, out of affection for a near relation,

Year of ROME CCCIV. Def. J. C. Four hundred forty-eight

lation, or moved by a zeal for the glory and interest of his family, or pleased with the honour of being the first whose opinion was asked, would take upon him to answer the severest parts of Horatius's invective. But the Decemvir addressed himself to a true Roman, one who would have sacrificed his own children to the preservation of the publick liberty.

Third Decemvirate. D. Hal. B. 11. p. 691. & seq.

Claudius observed to the Assembly, that two affairs of different natures were then to be considered of; a war abroad, and a remedy for the dissensions at home with relation to the Government: That as to the war, the late incursions of the enemies were wholly owing to the encouragement which the intestine divisions in the Republick gave them: That therefore the first thing to be done, was to settle peace and union in the city, after which the very appearance of the standards of the legions would be enough to frighten away the Æqui and Sabines, over whom the Romans had already so often triumphed: But that he doubted whether the People would range themselves under the banners of the Decemvirs, whom they justly looked upon as private men, who had usurped the Sovereign power. Then directing his speech to his nephew: "Know you not, Appius, how odious your conduct is to all good men? The voluntary exile to which our most illustrious Senators have condemned themselves, does it not sufficiently shew that they look upon you as a tyrant? The Senate very impatiently bears your robbing them of their authority; the People demand their right of Appeal, and that of Opposition which you have deprived them of; all our citizens call upon you, some for their estates, which have been made a prey to your ruffians, others for their daughters, whom you have forced away to satisfy your criminal passions. The whole city, the whole nation detest a Magistracy, which has destroyed their liberty, abolished the use of Comitia, usurped the legal authority of the Consuls, and suppressed the functions of the Tribunes. Restore to the Commonwealth the power with which she intrusted you but for one year; restore to us our ancient form of Government; restore yourself to yourself. Call to mind your former virtue, and generously quit, together with an unwarrantable power, the very name of Decemvir, which you have made so odious. I conjure you to this by our common ancestors, by the Manes of your father, that illustrious citizen, who left you so noble an example of moderation, and of zeal for the publick liberty; I conjure you especially, by your own preservation, and the care of your life, which you must unavoidably lose by some ignominious punishment, if you obstinately persist to hold any longer the unjust Empire which you have usurped over your fellow-citizens."

p. 696. Thus spake Claudius, and the Senate at first conceived hopes that the Decemvirs would be induced to lay down their Magistracy. But Appius disdained to give his uncle any answer. M. Cornelius, one of his Collegues, taking upon him to speak, and applying himself directly to C. Claudius, told him proudly, that those who had the Government of the Republick, did not stand in need of his advice to direct their conduct. That if he thought he had a right to give particular counsels to his nephew, he might go to him at his house; that the only affair in question now was the war with the

the

the Æqui and Sabines: “Tell us, therefore, said he, your opinion on this point, for on this only it was asked, and don’t waste our time in digressions that are nothing to the purpose.”

Claudius, yet more provoked at the scornful silence of Appius, than at his Colleague’s insolent answer, rose up again, and turning to the Senate: “Since my nephew will not condescend to speak to me, either in his own house, or in full Senate, and I am so unhappy as to see the tyrant of my country arise out of my own family, I declare, Conscript Fathers, that I am resolved to retire to Regillus. I banish myself from Rome, and make an oath never to enter it again but with our liberty. However, to fulfil the obligation I lie under of giving my opinion, with relation to the present business, I don’t think that any levy of troops ought to be made, till Consuls are first chosen to lead them.”

L. Quinctius Cincinnatus, T. Quinctius Capitolinus, and L. Lucretius, all Consular persons, and the principal men in the Senate, declared themselves of the same opinion. M. Cornelius, apprehending that the authority of those great men would draw the rest of the Senate after them, interrupted the order of gathering the suffrages, and asked the opinion of his brother * L. Cornelius, with whom he had before concerted the speech he should make in case of such an exigence. This Senator then rose up, but made no attempt to justify either the authority or conduct of the Decemvirs. Taking a more artful turn, he only represented to the Assembly, how expedient he thought it would be to defer the election of new Magistrates, till the enemy was driven out of the territory of Rome. “Have those, said he, who are so warm for the abdication of the Decemvirs, had any promise from the Æqui and Sabines, that they will put a stop to the progress of their arms, till we have changed the form of our Government? You know, Conscript Fathers, the tedious delays which our elections require: First, there must be a Senatus-consultum to appoint the Comitia by Centuries. This Assembly cannot be held till seven and twenty days after notice given. When the new Magistrates are named, and have taken possession of the Government, they must prefer a petition for the levies to another Assembly of the People; and before all these things can be done, and the necessary troops can be raised to repel the enemy, who will warrant us that we shall not see them at the gates of Rome, and in a condition to lay siege to the city? And what shall we do in this case? Doubtless we shall say to the Æqui and Sabines, A little patience if you please. Suspend your attack till we have chosen other Magistrates. Caius Claudius has persuaded us not to pass any Decree for raising forces, unless new Generals be first elected to command them. Be gone therefore out of our territory, and when you hear that the Roman People have created Consuls, and that we have made all necessary preparations for war, you may then return and sue to us for peace. Strange infatuation! that such follies should ever enter into the minds of men.”

* He had been Colleague to Q. Fabius in the third Consulate of the latter.

“Nor

Year of
R O M E
CCCIV.
Bef. J. C.
Four hundred forty-eight.
Third Decemvirate.

D. Hal. B.
11. p. 698.
& seq.

Year of R O M E CCCCIV. Bef. J. C. Four hundred forty-eight. Third Decemvirate.

" Nor surely less strange is our stupidity, that we can hear these triflers without indignation, as if we were consulting for the safety of our enemies, not the preservation of our country. My opinion, Conscripse Patres, is, that our Decemvirs immediately enlist the legions, and march against our enemies. Let us drive them from our frontiers, let us force them, by the terror of our arms, to beseech us to grant them peace; and when we have secured ourselves abroad, then let us employ our thoughts upon our affairs at home: Revoke by your authority that of the Decemvirs, if they will not of their own accord divest themselves of it: Call them to an account for their administration; elect new Magistrates in their room; and let the Republick return again to her ancient constitution: But permit me to tell you, that in matter of Government, we must regulate our proceedings by the times, and never hope to make the times subservient to our desires and projects."

D. Hal. B. 11. p. 700. The creatures of the Decemvirs declared loudly for this opinion, and the greater part of the Senators came into it, some as thinking it necessary in the present conjuncture, and others out of fear of the Tyrants. Nay, some of the oldest Senators took the same side, in hopes that after the war was finished, the abdication of the Decemvirs would quietly follow of course, and so the Government return naturally into the hands of the Consuls; and that prudent Magistrates by their moderation might perhaps gradually accustom the People to do without their Tribunes.

Liv. B. 3. c. 41. Appius, who with a secret pleasure saw that the majority were of the opinion of Cornelius, did then only for form-sake desire that of Valerius, on whom he had imposed silence at the beginning of the Assembly. Valerius rising up, spoke to this effect: " You see, Conscripse Patres, the crafty and deceitful management of these Decemvirs. My mouth was stopt so long as they apprehended that what I had to offer might make some impression upon the Assembly to the disadvantage of their pretensions; but now when the majority has declared for the opinion of Cornelius, why now truly they condescend to ask me mine, imagining, doubtless, that nothing which I can say, be it ever so reasonable, will be of any effect. I shall nevertheless deliver my thoughts with freedom, and you are still masters to determine as you shall judge to be most for the good of the Republick.

D. Hal. B. 11. p. 700, 701. " I declare then, in the first place, that I heartily subscribe to what C. Claudius has so wisely represented to you concerning the expediency of creating new Magistrates before we take the field. But since L. Cornelius, the avowed advocate of Tyranny, has endeavoured to turn so judicious a counsel into ridicule, upon pretence that the delays requisite for the election of those Magistrates would waste the time that should be employed in repelling the enemy, I think myself obliged to shew you the weakness and fallacy of this wretched reasoning. To convince you that such it is, do but call to mind the measures which the Republick took about ten years ago, against the same enemies, in the Consulate of C. Naupius and L. Minucius.

" You

“ You know, that, while Nautius was on one side fighting against the “ Sabines, Minucius on the other, suffered himself to be shut up by the “ Æqui in the narrow passes of some mountains. There was a necessity of “ raising a new army to relieve him; the Tribunes (according to custom) “ opposed all levies of troops, unless the Senate would admit the Law “ concerning the partition of the lands. In this extremity, as neither par“ ty would abate any thing of its pretensions, recourse was had to a Dicta“ tor, a Magistrate superior both to the Senate and the Tribunes of the “ People, L. Quinctius was chosen; he was sent for out of the country;
 “ he came to Rome; he raised a new army, and in a fortnight’s time “ brought off that of Minucius, and triumphed over the enemy. What “ hinders, in the present exigence, to follow so wise and so recent an exam“ ple? Let us chuse an Inter-rex, as was the practice upon the demise of “ the Kings, and has ever been the practice when the State happened to be “ left, as it is now, without legal Magistrates. Let him name a Dictator.
 “ These things may be done in less than a day. The Dictator will raise “ troops by the supreme power belonging to his dignity; we shall march “ against our enemies without delay; and, at our return from the campaign, “ that Magistrate, whose power cannot last longer than six months, will “ give us an opportunity to proceed at leisure, and according to the “ usual forms, upon the election of Consuls. If on the other hand you in-“ trust the command of your armies with the Decemvirs, do you imagine “ that these ambitious men who have usurped a tyrannical power, and in “ spite of all our laws refuse so obstinately to deliver up the Falces, will “ easily be brought to lay down their arms? Believe rather they will turn “ them against you yourselves, and make use of them to perpetuate their “ tyranny. I demand therefore, that, in the extreme danger wherein the “ publick liberty now is, the proposal I make to name a Dictator be ex“ amined, and the opinions and votes of the Senate taken thereupon.”

Almost all the Senators who were to speak after Valerius declared for D. Hal. B.
 this motion, as did also many of those who had before voted for the con- 11. p. 702.
 tinuation of the Decemvirate. But Cornelius cried out, that the affair upon which the Senate had met was already decided, and that nothing new ought now to be proposed. A warm dispute hereupon arose, with much clamour and tumult. Appius, taking advantage of the disorder to accomplish his desires, stepped forth into the midst of the Assembly, and spoke thus: “ You were called together, Conscripi Fathers, to deliberate con“ cerning a war with the Æqui and Sabines. Claudius, Cornelius, and “ Valerius, have given different opinions. The voices of the Assembly “ have been all taken, and the opinion of Cornelius has prevailed.” He added with a contemptuous smile, “ As for Valerius and his friends, if ever “ they attain to the Consulship, let them, if they please, revise and make “ void Decrees, which you in your wisdom have thought fit to pass.”
 This said, he ordered the Secretary to read aloud the Senatus-consultum (which he had already made him draw up in writing) empowering the Decemvirs to raise Troops, and to conduct the war. He then dismissed the Assembly, and withdrew.

Year of
R O M E
CCCIV.
Bef. J. C.
Four hundred forty-eight.

Third Decemvi-
rate.
D. Hal. B.
11. p. 703.

p. 704.

Livy, B.
3. c. 41,
42.

§. IV. THE new powers which by this Decree were granted to the Decemvirs, not only in some manner confirmed their authority, but made it more formidable than ever. They employed it to revenge themselves of their personal enemies, and they reckoned as such all those who did not submit to be their slaves. The most timorous among the citizens became as submissive and complying as the tyrants could wish: Others, less fearful, only quitted all attention to publick affairs, and turned their thoughts to live in quiet: But the men of courage and spirit held private Assemblies to concert measures for restoring liberty to the commonwealth. At the head of these were Valerius and Horatius. They gathered together in their houses a great number of their friends and clients to secure them against the violence of the Decemvirs; and they never appeared in the city without a powerful attendance strong enough to repel the insults they had reason to expect. As for C. Claudius, he left Rome, as he had declared in full Senate he would do, and retired to Regillus, the native city of his ancestors. Other Senators and many of the principal Citizens of Rome, who could not endure the Tyranny of the Decemvirs, and yet found themselves unable to destroy it, sought an asylum in the country, or among the neighbouring nations. Appius, enraged to see so convincing a proof given of the aversion which the best men in the Republick had to his Government, placed guards at the city gates: But finding that this precaution only increased the number of the malecontents, and fearing a general revolt, he removed the guard, leaving every body free to retire that would: But, to be revenged of those who withdrew, he confiscated the Effects they had in Rome, with which he paid and rewarded his ruffians.

§. V. AND now the Decemvirs began to raise troops for the war. Ten legions, soon completed, were divided into three Bodies. The Decemvirs agreed among themselves, that Appius and Oppius, invested with an Authority equal to that of All the Decemvirs united, should remain at Rome, and keep a garrison, consisting of two legions, in the capitol. Q. Fabius Vibulanus, with whom two other of the Decemvirs, Q. Petilius and M. Rabuleius, were joined in commission, marched against the Sabines at the head of three legions. M. Cornelius, L. Minucius, M. Sergius, T. Antonius, and C. Duilius, all Decemvirs, led five legions against the Æqui. The auxiliary Troops of the Latines and other Allies were, according to Dionysius, equal in number to the Romans. Nevertheless with this mighty force the Generals could effect nothing. The Romans, soldiers having a quick sense of their loss of liberty, would not conquer, for fear of increasing the power of the Decemvirs. Both armies suffered themselves to be defeated almost without fighting. The legions appointed against the Sabines, after some slight losses near Eretrum, made a hasty retreat in the night, and pitched their camp in the territory of Rome between Fidene and Crustumeria. And as for those who were to act against the Æqui (posted upon the Algidus) they lost their camp and baggage, and fled for refuge to Tusculum. The news of these defeats was received received at Rome with the same joy that would at another time have been shewn for a complete victory.

Appius, attentive to all events, sent recruits and provisions to his legues. He exhorted them, by letters, to keep the soldiers in awe by the terror of punishment, unless they judged this method to be dangerous in the present conjuncture. In that case, he added, that they would not want opportunities during the campaign to destroy the most mutinous by private ways; and he himself set them an example.

Sicinius Dentatus, that renowned Plebeian, who had been in 120 engagements, filled the ears of the multitude with the faults which he affirmed the Decemvirs had committed in the management of this war. Appius, to get him out of Rome, pretended an earnest desire to consult him upon the operations of the campaign. He sent for him, discoursed with him several times, admired his wisdom, and engaged him to go to the army at Crustumera, and assist the Generals with his Counsels. And, the sooner to induce him to make the campaign, he dignified him with the Character of Envoy or Legate, which among the Romans (according to Diomysius) not only gave him who was honoured with it the authority of a General, but made his Person sacred and inviolable, as that of a Priest.

Sicinius, free from distrust, and with the sincerity of a brave soldier, gladly embraced an opportunity of serving his country. He repaired to the camp with all speed. The Decemvirs, instructed by Appius, received him with outward marks of joy, and treated him with distinction. Nothing was undertaken without his advice; but this seeming deference concealed a real design of making away with him. An occasion soon offered. Sicinius, with his accustomed frankness, having told the Decemvirs, that he thought they should removed the camp into the enemy's territory, for many good reasons which he laid before them, they commissioned him to go and view the situation of the country, and mark out the ground for a new incampment; and they appointed him a hundred chosen men light-armed to be his guard; but this guard consisted only of the Decemvirs ruffians, who had secret orders to dispatch him. Sicinius having led them into the narrow passages of some mountains, they took that opportunity to fall upon him. He no sooner perceived their base design, but setting his back against a rock, that he might not be attacked behind, he received them with a courage that struck terror into the boldest of them. Calling up all his ancient valour, he slew several of the assailants, and wounded others: And now not one of them durst venture near him: They stood at a distance, and threw their darts at him. But, as even this did not effect their purpose, the villains climbed up to the top of the rock, and thence knocked him on the head with stones. They then went back to the camp, and gave out that they had fallen into an ambush, in which they had lost their captain, and part of their comrades. At first they were believed; but when a band of soldiers, who, with the Decemvirs permission, went to fetch the body of Sicinius in order to its burial, came to the place of action,

Year of
R O M E
CCCIV.
Bef. J. C.
Four
hundred forty-
eight.
Third Decemvi-
rate.
D. Hal. B.
11. p. 706.

p. 707.

Livy, B.
3. c. 43.

D. Hal. B.
11. p. 708.

Year of ROM E
CCCIV.
Bef. J. C.
Four hundred forty-eight.
Third Decemvi-
rate.
D. Hal. B.
11. p. 709.

they perceived that the slain were all Romans; that they were all fallen with their faces towards him, and that none of them were stripped either of their arms or cloaths. All these circumstances, laid together, made them suspect that the brave veteran had been murdered by his guard. This suspicion, prevailing throughout the camp, raised loud complaints, and a general discontent. The whole army with great fury demanded that the assassins should be brought to justice. But the Decemvirs helped them to make their escape; and, because the soldiers seemed resolved to have the body of Sicinius immediately conveyed to Rome, they with all expedition gave it an honourable funeral at the publick expence. These proceedings of the Generals made it but too evident, that Sicinius had not been murdered without their privity; and the discontent, which so odious a treachery excited in this army, rose to such a height, that the greater part of the soldiers began to think in earnest of revolting from the Decemviral Government. A new attempt of Appius, which was still more hateful, and which filled up the measure of his extravagant enormities, produced, in the city and in the other army, a yet greater detestation of the present tyranny.

C H A P. XXIX.

§. I. Appius (at Rome) falls in love with Virginia, a beautiful young woman, the daughter of a Plebeian. §. II. The wicked stratagems, which he employs to force her from her parents, that he may gratify his passion, occasion the abolition of the Decemvirate, and restoration of the Consulship. §. III. Valerius and Horatius are chosen Consuls. §. IV. Revenge is taken on the late Decemvirs.

§. I. IT has been already said, that Appius, by agreement with his Collegues, staid at Rome with a body of Troops to keep the inhabitants in obedience to the Decemvirs. As he was one day going to his Tribunal, he accidentally cast his eyes on a young virgin of uncommon beauty, who was reading her book in one of the publick schools. (In these times it was customary at Rome for young persons of that sex, as well as of the other, to pursue their proper studies in schools that were purposely erected for them in the Forum.) Her charms, and the blooming graces of youth, immediately drew his attention. He could not help beholding her with a secret pleasure: His curiosity increased the next day; he thought her more lovely than before; and, as he was obliged to pass often by the school, he insensibly conceived a most violent passion for her. Upon inquiry after her family and condition, he learnt, that she was by birth a Plebeian; her name Virginia; that she had lost her mother, Numitoria; that her father, Virginius, then served in the post of Centurion in the army employed against the Æqui, and that he had promised his daughter to Isilius, who had been Tribune of the People, and who was to marry her at the end of the campaign.

This

This account, so unfavourable to Appius's passion, served only to increase it. He would gladly have married Virginia, but he had a wife already; and, had this not been the case, the last laws of the twelve tables, of which he was the chief framer, prohibited all intermarriages of Patricians with Plebeians; so that he had no room to hope for the accomplishment of his wishes, but by the scandalous means of debauching the young maid.

Year of
R O M E
CCCIV.
Bef. J. C.
Four
hundred forty-
eight.

The innocence and modesty of Virginia restrained him from opening his dishonest purpose directly to herself. He thought it more proper to begin the work by means of one of those women of intrigue, who make a private market of the beauty and charms of youth. He loaded her with favours, and, having let her into his desires, ordered her not to name him, but to say only, that Virginia's lover was a man in power, who could do much good or much hurt to others, according to his pleasure. This woman applied herself to Virginia's nurse, made her rich presents, and richer promises; and, having thus paved the way, came at length to the subject of her errand. But the nurse, equally faithful and prudent, not only rejected the proposal with horror, but kept now a more watchful eye upon her charge than ever. Appius learned with grief, that it was impossible either to deceive or to corrupt her.

Third
Decemvi-
rate.
D. Hal. B.
11. p. 710.
Livy, B.
3. c. 44.

However, his passion growing still more furious by the difficulties it met with, he had recourse to another stratagem more bold and impudent, and which, if it succeeded, would put Virginia wholly in his power. For the execution of this new scheme he employed a client of his, named M. Claudius, a man without shame or fear, and one of those who introduce themselves to the ear of the great, by the sole merit of a base complaisance for their pleasures. This Minister of the Decemvir's passion, taking with him a band of fellows like himself, entered the publick school where VIRGINIA was, and seizing her by the arm would force her away to his own house, under pretence that she was the daughter of one of his slaves. He was already dragging her all in tears through the Forum, when the People, hearing a great cry, flocked about him, and, being moved with so pitious a sight, obliged him to let go his hold. The Villain, perceiving that he could not execute his first design, pretended that he had not meant to use any violence, but to proceed in due course of law; and he cited her to appear immediately before the Decemvir. Virginia by the new Laws was obliged to follow the claimant to the tribunal of justice, where Appius was that day designedly alone upon the bench. The multitude all attended her, some out of curiosity to see the issue of so strange a business, and others out of affection to Icilius, who during his Tribunate had made himself very agreeable to the People. Claudius was going instantly to open his claim; but the People full of indignation cried out, that he ought to wait 'till Virginia's relations, who had been sent for, were come. To this the Judge consented; and Numitorius, the uncle of the young woman, arrived soon after with a great number of his kinsmen and friends.

Silence

Year of
R O M E
CCCIV.
Bef. J. C.
Four hundred forty eight.
Third Decem-
virate.

Silence being then made, Claudius set forth, that Virginia was born in his house; that she was privately stolen away by a slave her mother, who, to conceal her theft, had pretended to be delivered of a dead child: But that it had since been discovered that she had sold this child to Virginus's wife, who was barren, and who, being uneasy at having no child, had made Virginia pass for her daughter: That he would soon produce undeniable testimonies of what he advanced; that in the mean while it was but just that a slave should go with her master; and that he would give good security for her appearance again, if Virginus, at his return, still pretended to be her real father.

D. Hal. B. 11 p. 711. §. II. NUMITORIUS presently saw that there was somebody of much greater weight and power than Claudius at the bottom of this contrivance; but he prudently concealed his suspicions, and represented to the Decemvir with a great deal of calmness, that his niece's father was absent in the service of his country; that it was highly unjust to dispute a citizen's right to his very children, when he was not present to assert it; that Virginus, upon notice, would not fail to be at Rome in two days, 'till whose return it was but fitting that her uncle should have the care of her. Numitorius offered to give any security whatsoever for producing her again, but he said it was not reasonable to trust the daughter of Virginus in the house of such a one as Claudius, where her honour would be in danger even more than her liberty. He added, that what he demanded was conformable to the laws, which ordained, that during a law-suit, and before a definitive sentence, the plaintiff should not disturb the defendant in his possession.

D. Hal. B. 11 p. 713. The whole Assembly shewed by their applauses, that they thought this request to be perfectly just. Appius having caused silence to be proclaimed, and affecting the impartiality becoming a Judge, declared that he should always be the protector of so reasonable a Law, and which he himself had inserted in the Twelve Tables: But that in the present dispute there were some particular circumstances which altered the case; that here were two persons claiming, one as a father, the other as a master; that, if he who pretended to be the father of Virginia were present, he indeed ought to be allowed the possession of her 'till the decision of the contest, but that, he being absent, the person who claimed her as his slave ought to have that possession, giving good security, however, to produce her again at the return of him who was called her father. This said, he ordered VIRGINIA to be delivered up to Claudius.

All the people present exclaimed against so iniquitous a Decree; and nothing was to be heard but cries of indignation, shrieks and lamentations. The women with tears in their eyes gathered round Virginia, and placed her in the midst of them, as if they meant to defend her. In this instant ICILIUS, to whom she had been promised in marriage, came running into the Forum with fury in his eyes, and loudly demanding who he was that durst lay violent hands upon a free woman, and what were his pretensions? Appius, who perceived him breaking through the crowd, ordered a Lictor to oppose his passage, and to tell him that the affair was already already judged. But nothing could stop the enraged lover; he forced his way up to the Tribunal, and taking Virginia in his arms, "No Appius, Year of ROME CCCIV: Bef. J. C. Four hundred forty eight. he cried, nothing but death shall separate me from her. If thou wouldst have thy vile artifices concealed, thou must murder me. Assemble all thy Lictors, and, if thou wilt, those of thy Collegues too; bid them prepare their rods and axes; but to my last breath I will defend her honour. Have you deprived the Romans of the protection of their Tribunes, that you may subject their wives and daughters to your lewd-Third Decemvirate. nefs? Go on to exercise your rage in scourging and slaughtering the Roman Citizens, but let modesty and chastity escape your tyranny. Virginia is mine, she is promised to me, and I expect to marry a virgin pure and unspotted. I will receive her from no man's hands but her father's. If in his absence any attempt be made to do her violence, I will implore the aid of the Roman People for my wife; Virginus will demand the assistance of his fellow-soldiers for his daughter; and both Gods and Men will be on our side."

Livy, B. 3. c. 45.

The People, equally moved with his misfortune and his courage, fell upon the Lictors, who were forcing away Virginia, dispersed them, and obliged Claudius himself to seek refuge at Appius's feet. The Assembly was full of noise and confusion. The tumult increased by the arrival of those who flocked to the Forum from all parts of the city. Appius, quite stunned at seeing to what a degree the People were incensed against him, was for some time in doubt what measures to take. At length, having caused silence to be made: "It is well known (said he) Icilius only wants Livy, B. 3. c. 46. an opportunity of restoring the Tribuneship by means of a sedition. But, that he may have no pretence of complaint, I am willing to wait for Virginus's return 'till to-morrow. Let his friends take care to give him notice. It is not above four hours journey from hence to the camp. I will prevail upon Claudius to yield up somewhat of his right for the sake of the publick peace, and to let the girl remain in liberty 'till the return of the man she imagines to be her father. But, in case Virginus does not appear to-morrow, I would have Icilius know, that I shall not want any assistance from my Collegues to put my decree in execution, or to keep in awe such seditious spirits as he."

Claudius, feigning to admit unwillingly of this delay, requested that at least Icilius might give security for producing Virginia on the morrow. The people all around immediately held up their hands, and every man offered eagerly to be his security. Icilius, touched with the affection of his fellow-citizens, broke into tears, while he returned them thanks. "To-morrow, said he, if there be occasion, we will make use of your assistance. To-day, I hope they will be satisfied with my security and that of all Virginia's Relations."

Appius, though intoxicated with his passion, durst not refuse such Bail: D. Hal. B. 11. p. 714. Livy, ibid. But he privately dispatched a messenger to his Collegues who commanded the army, intreating them to arrest Virginus upon some pretence or other, and to keep him in close prison. He thought that, the Father
not

Year of not appearing at the time appointed, he might then with a good colour
 R O M E deliver up the daughter into Claudius's hands : But his courier arrived at CCCIV. the camp too late. Numitorius's son and a brother of Icilius had been
 Bef. J. C. beforehand with him ; and Virginus, upon the first notice of his daugh-Four ter's danger, pretending the sudden death of some relation, had obtained hundred leave to return to Rome, and was already gone. And he had the good forty- fortune to escape two parties of horse, one which, upon the receipt of Ap- eight. pius's Letter, the Decemvirs sent after him to stop him, and the other, which Third Appius, with the same design, had placed in the road that led from the city Decemvi- to the camp.
 rate.

Livy, B. 3. c. 47. He appeared the next morning in the Forum pierced to the heart with grief, and leading by the hand his daughter all drowned in tears : She was accompanied by her kinswomen, and by a great number of other ladies. Virginus, as he passed along, addressed himself to his fellow-citizens with an air of dignity, that seemed to demand their assistance, rather than to implore it. " To what purpose, said he, do we every day
 " expose our lives in war to defend our wives and children from a foreign " enemy, if our Tyrants at Rome exercise upon them all the violence that " can be suffered in a city taken by assault ?" Icilius, quite furious with love and resentment, inveighed loudly against Appius, without any reserve : But the silent tears of the whole train of women affected the multitude more than any words or exclamations.

D. Hal. B. §. III. APPIUS heard with extreme surprise that Virginus was in 11 P. 715. the Forum. Full of rage and vexation he repaired instantly thither, with a numerous ^a guard of his dependants and creatures. Having ascended his Tribunal, he bid Claudius open his demand, and proceed in his action.
Claudius then repeated what he had said the day before, and at the same time produced the slave, whom he had suborned, and who, out of fear of her master, declared that she had sold Virginia to Virginus's wife. The

^a Mr Ferrat, B. 5. p. 71, quotes D. Hal. as saying, B. 11, that Appius, to prevent all resistance, ordered down the troops [2 legions] that were in the Capitol, and that they took possession of the Forum. And soon after quotes Livy, as telling us, that the multitude were attacked by Appius's soldiers. There is nothing either in Dion. Hal. or Livy, from whence it can be gathered, that Appius employed any soldiers on this occasion. It is true, Dion. Hal. represents him saying to the People, that the troops in the Capitol were not placed there only for defence against a foreign enemy, but also to prevent riots in the city. And Livy (c. 48.) makes him insinuate to the People, in order to terrify them, that he has brought down some armed men from the Capitol. But we do not find in either of those two Historians, that these armed men ever appeared. D. Hal. says, p. 714, that Appius came to his Tribunal μετὰ πολλῆς τριφῆς, but it was ἐταίρων καὶ πελαγῶν, (a great company of his friends and clients) as appears by the context. And Livy (c. 49.) having mentioned the resistance which Appius's Lictors met with when they would have seized Icilius, adds, Quum locus accundi apparitoribus non daretur, ipse cum agmine Patriciorum juvenum per turbam vadens in vincula duci jubit. Appius, the most despotick Magistrate that had appeared in Rome since Tarquin, did not venture to exercise so avowed a tyranny, as to employ his armed soldiers to attack unarmed citizens. This is evident, not only from what the Historians say of those who aided and abetted him, but from his being worsted in the conflict with his adversaries.

claimant

claimant added, that he had many other credible witnesses to produce, if there were occasion; and that he humbly hoped his being the Judge's client would not be thought a good reason for refusing him that justice, which every other man would obtain in the like case: And he concluded, with intreating the Decemvir not to suffer himself to be influenced by his compassion to the prejudice of truth and right.

Year of
R O M E
CCCIV:
Bef. J. C.
Fourhun-
dred forty-eight.

The friends and relations of Virginia, to destroy this imposture, represented, that her mother Numitoria could have had no temptation to practice such a fraud as was pretended; that she was married very young, and to a man almost as young as herself; that she bore a child in a very few years after her marriage; that if she had proved barren, and had been minded to introduce a stranger into her family, she would never have taken the child of a slave, and certainly not a girl, when she might as easily have had a boy. That, as to those many credible witnesses which Claudius talked of producing, it was highly improbable that a transaction which required so much secrecy should be imparted to many persons, when one was sufficient for the purpose. That, granting Numitoria to have been guilty of so strange a folly, it was yet stranger that an affair intrusted with so many confidants should remain so long a secret. That it was impossible to account why Claudius himself should be so profoundly silent in this affair for fifteen years, and should never declare his pretensions 'till the young woman was become marriageable, and appeared in that wonderful degree of beauty.

Third
Decemvi-
rate,
D. Hal. B.
11. p. 715,
716.

At these words all eyes were turned upon Virginia; the modesty of her countenance, her tears, her youth, her innocence, and, above all, her amazing beauty, which, clouded as it was with excessive grief, had yet a surpassing lustre, filled every breast with the most tender compassion. Nor could they help reflecting with extreme concern and terror, that, if the laws of liberty were thus violated in the person of this young maid, there could be no longer any security for wives or daughters against the like dishonour. For every body was already convinced, that the allegations of Claudius and his witnesses were mere imposture, and the wicked contrivance of some dignified villain, who thought himself at liberty to do whatever he pleased.

But to those arguments, shewing the improbability of what Claudius had alledged, Virginus added, that he had witnesses of unquestionable credit ready, (whom he named, and who he desired might be strictly examined) who would testify, some, that they had seen Numitoria big with child, others, that they had been present when she was delivered of this daughter, and others, that they had seen her give suck to young Virginia, which she could not have done, had she been barren, as Claudius pretended.

Virginus was still going on with his plea, when Appius perceiving the impression that was made upon the Assembly by those unanswerable reasons which had been offered, and being determined at any rate to accomplish his enterprise, interrupted him, and commanded silence, signifying,

Year of that he himself had something to say. All the People, being curious and R O M E anxious to know what it was, were presently still, and listened to him with CCCIV. attention.

Bef. J. C.

Four hundred forty eight.

Third Decem-
 virate.

The Decemvir having first cast his eyes on all sides to observe his strength, and how his friends were posted, "Virginus, said he, I must acquaint you, and all who are here present, that this is not the first time I have heard of this affair. I was told of it long before my election to the Decemvirate. Claudius's father, at his death, desired me to be guardian to his son; (his ancestors, you know, were always clients of our family.) Intimations were soon after given me, that I ought to claim this young slave in right of my ward. Hereupon I examined into the matter, and found the fact to be exactly as Claudius has represented it. However, I did not think it became me to meddle in an affair of this nature, but chose rather to leave it for him to manage when he should come of age, when he might either take back the girl, or accept of a sum of money for her from the parties who had bred her up. Our civil feuds, and the hurry of publick business, hindered me afterwards from giving any attention to the concerns of Claudius. He has applied himself of late, I suppose, to examine into the state of his affairs, and he finds this girl to belong to him, as part of his inheritance. I can see nothing unjust or unreasonable in the demand he makes; to have the daughter of his slave restored to him. It would have been better indeed if the thing could some way or other have been compromised. But, since a suit has been commenced upon it, I am obliged in conscience to give testimony in his favour; and, upon what I myself know, I do, as judge, pronounce him lawful master of this girl."

Virginus, provoked to the highest pitch at so unjust and cruel a sentence, no longer kept any measures with the Decemvir. Holding up his hand at him, "Appius, I promised my daughter to Scilius, and not to thee. I educated her for honourable marriage, and not to be a prey to an infamous ravisher. What? Is the lawless lust of savage beasts to prevail among us? How the citizens here will bear with these things, I know not; but I trust that those who are in arms will not endure them."

The People at these words set up a loud cry full of indignation, and they seemed at first as if they would oppose the execution of Appius's decree. But the Decemvir with a threatening voice told them, that he was not unacquainted with the seditious meetings which had been held the night before, nor with the plots there laid to cause an insurrection, but that he wanted neither power nor resolution to chastise those who should dare to disturb the publick peace; that the soldiers in the Capitol had not been placed there only for defence against the foreign enemy: And he advised them therefore to be careful of their behaviour, and to retire quietly to their own houses. "And you, said he, (speaking to one of his Lictors) go put aside the crowd, and make room for a master to lay hold of his slave."

The

The multitude terrified at these menaces, and the wrathful manner in which they were uttered, instantly gave back, and left the unhappy Virginia standing by herself, a helpless prey to injustice. Virginus, who then saw that there was no other remedy, turning towards the Decemvir, in humble manner thus addressed him: "Pardon, Appius, the unguarded words which escaped from me in the anguish of a fatherly grief, and allow me, if you please, before Claudius takes away the girl, privately to ask, in her presence, some questions of her nurse, that I may be set right in this matter, and, in case Virginia be not really my daughter, may return to the camp in less affliction."

Year of
R O M E.
CCCIV.
Bef. J. C.
Four
hundred forty-
eight.
Third Decemvi-
rate.

Appius readily granted him this request, upon condition however, that it should be in Claudius's sight, and without stirring out of the Forum. Virginus, pierced to the heart with the sharpest sorrow, took his daughter, half dead, in his arms; he wiped away the tears in which her face was all bathed, embraced her, and, drawing her near to some shops which were on the side of the Forum, chance directed him to a butcher's knife: Having instantly seized it, "My dear daughter, this is the only way to save thy honour and thy liberty:" As he said these words he plunged the knife into her heart: Then drawing it out again all smoking with her blood, he turned towards the Tribunal, and with a furious voice cried out, "By this blood, Appius, I devote thy head to the infernal Gods."

D. Hal. B.
11. p. 718.
Livy, B.
3. c. 48.

The Decemvir, from his Tribunal, called out, in the greatest fury, to seize him; but he with the knife in his hand made his way through those who would have stopt him, and, being favoured by the Multitude, got out of the city, mounted his horse, and took the road to the camp. In the mean while, Numitorius and Idilius raised a great commotion in Rome; they staid by the dead body of Virginia, shewed it to the eyes of the People, and besought them not to let her death go unrevenge. Crowds flocked to the Forum from all parts; they uttered bitter exclamations against the Decemvirs, and demanded the re-establishment of the ancient government and of the Tribunes. As for Appius, he was now returned to his own house. He had waded through an ocean of wickedness, to reach a prize which escaped him for ever, in the very moment he thought to take possession of it. He had been a spectator of the murder of her whom he loved to excess, a murder of which he himself was the cause; and by his last stroke of tyranny had made sure of the extreme hatred and indignation of the Roman People. Stung with these reflections, he seemed to have quite lost his reason. Instead of endeavouring to pacify the multitude, he sent his Lictors to seize Idilius and carry away the dead body from the Forum. The People opposed the execution of his orders, and, being now urged to fury, fell upon his Lictors, broke their fasces, and drove them out of the Forum. Appius hereupon getting together, as fast as he could, a great number of his friends and clients, came in person to support his authority. But Valerius and Horatius, those sworn enemies of the Decemvirs, having had notice of his motion, had put themselves at the head of a band of brave young men, marched them into the Forum, and

c. 49.

Year of placed them round the body of Virginia. At first the two parties dis-
 R O M E charged their fury against each other in mutual reproaches and invectives:
 CCCIV. But they soon after came to blows. Appius was worsted and repulsed.
 B. C. J. C. In this perplexity not knowing what else to do, he got up into the Temple Four hun- of Vulcan, and there took upon him to act the part of a Tribune of the dred for- People, demanding that Valerius and Horatius should be thrown head-long ty-eight. from the Tarpeian rock, as disturbers of the publick peace: But the mul-Third titude hissed at so senseless a discourse; and in the mean time Valerius, hav-Decemvi- ing caused the body of Virginia to be carried to the top of a flight of rate. steps, where the People might see it, was from the same eminence in-
 D. Hal. B. veighing against Appius. Most of the Decemvir's auditors soon left him 11. P. 719. to go to Valerius, who, thereupon assuming the authority of a Magistrate, commanded the Lictors to pay no more attendance on a private person.
 And now Appius, terrified at the desertion of many of his Creatures whom he saw changing sides, believing his life to be in danger; hiding therefore his face with his robe he fled, and took refuge in a neighbouring house.
 At this juncture Oppius the Plebeian Decemvir rushed from another side into the Forum to succour his Collegue. But he came too late. Force had got the better of authority. He judged therefore that the wisest method in the present exigence was to assemble the Senate; and this in a great measure quieted the People; for they hoped that the Decemvirate would speedily be abolished. But those of the Fathers who happened to be in Rome were most of them friends to the present Government; they only ordered the People to behave themselves peaceably, and commissioned some young members of their body to go to the camp near the Algidus, to prevent the sedition which Virginius might excite there. In the mean time Valerius and Horatius caused the body of Virginia to be laid in an open litter, and to be carried in great pomp through all the high-streets, in order to excite the compassion of the citizens, and increase their detestation of the Decemvirs. Men and women, old and young, married and unmarried, all ran out of their houses to see this funeral procession, and they all bewailed her fatal beauty, and her untimely death. The women with tears in their eyes threw, some of them flowers upon the litter, others the ribbons from their heads to adorn it, others cast their girdles, their fillets, wreaths of their hair upon it. The men also contributed, every one, some little present.

The whole city would have revolted immediately from the Government, had not the Decemvirs been actually commanding armies, and had not Valerius and Horatius (who managed this business, and who hoped to compass their point without effusion of blood) thought it more adviseable to wait and see what Virginius's return would produce in the army near the Algidus.

P. 720.
 & seq.
 Livy, B.
 3. c. 50. §. IV. HE entered the camp, attended by near 400 citizens, and still holding in his hand the bloody knife with which he had killed his Daughter. The soldiers at this strange sight flocked to him from all quarters.
Virginius got upon a small eminence, from whence he might the more easily

easily be heard : His face was drowned in tears, and grief for a while tied his tongue. At length breaking his mournful silence, he related to them the whole tragical story, and then raising his hands to heaven, " I call you to witness, immortal Gods, that Appius alone is guilty of the bloody deed I was forced to commit. And you, my fellow-soldiers, I conjure you not to drive me out of your company as a parricide and the murderer of my daughter. I would willingly have sacrificed my own life to have preserved her's, if she could have lived with her honour and her liberty. But finding that the tyrant was determined to make her a slave, that he might have an opportunity to dishonour her, pity alone made me cruel : I rather chose to lose my daughter, than keep her with shame ; but I would not have outlived her one moment, had I not hoped to revenge her death by your assistance."

Year of
R O M E
CCCIV.
Bef. J. C.
Four hundred forty-eight.
Third Decemvi-
rate.

The centurions and soldiers, filled with compassion for his misfortune, and with indignation against the Decemvir, all assured him, that they would not fail him in any thing he should undertake against Appius. Nay, they resolved to extend their resentment to all the Decemvirs, and to shake off the yoke of a dominion that was now grown into an avowed tyranny.

The Decemvirs who commanded the army being informed of Virginius's return, and of the disposition of the soldiers, sent for him with design to secure him. No obedience was paid to their orders. The troops were all eager to return to Rome ; nothing but the military oath withheld them. They thought they could not leave their Generals without offending the Gods, and dishonouring themselves. Virginius, who burnt with impatience to revenge himself of Appius, quickly removed their scruple, by assuring them, that a Roman could never be under any obligation to obey usurpers and tyrants ; that the Decemvirs were notoriously such, and that therefore to submit to them would not be obedience and piety, but madness and superstition. There needed no more to satisfy the conscience of the soldiers. They immediately flew in a kind of fury to their arms, snatched up their ensigns, and under the conduct of their respective Centurions took the way to Rome. The Decemvirs, startled at so general desertion, ran to stop them : But, wherever they turned themselves, they found only exasperated spirits, who breathed nothing but vengeance. If the Decemvirs spoke to them in gentle terms, they received no answer. If they pretended to threaten or command, the soldiers sternly answered, We are men, we have swords in our hands.

D. Hal. B.
11. p. 723.
Livy, B.
3. c. 50.

The army entered Rome about evening, without making the least disturbance, and without so much as a soldier's stirring out of his rank. As they passed along they assured their friends and relations, that they were returned only to destroy tyranny. All the troops marched quietly thro' the city to mount Aventine, fully resolved not to separate 'till they had obtained the desposal of the Decemvirs and the restoration of the Tribuneship.

D. Hal. B.
11. p. 724.

§. V. APPIUS, terrified with remorse of conscience, and with the revolt of the army, durst not appear in publick. But Oppius, his Colleague, had recourse in this distress to the authority of the Senate, which he convened with all expedition.

The

Year of
R O M E
CCCIV.
Bef. J. C.
Four hundred forty-eight.
Third Decemvi-
rate.
Livy, B.
3. c. 50.
c. 51.

The Senators thought it by no means adviseable to proceed in a way of severity, because they themselves had given occasion to the sedition. The result of their debate was to commission Sp. Tarpeius, C. Julius, and P. Sulpitius, all three Consulars, to go to mount Aventine and demand of the soldiers, By whose orders they had left their camp? what their intent was in possessing themselves of mount Aventine? and why, quitting the war begun against the enemy, they had invaded their own country?

The soldiers did not want an answer, but they wanted a speaker, for as yet they had not chosen themselves a head; and no one man among them would venture to act as Chief in this revolt. They remained for some time in silence, but at length they all cried out with one voice, Let Valerius and Horatius be sent to us, we will give an answer to the Senate by them.

As soon as the three Commissioners were gone, Virginus took notice to the soldiers how much they had been puzzled, even in an affair of no great importance, for want of a Head; that the answer they had fallen upon, though pertinent enough, had proceeded rather from casual agreement, than previous and publick counsel; and he advised them therefore to chuse ten persons to be over them, and to manage for them. Instantly they named him the first to that honour, but he excused himself, desiring them to reserve their good opinion of him to happier times. “No honours, said he, can give me pleasure while my daughter is unrevengeed, nor is it adviseable for you, in such a season of trouble as this, to chuse those men to be your directors and agents who are most obnoxious to the parties you are to treat with. If you think me capable of being useful to you, I shall not be less so in a private capacity.” The army hereupon appointed ten other Centurions to be their Governors, with the title of Military Tribunes.

The example of this army was followed by that employed in the war against the Æqui: for Numitorius and Idilius had gone thither, and had spirited up the soldiers to desert their Generals. With colours flying they marched straight towards Rome, and having advice, by the way, of the steps taken by the troops on mount Aventine, they in like manner, at the instigation of Idilius, (a man skilful in popular affairs) chose themselves ten Military Tribunes, to govern and conduct them. (What moved Idilius to give this counsel was an apprehension, that, without such election, the ten Tribunes of the other camp might be thought to have a kind of right to be appointed the Ten Tribunes of the Commons in the next Comitia that should be held for naming those Magistrates, and he himself had a view to be one of the College.) These troops entered the City, and marched through it in the same good order, and with the same peaceable behaviour, as had been observed by the other, whom they presently after joined. And then the united armies commissioned their twenty Military Tribunes to elect two out of their number to be supreme over all. The choice fell upon M. Oppius and Sextus Manilius.

The Senate in the mean while, anxious for the Commonwealth, sat every day to consider of some effectual remedy for the present evil. (Such desertions sertions were of dangerous example; and the frontiers were left exposed to the invasions of the enemy.) But the time, which should have been employed in sage deliberation, was wasted in strife and wrangling. The Decemvirs were incessantly reproached with the murder of Sicinius, the lust of Appius, and the miscarriages in the war. At length it was concluded to send Valerius and Horatius to mount Aventine; but then these two Senators, finding that their mediation was become necessary, protested that they would not move a step so long as the Decemvirs, whom they called usurpers, remained Masters of the Government.

Year of
R O M E
CCCIV.
Bef. J. C.
Four
hundred forty-
eight.
Third Decemvi-
rate.

The Decemvirs, on the other hand, declared that they would not resign their authority 'till they had proposed to the People the two last Tables of Laws, and had got them passed; and that this was the only term fixed for the expiration of their Magistracy. Nay, L. Cornelius, yet a warm partisan of the present Governors, advised against entering into any negotiation with the two armies, 'till they were returned to their former respective camps; upon which condition he was for offering the soldiers a general pardon, with an exception however to the Authors of the desertion.

D. Hal. B.
11. p. 725.

The soldiers on mount Aventine receiving accounts from M. Duilius (who had been formerly a Tribune) of what passed in the Senate, came to a resolution to remove their camp to the Mons Sacer, a place which would put the Senators in mind of the steady resolution of the Commons, and make them sensible of the absolute necessity of restoring the Tribuneship, in order to a re-union. Thither they marched, fortified themselves there, and observed the same good discipline for which their ancestors had been so much admired. In this decampment they were followed by such numbers of the Citizens, with their wives and children, that Rome was in a manner deserted: "What have we to do, said they, in a City where neither chastity nor liberty is safe?" The Conscript Fathers, astonished as they passed to the Senate-house to see the streets so thin of people, and that, except a few old men, there was scarce any body in the Forum, came now for the most part into the sentiments of Horatius and Valerius. They declared that it was madness in the Decemvirs to think of retaining their authority, when they had no subjects to govern. "What! said they, "will you administer justice to empty houses and bare walls? Are you not ashamed to see that all the citizens in the Forum scarce equal the number of your Lictors? In short, you must resolve either to have no Commons, or to allow them Tribunes. They extorted from our forefathers that Plebeian Magistracy, of which they had not then experienced the benefit; and do you imagine, that, when they have tasted the sweets of it, they will ever consent to part with it, and especially since your Government has not been so moderate and gentle, as to make them feel no want of protection and succour?"

The Decemvirs, finding that there was no remedy, promised at length to be wholly governed by the Senate; they only desired, that they might not be sacrificed to the hatred of their enemies, and reminded the Fathers, that

Year of that it concerned them nearly not to accustom the People to shed the ROM F. blood of Patricians.

CCCIV. §. VI. VALERIUS and Horatius, having brought this affair to the Bef. J. C. point they had wished, repaired to the camp, and were received by the Four hundred soldiers as their protectors. The Army, by the mouth of Icilius, de-forty- manded the restoration of their Tribunes, and of their privilege of ap-eight. peal, and an amnesty for all who had left the camp without permission Third from their Generals. But first of all they required, that the Decemvirs Decemvi- should be delivered into their hands; and they loudly threatened to burn rate. them all alive.

Livy, B.
3. c. 53.

The two mediators were not more favourable to those Magistrates than the People themselves; but they prosecuted the design of destroying with more art. At the same time that, in general terms, they exhorted the multitude not to be governed by cruel thoughts, (bidding them remember that they had more occasion for a shield than a sword) they insinuated to them, that when they were in possession again of their rights, and when their Tribunes, their Laws and Assemblies, were restored to them, they would then have it in their power to do justice to themselves.

c. 54.

The multitude, fully persuaded that no Tribunes whatsoever could have more Zeal for the interest of the Commons than Valerius and Horatius, trusted every thing to their management; who, returning without delay to the Senate, reported the Demands of the Army; but said nothing of its bloody designs against the Decemvirs. These Magistrates, hearing no mention of their punishment, readily yielded to all that was asked; only Appius, cruel by nature, and judging of other men's hatred to him by his to them, said aloud, "I am not ignorant of the fate I am to expect. The attack is only deferred 'till my enemies have got arms in their hands. Nothing but my blood will satisfy their malice. Be it so. I am ready nevertheless to resign the Decemvirate, and I care not how soon I do it." Hereupon the Senate past a Decree, That the Decemvirs should instantly depose themselves; that the Pontifex Maximus should hold the Comitia for electing Tribunes, and that no notice should be hereafter taken of the desertion of the soldiers from their Generals, or the retreat of the Citizens to the Mons Sacer. Submitting to this Decree, the Decemvirs immediately repaired to the Forum, and there abdicated their Magistracy, to the great joy of the City. The news of their abdication was presently carried by Valerius and Horatius to the Camp: "Return, soldiers, to your country, your Household-Gods, your wives and children; and may this return be happy to you and to the Commonwealth!" Instantly the army snatched up their ensigns, and exulting with joy returned to Rome. But, before they separated, they marched a second time, accompanied by the rest of the Commons, to mount Acentine, where they made an election of their Tribunes. A. Virginus the father of the hapless Virginia, Numiternus her uncle, and Icilius, to whom she had been betrothed, were

* Livy makes this Decree and another to be the acts of the Commons, presently after they had chosen their Tribunes.

the

the first chosen. Then C. Sicinius, M. Duius, M. Titinius, M. Pomponius, C. Apronius, P. Villius, and C. Oppius. An Inter-Rex was afterwards created, who held an assembly by Centuries, and, according to the votes of the People, named L. Valerius and M. Horatius to the Consulship.

Year of
ROME
CCCIV.
Bef. J. C.
Fourhun-
dred
forty-
eight.

§. VII. THE Administration of these Consuls was wholly popular, and the Plebeians obtained from them what they could hardly have hoped from their very Tribunes themselves. In the first place: Whereas it was a disputable point of Law, whether the PLEBISCITA [the Decrees of the Commons] would bind the SENATORS; the Consuls now passed a LAW in COMITIA CENTURIATA, importing, That what the COMMONS should enact, in COMITIA TRIBUTA, should bind the whole ROMAN PEOPLE. By which Law (says Livy) the Bills of the Tribunes were armed with a very dangerous weapon^a.

Sixtieth
Consul-
ship.
D. Hal. B.
11. p. 725.
Livy, B.
3. c. 55.

The

^a Omnium primum, quum veluti in controverso jure esset, tenerentur PATRES Plebiscitis, legem CENTURIATIS COMITIIS iulere ut quod TRIBUTIM PLEBES jussisset, POPULUM teneret; qua lege tribunitiis rogationibus telum acerrimum datum est. Livy, L. iii. c. 55.

Dionysius (L. xi. p. 726.) writes, "That this LAW put an end to the Disputes which had subsisted between the Patricians and Plebeians, concerning the Plebiscita, made in the COMITIA TRIBUTA, which the Patricians would not submit to, nor allow to be binding on any but Plebeians." The Historian goes on, "It has been already said, that in the Comitia Tributa the Plebeians and the Poor had the better of the Patricians; but that in the Comitia Centuriata the Patricians, though much inferior in number to the Plebeians, were superior to them in strength."

[This last assertion, how often soever he may have repeated it, I apprehend to be a great mistake. He seems here to make the terms Patrician and Plebeian equivalent to Rich and Poor. The richer Citizens had doubtless a superiority of strength in the Comitia by Centuries; but the Patricians had not. The majority of the voters in the majority of the Centuries were unquestionably Plebeians, and the Patricians were overpowered, as well as out-numbered by the Plebeians in the Comitia Centuriata. Had it not been so, had the Patricians, in the Centuriate Comitia, been superior in strength to the Plebeians, how consummately ridiculous would be Livy's admiration of the virtue of the Roman People, for their chusing to the Military Tribuneship PATRICIANS only (Y. of R. 379.) though the Plebeians were qualified, by law, to be chosen to that Magistracy! Livy, B. 4. c. 6.]

As to the memorable LAW (called Lex Horatia) now enacted by the Comitia Centuriata, Dionysius would have better satisfied the curiosity of his readers, if he had given them some instances of PLEBISCITA, made in COMITIA by TRIBES, to which the PATRICIANS had refused to submit. In his seventh Book he mentions a Plebiscitum that made it penal to interrupt a Tribune, when speaking to an assembly of the People. And he tells us, that this Plebiscitum was followed by much altercation between the Consuls and the Tribunes. And that the Senate and the Commons mutually refused to ratify each other's Decrees.

Vid. supr.
189, 190.

Μετὰ τὸτο πολλὰ καὶ περὶ πολλῶν ἐγίνοντο τοῖς δημάρχοις πρὸς τὰς ὑπάτους ἀντιλογίαι, καὶ ἔτε ὁ δῆμος ὁπόσα ἡ βουλὴ φησίσαιτο κύρια ἡγεῖτο, οὔτε ὧν ὁ δῆμος γνοίη τῇ βουλῇ φίλιόν τι ἦν ἀντιπαρεταμένοι δὲ καὶ δι' ὑποψίας ἔχοντες ἀλλήλους διετέλουν. D. Hal. L. vii. p. 432.

Deinde multæ variisque de rebus inter Tribunos & Coss. altercationes sunt sequutæ, & neque ipsa Plebs senatus-consulta rata habebat, neque senatus ipse ulla plebiscita approbabat. Sed magna contentione utrique alteris adversabantur, & se invicem suspectos habebant.

But these things passed in the next year after the erection of the Tribuneship, and before the introduction of COMITIA TRIBUTA, even according to the Greek Historian's own account. Here then a question arises. In what Comitia were those Plebiscita made,

B b b

Year of
R O M E
CCCIV.
Bef J. C.
Four

hundred forty-
eight.

Sixtieth
Consul-
ship.
Vid. supr.
p. 235. &
seq.

The Lex Valeria touching appeals to the Assembly of the People was confirmed anew, and strengthened with another Law, forbidding the future creation made, which were anterior to the first Assembly by Tribes? Not in the Centuriata: The Tribunes never attempted to hold these assemblies. And, as to the Curiata, we are told, that these could not be held but by a Patrician Magistrate, nor without a previous Decree of the Senate, nor without Sacrifices and Auspices, the care and management of which were appropriated to the Patricians. And we are likewise told, that the Tribunes, when they held Assemblies of the citizens for making Laws, observed none of these ceremonies and formalities. Particularly, with regard to the Senate's authorising their proceedings, Appius Claudius (in the debate on the affair of Coriolanus) enumerating, to the Fathers, the usurpations of the Plebeians and their Tribunes, mentions this among the rest, They propose laws without consulting you, and they pass them without your approbation, Νῦν τε ἀπροσέλευτος ἐσφίρει, καὶ τῆτες ἐπιζηροῖται τῆς ὑμετέρας γνώμης δόξα. D. Hal. L. vii. p. 455. And this, as I before observed, was interior to the introduction of Comitia Tributa. Shall we not therefore be obliged to say, that, though the Assemblies of the Curia could not, by the original constitution of the State, be legally held, and were not held in the first years of the Commonwealth, nor perhaps, after the introduction of Comitia Tributa, without the conditions above specified, yet the Tribunes, soon after the institution of that magistracy, did, without any previous Senatus Consultum, convene the Plebeians of the Curia, and, in those assemblies, did, without Auspices, or any Religious Ceremonies, enact Laws, which were called Plebiscita?

By the treaty of Re-union (on the Mons Sacer) the Tribunes were authorised to hold Concilia of the Commons; and they seem to have turned these Concilia into Comitia by Curia, as has been represented above, p. 189, 190. But it does not fully appear, whether the Senators and other Patricians, who were excluded the Concilia of the Commons, were suffered to be present, and vote in their Comitia. Dionysius, in the passage just referred to, represents the Tribunes as very expeditious in getting their Plebiscitum passed lest the Consuls should come and oppose it. But, by Opposition here, he may possibly mean an opposition by Violence, disturbing the Assembly, and hindering it from concluding any thing; for this was no uncommon method with the Patricians, when they disliked a Bill, proposed by the Tribunes.

A second difficulty is thrown in our way by what Dionysius says of the Disputes concerning the PLEBISCITA made in the COMITIA by Tribes, and of the Patricians refusing to submit to them. I do not recall any one Plebiscitum, by him mentioned, as made, before this time, in Comitia Tributa, except the judgments of the Tribes in criminal and capital causes. And these judgments did all take place, according to his own account. Coriolanus went into exile pursuant to the sentence against him; Menenius paid the fine, to which he was condemned; Servilius was acquitted; the sureties for the appearance of Cæso Quinctius, upon his running away to avoid trial, paid the money they stood bound for to the publick. So that when the Historian says, that the Patricians refused to submit to the PLEBISCITA, it is hard to guess what he means, unless it be, That (before the Horatian Law) the Patricians did not recognise the COMITIA TRIBUTA held by the Tribunes, as a legal Legislature, tho' they submitted, through necessity, to all their Decrees. In the case of Cæso Quinctius (year of Rome 292.) Dionysius (L. x. p. 631.) differing from Livy, who makes Cæso humble himself so far, as to solicit the favour of the multitude, represents him disowning the jurisdiction of the Court, and refusing to plead; yet the Historian introduces L. Quinctius Cincinnatus, the Father of the accused, pleading earnestly for his son to the Assembly.

It may be said, that this was the pure effect of necessity, and ought not to be construed into a recognising the Assembly for a lawful Judicature. For in the year 298 (six years after the affair of Cæso) on occasion of the Tribunes citing the Consuls to appear in judgment before the Tribes, the Consuls openly affirm, That the Tribunes have no power to summon thither, even the most inconsiderable of the Patricians, without a previous Senatus Consultum for that purpose. D. H. L. x. p. 661. And in the contest about Volero's Bill (year of Rome 282.) Appius Claudius (then Consul) declared that he would for ever oppose creation of any Magistrate, from whose judgments an appeal should not lie to that Assembly, and permitting any person to kill the man who should attempt

Year of
R O M E
CCCIV.
Bef. J. C.
Fourhun-
dred forty-eight.
Sixteith
Consul-
ship.

oppose the enacting of any law, which had not first passed the examination and approbation of the Senate. And the conclusion of that contest was — The Senate made a Decree, authorising the People to give their suffrages upon the Bill, and then the Bill was by the People passed into a Law. D. Hal. L. ix. p. 602.

It is said above (p. 244.) that this Law was enacted by the Comitia Centuriata. Several reasons may be given in support of that opinion. First, the validity of this Law was never disputed; in the next place it underwent the form of a previous Senatus Consultum, and then, thirdly, it seems probable, at least, (for the reasons given in the Discourse at the end of Chap. xiii.) that there were no Comitia Tributa before Volero's Law was enacted.

But let us suppose, on the authority of Dionysius, that Comitia Tributa were in use from the time of Coriolanus; and that all the capital trials, which the Historian speaks of, as between that time and Volero's Tribuneship, and all the capital trials from Volero's Tribuneship to the Consulship of Valerius and Horatius, were in Assemblies of the Tribes, and that even Volero's Law was enacted in one of those Assemblies: What will follow from these facts, compared with the passages just cited from the Historian? Seemingly, at least, the consequence will be, that, before the Horatian Law, there were two sorts of Plebiscita: Some that were passed in Comitia held by the Tribunes, without previously consulting the Senate; others, that were preceded by an authorising Decree of the Fathers, as in the case of Coriolanus, and in that of Volero's Bill. That to the former sort the Patricians would not submit, but did submit to the latter. And that this is the reason, why we read of no opposition given to the execution of those sentences, which are said by Dionysius to have been passed against certain Consuls, and other great men, by the Comitia Tributa, held by the Tribunes: We may suppose, that these Assemblies had been authorised by Senatus Consulta (though not mentioned by the Historian) to try and judge those persons. And then it will seem that the Horatian Law was enacted purely to give to the Plebiscita, that should be made in Comitia Tributa, without previously consulting the Senate, the same force, as was allowed to those which had been made in the like Assemblies, authorised by a Decree of the Fathers.

According to Livy (L. 3. c. 54.) the Commons had no sooner recovered their Tribunes (upon the abdication of the Decemvirs) but to Law-making they went with all vehemence, even before they returned to their houses (for they were then incamped without the city.) Tribunatu inito L. Icilius extemplo PLEBEM ROGAVIT, et PLEBS SCRIVIT, ne cui fraudi esset secessio ab Decemviris facta. Confestim de Consulibus, creandis cum provocatione M. Duilius rogationem pertulit. Ea omnia in pratis Flaminiis CONCILIO PLEBIS acta.

If I might here hazard a conjecture, I would say, that these proceedings, which were closely followed by the Lex Horatia, were the immediate occasion of this LAW's being enacted. That when Livy says, Ea omnia CONCILIO PLEBIS acta, the words Concilio Plebis are not equivalent to Comitiis Tributis. And that the new Law, while it gave the PLEBISCITA (the Decrees of the Commons) a force equal to that of LAWS made in the Comitia Centuriata, confined this privilege to such Plebiscita, as should be made TRIBUTUM, i. e. in Comitia Tributa, and did not extend it to decrees that might be made, Concilio Plebis. Quum veluti in controverso jure esset, tenerentur patres PLEBISCITIS, legem Centuriatis Comitiis tulere, ut quod TRIBUTUM Plebes jussisset Populum teneret.

Before the introduction of Comitia Tributa, there were unquestionably CONCILIA PLEBIS, which assumed the power of Legislation; and I have not observed any cogent reasons for believing that there were no such Concilia after the Assemblies by Tribes were brought into use.

Should it be asked, what the difference was between COMITIA TRIBUTA held by the Tribunes and CONCILIA PLEBIS, I should say, that, from the former, only the Senators were excluded; but that all the Patricians were excluded from the latter. The latter therefore was an Assembly of the Commons, the former an Assembly of the People; which People nevertheless is sometimes called Plebs. Plebs est ceteri cives sine senatoribus. Digest, L. 50. T. 16. N. 238.

B b b z

It

Year of attempt such a creation. To these Laws was added a Regulation im-
 R O M E porting, that the Senatus Consulta, which were often suppressed or altered CCCIV. by the Consuls, should for the future be transmitted to the Ædiles, and Bef. J. C. preserved in the Temple of Ceres.
 Four hun-

dred
 forty-
 eight.
 Sixtieth
 Consul-
 ship.
 Livy, B.
 3. c. 56.

§. VIII. THOUGH the Patricians in general greatly disliked all these proceedings, yet, because hitherto they saw no particular person of their Party attacked, they made no opposition to them. But the Scene quickly changed. The liberty of the People and the Power of the Tribunes being now firmly re-established, the latter thought the favourable time come for prosecuting the Decemvirs, and all the accomplices of their tyranny. Appius was the first accused. Upon a summons from Virginus (who was appointed to be the accuser) he came into the Forum, attended by a crowd of young Nobles, who had been his Ministers and his Guard during his Decemvirate. Their appearance brought afresh into the People's minds all the instances of his horrible abuse of power.

Then Virginus began, "Long speeches, O Romans, are for clearing up of doubtful cases. I shall not waste your time in expatiating upon the crimes of a man whose cruelty reduced you to the necessity of

It would seem that the Senators (in these times at least) were not allowed to vote in the Comitia Tributa, except when these Assemblies were held by one of the Magistratus Majores; and that then they were held with Auspicia. Tributa Comitia si a Plebeis Magistratibus, hoc est, a Tribuno Plebis & Ædile Plebis facta sint, sine Auspiciis (ut ait Dionysius) esse facta: in a Patriciis Magistratibus cum Auspiciis. Manut. de Com. Rom. cap. ix.

Dr. Middleton (in his Treatise on the Roman Senate, p. 119.) speaks too generally, when he says, that the Tribunes excluded them [the Senate] from any share or influence in the Assemblies of the Tribes. It would have been exact, I believe, if he had said, from THEIR Assemblies of the Tribes, that is, from the Comitia Tributa HELD by the TRIBUNES. But we find, in the year 307 (three years only after enacting the Lex Horatia) the CONSULS holding the Comitia Tributa, on occasion of the dispute between the Ardeates and Aricini, who had referred their cause to the arbitration of the Roman People: Aricini atque Ardeates de ambiguo agro quum sæpe bello certassent—judicem Populum Romanum cepere.—Concilio Populi a Magistratibus dato—quum TRIBUS vocari et populum iurare suffragium oporteret, consurgit P. Scaptius—si licet, inquit, CONSULES de republica dicere, &c. Quum, ut vanum, cum negarent CONSULES audiendum esse, vociferantemque prodi publicam causam summo veri iussu, Tribunos appellat, &c. Liv. E. 4. c. 71.

I thought to have mentioned some particulars in the History of these first years of the Republick, that do by no means correspond to the rules laid down by the Learned as generally observed in the holding the several sorts of Comitia, and doing business therein; but I am glad to retire from these discussions under cover of a passage in the excellent work, before referred to, intitled ELEMENTS OF CIVIL LAW. In page 185 the learned, judicious, and candid Author, after speaking of the differences between LEX and PLEBISCITUM, and between the Comitia Curiata and the Comitia Centuriata, proceeds thus: "I judged it proper that my reader should snatch, in a short and comprehensive view, this part of the Roman constitution. He will more easily make himself master of particulars, even when they contradict, or vary from, his general System: and I am persuaded, that many things might be taught more successfully, if both writers and readers would sometimes consider that which they set off with, not as a part of the building, but only as so much scaffolding, to be laid aside afterwards, or thrown by as useless and unnecessary. In the Civil History of a People, this doctrine may have fairer play, because the constitution of a country, at its final settlement, is best apprehended by the difference it carries with it, from the same constitution, when it first began to be moulded."

taking

“ taking arms to rescue yourselves from it : nor will I suffer him to add “ to his wicked deeds the impudence of defending them. Appius, I shall “ pass over the whole series of your flagitious practices during the space “ of two years. There is one crime only, from which if you do not in“ stantly clear yourself, I order you to be led to prison.
 “ What have you to say for the sentence you passed against Virginia ?
 “ Why did you, contrary to law, refuse a person, whose liberty was “ brought into dispute, the possession of that liberty till the suit was de“ termined ?”

Year of
R O M E
CCCIV,
Bef. J. C.
Four
hundred forty-
eight.
Sixtieth
Consul-
ship.

Appius had no hope of assistance either from the Tribunes or the People ; nevertheless he called upon the Tribunes ; and when, none of them interposing, the Officer laid hold on him to drag him away, he cried out, I appeal. The sound of these sacred words (the guardians of liberty) tho’ from a man who had so lately violated the laws of liberty, caused an universal silence. He then reminded the People of the merit of his ancestors, and of his own unhappy affection to the Commons, when to the great displeasure of the Senate he relinquished the Consulship, to make way for the Decemvirate, and the establishment of the new Laws ; Laws which were still in force, while he the Legislator himself, contrary to the tenor of them, was condemned to Prison. He added, that, as to his merits and demerits, it would appear what they were, when his trial should come on ; that at present he pleaded the common rights of a Roman Citizen, and only demanded the time necessary for preparing his defence : That if without being heard he was now sentenced to prison, he appealed once more to the Tribunes, and exhorted them not to follow the example of those they hated : That, if the Tribunes confessed they had come to an agreement among themselves to abolish the right of appeal, he appealed from them to the people, and implored the protection of the Laws just made, by joint consent of Consuls and Tribunes, to confirm that privilege. “ What “ Citizen can hope for any benefit from those Laws, if Appius Claudius “ can reap none ? Your conduct with regard to me will make it ap“ pear, whether this right of appeal, of which you seem so jealous, be “ only the appearance of a privilege, a thing subject to the cabals and “ private views of the Tribunes, or whether it be the real and firm sup“ port of liberty.”

Virginius, in answer, said, that Appius was the single man who had nothing to do with laws or any social compact, nor ought to have any benefit from them. That, having made himself perpetual Decemvir, his Tribunal had been the retreat and strong-hold of all wickedness ; that regardless of Gods and men, and always surrounded by hangmen instead of Lictors, he had, contrary to all laws and privileges, despoiled, scourged, and murdered his fellow-citizens ; that then, turning his mind from slaughter to lust, he had not been ashamed to tear a Roman maid of free condition out of her father’s arms, deliver her into the hands of the vile minister of his pleasures, and reduce the father to the cruel extremity of killing his daughter, to preserve her honour : That, when the uncle and the person to whom she was betrothed

Livy, B.
3. c. 57.

Year of
R O M E
CCCIV.
Ref. J. C.
Fourthun-
dred forty-eight.
Sixteenth
Consul-
ship.

trothed were taking up the body of the expiring virgin, he had commanded them both to prison, being more vexed at the disappointment of his intended rape, than touched with concern for the murder. That surely it was but fitting so infamous a wretch should go to that prison which he himself had built, and had insolently named the Habitation of the Commons of Rome. Then, turning to Appius, "Appeal therefore, as often as you will; unless you instantly plead, I order you to jail as a criminal condemned."

The commitment of a Patrician of such high rank seemed to many persons, even among the Commons, an excessive stretch of Tribunitian power; yet no-body opposed it. Appius was that minute led to prison, and Virginus appointed him a day for making his defence.

Liv. B. 3.
c. 53.

His uncle, C. Claudius, who had always been against the Decemvirs, and who had particularly detested the pride and insolence of his nephew, hastened however to his aid as soon as he heard of his disgrace. It has been already said, that, to avoid being an eye-witness of the tyrannical Government of the Decemvirs, and of the miseries of Rome, he had retired to Regillus. He was no sooner come back to Rome, but he appeared in the Forum in a habit of mourning, and attended by all his relations and friends. He went from citizen to citizen, and besought each of them in particular not to fix such an ignominy upon the Claudian family, nor to suffer such a shame to themselves, as that the founder of their laws should lie in a dungeon with villains and robbers; but rather to forgive one of the Claudii, for the sake of so many of the name as interceded for him, than, out of hatred to one, to reject the prayers of so many. He added, that, the People having fortunately recovered their liberty by their courage, there was now nothing wanting to the happiness of the Republick, but the restoring of union between the two orders in the State, and that this would be best done by clemency.

Many of the citizens were moved to pity by the intreaties and inter-cessions of Claudius. But Virginus on the other hand begged them to have compassion for him and his daughter, and to have regard to the prayers, not of the Claudian family which had tyrannised over them, but of Virginia's relations, three Tribunes, who, being created for the succour of the People, ought in their necessity to receive succour from them. Virginus prevailed.

D. Hal. B.
11. p. 726.

Appius died in prison before the day came for his trial; and Dionysius tells us, that, tho' the Tribunes gave out that he had strangled himself, it was much suspected that he had been dispatched by their orders. Livy, without mentioning a word of the Tribunes, barely relates, that Appius, to avoid the infamy of a public punishment, put an end to his own life in prison.

Livy, B.
3. c. 53.

The trial of Sp. Oppius, one of the Plebeian Decemvirs, followed next.
Numitorius, Virginia's uncle, (who was now a Tribune) prosecuted him, as an accomplice of Appius, whose injustice in her affair he had not opposed, tho' at that time in Rome. Nor was this the only crime laid to his charge.

A ve-

A veteran, who had served 27 years, and had been eight times honoured with military rewards, stripping off his robe, exposed his shoulders, which had been torn with rods by the Decemvirs Lictors; and he offered to submit himself to the same treatment again, if Oppius could assign any good reason for his cruelty. The accused was condemned by the unanimous suffrages of the People; he was thrown into prison, and Dionysius tells us, that he died there the very same day. The other eight Decemvirs sought their safety in flight, and banished themselves. Their effects were confiscated and sold, and the produce carried by the Quæstors into the publick treasury. Marcus Claudius, the instrument employed by Appius to get Virginia into his power, was condemned to death: but, as he laid all the crime upon Appius, Virginus was contented with his exile, doubtless in consideration that the wretch had acted in compliance with the will of a Magistrate from whom he could have no appeal.

Year of
R O M E
CCCIV.
Bef. J. C.
Four
hundred forty-
eight.
Sixtieth
Consul-
ship.
D. Hal. B.
11 p. 726.

Thus was revenge taken for the innocent blood of the unfortunate Virginia, whose death (like that of Lucretia) procured liberty to the Roman People.

Tho' the punishment of the Decemvirs was owned to be just; yet the Senate could not help being under some Consternation at the death and exile of so many members of their body. Neither was it possible to foresee what bounds the Tribunes, who were so closely united with the two Consuls, would put to their revenge: They seemed to be so many new Decemvirs, who were going to re-establish the late tyranny. Duilius, who was one of the Tribunes, but more moderate than the rest, dispelled the fears of the Senate by this publick declaration: "Enough has been done for the Security of our liberty, and the punishment of our enemies. During the remainder of this year, I will not suffer, that any person be prosecuted or imprisoned for past faults, which, being already expiated, ought therefore no longer to be remembered."

Livy. B.
3. c. 59.

C H A P. XXX.

§. I. The Consuls take the field. Valerius defeats the Æqui and Volsci, and Horatius the Sabines. Nevertheless the Senate, dissatisfied with their too popular administration, refuse them a Triumph. They obtain it of the People. §. II. The Tribunes propose to get themselves perpetuated in the Tribuneship, and Horatius and Valerius in the Consulate. Duilius, one of the College, defeats both these projects. By his influence, joined with the Senate's, five new Tribunes are chosen; after which, finding that he cannot prevail with the Tribes to fill the other five places with new Magistrates, he dismisses the Assembly, referring the completion of the whole number of ten Tribunes to the five already elected. These five, among those they associate with them in their office, name two Patricians. TREBONIUS ASPER, one of the Plebeian Tribunes, shortly after gets a Law passed, forbidding the Tribunes the practice of Co-optation. §. III. In the Consulate

Year of
R O M E
CCCIV
LXXV. C.
P. A. T. A.
C. A. T. A.
C. A. T. A.
C. A. T. A.
C. A. T. A.
C. A. T. A.

Consulate of T. Quinctius Capitolinus and Agrippa Furius the old diffisions are renewed; inſomuch that, though the Æqui and Volſci ravage the country to the very gates of Rome, the Tribunes oppoſe the neceſſary levies of troops to repulſe them: But Quinctius gets the better of this oppoſition, by a ſpeech he makes to the People. The Conſul routs the enemy. §. IV. The Roman People diſhonour themſelves by a judgment they give in a cauſe referred to their arbitration by the cities of Ardea and Aricia.

§. I. AND now the main affair of the Republick was to revenge her-ſelf on her Enemies abroad, who had taken advantage of her late intestine diviſions and anarchy to invade and pillage the Roman territory. Valerius was appointed to march againſt the united forces of the Æqui and Volſci, and Horatius againſt the Sabines. But, before the Conſuls left Rome, the two laſt tables of Laws, which had not yet been eſtabliſhed in due form, received the proper ſanction, and, being engraven in braſs, were, fixed up in the Forum.

Each Conſul obtained a complete victory. Nevertheleſs the Senate being diſſatisfied with theſe Magiſtrates, on account of their exceſſive popularity, and the little regard they had ſhewn for the honour or intereſt of their own order (even leſs than the Tribunes) decreed only one day's ſupplications (or ſolemn thankſgivings) in the name of both; but the People, of their own motion, prolonged the ceremony all the next day.

In the mean time, the Generals returned and appeared with their legions in the Campus Martius; and hither they ſummoned the Senators. Of this ſeveral of the chief among them very much complained, as if the Senate was held in the miſt of arms, with a view to keep it in awe. The Conſuls hereupon removed the Aſſembly to the Flaminian Meadows, and there preſented their petition for a TRIUMPH. Many of the Fathers ſtood up, and warmly oppoſed their requeſt; but C. Claudius eſpecially ſpoke with great bitterneſs on this occaſion. Directing his ſpeech to the Conſuls,

D.H.L.B. “ Did you not ſolemnly promiſe us, that the abdication of the Decemvirs 11.p.728. “ ſhould be followed by a general pardon? And yet no ſooner had we “ obliged thoſe Magiſtrates to depoſe themſelves, but ſome of them were “ murdered, and others conſtrained to baniſh themſelves from their “ country to ſave their lives. Appius, the head of the Claudian family,
“ the chief of the Decemvirs, was ſtrangled in priſon, without the leaſt “ form of juſtice, and without ſo much as being heard in the Aſſembly “ of the people, leſt, moved to pity by the tears and deſolation of a fa“ mily that has deſerved ſo well of the Republick, they ſhould have over“ looked his faults. Our Conſuls, the heads and protectors of the Se“ nate, they, who ought to have expoſed their very lives for the pre-“ ſervation of its dignity, have baſely connived at the murder of the “ unfortunate Appius, and proſecuted no-body for it.”

The Senate, exaſperated ſtill more againſt the Conſuls by this diſcourſe of C. Claudius, declared them unworthy of the honours they ſued for, and they were given to underſtand that they ought to be well content if they eſcaped

escaped punishment. Valerius and Horatius, provoked at the intended ignominy, carried their complaints before the Assembly of the People, and there the Tribune Icilius demanded the TRIUMPH in their behalf. Many Senators went to the Forum to prevent the effects of this cabal, and, among them, C. Claudius. Though he had always been averse to the Government of the Decemvirs, yet he could never pardon the two Consuls for having delivered up his nephew to the fury of the Tribunes. With great vehemence he cried out to the People, that it was over the Senate, and not over the enemy that the Consuls desired to triumph; that they sought a reward for a particular favour done to the Tribune, not for any worthy deed, any real merit; that the Commons had no right to bestow the honours of the TRIUMPH; nor had ever before pretended to it; that this was a prerogative which belonged to the Senate only; and that the Republick would never be free and quiet 'till the two Orders in the State forbore to inroach upon the rights and privileges of each other. No regard was had to these remonstrances; the Tribes unanimously decreed the TRIUMPH to the Consuls; and that it was afterwards thought a legal one may be well concluded from its having a place in the Capitoline Fasti.

Year of
R O M E
CCCIV.
Bef. J. C.
Fourhun-
dred forty-eight.

Sixtieth
Consul-
ship.
Livy, B.
3. c. 63.

Livy,
ibid. and
D. Hal. B.
11. p. 729,
Liv. B. 3.
c. 64.

§. II. THE Tribunes did not stop here. The power they had in the Commonwealth, by their good understanding with the two Consuls, encouraged them to form the design of getting themselves continued in the Tribuneship after the expiration of their year: And, to keep their ambition in countenance, they moved likewise that Valerius and Horatius might be continued in the Consulship. They pretended that the Senate had entered into a plot against the rights and immunities of the People; and that the new Laws would be in great danger of being annulled, if, before they were solidly established, other Consuls of quite contrary dispositions to those of the present should be chosen to the Government.

Luckily for the Commonwealth, it had fallen to Duilius to preside in the Comitia (the same Duilius, who had put a stop to the prosecutions against the adherents of the Decemvirs.) He, foreseeing the mischievous consequences of the measure proposed by his Colleagues, declared, that he would not admit them for candidates, nor make any account of votes given in favour of any one of them: And when, upon their pressing him either to leave the Assembly free, or to resign his Presidentship, a warm dispute arose, he sent for Valerius and Horatius to his Tribunal, and there asked them privately, What they intended to do, at the next Comitia for creating Consuls? They answered, Create new Consuls. The President, instantly advancing with them into the Assembly, put this Question to them before the multitude: If the ROMAN PEOPLE, mindful of the part you acted in recovering the Publick Liberty, and mindful of your other services, both at home and abroad, should, in consideration of your merit, re-elect you to the Consulship, what resolution would you take? Their answer to this imported the same intention which they had expressed in their answer to the first question. Duilius praised them highly for not following the example of the Decemvirs; and then held the Comitia for electing Tribunes. After five new ones had

Year of R O M E
CCCCIV.
Ref. J. C.
Four hundred forty-eight.
Sixtieth Consulship.

been chosen, the President perceiving, that the other candidates would not be able to engage a majority for them because of the busy opposition of his nine Collegues, dismissed the Assembly. Nor did he appoint another day for the meeting of the Tribes to complete the number of ten Tribunes. He alledged, that he had satisfied the Law; which no where required, that the whole number of Tribunes should be chosen at one and the same time; but, on the contrary, had expressly directed, That, in case the whole number of ten Tribunes were not chosen on the day of election, those who were chosen should themselves nominate persons to fill the vacant places.

It was in this manner that Duilius, to the satisfaction of both Senate and Commons, defeated the ambitious attempt of his Collegues; and, when he had reminded the last, that there could not be fifteen Tribunes in the Republick, he laid down his magistracy.

Livy, B. 3. c. 65.

The five new Tribunes presently discovered, that they were under the influence of the Senate: For among those they named to be their Collegues in the Tribuneship (which naming was then called Co-optation) were Sp. Tarpeius and A. Eternius, old Senators, and who had both possessed the consular dignity in the year 209.

Year of R O M E
CCCCV.
Ref. J. C.
Four hundred forty-seven.
Sixty first Consulship.
• Crabbed.

At the election of Consuls for the year 305, the Fasces were transferred from Valerius and Heratius to Lartius Herminius and T. Virginius. These Magistrates being no zealots for either party, their Government was intirely pacifick. But L. Trebonius, one of the Tribunes, extremely angry at the management of Duilius, (in the late election of Tribunes) which had opened a way for Patricians into that College, made heavy complaints of it to the Commons. He gave himself intirely up, during the whole year, to cross the Senate in every thing, whence he acquired the Surname of Asper *. And, in order to prevent, for the future, any Tribunes (gained over by the Senate) from doing as Duilius had done, he proposed a Law, which he got passed, and which from his name was called Lex Trebonia, by which it was ordained, That whoever should hereafter bold the Comitia for electing Tribunes of the Commons, should not dissolve the Assembly 'till the number of TEN Tribunes was completed by the votes of the Tribes. This Law put an end to the practice of Co-optation.

Year of R O M E
CCCCVI.
Ref. J. C.
Four hundred forty-six.
Sixty second Consulship.

§. III. M. GEGANIUS and C. Icilius succeeded Herminius and Virginius in the Consulate. The Plebeians began now to complain, and not without cause, that the young Patricians treated them injuriously; and, tho' the graver and wiser part of the Senate did not approve of the haughty and outrageous behaviour of those youths, yet they would not abandon them to the fury of the Tribunes. They thought it better (says Livy) if the bounds of equity must be transgressed, and one party must over-bear the other, that their own people should have the ascendant: So difficult a matter is it to act with moderation in the maintenance of liberty, every one, under pretence of levelling, exalting himself in proportion as he lowers another. While men are endeavouring to get free from the fear of others, they make themselves be feared; to avoid oppression, they oppress; as if there was a necessity that we must either do injustice, or suffer it.

The

The Consuls found means to quiet the cabals of the Tribunes on this occasion, without employing invectives against them, or suffering the Majesty of the Senate to be offended. There was neither contention at home, nor war abroad, when they resigned the fasces to * T. Quinctius Capitolinus and Agrippa Furius. But this calm did not last long. The young Nobles could not forbear insulting the Plebeians, nor these submit to be insulted. The aggressors were cited to appear before the People; fierce contentions and scuffles always followed. The report of these new dissensions was to the Æqui and Volsci as the signal for taking arms. They assembled their forces, fell first upon the Latine territory, and, meeting with no resistance, advanced so near to Rome, as to drive off the cattle that were grazing before the Æsquiline gate. The Consuls would have raised troops to repulse these invaders, but the Commons, at the instigation of their Tribunes, refused to lift themselves. Hereupon the Consul Quinctius, a man illustrious by several victories, respected for the purity of his manners, and the wisdom of his counsels, having convened a general Assembly of the People, spoke to them to this effect:

“ Though I am not conscious, O Romans, of any crime by me committed, it is yet with the utmost shame and confusion that I appear in your Assembly. You have seen it—Posterity will know it—In the fourth Consulship of Titus Quinctius, the Æqui and Volsci (scarce a match for the Hernici alone) came in arms to the very gates of Rome, and went away again unchastised! The course of our manners, indeed, and the state of our Affairs have long been such, that I had no reason to promise myself much good; but could I have imagined, that so great an ignominy would have befallen me this year, I would by death or banishment (if all other means had failed) have avoided the station where I now am. What? Might Rome then have been taken, if those men who were at our gates had not wanted courage for the attempt?—Rome taken, whilst I was Consul!—Of honours I had sufficient—Of life enough—more than enough—Three Consulships—I should then have died.

“ But who are they whom our dastardly enemies thus despise? the CONSULS? or you, Romans? if we are criminal, depose us, punish us yet more severely. If you are in fault—may neither Gods nor men punish your faults! only may you repent.

“ No, Romans, the confidence of our enemies is not owing to their courage, or to their belief of your cowardice: They have been too often vanquished not to know both themselves and you. Discord, discord is the ruin of this city. The endless disputes between the Senate and the Commons are the sole cause of our misfortunes. While we will set no bounds to our domination, nor you to your liberty; while you impatiently endure Patrician Magistrates, and we Plebeians, our enemies take heart, grow elated and presumptuous.

“ In the name of the immortal Gods, what is it, Romans, you would have? You desired Tribunes: For the sake of peace we granted them.

Year of
R O M E
CCCVII
Bef. J. C.
Four hun-
died forty-five.

Sixty-
third Consul-
ship.
* 4th time
Consul.
Livy, B.
3. c. 66.

c. 67, 68.

Year of " You were eager to have Decemvirs : We consented to their creation.
 ROME " You grew weary of these Decemvirs : We obliged them to abdicate.
 CCCVII. " Your hatred pursued them when reduced to be private men ; and we Bef. J. C. " suffered you to put to death or banish Patricians of the first rank in the Four hun- " Republick. You insisted upon the restoration of the Tribuneship : We dred for- " yielded. We quietly saw Consuls of your own faction elected. You ty-five. " have the protection of your Tribunes, and the privilege of appeal : Sixty- " the Patricians are subjected to the decrees of the Commons : under pre-third " tence of equal and impartial laws, you have invaded our rights ; and Consul- " we have suffered it, and we still suffer it. When shall we see an end of ship. " discord ? When shall we have one interest, and one common country ?
 " Victorious and triumphant, you shew less temper than we under our " defeat. When you are to contend with us, you can seize the Aventine
 " hill, you can possess yourselves of the Mons Sacer. The enemy is at our " gates, the Æsquiline is near being taken, and no-body stirs to hinder it.
 " But against us you are valiant, against us you can arm with all dili" gence. Come on then, besiege the Senate-House, make a camp of " the Forum, fill the jails with our prime Nobles ; and, when you have " achieved these glorious exploits, then at least sally out at the Æsquiline
 " gate with the same fierce spirits against the enemy. Does your resolu" tion fail you for this ? Go then, and behold from our walls your lands
 " ravaged, your houses plundered and in flames, the whole country laid " waste with fire and sword. Have you any thing here to repair these " damages ? Will the Tribunes make up your losses to you ? They will " give you words as many as you please ; bring impeachments in abun" dance against the chief men in the State ; heap laws upon laws ; Assem" blies you shall have without end : But will any of you return the richer
 " from those Assemblies ? You imagine, perhaps, that those flatterers, " those popular men, who will neither let you live in quiet at home, nor " take arms against our foreign enemies, are animated by a zeal for your " interests. It is honour, it is profit to themselves they seek. When do" mestick peace and unanimity reign, they find, they have no business, " are of no consideration ; and they had rather be leaders in tumults and " seditions, than not bustle about, and make a figure. Romans, beware " of such friends ; undeceive yourselves. Do but resume your former " spirit and manners, and there is no punishment to which I will not " submit, if I do not, in a few days, disperse and put to flight the in" vaders of our country, the pillagers of our lands. This terror of war " (with which you seem to be so grievously struck) shall quickly be re" moved from Rome to their own cities."

Livy, B. Never, says Livy, were the Commons more pleased with the flattering
 3. c. 69. speeches of a Tribune, than they were with the reproachful one of this generous Consul. The Senate was no less charmed with his conduct ; the wisest and most eminent men of that body declared, that other Consuls had either betrayed the dignity and rights of the Senate, to win favour with the Multitude, or, by the rough imprudent measures they had taken to keep

* keep them under, had only exasperated them to a higher pitch : But that Quinctius, without forgetting the honour of the Senate, had wisely suited his discourse to the times, and had shewn that he had nothing at heart but the union of the two orders, and the majesty of the Roman name.

Year of
R O M E
C C C V I I .
Bef. J. C.
Four hundred forty-five.

Consuls and Tribunes, Senate and People, all concurred unanimously in taking arms. The contention now was, who should appear most forward, so that the levies were quickly made ; each cohort chose its Centurions, and had two Senators placed at the head of it ; and all things were done with so much expedition, that the army, that very day, marched ten miles on its way. The next, the Consuls came in sight of the enemy, and the day following gave them battle. The Æqui and Volsci fought with great courage and resolution, but victory declared for the Romans. The first advantage gained was by the Roman cavalry under S. Sulpitius, one of the Consuls Lieutenants. They put the enemies horse to the rout, and then, falling upon the main body of their infantry, both terrified and disordered it. Quinctius (who commanded the right wing of the Romans) soon after forced the Volsci, who faced him, to give ground. But Agrippa Furius in the left wing met with a more obstinate resistance from the Æqui. Impatient of being less successful than the other Generals, he snatched some of the ensigns from the officers who bore them, and threw them into the midst of the enemies battalions. By this he turned the scale in his favour. His soldiers, by the vigorous effort they made to recover those ensigns, rendered the victory complete on the side of the Romans. The Consuls instantly marched to the enemy's camp, entered it without opposition, and found there, besides other effects which the Æqui and Volsci had carried off, out of the territory of Rome, a very rich booty.

Sixty-
third Consul-
ship.
Livy, B.
3. c. 70.

Livy remarks it, as a thing extraordinary, that the Consuls, at their return, did not demand a triumph, nor the Senate make them the offer of one. He conjectures, that Quinctius and Furius were ashamed to ask, in recompence of one victory, an honour which the Fathers had refused to Valerius and Horatius, for the reward of two ; lest, if they should obtain their request, it might be thought that more regard was shewed to persons than to merit.

§. IV. THIS would have been a glorious year for the Republick if the Roman People had not dishonoured themselves by their manner of deciding a cause, at this time, referred to their arbitration. It was a dispute between the inhabitants of Ardea * and those of Aricia, concerning a large tract of land, to which each of those cities laid claim. The tribes were assembled, the witnesses were heard, and the votes were just going to be taken, when one Scaptius, a very old man of the meanest of the People, (having obtained, by the interposition of the Tribunes, permission to speak, after it had been refused him by the Consuls) pretended to have known the district in question above forty-seven years ; that it formerly belonged to Corioli, and consequently now to the Romans, who, he said, ought therefore to make no scruple of seizing it. This motion (though, according

* In Latinum.

Year of according to Livy, the man spoke truth) gave the Consuls a great deal of concern, when they found it favourably listened to. They sent for the chief men of the Senate, and, jointly with them, used their utmost endeavours to dissuade the People from taking a step, which must cast a blemish on the Roman probity. But they strove in vain; the People adjudged the territory to themselves.

Sixty-
third Consul-
ship.

C H A P. XXXI.

§. I. The Commons of Rome (in the Consulate of M. Genucius and C. Curtius) demand that Plebeians may be admitted into the Consulship, and that the law prohibiting Patricians and Plebeians from inter-marrying may be repealed. §. II. T. Quinctius and the majority of the Senate think it better to comply than to come to a rupture with the People, which otherwise seems unavoidable. Claudius, to hinder the debasing of the Consulship, makes this new proposal, that, instead of Consuls, a certain number of MILITARY TRIBUNES be chosen partly out of the Senate, and partly from among the Commons; and that these new Magistrates be invested with Consular power. This project is approved by Senate and People; and six MILITARY TRIBUNES (three of each order) are to take the place of two Consuls. §. III. But, when the day of election comes, the People will not give their voices to any but Patricians; and only three Military Tribunes are elected. These are obliged soon after to abdicate on account of some defect in their inauguration; and two Consuls are chosen to govern the Republick the remainder of the year. §. IV. Under the succeeding administration of T. Quinctius Capitolinus (a fifth time Consul) and M. Geganius (a second time) the CENSORSHIP is established.

§. I. BY the late victory so suddenly obtained over the Æqui and Volsci, the Commons became sensible of their own strength, and the need which the Senate had of them. This made them carry their^a pretensions farther than ever. They grew every day more untractable and more enterprising. C. Canuleius, one of the Tribunes, proposed that, by a decree of the People, The Law (in the twelve tables) which forbade Patricians to inter-marry with Plebeians, should be repealed: And, soon after, nine of the Tribunes moved, that a new law should be made, qualifying Plebeians to stand for the Consulship. M. Genucius and Caius Curtius, the present Consuls, thought to defeat these projects by leading the Citizens into the field. The Ardeates had revolted on account of the unjust proceeding of the People of Rome in their affair, and it was said, that the Veientes had begun hostilities. There was a rumour also that the Æqui

^a According to Tacitus, (Annal. B. 11. c. 22.) the People obtained this year the right of naming the Quæstors, a prerogative which the Consuls had hitherto enjoyed. Plutarch attributes the choice of the Quæstors to the People, from Peppicola's time.

and

and Volsci were preparing to renew the war. Countenanced by these alarms, the Senate ordered troops to be raised with the same diligence as the last year. But then Canuleius in the most peremptory manner protested, that, while he had breath, no levies should be made, unless the laws proposed by him and his Collegues were first received. This said, he straight went out of the Senate-House and convened the People. The Consuls full of indignation inveighed in the sharpest terms against the Tribunes, whose madness, they said, was no longer to be endured; that they raised a war within the city, more dangerous than that without it; that no domestick peace could be maintained in a State which had Senators and Tribunes; that the *Conscrip*t Fathers must absolutely resolve either to resign their own authority, or abolish that Plebeian Magistracy. “What a detestable project is this of C. Canuleius? He is for mingling, by shameful marriages, the blood of the Nobles with that of the Commons. If he brings this about, those who are born of such marriages will hardly know, whether they belong to the Patrician or Plebeian Body, and the Auspices, publick and private, will be confounded. And as if it was not enough to destroy all distinction of birth, and to break thro’ all rights both divine and human, the Collegues of Canuleius, those other disturbers of the publick quiet, have the boldness to lift their eyes to the very Consulship itself. We are now just on the point of seeing that great dignity fall a prey to the Canuleii and the *Icili*i. But let those new men be assured, that the Gods, protectors of this Empire, will never suffer it; and that we ourselves will rather die a thousand deaths, than bear so great an infamy.”

While the Consuls were thus exasperating the Senate against the Tribunes, the Tribunes were exciting the anger of the Plebeians against the Consuls. These left the Senate-House, and repaired to the Forum. “What an insult upon us! cried Canuleius. If we are not so rich as the Patricians, are we not citizens of Rome as well as they? Inhabitants of the same country? Members of the same community? The nations bordering upon Rome and even strangers more remote are admitted not only to marriages with us, but to what is of much greater importance, the freedom of the city. Are we, because we are Commoners, to be worse treated than strangers? And when we demand that the People may be free to bestow their offices and dignities on whom they please, do we ask any thing unreasonable or new? Any thing more than a restitution of the People’s natural right? What occasion then for all this uproar, as if the universe was falling to ruin? (They were just going to lay violent hands upon me in the Senate-House.) What? must this Empire then be unavoidably overturned, must Rome of necessity sink at once, if a Plebeian, worthy of the office, should be raised to the Consulship? The Patricians, I am persuaded, if they could, would deprive you of the common light. It certainly offend them to see that you breathe, that you speak, that you have the shapes of men.—Nay, but to make a Commoner a Consul would be, say they, a most enormous thing.—Numa Pompilius, however, without being

Year of
R O M E
CCCVIII.
Bef. J. C.
Fourhun-
dred forty-four.
Sixty-
fourth
Consul-
ship.

Livy B.4.
c. 2.

c. 3-

Year of " being so much as a Roman citizen, was made King of Rome. The elder R O M E " Tarquin, by birth not even an Italian, was nevertheless placed upon the CCCVIII. " throne. Servius Tullius, the son of a captive woman, (no-body knows Bef. J. C. " who his father was) obtained the Kingdom as the reward of his wisdom Four hun- " and virtue. In those days no man in whom virtue shined conspicuous dred for- " was rejected or despised on account of his birth and descent. And did ty-four. " the state prosper the less for that? Were not those strangers the very Sixty- " best of all our Kings? And, supposing now that a Plebeian should have fourth " their talents and merit, must not he be suffered to govern us because he Consul- " is a Plebeian? Shall we rather have Consuls resembling the Patrician Ship. " Decemvirs, the most detestable of mortals, than such as resemble the " very best of our Kings, who were New Men?

" But we find that, upon the abolition of the regal power, no Com-
 " moner was chosen to the Consulate. And what then? Before Numa's
 " time there were no Pontifices in Rome. Before Servius Tullius's days
 " there was no Census, no division of the People into Classes and Centuries.
 " Who ever heard of Consuls before the expulsion of Tarquin the Proud?
 " Dictators, we all know, are of modern invention; and so are the offi" ces of Tribunes, Ædiles, Quæstors. Within these ten years we have " made Decemvirs, and we have unmade them. Is nothing to be done
 " but what has been done before? That very Law forbidding marriages " of Patricians with Plebeians, is not that a new thing? Was there any " such Law before the Decemvirs enacted it? and a most shameful one it " is in a free State.

" Such marriages, it seems, will taint the pure blood of the Nobility.
 " Why, if they think so, let them take care to match their sisters and " daughters with men of their own sort. No Plebeian will do violence " to the daughter of a Patrician. Those are exploits for our prime No" bles. There is no need to fear that we shall force any body into a con" tract of marriage. But to make an express Law prohibiting marriages " of Patricians and Plebeians, what is this, but to shew the utmost con" tempt of us, and to declare one part of the community to be impure " and unclean? Why don't they lay their wise heads together to hinder " rich folks from matching with poor?

" They talk to us of the confusion there will be of families, if this " Statute shall be repealed. I wonder they don't make a Law against " a Commoner's living near a Nobleman, or going the same road that he " is going, or being present at the same feast, or appearing in the same
 " market-place. They might as well pretend, that these things make " confusion of families, as that inter-marriages will do it. Does not every " body know that the children will be ranked according to the quality " of the father, let him be Patrician or Plebeian? In short, it is manifest " enough, that we have nothing in view but to be treated as men and " citizens; nor can they who oppose our demand have any motive to do
 " it but the love of domineering.

“ I would fain know of you Consuls and Patricians, Is the sovereign power in the People of Rome or in you? I hope you will allow, that the People can at their pleasure either make a Law, or repeal one. And will you then, as soon as any Law is proposed to them, pretend to lift them immediately for the war, and hinder them from giving their suffrages by leading them into the field?

Year of
R O M E
C C C V I I I .
Bef. J. C.
Four hundred forty four.

“ Hear me, Consuls: whether the news of the war you talk of be true, or whether it be only a false rumour spread abroad for nothing but a colour to send the People out of the City; I declare, as Tribune, that this People, who have already so often spilt their blood in our country’s cause, are again ready to arm for its defence and its glory, if they may be restored to their natural rights, and you will no longer treat us like strangers in our own country. But if you account us unworthy of your alliance by inter-marriages, if you will not suffer the entrance to the chief offices in the State to be open to all persons of merit indifferently, but will confine your choice of Magistrates to the Senate alone, Talk of wars as much as ever you please; paint in your ordinary discourses the league and power of our enemies ten times more dreadful than you do now; I declare that this People, whom you so much despise, and to whom you are nevertheless indebted for all your victories, shall never more enlist themselves; not a man of them shall take arms, not a man of them shall expose his life for imperious Lords, with whom he can neither share the dignities of the state, nor in private life have any alliance by marriage.”

Sixty-
fourth Consul-
ship.

After long speeches made on both sides, the Consuls and Tribunes fell to altercation. Canuleius asked the Consuls, what reason could be assigned, why a Plebeian might not attain to the Consulship? It was answered, (perhaps with truth, says Livy, but to little purpose, on the present occasion) that no Plebeian had a right to the auspices; and that the Decemvirs had prohibited marriages between persons of different Orders, that, the auspices being taken only by Patricians, whose blood was pure and unmix- ed, there might be no prophanation of that religious Rite.” No words can express the indignation of the people at this answer: To hear that they were excluded from taking the auspices as men hateful to the Gods on account of their birth.

Livy, B.
4. c. 6.

The fury of the multitude rose to such a height, that the Senate found it necessary to let Canuleius’s law concerning marriages pass. They hoped that this concession would induce the other Tribunes to give over intirely the pursuit of the law relating to the Consulship, or least to suspend it till the conclusion of the war: But their hope proved in vain: Those Tribunes, tho’ the alarm from abroad daily increased, still oppose the musters, and pushed their point with the same zeal as before: Nay, they all publicly swore by their Faith, (the most solemn oath then in use among the Romans) that they would not be diverted from their purpose by any persuasion whatsoever.

D. Hal. R.
II. p. 731.

Year of
R O M E
CCCVLII.
Esf. J. C.
Four hundred forty-
four.

Sixty-
fourth
Consul-
ship.
Liv. B. 4.
c. 6.

§. II. THESE violent proceedings greatly distressed the Consuls. They saw plainly that they must yield the victory either to the Commons at home, or to the enemy abroad. They held private counsels at their own houses, with the Senators of their party. C. Claudius, who had received from his ancestors an hereditary hatred, as it were, to the faction of the People, spoke first, and gave it as his opinion, that the Senate should rather have recourse to arms, than yield the dignity of the Consulship to the People; and that without distinction they ought to treat as publick enemies all persons, let them be private men or Magistrates, who should attempt to change the form of the Government. But the two Quintii, who abhorred all thoughts of shedding Roman blood, put the senate in mind of the solemn engagement they had entered into with the Commons to hold the persons of the Tribunes sacred and inviolable, and they advised them rather to yield up part of their prerogatives, than run the hazard of a civil war.

All the rest of the assembly having declared themselves of this opinion, C. Claudius rose up again: "I submit; the sentiment of so many wise and worthy men is not to be contradicted: But, since you think it proper to admit Plebeians into the Government, let us endeavour to satisfy this restless People, without debasing the Majesty of the Consulship. And, in order to this, I propose, that, instead of Consuls, we elect such a number of Military Tribunes as shall be agreed upon, to be chosen one half out of the Senate, the other from among the Plebeians, and that these Magistrates be invested with Consular power. The People by this means will be satisfied; and the Consulate in more favourable times may resume its ancient Splendor and Majesty." Great praises were given to Claudius, and the whole Assembly agreed to the proposal. Then addressing his speech to M. Genucius, first Consul: "In order to succeed in this design, I would advise you to convene the Senate, send for the Tribunes of the People, and, when the Assembly is formed, declare, that you invite all who love their country, to speak their minds freely with relation to the new laws demanded by the People. Then gather the opinions; and, instead of beginning with T. Quintius, me, or any other of the ancient Senators, begin with Valerius and Horatius. When these have delivered their sentiments, then ask ours. For my part I shall declare my thoughts freely, and oppose the pretensions of the Tribunes with all my might, as indeed I think it my duty to do. But, if you are willing to have Military Tribunes, let your brother T. Genucius make the motion. He is the fittest Person to make it; and I can assure you, it will not be in the least suspected if it comes from him."

All approved of this scheme. The Consuls soon after convened the Senate; and when they had recommended concord and, moderation to the Assembly, invited the Tribunes to give their reasons in behalf of the new laws. Canuleius, instead of speaking to the matter in question, ran wholly into bitter complaints against the two Consuls for holding secret Assemblies, from which, he said, all the Senators who were friends to the People had been excluded, and particularly Valerius and Horatius, than whom there were not wiser men, nor men of more merit in the Republick.

to

The Consul Genucius replied, that they had indeed assembled some of the older Senators, but only to consult with them, whether it would be better instantly to propose the new laws to the Senate, or to defer it till the end of the campaign: that, if they did not invite Valerius and Horatius to that council, it was purely to avoid making the People suspect that these Senators had changed their party. He added, "And to convince you, that my Colleague and I are impartial, we shall give you this proof of it. Though it be the custom for the Consuls to ask the opinions of the oldest Senators first, yet, as you do not believe them to be friends to the People, we will now change that method, and begin with Valerius and Horatius." Then, addressing himself to Valerius, he invited him to declare his opinion.

Valerius made a long preamble, expatiating upon his own services to the Republick, and upon those of his ancestors. He then turned his panegyrick upon the People, and recounted their merit. He added, that no city could be called free, where the citizens were not all upon an equality with regard to rights and privileges; and that he saw no reason why the Plebeians should be excluded from the Consulate. However, he at the same time declared, that he thought the consideration of this affair ought to be deferred to the end of the war; and he exhorted the Tribunes of the People to desist from their opposition to the levies which the Consuls demanded. On the other hand, he exhorted the Consuls to make it their first business, as soon as the war should be happily concluded, to procure a Senatus-consultum, for empowering the Assembly of the People to decide upon the affair in question; and he was for having the two parties come immediately to a formal written agreement to do as he advised. Horatius, whose opinion was asked, next spoke much to the same effect.

This advice raised a murmur in the Assembly, for it was not thoroughly liked either by those who were against the law, or by those who were for it. The first were pleased with the motion for postponing the affair, but they could not digest the proposal of resuming it after the end of the war. On the other hand, the favourers of the People, tho' glad to find that those two eminent Senators held the law to be reasonable, were yet uneasy at the thoughts of any delay in passing the Senatus-consultum.

The Consuls then asked the opinion of C. Claudius, who was looked upon as the main pillar and support of the Patrician faction. He pronounced with great spirit a studied harangue against these new pretensions of the People. He enumerated all their deviations from the excellent manners and institutions of their forefathers, and concluded against suffering the new proposal to be brought into deliberation, either now, or at any time hereafter.

Year of ROME cccviii. B.C. 310. Four hundred forty-four. Sixty-fourth Consulship.

Claudius's speech did not fail to produce a commotion in the Assembly. The Consul M. Genucius, to put a stop to it, called upon his brother Titus to give his opinion. This Senator declared, that it was with the greatest concern he beheld the Commonwealth afflicted with two scourges at the same time, a foreign war, and domestick feuds; that he found there was no avoiding one of two evils, the strengthening of the enemy by a continuation of the intestine broils in the Republick, or the hurting of the constitution by new concessions to the People: That, the case being so, he was of opinion rather to yield up part of the prerogative of the Nobility to the Plebeians, than abandon the territory of Rome to be ravaged by strangers. He added, "But, since the ancient Senators are so averse to the thoughts of seeing the Consular dignity in the hands of Plebeians, a medium may perhaps be found to satisfy both parties. What if we should suppress for a time that dignity, and create, in the room of two Consuls, six MILITARY TRIBUNES, who shall have the same functions and the same authority? Let three of the number be Patricians, and the other three be Plebeians. Next year the Senate and People may decide, in a general Assembly, whether they will restore the Consulship, or continue to elect Military Tribunes."

D. Hal. B. 11. P. 736. This proposal (of which Claudius was the true author) was approved by plurality of voices. T. Genucius had the praises of both the Senate and the People for his happy thought; the Senators were glad to have excluded the Plebeians from a dignity which they hoped to re-establish with all its prerogatives in more favourable times; and the People, without disturbing themselves about an empty Name, could not contain their joy at seeing themselves at length admitted to share in the government of the Commonwealth.

Livy, B. 4. c. 6. D. Hal. 12. §. III. SOME days after, an Assembly was held for the election of these new Magistrates. Several of the chief Plebeians, and especially those who had been Tribunes, appeared in the Forum cloathed in white, and solicited the People for their voices; but the multitude, satisfied with having it in their power to raise Plebeians to the Government, would give their votes to none but Patricians; so that only three Military Tribunes were chosen, A. Sempronius Atratinus, L. Attilius, and T. Cecilius, or Clelius. Livy adds, "Where shall we now find, in any one man, that moderation, that equity, that greatness of soul, which were then conspicuous in a whole People?" Dionysius, on the contrary, imputes their behaviour, on this occasion, to nothing but that levity so natural to the multitude, in all ages and nations."

But these new Magistrates were obliged to abdicate within three months after their election, upon account that C. Curtius, who had presided at it, gave notice, that in taking the Auspices (a ceremony which always preceded the elections of the curule Magistrates) the due forms had not been strictly observed. The Romans were very scrupulous in the least circumstances that concerned their religion; but perhaps the Patricians created this scruple only with a view to restore the Consular Office. The Military Tribunes had no sooner resigned their authority, but an Inter-rex was named, that the Commonwealth might not remain without a head. The main question now was, whether Consuls or Military Tribunes should be appointed to the Government? The Senators failed not to declare for the former; the People at first for the latter: But, as they knew themselves resolved to chuse none but Patrician Governors, they soon grew indifferent; and the Tribunes themselves chose rather to proceed to an election where they could not be candidates, than to one where they were sure to suffer the disgrace of being rejected as unworthy. And thus, by the joint consent of the Senate and People, the Inter-rex appointed Consuls, for the remaining part of the year. L. Papirius Mugillanus, and L. Sempronius Atratinus, brother to one of those Patricians who had abdicated the Military Tribuneship, were the persons named.

* Livy makes the Military Tribunes to take place in the year 310. The Fast. Cap. in 309.

Year of
R O M E
CCCIX.
Bef. J. C.
Fourhun-
dred forty-three.
First Military Tribunes.

Livy, B.
4. c. 7 &
8.

Nothing considerable happened during the Government of the late Military Tribunes, or during the present Consulship. The union between the two orders in the Republic kept the neighbouring powers quiet; and even the Ardeates submitted, and renewed their alliance with Rome. The Senate gave them good words concerning the restitution of their lands in due time; but they could not reverse a decree of the People.

§. IV. IN the following Consulate of M. Geganius and * T. Quinctius, the CENSORSHIP was erected, This new dignity, which at first seemed of but small importance, became, in time, by the power annexed to it, the pinnacle of honour, and the most formidable Magistracy in the Republick.

Year of
R O M E
CCCX.
Bef. J. C.
Fourhun-
dred forty-two.

As the spirit of conquest was what chiefly prevailed in this nation, King Servius Tullius, in order to have a sure supply of men and money, decreed, as has been already shewn, that every five years an enumeration should be made of all the Roman citizens, with an exact valuation of every man's wealth. The Prince or Magistrate by this means could know immediately how many inhabitants Rome had, that were capable of bearing arms, and what contributions might be raised for the expence of war.

Sixty-
sixth Consul-
ship.
* 5th time
Consul.

But the Consuls (almost continually employed in foreign wars) not having had leisure in more than seventeen years to make that enumeration which was called the Census, it was proposed, for the ease of the Consuls, that two Magistrates should be created, who, with the title of CENSORS, should every five years take that general review of the whole Roman People.

* D. Hal. says, that the Assembly of the People chose these Consuls. And Livy the Inter-rex, than that the Inter-rex presided in the Assembly. Vid. supr. p. 27. means no more, by imputing the choice to

Year of
R O M E
CCCX.
Bef. J. C.
Four hundred forty-two.

Sixty-
fifth Consul-
ship.

The Tribunes, though always upon their guard against every thing offered by the Senate, did not oppose the establishment of this new Magistracy. Nay, they did not so much as demand that the Plebeians should be allowed a share in it. The reason of this might be, that they thought the powers and prerogatives of the Censorship would be inconsiderable, or that the Commons gained a sufficient advantage by the diminution that was made of the Consular authority, the constant object of their envy and emulation.

Papirius and Sempronius, the Consuls of the preceding year, were the first Censors; and this dignity was unanimously conferred upon them, to make them amends for the short duration of their Consulship, which they did not enter upon till after the abdication of the Military Tribunes.

While the Consuls performed the Censorial functions, their whole business in that article had been to take an exact account of the names, estates, ages, and conditions of all the masters of families, and the names and ages of their children and slaves. But, as men generally study how to enlarge their own authority, the Censorship was no sooner dismembered from the Consulship, and made a distinct Magistracy, than the Censors began to take upon them the reformation of manners. The Senators and Knights in process of time became subject to their censure as much as the meanest of the People.

When the Censors made their general review, their citizens of all ranks trembled at the sight of their tribunal; the Senator, through fear of being expelled the Senate; the Knight, with apprehension of being deprived of the Horse which the Republick kept for him; and the Commoner, with dread of being removed from a higher tribe to a lower, or quite disabled from giving his vote in the Assemblies, or condemned to pay a fine. So that this wholesome terror was the support of the sumptuary laws, the bond of concord, and as it were the guardian of modesty and virtue^a.

^a After the second Punic war the Censors were always created out of such persons as had been Consuls, though it sometimes happened otherwise before. Their station came in time to be reckoned more honourable than the Consulship, though their authority, in matters of State, was not so considerable: And the badges of the two offices were the same, only that the Censors were not allowed the Lictors to walk before them, as the Consuls were.

The Censorship continued no longer than to the time of the Emperors, who performed the same duty at their pleasure: And the Flavian family, i. e. Vespasian and his sons took a pride (as Mr. Walker * observes) to be called Censors, and put this among their other titles upon their coin. Decius, the Emperor, entered on a design of restoring the honour to a particular Magistrate, as heretofore, but without any success. † Kenn. Antiq. P. 2. B. 3. Ch. 7.

* Of Coins and Medals.

† Vide Trebell. Poll. in Decio.

C H A P. XXXII.

§. I. The Romans put an end to a civil war among the Ardeates. §. II. And the next year make them some amends for the wrongs they had done them, on occasion of their contest with the Aricians. §. III. Sp. Mælius, a Roman Knight, and Corn-merchant, aspires to the sovereign power. His designs are discovered by Minucius, Superintendant of provisions, in the Consulate of T. Quinctius Capitolinus (now a sixth time Consul) and Agrippa Menenius. Quinctius, on this occasion, names his brother Quinctius Cincinnatus Dictator, who appoints Servilius Ahala to be his General of the Horse. Mælius is slain by Servilius. Three of the Tribunes, provoked at this action, stir up the People to mutiny; and the Patricians, to pacify them, consent to the creation of Military Tribunes for the next year.

§. I. WHILE the Consuls were thus removing from themselves some part of the burden which had been annexed to their office, a neighbouring city found them new employment abroad. The Ardeates were involved in a civil war, occasioned by a dispute between two private citizens of Ardea, one of a noble family, the other of a Plebeian, who had both fallen in love with the same young woman. She herself was Plebeian, and her guardians were for giving her to a man of her own rank; but her mother, an ambitious widow, was fond of matching her with a man nobly born. It became a party quarrel, and rose to such a height, that the Plebeians left the City in great numbers, incamped on a hill in the neighbourhood, and from thence sent out parties that pillaged and laid waste the lands of the Nobility. The mutineers were joined by the Volsci, and, having chose themselves a Commander, named Cluilius, laid siege to Ardea. The Nobles applied to the Romans. The Senate sent an army to their relief, under the command of the Consul Geganius, who invested the besiegers, reduced them to surrender their arms, and made pass under the yoke.

But though Geganius returned to Rome with all the glory of a Conqueror, his triumph being attended with uncommon pomp and solemnity, yet his Collegue, Titus Quinctius, who had continued in Rome, was, for his admirable conduct in the civil government, and his impartiality in the administration of justice, more esteemed and respected than he. No-body ever knew better than Quinctius how to temper severity with mildness.

The Senators thought him sometimes too severe to the People, and yet the People were perfectly satisfied with his goodness to them. It is easy to imagine, that, during such a wise administration, the People did not think of changing the form of government, and creating Military Tribunes.

§. II.

Year of
ROME
CCCX.
Bef. J. C.
Four hundred forty-two.
Sixty-
sixth Consul-
ship.
Livy, B.
4. c. 9.

c. 10.

Year of R O M E
CCCXI.
Bef. J. C.
Four hundred forty one.
Sixty-seventh Consulship.
Livy, B. 4. c. 11.

§. II. M. FABIUS and Posthumius Æbutius, being chosen Consuls for the new year, made it their business to bury in oblivion the remains of that infamy which the Roman People had brought upon themselves by the unjust judgment formerly passed in relation to the Ardeates. They prevailed on the Senate to pass a decree for sending a colony to Ardea, to defend and re-people the city, much depopulated by the civil war. It was agreed, but secretly, for fear of the Tribunes, that no lands, except those formerly in dispute, should be divided among the new colony, of which the greater part should not be Romans, but Rutuli (whose capital city was Ardea) and that no Roman should have any portion of the lands, till all the Rutuli of the colony were provided for. This was in reality annulling the judgment of the People by an act of power. And accordingly Agrippa Menenius, T. Clælius, and M. Æbutius, the Commissioners for making the distribution, were (after a faithful discharge of their trust) cited to appear before the People. But these three Patricians avoided the prosecution, by declaring themselves Citizens of Ardea, and continuing there.

Year of R O M E
CCCXII.
Bef. J. C.
Four hundred forty.

The new year of C. Furius and M. Papirius was as peaceful as the foregoing; not but that some Tribunes of the Commons, always restless, endeavoured to revive the pretensions of the People, relating to the partition of the lands: They even threatened, according to their old custom, to oppose the raising of soldiers: But, as there were no wars then to be carried on, this menace was fruitless and despised.

Sixty-eighth Consulship.
c. 12.

§. III. ALL was quiet, when the next year, in the Consulate of Proculus Geganius and L. Menenius, there happened a dreadful famine, which occasioned seditions, by means whereof a private man (if we may credit Livy) was near getting possession of the sovereign power. The Senate imputed this scarcity of corn to the laziness and negligence of the Plebeians, who, intoxicated with the seditious harangues of the Tribunes, were always sauntering in the Forum, and, instead of cultivating their lands, wasted their time in idle reasonings about state affairs. On the other hand, the multitude (who always grumble at those who are at the helm) imputed the dearth intirely to the want of care in the Consuls. At length the People, with the Senate's approbation, appointed L. Minucius, an active, prudent man, to be principal purveyor and superintendant of provisions. Minucius sent his agents into the neighbouring countries all round to buy corn; but with little success. A Roman Knight, whose name was Sp. Melius, one of the richest private men in the Commonwealth, had been beforehand with him at the markets in Hebruria, and had bought up, in that Province, so much corn, at his private expence, as hindered the agent of the publick from making the necessary Provision at a reasonable price. Melius with a liberal hand distributed, among the necessitous, the corn he had amassed. It is said that the popularity he acquired by this means gave him good ground to hope being one day raised to the Consulship. But this, it seems, was not enough to satisfy his ambition. Nothing less than regal Power would content him.

During

During the publick calamity new Consuls were chosen, * T. Quintilius Year of R O M E CCCXIV. Bef. J. C. Four hundred thirty-eight. Capitolinus and Agrippa Menenius; but Minucius was continued in his office. His commission frequently obliging him, either by himself or his agents, to have intercourse with the same sort of men, with whom Mælius trafficked in his private capacity, the purveyor, by their means, learnt that this ambitious Knight, under cover of that liberality, which drew crowds of People to his gate, formed Assemblies in his house; nay, he got information, that great quantities of arms were often carried thither by night.

He afterwards learnt that there was a conspiracy laid to change the form of the Government; that Mælius aspired to the Royalty; that the People were to take arms in his favour; and that the Tribunes had consented to sell the publick liberty.

Minucius, having discovered the whole secret of this conspiracy, immediately gave an account of it to the Senate. Heavy reproaches were thrown upon the Consuls of the preceding year, and on those of the present, for that so important a discovery should be first made by the Purveyor General; whereas the Consuls ought not only to have been acquainted with Mælius's wicked designs more early, but before this time to have punished him. Quintilius replied, that, as to the latter, the Consuls were unjustly blamed; that they wanted neither courage nor resolution to punish so horrid an attempt; but that the consular Authority was too much restrained by the Laws of Appeal; that, if ever the business should be brought before a general Assembly, Mælius would infallibly escape from justice, by the favour of the multitude, who were devoted to him; that, in the present danger, the Republick stood in need of a Magistrate, not only firm and resolute, but above the laws; and that therefore he would name to the Dictatorship his brother L. Quintilius Cincinnatus, a man whose prudence and steady courage were answerable to that supreme authority. Cincinnatus would have declined the office, on account of his great age, being now past fourscore; but the Consuls and the whole Senate declaring that no man was so fit for it as he, and insisting upon his charging himself with the care of the Commonwealth in this critical juncture, he at length acquiesced, praying to the Gods, that the publick weal might not suffer through his infirmities.

He named Servilius Ahala to be his General of the Horse, and the next day placed guards in all parts of the city, as if some foreign enemy had been at the gates of Rome. This precaution surprised all who knew nothing of the conspiracy; every body inquired the reason of so strange a novelty, and why a Dictator should be named in the midst of peace. But Mælius plainly saw, that the power of that supreme Magistrate was wholly bent against him; and therefore, to strengthen himself by the assistance of the multitude, he was now more liberal and bountiful than ever.

The Dictator, finding that nothing but a stroke of authority could crush so dangerous a plot, caused his Tribunal to be carried into the Forum, and ascended it guarded by his Lictors armed with their axes. He then

Year of sent Servilius, his Master of the Horse, to cite Mælius to appear before R O M E him. Mælius, surprised, and in doubt what course to take, delayed to CCCXIV. obey, and sought to make his escape. Servilius commanded a Lictor to Bef. J. C. arrest him; which the Lictor having done, Mælius cried out, that the Four Senate wanted to destroy him only out of jealousy, and because he had con-hundred sacred his estate to the relief of the poor; he implored the assistance of thirty- the multitude, and conjured his friends not to suffer him to be murdered eight. in their presence. The People hereupon, encouraging one another, rescued him out of the Lictor's hands. Mælius threw himself into the crowd, to escape; but Servilius pursued him, overtook him, and with a stroke of his sword killed him out-right. Then, all sprinkled with the blood of the slain, he presented himself before the Dictator; "Mælius (said he) "refused to obey your summons, and endeavoured to raise a rebellion;
 "he has by this hand received his due punishment." 'Twas greatly done, (replied the old man) you have saved the liberty of the Commonwealth.

He then convened a general Assembly of the People, laid before them the crimes of Mælius, and pronounced that he was justly slain^a. The Livy, B. Knight's house, by the Dictator's order, was razed to the ground. Pro-
 4. c. 15; digious quantities of corn were found there, which Minucius selling to the & 16. People at low rates, they made no opposition to a Decree which ordered a statue to be erected to his honour, as the reward of his vigilance.

But three of the Tribunes, who were doubtless the confidents and accomplices of Mælius, could never forgive either Minucius or Servilius the death of that ambitious Corn-merchant; they made loud complaints of the murder; and the Tribunes in general were so much provoked against the Senate, that they absolutely opposed the election of Consuls: The Patri- cians, to avoid a tumult, were forced to consent that Military Tribunes should be chosen to the Government, for the next year.

Some Tribunes of the Commons flattered themselves, that they should have a great sway in this election; but, notwithstanding all their cabals, the People, contented with being allowed to stand candidates, gave their votes to Patricians only. Mamercus Æmilius, Julius Iulus, and L. Quinc- R O M E tius (the son of the Dictator who had just taken off Mælius) were the per-CCCXV. sons elected.

Year of
 R O M E
 CCCXV.
 Bef. J. C.
 Four hundred thirty-seven.

^a See what is said on this Matter, in the note at the end of chap. xiv.

Second
 Mil. Trib

C H A P. XXXIII.

§. I. Fidenæ revolts from the Romans, and puts itself under the protection of Tolumnius, King of the Veientes. The Romans name a Dictator, Mamercius Æmilius, who defeats the enemy in a pitched battle, wherein Cornelius Collus, a legionary Tribune, kills Tolumnius and strips him of his armour. §. II. Sp. Mælius, a Tribune of the Commons, commences a prosecution against Servilius and Minucius, for the death of Mælius the corn-merchant. §. III. The Veientes and Fidenates renew the war.
 Fidenæ

Fidenæ is taken by the Romans. A law is passed restraining the office of Censor to eighteen months duration. §. IV. The Senate is obliged to humour the People, by suffering Military Tribunes to be created. However none but Patricians are chosen. The rich Plebeians complain of the poorer sort, for their having constantly refused to elect any of them to that Magistracy. The Senate, fearing lest some of the chief Plebeians should get into the Military Tribuneship, contrive, on occasion of a war with the Æqui, to get two Consuls chosen to the Government; but these disagreeing, through jealousy, the Senate judge it necessary to have a Dictator. The Consuls refuse to name one. The Senators rashly apply to the Tribunes to interpose in the affair. The Tribunes threaten the Consuls. Posthumius Tubertus is named Dictator. He defeats the enemy. §. V. The Æqui obtain a truce for eight years. Rome being afflicted with a famine and a plague, the People have recourse to foreign superstitions; which are soon prohibited. §. VI. The Veientes make incursions on the Roman lands. Disputes arising between the Senate and People about the prerogative of proclaiming war, the Romans do not take the field 'till the next year, when the People prevail to have Military Tribunes in the Government, but they chuse only Patricians. These not acting in concert are defeated by the enemy. Mamercus Æmilius, raised to the Dictatorship, gives the Veientes a total overthrow, and takes their camp, as also Fidenæ, which had again revolted from the Romans.

§. I. THE tranquillity of the new administration was disturbed by the defection of Fidenæ, a city about five miles distant from Rome, on the side of Sabinia. It had been a Roman colony ever since Romulus's time. The Fidenates had frequently revolted; and now again, throwing off the yoke, they put themselves under the protection of Tolumnius, King of the Veientes. Nor did the Fidenates stop at rebellion only, but murdered four Ambassadors whom the Romans sent to them to ask the reason of their conduct. Livy relates, that they did this enormous deed by order of the King, whose aim (he supposes) was to extinguish in them all hope of a reconciliation with Rome. The prospect of coming soon to a bloody battle (for the war was already begun) determined the Republick to chuse Consuls, rather than Military Tribunes, for the ensuing year.

M. Geganius (a third time) and L. Sergius were elected. It fell to the latter to conduct the war. But, though he gained some advantage over the enemy, it cost the Romans dear, and they did not think fit to continue at the head of the army a General, who was so prodigal of Roman blood. The Senate ordered a Dictator to be created, and Mamercus Æmilius was nominated by the Consuls. The very report of the election of a General whose merit was equal to his employment abated the confidence of the Veientes and Fidenates, who durst not appear in the field; 'till they were joined by the Falisci. The Dictator defeated these confederates in a pitched battle. Tolumnius was slain in the action by Cornelius Cossus, a legionary Tribune, who stripped him of his Armour and royal Robes. And these

Year of
R O M E
CCCXV.
Bef. J. C.
Four hundred thirty-seven.
Second
Mil. Trib.
Liv. B. 4.
c. 17.

Year of
R O M E
CCCXVI.
Bef. J. C.
Four
hundred thirty-six.
Seventy-
first Con-
sulship.
Liv. B. 4.
c. 18, 19, 20.

Year of ROME cccxvi. Bef. J. C. Four hundred thirty-six. spoils, called opima spolia, Cornelius afterwards carried on his shoulders in the Dictator's triumph, and then deposited them in the temple of Jupiter Feretrius. They were the second of the sort known in Rome. The first were borne by Romulus, who killed King Acron in single combat.

§. II. IN the following year (of the Consuls, M. Cornelius and L. Papirius) one Sp. Melius, a Tribune of the People, and a relation of the famous Corn-merchant, cited Minucius and Servilius Abala to answer for what they had done against his kinsman; Minucius for having brought a false accusation against him, and Servilius for having put to death a Roman Citizen, before condemnation.

Seventy-first Consulship. Year of ROME cccxvii. Bef. J. C. Four hundred thirty-five. Livy intimates that these prosecutions were fruitless, and that the Tribune only brought himself into contempt by them: But others relate, that Servilius was condemned to banishment, from which Cicero pretends, that he was afterwards recalled. As for Minucius, we do not find that he suffered any thing from the resentment of the prosecutor.

Seventy-second Consulship. Livy, B. 4. c. 21. Val Max. B. 5. c. 3. Cic. pro Domo, §. 32. Year of ROME cccxviii. Bef. J. C. Four hundred thirty-four. §. III. THE chief concern of the Romans, at this time, was to preserve themselves from the plague, with which they were grievously afflicted. And it raged with greater fury, in the following Consulship of * Julius Iulus and L. Virginus. While Rome was in this distress, the Veientes and Fidenates came and incamped almost close to the city, on the side of the gate Collina. The Senate, being terrified at so near an approach of the enemy, thought it necessary to nominate a Dictator; and the Consuls pitched upon Quintus Servilius Priscus, who commanded all those whose health would permit them to march out of the city. Upon this the enemy immediately retired: But Servilius came up with them near Nomentum, routed them, and afterwards took the city of Fidene by sap. However, this being looked upon as a civil war, because Fidene was a Roman Colony, the General was not granted a triumph, though he probably assumed then the name of Fidenas. This success was followed by a Census of the Roman People, which, after the establishment of the Censors, never failed to be renewed every five years.

Seventy-third Consulship. * A third time. Livy, B. 4. c. 22. Fast. Cap. Year of ROME cccxix. Bef. J. C. Four hundred thirty-three. It is not agreed, whether Rome in the beginning of the year 319 was governed by the former Consuls, Julius Iulus and L. Virginus, or by new ones, M. Manlius and Q. Sulpicius, or by three Military Tribunes. But, be that as it will, it is certain that these Tribunes or Consuls were so little concerned in the events of the year, that they were soon forgotten. A rumour being spread abroad, that all the nations of Hetruria were to take arms in favour of the Veientes, Mamercus Æmilius, a man illustrious both in peace and war, was raised a second time to the Dictatorship, a dignity in which he had before acquired great glory against the same enemies. But the news of this dreadful league proving false, and Æmilius finding himself deceived in his hopes of signalising his second Dictatorship by a new victory, resolved however to leave some monument of his zeal for the publick liberty. He observed to the People in a general Assembly, that their Ancestors, in order to preserve their freedom, had established in the Republick no Officer whose authority was to last above a year :

a year : but that this wise precaution had not been remembered in the late Year of creation of Censors, who were allowed a five years Magistracy ; that it R O M E was a grievous thing to be subject five years (a great portion of a man's CCCXIX. life) to the censure of the same persons : And that a Law therefore ought Bef. J. C. to be made for shortening the duration of that office to eighteen months. Four hundred thirty-three.

This discourse was received with great applause, especially by the People, and the next day the Law, with their approbation, was passed and published in form. Then Æmilius, " To convince you, Romans, that I am in earnest, when I express so great a dislike to Magistracies of long continuance, I now resign my own." The multitude with acclamations of joy, and with expressions of the greatest esteem and affection, conducted him back to his house. But C. Furius and M. Geganius, the present Censors, shewed a most extravagant resentment of the injury which they pretended was done them, by this abridging of the duration of the Censorship. Æmilius had no sooner abdicated his authority, but, in virtue of the power belonging to their office, they struck his name out of the roll of his Tribe, took from him, as from a scandalous wretch, the privilege of voting, and loaded him with a tribute eight times greater than he used to pay. But this persecution, instead of dishonouring him, gave him a new lustre ; all the shame fell upon the persecutors. The Senators themselves, notwithstanding they disliked the new law, were yet more displeased with the severe and arbitrary conduct of the Censors ; making this natural reflection, that, though they might themselves be for a time possessed of the same power, they should probably be much longer subject to it. And, as for the People, full of indignation, they would have torn Furius and Geganius to pieces, if Æmilius had not been so generous as to save them. Seventy-fourth Consulship.

§. IV. THE Tribunes of the Commons, by renewing their ordinary harangues against the electing of Consuls, prevailed to have Military Tribunes chosen for the next year ; nevertheless, in spite of all their interest and intrigues, the People still prepossessed in favour of the Nobility, as to their capacity for government, and the command of armies, gave their voices again to three Patricians, M. Fabius, M. Fostius, and L. Sergius. Nothing remarkable happened in their year except a plague, which ceased in the following year of L. Pinarius, L. Furius, and Sp. Posthumius. And then ambition raised some fresh disturbances at Rome. The wealthy Plebeians complained of the inferior sort, as not well enough affected to their interests, having never chosen any but Patricians to be Military Tribunes, notwithstanding the law, which allowed them to chuse three Plebeians to that dignity. They met at the houses of the Tribunes of the Commons, to consult upon this matter ; and there they came to this conclusion, that the neglect which had been shewn them was owing to the various arts used by the Nobles to gain the People's favour in elections, and it was resolved to propose a law, forbidding any pretenders to the superior offices to go about, as had been the custom, in garments of an extraordinary whiteness, (whence they were called Candidates) to solicit the People's votes : A matter which, as Livy tells us, would in his days have been thought of Livy, B. 4. c. 25. Year of R O M E CCCXX. Bef. J. C. Four hundred thirty-two. Third Mil. Tri. Y. of R. 321. Bef. J. C. 431. Fourth Mil. Tri. Liv. B. 4. c. 25. small

Year of small moment, and scarce worthy of a serious debate, but which at this time raised a very warm contention between the two parties. The Tribunes prevailed, the law was passed, and the present animosity of the People against the Patricians gave reason to believe that the former would no longer refuse their voices to the chief Plebeians for the Military Tribuneship. The Senate to avert this danger turned their thoughts to get Consuls chosen for the next year. The formidable preparations which the Æquians and Volscians made for war at this time favoured the design. As there were no Plebeians who had ever commanded armies, and none but old Captains and the chief men of the Senate were fit for that employment, the People were indifferent, whether Consuls or Military Tribunes were chosen this year. Thus the Senate being left masters of the election, the Consulship was restored, and T. Quintius, the son of Lucius, and C. Julius Mento attained that dignity. A better choice could not have been made, with respect either to birth or capacity in the art of war: But, jealousy and division arising between them, it is said * they were beaten near the Algidus. The Senate, to prevent the Consequences of their defeat, resolved to have recourse to a Dictator. But the two Consuls, on whom the nomination of him depended, though they differed in all other respects, united to cross the Senators in this particular. They were probably offended at the diffidence shewn of their abilities; but, whatever was the cause of their non-compliance with the Senate's desire, they continued obstinate in their determination, 'till, expresses upon expresses bringing accounts of the mischievous progress of the enemies arms, Q. Servilius Priscus, a Consular person, turning to the Tribunes of the People who were then in the Senate-house, exhorted them to interpose their authority, and oblige the Consuls to name a Dictator. Those Plebeian Magistrates joyfully laid hold of so fair an occasion to extend their power, and, having withdrawn a while to consult, returned with this declaration, That it was the pleasure of the Tribunes, that the Consuls should obey the Senate, or be led to prison, if they persisted in their disobedience. Hereupon the two Magistrates submitted, upbraiding the Senators however, that it was by them the Consular authority was betrayed and subjected to the yoke of the Tribunitian power. The Conscript Fathers indeed seem to have been so much exasperated against the two Magistrates, and so intent upon vanquishing their obstinacy, as not to be duly sensible of the breach they made in their own authority. After some dispute between the Consuls about the person who should be Dictator, they drew lots for the privilege of nominating. It fell to T. Quintius; and he named his father-in-law Posthumius Tubertus, who appointed L. Julius Iulus to be his General of the Horse.

Posthumius was an old Captain, of great valour and experience, but naturally harsh and severe. The knowledge of his temper and the power of life and death, which the Dictatorship gave him, made all who were summoned run obediently to range themselves under his ensigns. Leaving the defence of the city to the Consul C. Julius, and giving to the other Consul, T. Quinctius, the command of one half of the Army; he marched away, and soon came up with the enemy. Observing that they were lodged in two separate camps, he posted his troops likewise in two camps, about a mile from theirs. Daily skirmishes ensued, in which the Romans had generally the advantage. This took from the enemy the hope of conquering in the plain field. They attacked therefore the Consul's camp in the night. But neither did they succeed in this enterprise. By the able conduct of the Dictator and his Generals, the Romans, after a bloody conflict, proved victorious. Posthumius led back his army to Rome, and, when he had been honoured with a TRIUMPH, laid down the Dictatorship.

* Livy speaks doubtfully, and seems here to be much in the dark. He gives no account of what became of the Consuls army after the defeat; nor how the Generals came to be so suddenly in the Senate-house after it.

Year of
R O M E
cccxxii.
Bef. J. C.
Four hundred thirty.
Seventy-fifth Consulship.

§. V. THE next year, in which C. Papirius and L. Julius were Consuls, the Æqui, being humbled by former losses, desired to enter into alliances with the Republick; on the same foot with the Latines and Hernici. But their Envoys perceiving that the Romans were not inclined to an union, upon any other terms, than a submission at discretion; they proposed only a truce, which was granted for eight years. The Volsci at this time quarrelled among themselves, and from disputes and reproaches came to seditions and battles. By this means Rome was left in perfect tranquillity, and nothing remarkable was done there during the present Consulship, but the settling, by a law, the value of the oxen and sheep, paid by way of fines for disobedience to Magistrates; and the fines were ordered to be paid in money for the future, each ox valued at 100 Asses of brass, and each sheep at 10. The Tribunes were the first projectors of this new regulation; but the Consuls, having notice of the design, proposed the law themselves, by which they gained the favour of the People.

Year of
R O M E
cccxxiii.
Bef. J. C.
Four hundred twenty-nine.
Seventy-sixth Consulship.
Livy, B. 4. c. 30.

L. Sergius and Hostus Lucretius passed their Consulship in greater inaction than their Predecessors. The Republick enjoyed a profound peace. But the next year, when T. Quinctius (a second time) and Cornelius Cossus were raised to the Consulate, a calamity more grievous than war fell upon Rome, and almost upon all Italy. An extreme drought occasioned a famine, which was followed by a dreadful plague, that spared neither man nor beast. And not only the bodies of the Romans were distempered, says Livy, but their minds too were infected with various superstitions; and these chiefly of foreign growth. Rites and Ceremonies and expiatory Sacrifices, never before practised at Rome, were introduced by crafty knaves, who, pretending to prophecy, imposed on the credulity of the People. The chief Magistrates, well apprised of the danger of innovations in religion, ordered the Ædiles to put a stop to this disorder, and to see, that no other Gods were worshipped but the Roman, nor these worshipped in any other manner than that which was established by Law.

Y. of R.
cccxxiv.
Y. of R.
cccxxv.

§. VI. THE Veientes after their defeat near Nomentum, in the year 318, had obtained a truce for 8 years, but, before this time was expired, they

Year of R O M E CCCXXVI. B. J. C. Four hundred twenty-five. ————— they had ravaged the lands of the Republick. The Senate therefore in the Consulship of L. * Papirius and Servilius Abala thought it proper to revenge this injury. The only question was in what manner war should be declared against them. The Senate pretended that their Decree would be sufficient: On the other hand the People urged that to determine affairs of peace and war was their peculiar province. This was not disputed, but the Senators alledged that the question at present was not about a new war, but about a war already begun, and only suspended by a truce. The Tribunes carried their point by threatening to hinder the levies, if the Consuls did not apply themselves to the People to obtain a declaration of war against the Veientes. These disputes produced these two effects, they delayed the vengeance of the Romans, and made the People insist upon having the government of the Republick placed the next year in the hands of Military Tribunes, and not of Consuls.

Year of R O M E CCCXXVII. B. J. C. Four hundred twenty-five. —————
 Four Patricians were chosen, T. Quintilius Cincinnatus, C. Furius, M. Posthumius, and A. Cornelius Cossus, and they took their employments by lot. Cossus stayed at Rome, the other three marched against the Veientes. But these Generals not acting in concert, when they came to an engagement with the enemy, the Roman army was routed. However, it happened very fortunately, that the nearness of the camp saved the troops from slaughter, and their disgrace was greater than their loss. But, as it had not been usual for them to suffer any disgrace, the whole city was in consternation at the news of this shameful action. The People demanded to have the Generals deposed, and at the same time to have a Dictator named. A difficulty arose in relation to this last demand. It had been the prerogative of the Consuls to nominate a Dictator, and there were no Consuls now in being. The Augurs, being consulted thereupon, declared that Cossus, who had had no share in the late disaster, might lawfully name a Dictator. Accordingly he named Mamercus Æmilius, that great man, who had been in the same post twice before, and whom the Censors had degraded, and sunk to a level with the lowest of the People. Æmilius appointed Cossus to be his General of the Horse.

In the mean time the inhabitants of Fidene massacred the Roman colony there, and revolted a seventh time to the Veientes, who passed the Tiber, and incamped near the city. The Dictator, with his infantry, attacked them furiously; but his left wing was a while amazed and terrified by the enemy's new manner of fighting. The Fidenates opened one of the gates of their city, and sent out some soldiers with lighted torches in their hands, and dressed in habits like those usually given the furies. These ran like mad enthusiasts through the Roman battalions, and threatened them with fire and sword at the same time. But the Dictator upbraided his men with cowardice, "What, said he, are you as much afraid of smoke as a swarm of bees? Make use of your swords to wrest these torches out of the enemy's hands, and then go and set fire to their city with them." The Romans recovered their courage, and, Cossus with his cavalry falling upon the enemy at the same time, the latter were intirely defeated: Both Fidene and and the camp of the Veientes were taken and plundered, and the prisoners were partly distributed by lot to the Roman Officers, and the rest sold for the benefit of the publick. This glorious expedition being finished in sixteen days, Æmilius led back his troops to Rome, had the honours of a triumph, and then laid down his Dictatorship, leaving it a question, whether his bravery or his moderation were the greater.

Year of
R O M E
cccxxvii.
Bef. J. C.
Four hundred
twenty-
five.

C H A P. XXXIV.

Fifth Military Tribunes.
Livy, B.

§. I. Military Tribunes are chosen to the government the two following years; but the choice falls only on Patricians. The Tribunes of the Commons use their utmost endeavours to dissuade the People from this preference of the Nobles to them, in their elections. The Senate, to counterplot them, before the new elections come on, contrive to send away the principal of the Plebeians into the field against the Volsci. In their absence Appius Claudius (son of the Decemvir) one of the Military Tribunes, holds an assembly for electing Consuls, and C. Sempronius and Q. Fabius are chosen. §. II. Sempronius brings the whole Roman army into danger of being cut to pieces by the Volsci. An Officer of horse, named Tempanius, by his bravery and prudence, prevents the defeat of the Romans. He arrives at Rome before the Consul, and gives testimony in favour of his conduct. §. III. The People condemn Posthumius (one of those Military Tribunes, who by their disunion had lost a battle in the year 327) in a fine. Tempanius is made one of the Tribunes of the Commons. His General Sempronius being prosecuted by the People for his misconduct, he takes his part, and engages the Tribune Hortensius, the accuser, to drop the prosecution.

§. I. THE two following years were spent in making truces with the Veientes and Æqui, and in other negociations, and in celebrating the great games of the Circus. The Government was in each of these years committed to four Military Tribunes. The Tribunes of the Commons prevailed so far; but they had still the mortification to see Patricians only elected.

Year of
R O M E
cccxxviii.
Bef. J. C.
Four hundred
twenty-
four.

It is impossible to express the rage and indignation of these Plebeian Magistrates. They reproached the People with ingratitude. They told them plainly that great recompences were necessary to encourage men to great actions, and that for their parts they would throw up all care of the Plebeian interest, if their zeal and labours were never to be rewarded with honours. That it was much better to repeal the law which qualified Plebeians for the Tribuneship, than to see it thus rendered fruitless in all the

Year of
R O M E
cccxxix.
Bef. J. C.
Four hundred twenty-
three.
Livy, B.
4. c. 35.

A. SEMPRONIUS,	} Y. of R.		AP. CLAUDIUS,	} Y. of R.
L. FURIUS.			SP. NAUTIUS,
L. QUINCTIUS,			L. SERGIUS,
L. HORATIUS,			SEX. JULIUS.
	3.			329.

Year of elections by the cabals of the Patricians; and that it would be less shame
 R O M E to the Commons to be wholly excluded from the privilege of standing can-CCCXXIX didates, than to be always rejected as incapable or unworthy.

These discourses, often repeated, made an impression upon the multitude; and at the same time the richest and most eminent men of the Ple- beians gave out, that, if they could once be chosen to the Government, they would not fail to get the publick lands divided among the citizens, procure the establishment of new colonies, and cause a tax to be laid upon the landed men to provide pay for the soldiers in time of war: In a word, they forgot nothing that might engage the People to raise them to the dignity of Military Tribunes.

The Patrician Magistrates, who were then in possession of that dignity, to avoid the shame of having Plebeians for their successors, privately agreed with the Senate to lead out of Rome (under pretence of making an incursion upon the lands of the Volsci, who, they gave out, were preparing with all diligence for war) the chief of the People, and especially those who aspired to the Military Tribuneship; and during the absence of the army to proceed to an election of Consuls. Three of the Military Tribunes took the field, leaving Appius (the Decemvir's son) their Collegue, to guard the city, and preside at the intended election. Appius was a young man bold and enterprising, and had been educated from his very cradle in an hereditary aversion to the People's power. No sooner were the Tribunes with great numbers of the Plebeians gone into the field, but, laying hold of the opportunity, he, pursuant to a decree of the Senate, held the Comitia for electing Consuls. C. Sempronius Atratinus and C. Fabius Vibulanus were chosen: And the People and their Tribunes, at their return, found the election too strongly settled, to think of reversing it. They afterwards shewed their resentment, by prosecuting one of the Consuls as a criminal, on account of the ill success he had in the war against the Volsci.

§. II. THIS warlike People, who had long fought with the Romans for empire and dominion, did this year make, as it were, a last effort to avoid receiving the yoke of their old enemies. They raised a great number of troops, made choice of able Captains, and omitted none of those wise precautions, which may be looked upon as the surest presages of good success. Rome sent against them her first Consul Sempronius, a man full of courage, familiar with his soldiers, and therefore greatly beloved by them, but who was himself more a soldier than a Captain, and seemed to think that valour alone was sufficient to supply all the duties of a General.
 The two armies soon came in view of each other. Sempronius despised enemies whom the Romans had so often vanquished; and, as if he had been sure of winning the victory with only his infantry, left his horse in a place where he could receive no manner of assistance from them. The fight began with great fury on both sides. The Romans advanced daringly, and charged the enemy with their usual valour. But as they fought with more fury than order, and as the Volsci, drawn together in firm and close battalions, defended themselves with great courage, victory began to declare

Year of
 R O M E
 CCCXXX.
 Bef. J. C.
 Four hundred twenty-two.

Eightieth
 Consul-
 ship.
 Livy, B. 4.
 c. 73.

declare for the side where was most disciplines. The Volsci, led by an experienced General, pressed on briskly, and broke the legion. The Romans, instead of attacking, thought now only how to avoid the attack of the enemy. They gave back, and lost ground apace. The Consul, perceiving it, hastened to the place where there was most danger. He fought with his own hands, and tried to animate his soldiers by his example and reproaches, but in vain. He called and he threatened; no-body gave attention to his orders. At length all the legions fell into confusion, and the battle had been quite lost, but for the valour and prudence of Sex. Tempanius, an old Captain of horse.

Sempronius, who, as was said before, had flattered himself that he should be able to defeat the enemy with only his foot, had left his horse in a place hemmed in with bogs, where it was impossible for them to fight. Tempanius, observing the disorder the legions were put into, leaped to the ground, and addressing himself to his companions, Follow my lance, said he, as if it were a standard; and let us shew the enemy, that, as well on foot as on horseback, nothing can withstand us. The whole body of horse dismounted after his example, and followed him. Tempanius, at the head of them, marched straight against the enemy, and restored the fight. The legions, at the sight of this succour, resumed courage, and returned to the charge with fresh fury. The General of the Volsci could not conceive whence this new body of infantry should come. But, as he found himself pressed by them, he sent orders to his troops to open their ranks, and give passage to the soldiers which Tempanius commanded, and then to close again, in order to separate them from the Roman legions. The Volsci did as they were ordered. Tempanius and his men, carried on by the heat of their courage, and imagining they were following victory, and a routed enemy, rushed still forwards: But it was not long before they found themselves cut off from the Roman main body by some of the enemy's battalions, that stood now in close array. Tempanius did his utmost to force his way through them, and rejoin the Consul; but he could not break their order. In this extremity he spied an eminence, of which he presently took possession.

A part of the Volscian troops immediately attacked him, believing it impossible for him to make a long resistance. But TEMPANIUS, throwing his men into a ring, defended himself with invincible bravery; and this diversion saved the Roman army. The Consul, however, at the head of the legions, strove in vain to join Tempanius. The Volsci, though they lost abundance of men in this last conflict, kept their ground every-where; nor could the Romans break one of their battalions. They fought 'till it was night, without either of the Generals being able to perceive on which side lay the advantage; and nothing but want of light made the battle cease.

Both armies, believing themselves losers, equally feared to renew the fight the next morning; nay, the terror in both was so great, that they hastily quitted their camps in the night, leaving many of their wounded,

Year of
R O M E. cccxxx.
Bef. J. C.
Four hundred twenty-two.
Eightieth
Consulship.
Livy, B.
4. c. 38.

Val. Max.
B. 3. c. 2.
Livy, B.
4. c. 39.

Year of and a great part of their baggage behind them, and retired to the moun-
 R O M E tains that were nearest to them.

cccxix. Tempanius continued to be invested 'till after midnight; but then the Bef. J. C. assailants, receiving notice that their main army had abandoned their camp, Four hun- fled likewise in a fright. The Roman, who doubted not but the Volsci dred would attack him again when light returned, was very much surprised twenty- when at day-break he saw neither friends nor enemies. He could not
 two. imagine what was become of two great armies, who, not many hours Eightieth before, had stretched over the whole plain. He went down with a few Consul- of his companions, and took a view, first of the Volscian camp; not a ship. man was to be seen in it, except those of the wounded, who had not been Livy, B. able to follow the main body of the army. Then calling down all his
 4. c. 39. soldiers from the hill, he entered the Roman camp, and there found the like solitude. Not knowing to what place the Consul was retired with his troops, and fearing the return of the Volsci, upon the first discovery of their error, he took up the wounded Romans, and marched straight to Rome.
 c. 40. Some run-aways from the battle had got to the city before him; and, because they had seen him and his followers cut off from the main army, and surrounded by the enemy, they had given out, that the whole body of cavalry was cut to pieces. The return therefore of these brave men occasioned an excessive surprise and joy.

It happened, that the People were actually assembled when Tempanius arrived at Rome. The Tribunes of the Commons thought this to be a favourable opportunity of humbling a Consul. They obliged Tempanius to appear in the Assembly before he set foot in own house; and Cn. Julius, one of those Plebeian Magistrates, asked him aloud, whether he thought Sempronius had chosen a proper time to come to an engagement with the enemy, had supported his line of battle with reinforcements, or in any respect acted the part of a good General? He added, You are to answer these Questions upon your honour, as you are a man of veracity and bravery.
Finally, tell us, what is become of Sempronius and our Legions; whether they abandoned you, or you deserted them; and whether we are vanquished or
 c. 41. victorious? Tempanius, far from seeking to make his own advantage of Sempronius's disgrace, answered, That it did not become a private Officer to pretend to judge of the capacity of his General: That the People had given their opinion of it when they chose him Consul: That he had seen him fight at the head of the legions with invincible bravery, and expose his own person in all the places where there was most danger: That the great distance between them after their separation, and the confusion which always happens in so obstinate a fight, had kept him from knowing every thing that passed where the Consul was engaged; but that he could however assure them, by what had appeared to him upon a view of the field of battle, that the Volsci had not lost fewer men than the Romans. He added, That as, upon his separation from the main body of the legions, he had been so fortunate as to get possession of an eminence, on which, notwithstanding all the assaults of the enemy, he had preserved those that were

were trusted to his command; so he presumed the Consul, in that general disorder, had gained the mountains, and there intrenched himself. Tempanius then desired leave to retire, in order to get the wounds dressed which he had received in the fight. The whole Assembly gave yet greater praises to the discretion and modesty of his answer, than to the valour and good conduct with which he had fought against the enemies of his country.

§. III. HOWEVER the people were so much out of humour with their Generals, that they hastened the condemnation of Posthumius, one of the three Military Tribunes, who by their disunion had lost a battle in the year 327. The Tribunes of the Commons had in the beginning of the present year cited both him and his Collegue T. Quintilius (the third was dead) to answer for their misconduct; but the prosecution had been suspended by the apprehension of a war with the Volsci. Posthumius was now condemned to pay a large fine^a; but Quintilius was universally acquitted by the Tribes, on account of his own signal services, (when Consul under the Dictator Posthumius) as well as those of his father Cincinnatus, and his uncle Capitolinus; which latter interceded for him.

As for Tempanius, the People, in reward of his services, chose him some time after to the Tribuneship, together with three other Officers, who like him had distinguished themselves in the war. In this post he gave new proofs of the generosity of his soul. For L. Hortensius, one of the Tribunes, having cited Sempronius, after the year of his Consulate was expired, to answer before the Assembly of the People for his conduct in the last battle, Tempanius and his three Collegues above-mentioned generously made themselves his advocates, and intreated Hortensius not to persecute a brave General, who had been only unfortunate on that occasion. Hortensius, believing that these Tribunes, though they affected to act the part of intercessors, had resolved to interpose their authority in favour of the accused, turning to Sempronius, asked him, What was become of his Patrician spirit, and of that courage which a consciousness of innocence would give him, that he, a Consular, should shelter himself under the shadow of the Tribunes? Then turning to his Collegues, But, if I persist in my prosecution of this man, what is the part you will act? Will you rob the PEOPLE of their Judicature, and overturn the power of the Tribunes? Tempanius and his Collegues replied, That the ROMAN PEOPLE had indisputably a supreme authority over Sempronius and all the members of the Republick; and that, as for themselves, they had neither the inclination, nor the power, to deprive the PEOPLE of their Right of Judging the accused: But that, if the intreaties they made in behalf of their General, who had been to them a father, could not prevail, they would change their habit, as he had done. “Nay (cried Hortensius) but that shall never be; the Com-

Year of
R O M E
cccxxxi.
Bef. J. C.
Four hundred twenty-one.

Eighth
Military Trib. *

Livy, B.
4. c. 42.

* L. MANIUS VULSO,

Q. ANTONIUS MERENDA,

L. PAPIRIUS MUGILLANUS,

L. SERVILIUS STRUCTUS.

^a Ten Thousand Asses. Decem millibus æris gravis damnatur. 32l. 5s. 10d. Arlutbot,

“ MORS

Year of " mons of Rome shall not see their Tribunes in mourning. I have done.
 R O M E " I have nothing farther to say against a man who by his behaviour in cccxxxi. " command could make himself so dear to his soldiers." And thus he Bef. J. C. dropt the impeachment.

Fourhun-
 dred
 twenty-
 one.

C H A P. XXXV.

Eightieth
 Consul-
 ship.

§. I. New dissensions arise in the Republick, on occasion of a proposal to add two Quæstors to the two already established. The Tribunes resolve not to suffer an election of Consuls, unless it be made a rule, that, of the four Quæstors, two be always Plebeian. The two parties come at length to this compromise, that Military Tribunes shall be elected to the government, and that the People shall be free to chuse Patricians or Plebeians to the Quæstorship. The People chuse not only the Military Tribunes but the Quæstors too out of the Patricians only. §. II. The Tribunes revive the old quarrel about the distribution of the conquered lands. Appius's advice to the Senate, to raise a division among these Magistrates, is followed with success. §. III. The affair of the AGRARIAN LAW is revived. Posthumius, one of the Military Tribunes, and General of the army, by his breach of word, and by some imprudent menaces, he provokes his soldiers, that they mutiny. Attempting to justify the mutineers, he is slain by them. The Senate, fearing lest the People, in order to screen the murderers, should chuse Plebeian Military Tribunes for the next year (340), use all their endeavours to get the Consulship restored; and they prevail. The fasces, after being seven years in the hands of Military Tribunes, are transferred to two Consuls, A. Cornelius Cossus and L. Furius Medullinus, who shew great moderation and prudence in the prosecution of the criminals. §. IV. In the year 344, the People chuse three of the four Quæstors out of the Plebeians. And the Senate is forced to consent to an election of Military Tribunes for the next year. Three Patricians are chosen. They being ordered by the Senate to name a Dictator, on occasion of a war with the Volsci, two of them refuse. The Senate hereupon has recourse, as formerly, to the Tribunes; but these return a disdainful answer, and will not meddle in the dispute. Servilius Ahala, the third Military Tribune, names P. Cornelius Dictator, who quickly puts an end to the war. Servilius's two Collegues, in anger against the Senate, propose Military Tribunes at the next election: However Patricians are chosen, and so likewise the next year. The Tribunes of the Commons, provoked to the utmost, revenge themselves, by opposing the levies for a war with the Veientes, who had insulted the Roman Ambassadors; and they make the old affair of the Agrarian Law their pretence. The Senate get the better of this opposition, by decreeing that the infantry shall hereafter have PAY out of the publick treasury, during the service. The People joyfully confirmed this Decree, and readily offer themselves to be enlisted.

§. I.

§. I. THE affection which four Tribunes of the Commons had shewed to a Patrician, and the compliance of Hortensius with their desires in his favour, seemed to promise a better understanding, and more union between the Senate and People, than there had been of late: But the very next year, in the Consulate of T. Quinctius Capitolinus and Fabius Vibulanus, new dissensions arose with relation to the Quæstorship. [The institution of this office is ascribed by Plutarch to Poplicola, who (according to the same Author) left the choice of the Quæstors to the People. Their business was to collect the taxes, defray the expences of war, and keep exact accounts of their receipts and disbursements of the publick money, of which they were the treasurers, and for which they were accountable. And, lastly, the Roman eagles were deposited with them, and they delivered them out, at the Consuls command, when the Romans marched into the field.]

Year of
R O M E
cccxxxii.
Bef. J. C.
Fourhun-
dred
twenty.
Eighty-
first Consul-
ship.
Liv. B. 4.
c. 43.

To this time, only two of these Officers had been annually chosen, who never stirred from Rome. The Consuls proposed that two others should now be added, to attend the Generals in the field, take account of the spoils won from the enemy, sell the booty, and, above all, provide for the subsistence of the army. The Senate warmly seconded this Proposal, 'till the Tribunes demanded, that some of the Quæstors should henceforward be Plebeians. (Hitherto the Quæstors had been chosen out of the Patricians only. Both Consuls and Senate, at first, opposed this demand with all their might, afterwards they yielded thus far, That in the election of Quæstors, as in that of Military Tribunes, the Roman People, if they thought fit, should chuse as many Plebeians as Patricians. But the Tribunes, demanding that two of the Quæstors should always indispensably be Plebeians, the Senate, rather than submit to this, dropt the design of increasing the number of those officers. The Tribunes, in revenge, renewed the proposal of the division of the lands; nor would they suffer the present Consuls to hold the Comitia for electing new ones, but insisted on having Military Tribunes for the next year. The Senate were now more than ever concerned to hinder this, lest, if the Plebeians were chosen to the Government, the Agrarian Law should take place. The obstinacy of the two parties in holding to their demands threw the Republick into a kind of anarchy: For the Tribunes sometimes even opposed the Senate's meeting to name an Inter-rex; but they constantly hindered this Officer's holding any Assembly for the chusing of Consuls. At length L. Papirius Mugillanus, being Inter-rex, by expostulations and soft persuasions, brought each of the parties to yield something of its pretensions, in order to a reconciliation. The Senate agreed to let Military Tribunes be chosen instead of Consuls; and the Tribunes of the Commons consented that in the election of the four Quæstors the People should give their votes as they pleased, either to Patricians or Plebeians; and thus the dispute ended.

The

Year of R O M E cccxxxiii. Bef. J. C. Four hundred nineteen. The Assembly for the election of Military Tribunes was first held; and, notwithstanding all the credit and intrigues of the Tribunes of the Commons, four Patricians were chosen, L. Quinctius Cincinnatus, Sp. Furius Medullinus, M. Manlius, and A. Sempronius Atratinus, (cousin to the Consul of the same name :) Sempronius presided in the election of Quæstors *. Antistius and Pompilius, two Tribunes of the Commons, asked the Quæstorship, the first for his son, the second for his brother; yet none but Patricians were promoted to that office; the People had not power to deny it to men whose fathers and ancestors had been honoured with the Consulship. The Tribunes of the Commons, enraged almost to madness at this preference, cried out, What! Two Tribunes of the Commons, one recommending his son, the other his brother, and both disregarded! There must infallibly have been some deceit in gathering the votes, and A. Sempronius ought to be called to account for it. But as he was a man of known probity, and his innocence and the dignity with which he was then invested, set him above their reach, they turned all their fury against C. Sempronius, his relation, before spoken of, and revived the prosecution against him (for his ill conduct in the last battle) which Hortensius, at the request of Tempanius, had dropped. He was again cited to appear at the end of twenty-seven days. During this interval, Sempronius constantly attended the Senate, and being resolved not to lose his character there, by a timorous behaviour, zealously opposed the request of the Tribunes, concerning the partition of the lands; and he behaved himself with the same steadiness on his trial: But, notwithstanding all the solicitations of the Senate in his favour, he was fined 15,000 Asses [48 l. 8 s. 9 d.]

Year of R O M E cccxxxiv. Bef. J. C. Four hundred eighty-teen. §. II. IN the following Military Tribuneship of Agrippa Menenius, Sp. Nautius, P. Lucretius, and C. Servilius, a plot was formed by the slaves, to set fire to the city, and seize the Capitol; but this secret was revealed by some of the conspirators, and the mischief prevented. Soon after, Lavicum *, a city included in the Latine confederacy, gave the Romans some reasons to suspect their fidelity. And the next year (in which the Republick was governed by three Military Tribunes only, M. Papirius, C. Servilius, and L. Sergius) produced the intire revolt of the Lavicani, who joined the Æqui, pillaged the territory of Tusculum, and incamped with their new allies under the Algidus. It was ordered by the Senate that two of the Military Tribunes, should take the field, and the third continue to govern the city. Upon this a contest arose between the three, no one of them being willing to stay at home. The Senate was offended at these disputes; and Q. Servilius Fidenas, formerly Dictator, put an end to them by his paternal authority, commanding his son C. Servilius, one of the three Governors, to stay in Rome. But the two Generals agreed no better in the field than they had done in the city; each was for fighting the enemy

* By a letter from Cicero to Curius (Ep. 30. L. vii. ad Famil.) it appears, that, in their time, the Quæstors were elected in Comitia Tributa. But I find no reason to believe, that, at this time, they were elected in those assemblies, nor so long as the People chose the Quæstors out of the Patricians only.

his own way; they despised each other, and the troops were divided into two parties. When the news of this discord came to Rome, Q. Servilius apprehended the consequences of it, and advised his son to raise more troops to be in readiness at all events: And the advice proved serviceable. For, the two Generals having at length agreed to command the troops alternately each his day, Sergius soon after imprudently hazarded a battle, and by a stratagem of the enemy, who designedly gave ground to draw him into an ambush, was intirely defeated. He took refuge with his broken troops in Tusculum. Upon this news the Senate ordered a Dictator to be created; and the younger Servilius nominated his father, who (as some say) appointed his son General of the Horse. The father and son left Rome at the head of a new army (that which had fled to Tusculum being recalled) and incamped within two miles of the enemy. The Dictator being there informed that they were grown negligent and presumptuous, he marched with haste to attack them, routed them, invested Lavicum, their place of retreat, and took it by assault. And, all this being done in eight days, he returned to Rome, and immediately laid down his office.

Year of
R O M E
cccxxxv.
Bef. J. C.
Four hundred seventeen.
Eleventh
Mil. Tri.

The succeeding Military Tribunes, P. Lucretius, L. Servilius, Agrippa Menenius, and Sp. Veturius, gained no other glory but that of preserving the Republick in the same tranquillity in which they found it.

But the next year (when A. Sempronius, M. Papirius, Q. Fabius, and Sp. Nautius, governed the Commonwealth) Sp. Mæcilius, a fourth time Tribune of the People, and Metilius, now Tribune a third time, renewed the proposal of an equal distribution of lands, conquered from the enemies of Rome. This tended to a confiscation of the estates possessed by a great part of the Nobility. The city of Rome had been built upon ground originally belonging to the city of Alba, and had scarce any territory, but what had been since won, sword in hand. Under pretence of buying or renting parcels of this acquisition, those of the Patricians whose ample share in the Government furnished them with opportunities, had possessed themselves of large tracts, to which they could not produce any just title. The Tribunes were for resuming these lands, and making a fair partition of them among all the Citizens, Nobles and Commons. To defeat this project the SENATORS had meetings publick and private. The youngest of them, Appius Claudius, (grandson of the Decemvir) is said to have spoken to this effect: That it had been a constant tradition in his family, that relief against the Tyranny of the Tribunes was to be found no where but in their own College: That the best way to frustrate the designs of Mæcilius and Metilius was to engage some one of their Collegues to oppose them: that it would be no difficult matter for the Nobles by condescensions and caresses to gain over those who were but newly come into Office, made no figure, and were perhaps jealous of the authority assumed by the two leading Tribunes. And he exhorted the Fathers to try the experiment.

Year of
R O M E
cccxxxvi.
Bef. J. C.
Four hundred sixteen.
Twelfth Military
Tribunes.
Year of
R O M E
cccxxxvii.
Bef. J. C.
Four hundred fifteen.
Thirteenth
Military
Tribunes.
c. 48.

This advice they unanimously approved, and Appius was highly praised for having thus shewn that he did not degenerate from the virtue of his an-

Year of censors. The chief men of the Senate immediately applied themselves to R O M E gain some of the Tribunes; and by intreaties and remonstrances they succc xxxviii. ceeded so well, that of the ten they won over six to oppose the promulga-Bef. J. C. tion of the law. Mecilius and his Collegue reproached them as traytors, Four-hun- enemies to the People, and slaves to the Senate: But it was all in vain, dred ef- they were forced to desist from their enterprize.
 teen.

Thir- The Senate, by means of a good intelligence with the majority of the teenth Tribunes, remained the directors of affairs the following year also. L. Sex-
 Mil. Tri. tius, one of the College, to make his court to the People, having proposed Year of to send a colony to Volæ, a little town which they had lately taken from the R O M E Æqui, the other Tribunes opposed it, and declared, that, during their Tri-ccxxxviii. buneship, they would never suffer any new law to be offered, which had Bef. J. C. not been first approved by the Senate. But this influence of the Conscrip- Four-hun- Fathers in the Tribunitian College did not last long: The affair of the dred four- Agrarian Law was revived the next year.
 teen.

Four- §. III. THE Æqui having retaken Volæ, P. Posthumius Regillensis, one teenth of the Military Tribunes, a good soldier, but an imperious, obstinate, Mil. Tri. wrong-headed man, was sent with an army to recover it. After some Livy, B. skirmishes with the enemy in the field, he invested that place. Before he
 4. c. 49. led his troops to the assault, he promised them for their encouragement, Year of that, if they took the town, they should have the plunder. The place was R O M E won, but the General, who naturally hated the Plebeians, of whom the ccxxxix. greatest part of his army consisted, broke his word, and sold all for the Bef. J. C. Publick treasury.
 Four-hundred thirteen.

Fifteenth Sextius, one of the Tribunes of the Commons, soon after brought on Mil. Tri. anew the affair of the conquered lands. Posthumius was hereupon sent for to Rome to assist his Collegues in opposing the Tribunes enterprize. Being come, he in full Assembly of the People dropt an expression, that seemed to speak him a fool or a madman. Sextius having proposed to the Assembly to pass a decree for dividing the city and territory of Volæ among the soldiers who had made the conquest, affirming that they had the best right to the benefit of it, Posthumius hastily cried out, Woe be to my soldiers, if they stir. So proud and unjust a saying offended the Senators no less than the multitude: Sextius, bold and eloquent, took advantage of the general discontent, and directing his speech to the People: "Do you hear how " Posthumius threatens his soldiers, as if they were so many slaves? And " yet this brute of a man you think more worthy of the Military Tribune-
 " ship, than any of us, whose whole study is to procure you lands, and " houses, and a comfortable retreat in your old age, and to defend you " upon all occasions against such proud and cruel adversaries. Can you
 " then have any reason to wonder, that of late so few of your Tribunes

CORNELIUS CASSUS,	} Y. of R. 338.		Q. FABIVS,	} Y. of R. 339.
QUINCTIVS CINCINNATVS,			CN. CORNELIVS,
VALERIVS VOLVSVS,			P. POSTHVMIVS,
FABIVS VIRVLANVS.			L. VALERIVS.

“ shew

“ shew much zeal for your interests ? What have we to expect from you ? Year of “ Honours ? You bestow them upon your enemies, Posthumius’s words R O M E “ have indeed shocked you, filled you with horror. But what then ? If ^{CCCCXXIX.}
 “ you were just now to go to an election, you would prefer this cruel ^{Bef. J. C.} “ threatener to your best friends, to those who have nothing at heart but ^{Four} “ your welfare.” ^{hundred} ^{thirteen.}

This Discourse did not fail to inflame the People ; and when the threats ^{Fifteenth} of Posthumius were reported in the camp, they occasioned such a commo- ^{Mil. Tri.} tion and murmuring in the army, as came little short of downright sedi- ^{Livy, B.}
 tion. P. Sestius, one of the Quæstors, having in the absence of his Gene- ^{4. c. 50.}
 ral ordered a Lictor to seize a soldier who was more mutinous than the rest, ^{Zonaras,} his fellow-soldiers rescued him, and one of them gave the Quæstor a severe ^{B. 7.} blow with a stone. Posthumius, informed of this tumult, hastened to the camp, and exasperated the troops more than ever by the strictness of his inquiries, and the cruelty of his punishments. He commanded the most guilty of the mutineers to be put to death under the hurdle, a kind of execution which has been beforementioned. The manner of it was this :
 The criminal was laid at his length in a shallow water, under an hurdle, upon which they heaped stones, and so pressed him down ’till he was drowned. But in vain did the General now pass this sentence against the seditious : the rest of the soldiers tore them out of the hands of the executioners, and set them at liberty. Posthumius, transported with rage, came down from his Tribunal, and, preceded by his Lictors, broke through the press, in order to lay hold on the criminals. He found no ^{Florus,} respect remaining, among the soldiers, either for his orders or his person ; ^{B. 1.} they opposed force with force, and, being urged to fury, stoned him to death. This was the first instance, from the foundation of Rome, of a Roman General slain by his troops.

When the news of the tragical end of Posthumius came to the city, his Col- ^{Livy, B.}
 legues, who resided there, zealous to revenge his death upon the rebellious ^{4. c. 50.} soldiers, decreed, with the Senate’s approbation, that informations should be taken concerning it : The Tribunes of the Commons interposed. This contest depended upon another. The Conscript Fathers thought it of the utmost importance to avoid an election of Military Tribunes for the next year, lest the Commons, to screen the guilty soldiers, should chuse Governors out of the Plebeians. They would therefore have made a Decree, that Consuls should be chosen in the next Comitia. The passing of this Decree was opposed by the Tribunes of the Commons, and the contention lasted so long, that the Republick fell into an Inter-regnum. In the ^{Livy, B.} end the Senate carried their point. Fabius Vibulanus, being Inter-rex, ^{4. c. 51.} assembled the Comitia by Centuries, and they chose M. Cornelius Cossus and ^{Year of} L. Furius Medullinus Consuls. These were good-natured men, and for ^{R O M E} that reason, as it was thought proper not to be too rigorous in punishing ^{CCCXL.} the soldiers who had murdered their General, were unanimously appointed ^{Bef. J. C.} by the Senate and People to inquire into the crime. Necessary it was to ^{412.} make examples ; but this was done with moderation ; and those few who ^{82d Con-} died ^{sulship.}

Year of died fell by their own hands, and not by the axes of the Licitors. The R O M E Consuls thought it more adviseable to suppose the army in general to be in-CCCXL. nocent, than to drive them into an open revolt by too strict an examination.
 Bef. J. C. It had been happy if the Senate and Consuls had, to so prudent a ma-
 Four hun- nagement, added the partition of the Territory of Volæ among the People :
 dred twelve. They had indeed no plausible pretence not to do it, there being as yet no private occupiers of it to be disturbed in their possessions. And this would Eighty- have been the most effectual way to silence the factious complaints of the second Tribunes, and abate the ardour of the People for the division of the pub-Consul- lick lands conquered before. But the Commons now saw with indignation, ship. that the secret design of the Senate and Nobility was to keep them always in poverty, as well for their own interest, as to make them more submissive and dependent. Before it be long we shall see them prosecute their pretensions with more fury than ever.

In the mean time the Consul Furius marched against the Volsci, who had pillaged the territory of the Hernici. At his approach the enemy disap-
 Year of peared; and he took from them Ferentinum, which he gave to the Hernici, R O M E with the lands about it, to compensate their losses.
 CCCXLI.

Bef. J. C. §. IV. THE Tribunes made no opposition to the election of Consuls Four hun- for the next year; and Q. Fabius and C. Furius were chosen. But L. Ici- dred ele- lius, a Tribune, began to resume the affair of the conquered lands with ven. immoderate heat. A plague that raged in the city put a stop to his ca-Eighty- reer. This calamity was of course followed by a scarcity of provisions :
 third For, the citizens being also the husbandmen, the lands were left untilled Consul- while the distemper prevailed; and the loss of one harvest was sufficient ship. to reduce Rome to extreme want.

Liv. B. 4. The famine was severely felt in the succeeding Consulship of M. Papirius
 c. 52. and C. Nautius; however, care was taken to get corn from Hetruria and Year of R O M E Sicily; and Rome by extraordinary good fortune continued this year without CCCXLII. commotions at home or abroad.
 Bef. J. C.

Four No sooner did the plague and famine cease, but the Æqui renewed their hundred incursions upon the territories of the Latines and Hernici, faithful allies of ten. Rome. M. Æmilius and C. Valerius were now Consuls. It fell to the latter Eighty- to conduct the war; but, when he would have levied troops, the Tribune fourth Menius opposed it upon the old pretence of the Agrarian Law. In the mean Consul- time the Æqui insulted the Romans, and took from them the fort of * Car- ship. ventum. This disgrace not only increased the hatred of the Nobles to Year of Menius, but induced the other nine Tribunes to assist the Consul in making R O M E the levies and punishing those persons who refused to serve.
 CCCXLIII. Bef. J. C.

Four hun- The Romans recovered the fort, and found in it a considerable booty dred which the enemy had laid up there; but, Valerius being dissatisfied with his line. men on account of their backwardness to enlist themselves for the war, he Eighty- sold all, and put the money into the Quæstor's hands.
 fifth

Consul- It was the custom in the triumphal procession for the soldiers to chant ship. satyrical verses on the victor who enjoyed that honour. In Valerius's
 c. 53. Ovation they did something particular, and by way of revenge they
 * In Latine divided war.

divided themselves into two choirs, and, while one made the air resound with songs against their General, the other sang verses in praise of Menius; and every time his name was repeated the People in the streets clapped their hands and made acclamations and even drowned the noisy musick of the soldiers.

This behaviour of the citizens alarmed the Senate and obliged them to bestir themselves, to hinder an election of Military Tribunes for the next year, lest Menius should be chosen for one. The Fathers prevailed; Consuls were elected; and the choice fell upon Cn. Cornelius and * L. Furius.

Under their administration three Tribunes of the name of Icilius, all three kinsmen, and of a family in which to hate the Patricians was hereditary, undertook to deprive them of the Quæstorship, which hitherto had never been out of their order, though Plebeians were qualified to stand for it. The *Icili*i talked much of glorious projects they had formed in favour of the Commons; but at the same time declared that they would not stir one step towards the execution of them, unless the Plebeians would assume so much courage at least as to raise some of their own body to the Quæstorship. The multitude, possessed with hopes of the mighty advantages they were to reap from the zeal of their present Tribunes, gave their votes in the election of Quæstors to Q. Silius, P. Ælius, and P. Pupius, all three Plebeians; and of the Patricians who put up for that dignity none but Cæso Fabius Ambustus could obtain it.

The Tribunes of the Commons, elated with this victory over the Nobility, flattered themselves, that the Quæstorship would now open them a way to the Military Tribuneship, the Consulate, and the Triumph. They would not hear therefore of an election of Consuls for the next year; they opposed the publication of a Decree of the Senate for that purpose; they cried out, that it was high time for the Plebeians to have their share in the Government. The disputes on this head grew warm, when, luckily, for the *Icili*i, news came that the Æqui and Volsci were again in motion. The Tribunes opposed the levies, which, in pursuance of a Senatus-consultum, the Consuls would have made. Two of the *Icili*i constantly attended upon these Magistrates, each watching his man, to hinder him from raising troops, or holding the Comitia for chusing new Consuls. The business of the third Icilius was to manage the Multitude, and let them loose, or restrain them, as he judged proper. Things were at this pass, when news was brought that the Æqui had retaken the fortress of Carventum. This gave the Tribunes a farther advantage, the want of an army being now more pressing. In short, the Senate were forced to consent to an election of Military Tribunes; but, to disappoint the *Icili*i, they annexed this proviso to their decree, That none of the present TRIBUNES OF THE COMMONS should be chosen to the MILITARY TRIBUNESHIP, or continued in their office the next year.

The levies now went on without opposition. The Consuls marched to recover Carventum, but they lost a great deal of time before it, and were forced

Year of
R O M E
cccxi iii.
Bef. J. C.
Fourhun-
dred
nine.

Eighty-
fifth Consul-
ship.

Year of
R O M E
cccxliv.
Bef. J. C.
Fourhun-
dred
eight.

Eighty-
sixth Consul-
ship.

* A 2d
time.
Liv. B. 4.
c. 54.

c. 55.

Year of forced to raise the siege at last. They took however Verrugo from the R O M E Volsci.

CCCXLIV.
Bef. J. C.
Four hundred
eight.

Eighty-
sixth Consul-
ship.
Livy B. 4.
c. 56.

Though the Commons had carried their point, of obtaining Comitia for electing Military Tribunes (instead of Consuls) for the next year; yet the Fathers got the victory at the elections: three Patricians were chosen and no Plebeian. It is said that the Nobles made use of a stratagem (and were reproached with it at that time by the Idili) which was this: They engaged a great number of the meanest and most worthless of the Plebeians to stand candidates, mixing them with the worthy candidates of the same order. The People were so disgusted with the appearance of the former, that they would not give their voices to the latter, nor to any but Patricians.

Year of
R O M E
CCCXLV.
Bef. J. C.
Four hundred seven.

Sixteenth
Mil. Tri.

C. Julius Iulus, P. Corn. Cossus, and C. Servilius Ahala were declared Military Tribunes; but did not long continue in the supreme Command. The Volsci having set on foot a very formidable army, the Senate, according to custom, resolved to send a Dictator against them. As the absolute authority of that Magistrate in a manner swallowed up the power of all the inferior Officers, Julius and Cornelius opposed his nomination, alledging that they did not want courage and experience to command an army, and that it was unjust to deprive them of a dignity which they had so lately obtained by all the votes of their fellow-citizens.

The Senate, exasperated at their refusal to name a Dictator, had recourse to the Tribunes of the Commons, as they had done before upon the like occasion. But the Tribunes of this year observed a different conduct from that of their predecessors. Overjoyed to see this dissension between the Military Tribunes and the Senate, they answered, with a scornful raillery, "That for their part they could give no help in the affair; that they were only Plebeians, not citizens, nor even to be reckoned in the number of men; that, if ever the honours and dignities of the Republick were made common to them with the Patricians, they should then take care that no proud Magistrate disobeyed the decrees of the Senate; but that in the mean time the Patricians themselves, as they had thrown off all respect of Laws and Magistrates, might also, if they pleased, assume the power and functions of the Tribunes, and do their own business as they could."

c. 57.

The contests drawing to an end, and the enemy still advancing towards the frontier, Servilius Ahala, the third Military Tribune, declared publicly, that the good of his country was more dear to him than the friendship of his Collegues; and that, if they would not chuse a Dictator, he would take upon him to name one himself: And accordingly, being supported by the whole Senate, he named to that highest Magistracy P. Cornelius Rutilius, who afterwards appointed Servilius to be General of the Horse.

The war was of no long continuance; the Volsci were defeated near the city of Aniurn, their territory plundered, and a great number of prisoners taken. After this expedition the Dictator laid down his authority, and the Military

Military Tribunes resumed theirs. Julius and Cornelius Cossus, discontented with the Senate for having, by the creation of a Dictator, frustrated their hopes of acquiring glory, in this war, made no mention of electing Consuls for the ensuing year, but appointed an Assembly for chusing Military Tribunes. The Conscript Fathers were much alarmed to see their interest thus betrayed by men of their own order: and therefore, as they had, the last year, by setting up unworthy candidates from among the Ple- beians, given the People a dislike to all the worthy; so now they effected an exclusion of all Plebeians by setting up, for candidates, the most illustrious members of their own body, men whom they knew to be esteemed by the Commons. C. Valerius,* C. Servilius, L. Furius, and † Fabius Vibulanus, all eminent Patricians, were chosen to the Military Tribuneship.

Year of
R O M E
CCCXLV.
Bef. J. C.
Four hundred
seven.

Sixteenth
Mil. Trib

The truce with the Veientes being at this time expired, the Romans sent Heralds to them to renew their demand of satisfaction of damages formerly sustained. These Heralds, meeting on the road some Envoys going from Veii to Rome, consented, at their request, to proceed no farther, 'till the latter had been heard by the Senate. The Veientan Ministers obtained of the Conscript Fathers to desist from their demands, 'till some civil broils which were then at Veii should be quieted; a conduct which Livy remarks as an instance of great generosity in the Roman Senate, who, had they consulted nothing but their own interest, could not have had a more favourable occasion of falling upon a rival State.

Year of
R O M E
CCCXLVI.
Bef. J. C.
Four hundred six.

Seventeenth
Mil. Tri.

* A 2d
time.

† A 3d
time.

Livy, B.

The same year the Volsci retook Verrugo from the Romans, and put the garrison to the sword, the Senate being dilatory in sending succours to it.
However the Military Tribunes revenged this loss; they surprised the Volscian troops when scattered about the country to plunder, and cut them to pieces.

4. C. 56.

The Senate kept their ascendant in the election of Magistrates for the next year, and procured the Military Tribuneship for C. Cornelius, † L. Va- lerius, Cn. Cornelius, and Fabius Ambustus, all Patricians, and of the best families in the Commonwealth.

Year of
R O M E
CCCXLVII
Bef. J. C.
Four hundred
five.

During their administration, the Veientes having insulted the ambassadors of the Republick, the Senate ordered a declaration of war against Veii to be immediately proposed to the People. The Roman youth, upon the first rumour of this design, began to murmur at it: The war with the Volsci is not yet ended; we have lately had two garrisons cut in pieces, and the places [though covered] are not defended now, but with much danger. Not a year passes without a battle; and yet, as if we had not fighting enough, we must begin a new war against powerful neighbours that may engage all Hetru- ria in their cause.

Eighteenth
Mil. Tri.

† A 2d
time.

The Tribunes did not fail to encourage them in this opposition to the Government. “ In truth, said they, the chief war you have to sustain is “ that which the Senate has so long carried on against the Commons of “ Rome. They send you into the field only to be slaughtered, or else
“ to keep you at a distance from the City, lest, if they allowed you any re“ pose,

Year of " pise, your minds should run upon Liberty and Colonies, or the pub-R O M E " lick Lands, or freedom in giving your votes in the Assemblies, and you cccxvii. " should concert measures for promoting your own interests, with reference Bef. J. C. " to these matters."

Fourhun- Whenever the Tribunes met with any of the veteran soldiers, they took dred five. them by the hand, entered into familiar discourse with them, inquired how High- many years they had served, and, making them shew their scars, asked them, teen. whether they had room for any more wounds, or could spare any more Mil. Tri. blood for the service of the Commonwealth. By these and other arts of management, in which the Tribunes were indefatigable, they made the Commons utterly averse from a war with the Veientes: so that the Patrici- ans, perceiving, that their Bill, if now offered, would be rejected, deferred it to another time.

Livy, B. However it was agreed, that three of the Military Tribunes should lead
 4. c. 59. an army against the Veji. At the approach of it the enemy disappeared, and left their country open to be pillaged. The Roman Generals hereupon divided their forces into three bodies, and made incursions into it on different sides. Fabius laid siege to Anxur (afterwards called Terracina) a wealthy city, and, having taken it by assault, divided the spoil equally among the soldiers of all the three armies, telling his own men, that the troops of his Collegues, by hindering succours from coming to the relief of the place, had contributed to the taking of it as much as if they had been present in the action. This generosity (not usual of late) to the soldiers paved the way for a reconciliation between the Nobles and Commons. And this was intirely accomplished by a Decree of the Senate, soon after passed, That for the future the Roman infantry should be maintain- ed in the field at the publick expence. Hitherto all the citizens had used to go to war at their own charges; and oftentimes, when the campaign was too long, the lands, especially those of the poorer Plebeians, lay fallow.
 This occasioned borrowing, exorbitant usury, complaints and seditions.
 The Senate, to prevent these disorders, decreed of themselves, and without being importuned by the People or their Tribunes, that for the future the soldiers should have PAY out of the publick money; and that, to furnish this expence, a new tax should be raised, from which no Citizen whatsoever should be exempt.

c. 60. Upon the first news of this Senatus-consultum, the People were transported with joy; they ran in crowds from all parts to the Senate-house, and, taking the Senators by the hand as they came out, said, that now indeed it appeared they were justly called Fathers; and declared themselves ready to spill the last drop of their blood for their country, so tender and generous a mother to all her children.

In this universal gladness, the Tribunes of the Commons were remarkable for their gloomy and envious countenances. Union always hindered them from making a figure in the State. They gave out that the Senate bestowed largesses at a very cheap rate; that the People must be very blind if they did not perceive that this their pay would come out of their own pockets;

pockets; nay, that it was not just to make those Citizens who had always served at their own charge, and had compleated the time of their service, contribute to the support of the new soldiers who succeeded them in the armies; and they proclaimed that they would protect all those who should refuse to pay the tax. These declarations made some impression upon the People; the Senators, nevertheless, went on with their undertaking, and began the contribution themselves, paying their own contingents fairly, according to the real value of their estates; and their example was followed by the chief men among the Plebeians.

Year of
R O M E
CCCXLVII.
Bef. J. C.
Four hundred five.
Eightteenth
Mil. Tri.

As, in those days, there was no silver money, carts loaded with weighty pieces of brass were every day seen going to the Treasury with the contributions of the rich: The poorer sort, pleased with this sight, and animated by the commendations given by the Nobles and the soldiers to those of the Commons who submitted to the impost, listened no longer to the declamations of their Tribunes, but ran every one eagerly to pay the Tribute according to his proportion.

C H A P. XXXVI.

§. I. The Romans invest Veii. In the two first years of the siege (which lasted ten) there is little action. The third year, (350 of Rome) a loss which the besiegers sustain before the place animates the Plebeians with a zeal to push on the siege with vigour. The Senate, for the first time, allow PAY TO THE HORSE. §. II. The year following, Sergius and Virginus (two of the Military Tribunes) who have the conduct of the siege, quarrel, and divide the troops between them, which having mischievous consequences, they are both recalled. All the Military Tribunes of this year are obliged to abdicate, and new ones are chosen. Sergius and Virginus (the Generals of the last year) are both fined for misconduct. §. III. The Tribunes renew the domestick broils: But all is quieted by the chusing of some Plebeians into the Military Tribuneship. At the next elections the Comitia chuse five Plebeians to that dignity, and only one Patrician. There happens a great mortality among men and cattle. To avert this evil, the ceremony of the Lectisternium is observed. §. IV. The Senate take advantage of the People's fears and superstition, to get the Military Tribuneship for Patricians only; pretending that the Gods were angry at the choice, which had been made of Plebeians to that Magistracy. The lake of Alba overflows. This being looked upon as a prodigy, Deputies are sent from Rome to consult the Oracle of Delphos. Six new Military Tribunes are chosen, all Patricians. Some defect being discovered in their inauguration, they all abdicate, and six new ones are chosen, all Plebeians. Their administration not being prosperous, Camillus is named Dictator. §. V. He takes Veii by sap.

Y. of R.
347. Bef.
J. C. 405.

§. I. THE Senate's view, in allotting funds for the payment of the troops, was not only to ease the People, but also to enable the State to carry on the war farther, and maintain it longer.

Eight-
teenth
Mil. Tri.

Year of ROME cccxlviii. Bef. J. C. Four hundred five. Eight-teenth Mil. Trib. Year of ROME cccxlviii. Bef. J. C. Four hundred four. Nine-teenth Mil. Trib. Liv. B. 4. c. 61. fore this regulation they could not so properly be said to make war as incursions, which were generally terminated by one battle. These expeditions rarely lasted above twenty or thirty days, the soldiers, for want of pay, not being able to keep the field for a longer time together. But now, when the Senate found themselves in a condition to maintain an army abroad as long as they pleased, they began to form great designs; and, all opposition to a war with the Veientes being over, they resolved to besiege Veii itself, one of the strongest places in Italy, the bulwark of Hetruria, and which yielded to Rome neither in the courage nor in the wealth of its inhabitants.

The siege was begun in the year 348 of Rome, when the Romans, for the first time, chose six * Military Tribunes. The States of Hetruria had a general council, to debate whether they should unite their forces in the defence of the Veientes, or not; but came to no agreement upon this head.

The next year, when Rome was again governed by six † Military Tribunes, the siege was carried on with less vigour than in the beginning, part of the Roman forces being called away to a war with the Volsci.

Livy tells us, that the year following the Republick chose eight Military Tribunes; among whom he reckons M. Furius Camillus and M. Posthumius Albinus; but in this he seems to have been mistaken: For, besides that the electing of eight was illegal, those two Senators, according to the Capitoline Fasti, were Censors this year, and there were but six ‡ supreme Governors, of whom Appius Claudius, grandson of the Decemvir, was one.

Happily for the Romans, the Veientes at this time chose themselves a King; a proceeding which so displeased the other States of Hetruria, who not only abhorred all Royalty, but had a particular dislike to this King, that they came to a resolution to refuse their assistance to the besieged, so long as these should continue under Regal Government.

We may judge of the strength of Veii by the length of the siege, which (with various fortune) lasted ten whole years; though perhaps this might be chiefly owing to the frequent changing of the Generals who commanded the Roman armies. Doubtless these changes hindered the Romans from

Livy, B.

5. c. 1.
Sig. in Fastos. Pig-nius in Annal.

*C. JULIUS IULUS, a second time,
M. ÆMILIUS MAMERCINUS,
T. QUINCTIUS CAPITOLINUS,
L. FURIUS MEDULLINUS, a second time,
Q. QUINCTIUS CINCINNATUS,
A. MANLIUS VELSO CAPITOLINUS.
†P. CORNELIUS MALUGINENSIS,
SP. NAUTIUS RUTILUS, a third time,
CR. CORNELIUS CASSUS, a second time,

C. VALERIUS POTITUS, a third time,
K. FABIUS AMBUSTUS,
M. SERGIUS FIDENAS,
‡M. ÆMILIUS MAMERCINUS, a 2d time,
M. FURIUS FUSUS,
AP. CLAUDIUS CRASSUS,
L. JULIUS IULUS,
M. QUINCTIUS VARUS,
L. VALERIUS POTITUS, a third time.

making

making a swifter progress in conquest. Had they been constantly governed by some one of those illustrious Dictators, who were their last refuge in cases of extreme danger, they had soon been Masters of Italy: But such is the usual conduct of a Republick, jealous of her liberty; she checks the rapidity of her victorious Generals, lest she herself should become a part of their conquests. It was at this siege that the Romans are thought to have first invented those lines of circumvallation and contravallation, which have been since so much in use; at least this is the first time they are mentioned in Roman antiquity.

The Military Tribunes, considering that Veii could not be taken but after a long siege, and then rather by famine than force, formed a design of keeping the army in the field all winter, and they began to erect wooden barracks for the men. The soldiers made no opposition to it, chusing rather to live in the camp at the publick expence, than in Rome at their own: But the Tribunes of the Commons had no sooner heard of this, than they immediately made it a pretence to raise an outcry against the Senate. They said in every Assembly, that indeed they always feared the gifts of the Senate concealed some fatal poison; that this new pay was only a bait which the Patricians had made use of to deceive the People: That it was in truth the price of their liberty: That the Military Tribunes, in detaining the soldiers in the camp during winter, had visibly no other end, but to deprive the Commons of so many votes: That the Senate and Patricians would now reign despotically in all the Assemblies: But that they ought to be made sensible, that they governed men who were free; and that it was but fitting the poor Citizen, who daily exposed his life in the defence of his country, should at the end of every campaign enjoy a little rest, and have the satisfaction of seeing his house, his wife, and his children, and of giving his voice in the election of the Magistrates.

Appius, whom the other Military Tribunes had left at Rome to oppose the Measures of the Tribunes of the Commons, being informed of these seditious speeches, called an Assembly, and in a long harangue reproached those Plebeian Magistrates, That they studied nothing but to hinder all union between the two Orders in the State: That they sought to create themselves employment like knavish physicians: That their desire was to have the State always diseased, that they might ever be busy in the cure: That they seemed determined to like nothing which the Senate did, let it be never so advantageous to the People: That as Masters did not suffer their slaves to have any intercourse with the neighbours, lest they should be either well or ill used by them, so the Tribunes for the same reason could not endure that the Commons should have any intercourse with the Nobles, and were enraged to see that the Senate had shewn so much tenderness for the soldiers, as to allow them pay.

He added, " Either we should not have undertaken this siege, or we should continue it. Shall we abandon our camp, the forts we have erected, our towers, our mantelets, and our gabions; and so have all the same works to begin again the next summer? And who will promise

H h h 2

" your

Year of
R O M E
CCCL.
Bef. J. C.
Four hundred two.
Twenty-
first
Mil. Tri.
Plut. Life
of Camil-
lus.
Livy, B:
5. c. 2.

c. 3-6.

Year of " your Tribunes, who give you such wholesome advice, that all Hetruria
 R O M E " will not be at length prevailed upon by the Veientes to arm and come CCCL. " to their assistance, if we raise the blockade, and give them opportunity Bef. J. C. " to renew their solicitations. They may perhaps displace that Gover-Fourhun- " nor who is so disagreeable to the Hetrurian States, or he may perhaps dred two. " for the sake of his country resign his authority. The scene would be Twenty- " much changed, if those States should all unite against us. Who can first Mil. " assure you, that the Veientes, thus strengthened, will not next year Trib. " invade and pillage our territory? And what a contempt will it bring " upon the Republick, if the nations bordering upon Rome, and now
 " jealous of her greatness, shall find that your Generals, fettered by new " laws of your Tribunes, are unable to finish a siege, or keep the field a " moment after the fine weather is over? Whereas, on the other hand,
 " nothing will make the Roman People more formidable, than their shew-
 " ing that no severity of the seasons is able to put a stop to their enter" prises; and that they are firmly resolved to conquer, or die at the foot " of the enemies ramparts."

Livy, B. APPIUS was already a match for the Tribunes of the Commons, even in
 5. c. 7. their assemblies, when a loss, sustained at the siege, gave him a complete victory over them, and produced a surprising concord between the two orders at Rome. The Veientes, in a sally, surprised the besiegers, slew a great number of them, set fire to their machines, and ruined most of their works. This news, instead of depressing the spirits of the Romans, inspired them with new ardor for the continuation of the siege. The richer citizens, whose wealth qualified them to be in the first class among the Roman Knights, but who, not having yet received horses from the Republick, were therefore not legally and actually Knights, offered to mount themselves at their own expence. Acceptance and a profusion of thanks from the Senate rewarded this generous offer. And no sooner did the report of it reach the Forum, but the Commons came in crowds to the Senate-house with a tender of their voluntary services (in the infantry) to be employed before Veii, or wherever it should be thought most proper; and they promised, in case they were led to Veii, never to leave the camp till the city was taken. The joy which had before filled the minds of the Fathers was now made to overflow by this extraordinary and unexpected zeal of the Commons. These volunteers were not thanked and praised, as the cavalry had been, by some of the Magistrates commissioned to that office, nor were any of them called into the house to receive an answer:
 The Senators could not keep themselves within doors; out they ran, and every one in particular, by his words and gestures, expressed to the multitude (that were standing below in the Comitium) the general gladness and exultation: Happy, unconquerable, eternal would Rome be made by this concord! They praised the Knights, they praised the Commons, they extolled even the day, the glorious Day! they confessed the Senate to be outdone in kindness and benevolence. The Senators and the People seemed to vie with each other in weeping tears of joy; till at length the Fathers were

were called back into their house; and then they made a Decree, "That
 " the Military Tribunes should, in an Assembly of the People, give the due
 " thanks to both cavalry and infantry, and assure them that the Senate " would be ever mindful of the affection they shewed for their country,
 " and had come to a resolution to allow pay to all the voluntiers." It was at this time, that the cavalry in general began to receive pay out of the publick Treasury.

The new army of voluntiers were conducted to Veii, the works, that had been destroyed by the enemy, restored, new ones formed, and provisions conveyed from Rome to the camp, with more care and diligence than ever; so that nothing necessary might be wanting to soldiers who deserved so well of the Republick.

§. II. THE Capenates and Falisci, nations of Hetruria, nearest to the Ve- entes, and consequently most concerned in their preservation, armed privately, and, joining their troops, surpris'd and attacked the Romans. L. Virginus and *M. * Sergius, both Military Tribunes, commanded at this liege.
 The jealousy, so common between persons in equal authority, had set them at variance: Each had a body of troops under his command, and had as it were a separate camp. The Capenates and Falisci attacked that of Sergius on one side, at the same time that the besieged made a sally, and attacked it on the other. The Roman soldiers, thinking they had all the forces of Hetruria to deal with, were dismayed, fought faintly, and rather to defend their own lives, than with hopes to vanquish the enemy. It was not long before they gave ground, fell into disorder, and ran away. Virginus could have saved his Collegue's troops; his own were ranged in order of battle:
 But the animosity between the two Generals was so great, that Sergius chose rather to perish, than to ask the assistance of Virginus; and Virginus, on the other hand, would not give him any succour, unless he would send and beg it. The enemy profit'd by this division: Sergius's army fled in disorder to Rome, which was but six leagues distant from the camp, and the General went thither himself, not so much to justify his own conduct, as to set forth the baseness of that of his Collegue.

The Senate hereupon sent orders to Virginus to leave his army under the command of his Lieutenants, and repair immediately to Rome, to answer to the complaints which Sergius preferred against him. The dispute was managed with great acrimony and the two Military Tribunes ran into invectives against each other before the Senate. Each had his friends there who took his part. The Conscript Fathers, to quiet the matter, thought it adviseable to make a decree, that all the Military Tribunes of that year should resign their Magistracies, and the People immediately proceed to a new election of Military Tribunes, who should enter on their office on the Calends of October. The four who had been in no fault acquiesced; but the two, on whose account this decree was proposed,

* The other four were

C. SERVILIUS AHALA, a third time,
 Q. SULPITIUS CAMERINUS,

Q. SERVILIUS PRISCUS,
 A. MANLIUS VULSO, a second time.
 begged

Year of
 R O M E
 CCCL.
 Bef. J. C.
 Four hundred
 two.
 Twenty-
 first
 Mil. Tri.
 Year of
 R O M E
 CCCL.
 Bef. J. C.
 Four hundred
 one.
 Twenty-
 second
 Mil. Tri.
 * 2d time.
 Livy, B.
 5. c. 8.

Livy, B.
 5. c. 9.

Year of ROME begged of the Senate that they might not be disgraced; and, when they found that their intreaties were not regarded, they protested against the Senatus-consultum, declaring that they would not resign their authority before the Ides of December, the due time for its expiration.

The Tribunes of the Commons, who much against their will had been for some time quiet, laid hold of this occasion to break out, and make a figure. They threatened the two Generals to send them to prison, if they did not obey the Senate's orders. Servilius Abala, one of the Military Tribunes, full of indignation at the haughty manner in which these Plebeian Magistrates treated his Colleagues: "As for your threats, I should not be displeased with an opportunity of shewing, that you have as little courage to execute them, as you have right to utter them. But the decrees of the Senate ought to be obeyed; and, if my Colleagues are refractory to its commands, I shall name a Dictator, who will be able, without your interposition, to force them to quit their office."

Virginus and Sergius, finding it fruitless to resist any longer, abdicated their Magistracy, and the People proceeded to a new election.

Year of ROME L. * Valerius, L. Julius, M. † Æmilius, Cn. § Cornelius, Cæso || Fabius, and Furius Camillus, were chosen Military Tribunes. And these new Governors had work enough upon their hands: They were to begin anew the siege of Veii, to keep the Falisci and Capenates in awe, and to recover Anxur, which the Volsci had taken the last year. Besides, the Tribunes of the Commons kindled fresh broils, when the armies came to be raised. They dissuaded the old soldiers, who were to stay in the city to guard it, from paying taxes, pretending they were exempted from that burden by being enlisted. And the disturbances, occasioned by their seditious harangues, the levies, and collecting the tribute, were so great, that the tribes could not agree in the choice of more than eight new Tribunes off the Commons. Two were still wanting. The Patricians at first endeavoured to get them supplied out of their body, but in vain. They then caballed to strike at the Trebonian Law ‡; and in the end prevailed to get two persons added to the eight, by the appointment of the majority of those eight. This was in effect to abrogate the Trebonian Law. It happened, that among the Tribunes of the Commons there was one C. Trebonius, who thought it a duty owing to his name and family to take that Law under his protection. He told the People that their interests were betrayed; and he brought an odium upon those of his Colleagues, who had ventured, of their own authority, to appoint two Tribunes. The People were especially exasperated against three of the eight, P. Curatius, M. Metilius, and M. Minutius: But these diverted the hatred of the publick from themselves, by turning it against Sergius and Virginus, the two Generals of the last year, whom they cited to appear in judgment before the People; and they forgot nothing upon this occasion, that might inflame the minds of the multitude, not only against the two persons accused, but against the whole body of the Patricians. They said, "that though the two Generals laid the blame of their ill success on each other, Virginus reproach-

ing

“ ing Sergius with cowardice, and Sergius accusing Virginus of treachery, Year of
 “ it was not probable, that either of them acted his shameful part, but in R O M E “ concert with the Body of the Patricians: For that the study of the CCCLII.
 “ Patricians was to protract the war; to the end, that, the soldiers being Bef. J. C.
 “ kept in the field, the Tribunes might not have a sufficient number of Fourhun“ voters in the city to support their Bill concerning the conquered Lands, or Twenty-“ any other Bill that tended to the advantage of the Commons.” third They added, “ That the accused had, in effect, been already con- Mil. Tri.
 “ demned by the Senate, the Roman People, and even their own Col-“ legues. That the Senate, by a Decree, removed them from the Go“ vernment; and, when they refused to obey that Decree, their Collegues “ contrained them to it by threatening to name a Dictator. That the “ Roman People had created new Military Tribunes, and had directed “ them to enter on their Magistracy, not on the 13th of December (the “ usual time) but on the 1st of October, because the Republick could no “ longer subsist under the administration of Sergius and Virginus. And “ yet these men, so universally pre-condemned. had the folly to imagine “ they were sufficiently punished by being reduced to the condition of “ private citizens, two months before the time; whereas the abridging
 “ the duration of their Magistracy was only a depriving them of the “ power of doing more mischief, not an infliction of punishment; seeing “ their Collegues, who had certainly committed no fault, were removed “ from the administration at the same time with them.” In conclusion they admonished the People, “ To recall those dispositions which they “ lately felt, when they saw their routed, affrighted army coming flying to “ Rome, accusing, not Fortune, nor the Gods, but only the two Gene“ rals.—There is not one among you, who did not, that day, detest
 “ and curse Virginus and Sergius, and all that belong to them. Is it fit, “ that, after invoking the Gods to punish these criminals, you yourselves, “ when you have them in your power, should shew them any indulgence?
 “ The Gods are never themselves the executors of vengeance upon unjust “ men; it is sufficient that they furnish the injured with an opportunity of “ revenge.” The People, irritated by these harangues, would give no ear to Sergius’s Plea of the Chance of War, nor to Virginus’s intreaty, not to render him more unhappy at home, than he had been in the field. They were each of them condemned in a fine of 10,000 asses of brass.

This prosecution had the designed effect; the People were so intent upon it, that they forgot the Trebnian Law, and their quarrel with the three Tribunes.

§. III. ROME at this time received good news from all parts where the war was carrying on: But this did not put a stop to domestick seditions. The Tribunes of the Commons preferred two laws, the first requiring a partition of the lands, the second excusing the People from any more contributions towards the soldiers pay: And in fact they would not suffer them to pay
 the

Year of the times; for the legions, being deprived of their subsistence, were ripe for a sedition.

CCCCII. But all this bustle ended in getting five Plebeians into the Military Bef. J. C. Tribuneship. P. Licinius Calvus, P. Mælius, P. Menius, L. Titinius, Four hundred. and L. Publilius. Sp. Furius was the only Patrician elected at this time².

Twenty-third. [Livy says, that Licinius, though a Plebeian, and never before in any public office, was an old Senator.] The Tribunes of the Commons were so much rejoiced to see Plebeians in the supreme magistracy, that they ceased their opposition to the tax; the soldiers received their pay again, their courage was revived, they took Anxur from the Velsci, and carried on the siege of Veii with perseverance; tho' they suffered much from the severe cold of the winter.

Year of ROME CCCCIII. At the next elections, the Centuries almost unanimously chose five Military Tribunes out of the Plebeians, and only M. Veturius out of the Patricians. These five were C. Duilius, L. Atinius, Cn. Genucius, M. Pomponius, and Volero Publilius. To hasten the reduction of Veii, the three armies of the last year joined their strength; and they intirely defeated the forces of the Falisci and Capenates, who came to its relief. So complete a victory made the administration of the Plebeian Military Tribunes glorious in the eyes of the People; but it was not happy. The extreme cold of the weather changed on a sudden to excessive heat; and this occasioned a mortality both among men and cattle. The Sybilline books being consulted upon this occasion, the Duumvirs pretended to find there a sort of expiation never before used in Rome: It was called the Læsternium. They took down the Statues of Apollo, Latona, Diana, Hercules, Mercury, and Neptune, from their niches, and laid them on three beds placed about a table, on which magnificent repasts were served up to those Deities for eight days together. These publick ceremonies were imitated in private families. Every one kept open house for friends and strangers, and conversed friendly even with adversaries. All processes, disputes, and animosities were suspended; nay, the prisoners were released from their chains, to partake of the publick rejoicings; and it was a point of Religion not to confine them again after the festival.

Year of ROME CCCCIV. §. IV. THE Patricians, taking advantage of the present disposition of the People, gave out, that the mortality was owing to the wrath of the Gods, who, they said, were displeased, because in Comitia, held with the sacred Rite of observing the Birds, honours were prostituted, and no regard had to the distinction of families. By a religious scruple, thus raised in the minds of the multitude, and by presenting to them, at the next elections, candidates of the greatest dignity and best families, the Patricians carried a point which they had much more at heart, than the business of the war.

² Livy reports, that the Military Tribunes, now chosen, were all Patricians except Licinius. But Pighius and others are persuaded, that the Historian has here made a mistake; all the names, except Furius, being names of Plebeian families; and three of them, viz. Mælius, Manius, and Titinius, being the names of three Plebeian Military Tribunes chosen about four years after this time, according to his own account.

The Triclinium of the Ancients.

ness of the war; the recovering to their order the supreme magistracy which they had seemed in danger of losing for ever.

L. Valerius*, L. Furius†, M. Valerius, Q. Servilius§, Q. Sulpicius||, and the famous Camillus‡ were chosen to be the six Governors of the Republick. This year the Romans had a prodigy to employ their attention. It happened to be a dry summer; but though there was little water in the rivers, springs or marshes, the lake of Alba, that seldom rose so high as to the foot of the rocks which quite surrounded it, swelled on a sudden to such a height as to reach the very tops of those rocks. This strange accident occasioned much discourse in the camp; and, as in long sieges the soldiers of the different parties sometimes become acquainted, they talked of the prodigy from their several posts. One day when they were scoffing at one another in relation to the siege, an old soldier of the Veientes cried out in an enthusiastick manner, "Veii shall never be taken, 'till all the water " is run out of the lake of Alba." A Roman Centinel, who had great faith in divination, hearing what he said, and, upon inquiry, understanding that he was a Diviner, contrived a stratagem whereby he made him prisoner, and then carried him before the Roman General, who sent him to the Senate. The old man affirmed to the Fathers, that what he had declared was agreeable to an ancient tradition written in some prophetick books in his country, and that, if the Romans could draw the water out of the lake, Veii would be taken: But he advised them to have especial care, that the drains which should be made to carry it off did not convey it to the sea. Though the Senate were not disposed to an implicit faith in the diviner, yet they thought the matter of such importance, as to send a deputation of three Patricians to Delphos to consult the Oracle upon it.

Before the return of the Deputies, the People had chosen six new Military Tribunes, all Patricians. The Romans, during the siege of Veii, found themselves obliged this year to make head not only against the Volsi, Falisci, and Capenates, but against the Tarquinienses, new enemies from Hetruria, who had committed hostilities in the Roman territory. A. Posthumius and L. Julius (two of the governors) who had staid in Rome, requested leave to raise troops to disperse them, and, when the Tribunes of the Commons obstructed the levies, put themselves at the head of a small number of volunteers, and fetching a great compass about surprised the Tarquinienses, as they were returning home, made a terrible slaughter of them, and recovered the booty they had seized.

In the mean time the three Patricians returned from Delphos; and, to the astonishment of the Senate and People, the answer of the Pythonefs was perfectly conformable to the prediction and advice of the old diviner, whom, thereupon, they advised with concerning the necessary expiations

Year of
R O M E
CCCLV.
Bef. J. C.
Three
hundred ninety-
seven.
Twenty-
sixth
Mil. Tri.
Plut. life.
of Cam. p.
130.
* A 5th
time.
† A 3d
time.
§ A 2d
time.
|| A 2d
time.
‡ A 2d
time.
Livy, B.
5. c. 15.
Val. Max.
B. 1. c. 6.

Year of
R O M E
CCCLVI.
Bef. J. C.
Three
hundred ninety-
six.
Twenty-
seventh
Mil. Tri.
Livy B. 5.
c. 16.
Plut. in Camillus,
P. 137.

L. JULIUS IULUS, second time,
L. FURIUS, fourth time,
L. SERGIUS,

A. POSTHUMIUS,
A. MANLIUS, third time,
P. CORNELIUS, second time.

Year of to render the Gods propitious. Then the Romans sent out pioneers to R O M E make a canal, which might carry off the waters of the lake, and convey cccclvi. them all over the fields, by trenches. [This fine work subsists to this day, Bef. J. C. and the water of the lake Albano which runs along Castel Gandolfo, passes Three through it.] But the oracle had likewise directed the Romans to re-estahundred blish the neglected ceremonies of religion, and to begin those again which ninety-six had not been regularly performed. The first they interpreted of the Feriae Twenty- Latinae, of late neglected; and they renewed the observation of them.
 seventh And as to the second it was discovered, that the election of the present
 Mil. Tri. Military Tribunes had been defective, with regard to the Auguries;
 Kircher, whereupon they all abdicated, and after a short Inter-regnum were suc-
 B. 3. ceeded by six new ones, all Plebeians. Their administration was not
 Vet. Lat. prosperous. Atinius and Genucius, two of them, marched with some troops Livy, B. to oppose an inundation of Hetrurians, who, not by order, but by
 5. c. 17- permission of their Governors, were coming to attack the Roman intrench-
 18. ments before Veii: The Tribunes fell into an ambush; Genucius was killed;
 Year of and Atinius, though he rallied his men and retreated, durst not any more R O M E face the enemy in the open field. The news of this disaster so terrified the cccclvii. army before Veii, that it was with difficulty hindered from disbanding.
 Bef. J. C. Rome, in a yet greater consternation, had recourse, as in the most pressing Three and general calamities, to a Dictator; appointing M. Furius Camillus to that hundred supreme dignity. This elevation he owed wholly to the publick danger and ninety- distress: A time when superior merit, without canvassing or intriguing, five. naturally gets into its right place. The change of the commander made a Twenty- sudden change in every thing,—New hope—fresh courage—fortune seem-eighth ed to turn at once in favour of the city^b. Camillus, having named for Ge-Mil. Tri. neral of the Horse P. Cornelius Scipio, and having rigorously punished those
 c. 19. cowards, who on the late alarm had fled from the camp, he rode thither with all expedition to revive the courage of the soldiers; which done, he returned to the city to raise a new army. The People strove who should first list themselves under his banners; every body was for going to the wars with a General whom victory had never deserted. Nay the allies, (the Latines and Hernici) of their own accord, sent to offer him a strong supply of their ablest youth. The Dictator marched from the city against the Falisci and Capenates, whom, in the territory of Nepete, he

^a Livy tells us, that old Licinius Calvus, the first Commoner ever raised to the Military Tribuneship, was now a second time named to that dignity by the majority of the Prerogative Tribe, i. e. of the Tribe to whose lot it fell to vote first; but at his request, pleading age and infirmities, the People chose his son in his stead. From this passage in Livy, it appears that the order established by Servius Tullus, in voting, had been changed; and that the Classes and Centuries were now blended with the Tribes. See p. 93. 94. 238.

^b Omnia repente mutaverat imperator mutatus, alia spes, alius animus hominum, fortuna quoque alia urbis videri. Liv. L. 5. c. 19.

P. LICINIUS,
 L. ATINIUS, second time,
 P. MÆLIUS, second time.

L. TITINIUS, second time,
 P. MÆNIUS, second time,
 C. GENUCIUS, second time.

defeated in a pitched battle; and, after this victory, which left him the country open, he repaired to the camp before Veii, restored military discipline, which of late had been very much slackened, invested the place more straitly, and strengthened his lines by several additional forts.

As the besieged defended themselves with no less courage than before, and as Camillus perceived that he should not be able to carry by assault or open force a town which had a whole army for its garrison, he had recourse to mines and sapping. His pioneers, whom he divided into six companies, relieved one another; so that the work being carried on without interruption, they, in a short time, opened a passage under ground to the very citadel, the besieged suspecting nothing of the matter. The Dictator, then thinking himself sure of conquest, sent to the Conscrip Fathers, to know how they would have the spoils of the city disposed of. When the question came to be debated in the Senate, old Licinius, whose opinion was the first asked by his son (now Military Tribune) answered, that he thought, proclamation should be made, That whosoever of the citizens was desirous of sharing in the plunder of Veii, might repair to the Dictator's camp. Appius Claudius spoke warmly against this bounty, as an unprecedented prodigality, and inconsistent with equity and sound policy: That if the Senate were absolutely against bringing the whole produce of the spoil into the publick treasury (though much exhausted) yet, at least the soldiers ought to be paid out of it, and the Commons be thereby, in some measure, eased of their burden of taxes; and that by this regulation every family in Rome would have some advantage from the booty. To this Licinius replied, That the money, so reserved and appropriated, would be a source of endless discontent, occasion impeachments, and seditions, and motions for new Laws. That it was better to conciliate to the Senate the good-will of the multitude, by a bounty, which would relieve their indigence (caused by the taxes they had paid for ten years together) and would make them taste the sweet fruits of persevering in a war, in which they might almost be said to have grown old. That what each man should take with his own hand from the enemy, and bring home, would give him more pleasure, than a gift of much greater value, from the Senate. That, as it was only to avoid the bringing odium upon himself the Dictator had referred the matter to the Senate, so the Senate, from a like regard to themselves, ought to abandon the whole spoil to the people, and suffer every man quietly to enjoy what the fortune of the war should give him.

Year of
R O M E
ccclvii.
Bef. J. C.
Three
hundred ninety-
five.

Twenty-eighth
Mil. Tri.

Livy, B.
5. c. 20.

c. 21.

tem-

This advice, being thought the safer, prevailed; a proclamation was issued conformable to it, and hereupon prodigious numbers of the citizens immediately flocked to the Dictator's camp.

Camillus, when he had taken the Auspices, and ordered his troops to be ready for an assault upon the place, is said to have made the following vow and prayer: O Pythian Apollo, it is by thy inspiration, and under thy guidance, that I am going to assault the city of Veii! and I do therefore vow to dedicate to thee the tenth part of the spoil which shall be taken in it. And, O Queen Juno, who now residest in Veii, vouchsafe to follow us victorious to our city, which shall thenceforward be thy city, where thou shalt possess a Year of temple worthy of thy greatness ! To engage the whole attention of the be-R O M E sieged, so that they might as late as possible discover their danger from CCCLVII. his mine, Camillus (whose army was now numerous enough for the purpose)

 Bef. J. C. caused an assault to be made on all sides of the place at once. This Three drew the citizens from all quarters to the ramparts, wondering what hundred should be the cause of so sudden and furious an attack from the Romans, ninety- who for some days had been quite still. While the besieged were in this Eve. amazement, the Roman soldiers, who filled the mine, rising up in the Twenty- middle of the temple of Juno, which stood in the citadel, sallied forth, eighth and spread themselves in several bodies through the town. One fell upon Mil. Tri. the rear of those who were defending the walls, another broke down Livy, B. the gates ; and the whole Roman army rushed into the place, putting all
 5. c. 22. to the sword who did not surrender their arms. It is said, that the Dictator, when he beheld the spoil, far exceeding this expectation both in quantity and value, lifted up his hands to heaven, and prayed, That, if his prosperity, and the prosperity of the Roman People, should appear to Gods or Men excessive, the envy might be all spent upon him, rather than the publick should feel even the smallest effects of it : and that after this prayer, as he was turning himself to the right, he fell to the ground ; an accident, says Livy, which, after the condemnation of Camillus and the destruction of Rome by the Gauls, was interpreted into an omen foreboding those events.
 The next day the prisoners of free condition were sold to the best bidder ; and the money arising from thence the Dictator transmitted into the publick treasury, much to the dissatisfaction of the soldiers ; though this was the only part withheld from them of the produce of the spoil. Nor did they hold themselves obliged to the Dictator for what they brought away with them, because from a selfish motive he had referred a matter to the Senate which it was in his own power to determine ; nor did they think themselves obliged to the Senate, but to the two Licinii only, father and son, who had made themselves the advocates of the People on this occasion.

When the conquerors had emptied Veii of all the riches that had belonged to men, they began to remove what belonged to the Gods, and to remove the Gods themselves ; but this more like worshippers than plunderers. For they selected, out of the whole army, some of the youngest men, to whom, when their bodies were washed perfectly clean, and cloathed in white, it was given in charge to transport Queen Juno to Rome. They entered her temple with reverence, and, at first, but lightly touched her, to see how she would take it : Because, among the Etrurians, it was not customary for any but a priest of a particular family to handle that image. As she gave no sign of anger, one of the lads,

^a According to Plutarch, Camillus prayed, that the publick might suffer nothing, and be himself very little ; and that he thought his prayer answered, by his falling down without hurting himself. Mr. Dacier is much displeased with this account, unworthy of the Hero. Both Mr. Dacier and Gronovius suppose that Plutarch did not understand Livy's words : Uteam invidiam lenire suo privato incommodo [potius] quam minimo publico populi Romani liceret.

in a civil manner, then asked her. Are you willing to go to Rome, JUNO?—Yes, yes, (answered the rest, all together) she is willing; she gives a nod of assent: And hence (says Livy) a fabulous report, that she herself made the answer in words. He adds, Certain it is, that she was easily moved from her place, and that they got her to Rome with as little trouble, as if she had followed them thither on foot. They conveyed her safe and found to the Aventine hill, whither Camillus had invited her, and which was thenceforward to be the seat of her residence for ever; and there he dedicated a temple to her in discharge of a vow, which, to gain her favour, he had formerly made. Such, after a ten years siege, was the fate of Veii, the richest city of Tuscany; it was at once despoiled of its riches, its inhabitants, and its gods.

Year of
R O M E
CCCLVII.
Bef. J. C.
Three
hundred ninety-
five.
Twenty-
eighth
Mil. Tri.

C H A P. XXXVII.

§. I. The People are much displeased with Camillus. §. II. The next year (the Republick being under the Government of six Military Tribunes, all Patricians) a Tribune of the Commons proposes, that half of the Senators, Knights, and People of Rome should remove to Veii, and settle there. After much struggle Camillus and the other Senators bring this project to nothing. §. III. Camillus, chosen one of the six Military Tribunes for the year following, has the conduct of the war against the Falisci. He besieges Falerii their capital city, and punishes a Schoolmaster, who would have betrayed the place to him. The Falisci submit to the Romans. §. IV. The People, when the time comes for electing their Tribunes, chuse to the same office those of the old ones who had appeared for the proposal of removing half the People to Veii. On the other hand, the Patricians get Consular Government restored. The project of going to Veii is debated in an Assembly of the People, and rejected by a majority of only one tribe. The Senate decree seven acres of the lands of Veii to every freeman of Rome. §. V. The Volturnenses, a People of Hetruria, take arms against Rome. The Consuls, being seized with a contagious distemper, resign the Fasces. An inter-regnum ensues. And then Six Military Tribunes are elected to the government.

§. I. THE length of the siege, the dangers attending it, the uncertainty of success, the importance of the conquest, all these made the news of the taking of Veii be received at Rome with the utmost transport of joy: The temples were filled with Roman Ladies, and four days were set apart for a publick thanksgiving to the Gods; which had never before been practised in the Republick upon the greatest success. The very triumph of the Dictator had something new and singular in it. Camillus appeared in a stately chariot drawn by four horses all milk-white, and he had coloured his face with vermillion.

White horses, since the expulsion of the Kings, had been allowed only to Jupiter and the Sun; and it was with vermillion the statues of the Gods

were

Livy, B.
5. c. 23.
Plut. in Camillus,
p. 132.
Plin. B.
33.

Year of R O M E CCCLVII. Bef. J. C. Three hundred ninety-five. ——— Twenty-eight. Mil. Tri. Liv. B. 5. c. 23. Plut. in Camillus, p. 133.

were commonly painted. In the midst therefore of the praises which the People gave the Dictator, they could not without a secret indignation behold him affecting a pomp, which in a manner put him upon a level with the Gods. Vanity so impious much diminished the esteem and affection of the multitude for him; and he had not long resigned his Dictatorship, before he became perfectly odious to them. What partly occasioned this was the vow which, just before ^a the assault upon Veii, he made, as we have before observed, to consecrate the tenth part of the booty to Apollo. Amidst the hurry and confusion of the plundering he remembered not his vow: And when it returned to his mind, [a year after] there could no easy means be found to make the soldiers give back the tenth of what they had got. In this perplexity the Senate proclaimed, that all who were desirous to have a clear conscience, and secure prosperity to their families, should honestly compute the value of their booty, and bring the tenth part of that value to the Quæstors, in order to make the God a present suitable to his majesty, and proportioned to the benefits received from him.

This contribution, exacted at a wrong time, alienated the hearts of the People from Camillus. His vow, they said, was to give Apollo the tenth of the enemy's spoils, but that he performed it by tithing the goods of his fellow-citizens.

Year of R O M E CCCLVIII. Bef. J. C. Three hundred ninety-four. ——— Twenty-ninth. Mil. Tri. Liv. B. 5. c. 24.

§. II. THE centuries chose six Military Tribunes, all Patricians, for the new year. In the beginning of their administration, the Capenates sued for peace and obtained it. The war with the Falisci went on. In the mean time, to quiet the discontented people at home, the Senate decreed, that a colony of 3000 Romans should be sent into the country of the Volsci (who had lately made submissions) each man to have about three acres and a half of land: But, when the time came for enrolling the names of those who were to form the colony, the Plebeians expressed a contempt of the Senate's bounty: Why should they be sent into banishment among the Volsci, when the fair city of Veii, and its territory, more fertile and more ample than that of Rome, were before their eyes? Nay SICINIUS, one of the Tribunes of the Commons, preferred a bill for removing one half of the Senate and People of Rome to Veii, (a city better situated and better built than Rome) yet so, that the two cities should form but one Commonwealth. He added, That the Romans would, by this means, more easily preserve their conquests. The chief nobles opposed his project with all their might; (and they had gained over to their side some of his Collegues.) They said, they would sooner die than suffer so mischievous a bill to pass into a Law: A people so prone to civil dissension, when dwelling together in ONE and the same

^a Pistarch says, that Camillus made this vow before he left Rome to go to the siege of Veii.

P. CORNELIUS COSSUS,
P. CORNELIUS SCIPIO,
M. VALERIUS, second time,

K. FABIUS, third time,
L. FURIUS, fifth time,
Q. SERVILIUS, second time.

city,—what will be their temper when living separate in two?—Would any man in his wits prefer a conquered city to his own native city which had conquered it?—Would you have Veii, after its being subdued, exalted to be more considerable than it was before its reduction?—You may leave us here, if you please; but nothing shall ever engage us to relinquish the place of our birth, and, in order to follow the new founder, Sicinius, to Veii, forsake our God Romulus, the son of a God, and the father and founder of Rome.

Year of
R O M E
ccclviii.
Bef. J. C.
Three
hundred ninety-
four.

In the struggle about this bill, nothing restrained the populace from blows and violence, but the deep-rooted respect which they had for the principal Senators, who, whenever a shout was raised for beginning a scuffle, presented themselves to their fury, bidding them assault, strike, kill.

Twenty-
ninth
Mil. Tri.

CAMILLUS went about, loudly declaiming, That it was no wonder the people were seized with a madness, seeing they had nothing so little at heart as the performance of vows to the Gods, after receiving the favours, to obtain which the vows had been made. He would say nothing of the ALMS given to Apollo, instead of the TENTH of the spoil: Each of the individuals had bound himself; so the state was free. But he was obliged in conscience to let them know one thing: That, though no mention had hitherto been made, but of the moveables, yet his vow to Apollo had comprehended the city of Veii, and all the territory belonging to it. The Senate, [pretending to be] perplexed with this new scruple, referred it to the Pontiffs; and these (in concert with Camillus) declared, that a tenth of whatever had belonged to the Veientes before the Dictator made his vow, and had, after his making the vow, fallen into the power of the Romans, ought to be sacred to Apollo. In consequence of this judgment, the city of Veii and its territory were appraised, and a tenth of the value was given out of the publick treasury to the Military Tribunes, to purchase gold with it, that a golden cup, or vase, large and massy, might be sent as a present to Apollo. Gold being scarce, the ladies agreed among themselves to lend their toys and ornaments to the State. Never were the Fathers better pleased with any thing, than with this complaisance of the sex; and, in return for it, a decree was made, that they should have the privilege of riding in covered chariots to the sacrifices and publick games, and in open ones at all other times.

Livy, B.
5. c. 25.

The business of the vow thus settled, the Tribunes of the Commons began to stir again, and the multitude to vent their anger against all the principal Senators, and especially Camillus—That by their Reservations, and their Consecrations, they had reduced the spoil of Veii to nothing. And, finding that the affair of removing to Veii was not like to be determined this year, they chose again, to the Plebeian Tribuneship, the same men who had preferred the Bill. On the other hand the Senate, by employing all their influence, got those Tribunes rechosen who had opposed the Bill; so that there was little change in the college.

§. III. By a like exertion of their utmost strength, in the Comitia held for electing Military Tribunes, the Fathers prevailed to have Camillus chosen to be one of the number. They pretended to want an able general for the war, but their real aim was to provide themselves with a champion-able

c. 26.

Year of able to make head against the Tribunes of the Commons, resolutely bent
 R O M E upon an Agrarian Law, and an equitable partition of the lands of Veii.
 cccix. The five Collegues given him were all Patricians ^a. Things remained quiet Bef. J. C. 'till Camillus had taken the field; and even then the Plebeian Tribunes
 Three made little progress in their affairs; while he, their most formidable ad-hundred verſary, acquired new glory by his conduct in the war against the Falisci. ninety- The enemy for ſome time kept themſelves ſhut up in Falerii, 'till the de-three. vastations made by the Romans, in the territory about it, provoked them at Thirtieth length to come out: Their fear however hindered them from advancing far-Mil. Tri. ther than about a mile from the town, and they incamped in a place ſo ſtrong by nature, that they thought it needed no other fortifications. Camillus nevertheleſs attacked them there, defeated them, and took their camp. The whole ſpoil he put into the Quæſtors hands, much to the diſcontent of the ſoldiers; yet he kept them in awe by the ſtrictneſs of his diſcipline; ſo that they hated him for the very virtue they admired in him. After this victory he inveſted Falerii and ſurrounded it with lines, but at ſo great a diſtance from the walls, that there was more than ſufficient room for the beſieged to come abroad and take the air without danger.

The Falisci had brought from Greece the cuſtom of committing all their children to the care of one man, who was to inſtruct them in all ſorts of polite learning, and ſee them perform the exerciſes proper for their age.
 The children had uſed often to walk with their maſter without the walls of the city, before the ſiege; and their fears of an enemy, who kept quiet, and at ſuch a diſtance, were not great enough to make them diſcontinue the practice. But the preſent ſchool-maſter proved a traitor. At firſt he led the youth only along the walls, then a little farther, and at length took his opportunity, and brought them through the Roman camp, quite to the General's tent; whom he accoſted with telling him, that by putting thoſe boys, the ſons of the principal citizens, into his hands, the city in effect was delivered up to him. Camillus, ſtruck with horror at the treachery, ordered his Lictors to ſtrip the traitor, tie his hands behind him, and then furniſh the youth with rods, to whip him back again into the city. A little before, the Falisci had proteſted they would rather undergo the fate of the Vientes, than imitate the cowardice of the Capenates: But now they ardently deſired peace; ſo deep an impreſſion had the probity of Camillus made upon them. The Deputies whom they ſent to him on this buſineſs he ſuffered to proceed to Rome; where they addreſſed the Senate in the following manner: " You and your General have gained a victory over us, " which cannot be diſpleaſing to Gods or Men. We ſubmit ourſelves to " you, out of a perſuaſion that we ſhall live more happy under your laws
 " than under our own. The Romans and Falisci are this day giving two " great examples to mankind; you, in preferring an honourable action to

Plat. Life of Camil-
 lus, p.
 133, 134.
 Livy, B.
 5. c. 27.

^a M. FURIUS CAMILLUS, third time,
 L. FURIUS, ſixth time,
 C. ÆMILIUS,

Sp. POSTHUMIUS,
 P. CORNELIUS SCIPIO, a ſecond time,
 L. VALERIUS POPLICOLA.

victory;

“ victory ; we, in rather yielding to the power of virtue, than the force of “ arms.” Camillus demanded of the Falisci a year’s pay for his troops, and, Year of R O M E ccclix.
Bef. J. C. having on that condition granted them peace, led back his army to Rome. Three hundred.
ninety-three.
Thirtieth
Mil. Tri.

The applauses, now given to Camillus by his fellow-citizens, were much sincerer than those he had formerly received, when the white horses drew his triumphal chariot through the city. And the Senate, ashamed perhaps of having delayed to discharge his vow to Apollo, deputed, at this time three Patricians, L. Valerius, L. Sergius, and A. Manlius, to convey the golden vase to Delphos. The long ship, on which these deputies embarked, was intercepted by some pirates from the isle of Liparæ ; and thither the captors carried their prize. But it luckily happened that Timasitheus, this year chief magistrate of Liparæ, had as much religion as any Roman. For when he understood, that the treasure which had fallen into the hands of his people was an offering designed for Apollo, in discharge of a vow ; and when he had farther learnt, that the three Romans were ambassadors ; he not only entertained them hospitably, but in person, with a squadron of ships (the pious pirates consenting to it) conveyed them to Delphos, and from thence (when they had made their offering) safe back to Rome : For which generous and religious proceeding, he received, in virtue of a decree of the Senate, rich presents from the Publick ; and they made a league of hospitality with him.

War with the Æqui was carried on this year, under the conduct of Æmilius and Posthumius, with such various success, that neither the citizens at Rome, nor the soldiers in the field, could, for some time, tell which side had the better. At first when the two Generals acted in conjunction, they gained a victory ; but afterwards when, separating, Æmilius thought fit to go to garrison Verrugo, and Posthumius to lay waste the enemies borders, the troops of the latter, carelessly secure, and marching in disorder, were by the Æqui surprised, struck with terror, and put to the rout. They fled to some neighbouring hills ; and their fright communicated itself to the garrison at Verrugo. Posthumius, as soon as he had rallied his men, and posted them so as to be out of danger, reproached them bitterly with their coward-like behaviour. They confessed their fault, begged with earnestness to be instantly led to the attack of the enemy’s camp (which was within sight, in the plain below) and declared they would submit to any punishments if they did not force it before night. The General commended their ardor, bid them refresh themselves, and be ready at the fourth watch. As the Æqui, to hinder the Romans from escaping to Verrugo, were guarding the road that led thither, the two armies met in that road. The battle began by moonlight, and the shouts of the combatants reaching Verrugo, the troops there, imagining that Posthumius’s camp was assaulted, took a fright, and, notwithstanding all that Æmilius could say, fled for refuge to Tusculum. Thence flew a report to Rome, that Posthumius was killed, and his army defeated : But a letter, crowned with laurel, arrived from that General to the Senate presently after, with an account of his having obtained a complete victory.

Year of
R O M E
ccclix.
Bef. J. C.
Three
hundred ninety-
three.

Thirtieth
Mil. Tri.
Livy, B.
5. c. 29.
Year of
R O M E
ccclv.
Bef. J. C.
Three
hundred ninety-two.

Eighty-
seventh Consul-
ship.

* 321. 5.
10d.
Arbuth-
not.
Livy, B. 5.
c. 30.

+ Create a Dictator.

§. IV. THE bill for removing the Veii being still in suspense, the Commons, when the time came for electing their Tribunes, were for continuing those of the old ones who had proposed the bill; and the Patricians endeavoured to get those re-elected who had opposed it. The former prevailed in their own Comitia. The promoters of the law were re-chosen, and the opposers excluded: Upon which the Fathers in revenge made a decree that Consuls should be chosen for the next year: L. Lucretius Flaccus and Servius Sulpitius Camerinus were by the Centuries raised to that dignity.

Under the new administration, Sicinius renewed his intrigues with more zeal than ever, to get the Law passed for removing half of the People and of the Senate to Veii. A. Virginius and Q. Pomponius, two of the last year's Tribunes of the Commons, who had distinguished themselves by their opposition to the law, were cited to appear before the tribes; and, notwithstanding all the influence of the Senate in their favour, they were fined * 10,000 Aſſes of brass: A sentence which gave great offence to the Fathers. Camilius loudly inveighed against the Commons, who, he said, were so blind, as not to see, that by their iniquitous sentence they had overturned the tribunitian power; in as much as they had deprived their Tribunes of the privilege of INTERCESSION. But they deceived themselves, if they imagined the Senate would endure an unbridled licentiousness in any of those magistrates. That, if the violence of some of the Tribunes could not be repelled by the help of their Collegues, the Fathers would † find another weapon! He likewise reproved the Consuls for quietly suffering the two Tribunes to be oppressed, who had done nothing but by advice of the Senate, and had trusted to their promised protection. And, as to the Law in question, he never ceased exhorting the Fathers to oppose it with all their might; advising them to go down into the Forum (when the Tribes should be assembled to determine the affair) as men prepared to fight in defence of their native land, the altars of their household Gods, and the temples of the Gods of their Country. He added, “ Were I at liberty to think of my own glory, when that of my country is in question, what could flatter my ambition more, than to see a city, which I have conquered, inhabited by Romans, who would be so many living witnesses of my victory, and where every object would be a monument of my glory? but I think it would be impious to re-people a city whose Gods have deserted it, and shameful to prefer before your own country a country conquered by it.”

The Senators, old and young, moved by these exhortations, went all in a body to the Forum, when the Law was to be proposed, and dispersing themselves into their respective Tribes, with tears in their eyes, conjured the People not to abandon “ that city where they were born, and in defence of which both they and their ancestors had so bravely and so successfully fought.” Then pointing to the Capitol, the Sanctuary of Vesta, and to the other Temples all around, “ Can you consent that the Roman People should be driven, like exiles, from their guardian Gods, and their native country, to inhabit a city not long ago peopled by their enemies? Better had it been never to have taken Veii, than that Rome should be “ thus deserted.” As the Patricians, abstaining from all violence, employed prayers and intreaties only on this occasion, and made frequent mention of the Gods, they, by raising a religious scruple in the minds of many, prevailed to have the law rejected, though it was only by a majority of one Tribe. And now the Senate were so pleased with this victory, that the next morning, at the request of the Consuls, they made a decree, whereby they assigned seven acres of the lands of Veni, not only to every father of a family, but to every single person of free condition, that the former might be enabled to educate their children, and the latter be induced to marry.

“ thus

Year of
R O M E
CCCLV.
Bef. J. C.
Three
hundred ninety-two.

Eighty-
seventh Consul-
ship.

Livy, B.
5 c. 31.

Year of
R O M E
CCCLXI.
Bef. J. C.
Three
hundred ninety-
one.

Eighty-
eighth Consul-
ship.

Fall. Cap.
Cicero's
in Ver. 2.

§. V. ON the other hand, the People, obliged by this liberality, made no opposition to the election of Consuls for the next year. L. Valerius Potitus and M. Manlius, (afterwards Capitolinus) were the persons chosen; and they began their year by performing a vow made by Camillus, when Dictator, to celebrate the great Games. (Of these there were two sorts, the one celebrated every year in the month of September, in honour to Jupiter, Juno, and Minerva; the other called votive, or extraordinary, had no fixed day appointed for them, and were celebrated in honour of Jupiter only.)

The Romans, commanded by their two Consuls, had this year a battle with the Æqui, whom they presently routed. Valerius, because he pursued the enemy farther, and killed more of them than Manlius did, was more honoured than he; Manlius had only an Ovation; Valerius a Triumph. In this same year, war was declared against the Volsinienses and Salpinates (nations of Hetruria) who, joining their forces, had, without provocation, made an incursion on the lands of the Republick. No army, however, could, for some time, be led against these new enemies, because a famine and pestilence, occasioned by an excessive hot and dry season, then raged in the Roman territory. C. Julius, one of the Censors, being carried off, L. Cornelius was substituted in his place, a thing afterwards deemed inauspicious, because Rome was taken in that Lustrum: Nor after this time did the Romans ever substitute, in the place of a Censor who died in his office, another person to be colleague to the survivor. The Consuls too falling sick, the Senate decreed that they should abdicate; and an Interregnum ensue. Camillus was created Inter-rex, and succeeded by Cornelius Scipio, and he by Valerius Potitus. This last held an assembly for the election of six Military Tribunes, that, in case some of the supreme Magistrates should be seized with the distemper, there might yet be others in a condition to take care of the publick.

C H A P. XXXVIII.

§. I. Camillus is cited to appear in judgment before the People. To avoid a publick condemnation he goes into exile. §. II. Shortly after, Clusium in Hetruria being besieged by the Gauls under King Brennus, the inhabitants implore the assistance of the Romans. Three brothers of the Fabian family

K k k 2

are

ere sent Ambassadors from Rome to mediate a peace. They rashly transgress the law of nations. Brennus, in anger, raises the siege, and marches towards Rome. §. III. He gives the Romans a total overthrow on the banks of the Allia. The third day after the battle, he enters Rome, burns the City, and invades the Capitol. §. IV. Camillus, though at this time an exile, is, by a commission from the Senate, in the Capitol, constituted Dictator. §. V. The Gauls attempt to scale the Capitol in the night. Their approach to the ramparts is discovered by the cackling of some geese. The assailants are repulsed, chiefly by the bravery of M. Manlius. §. VI. Both besiegers and besieged being distressed by famine, they enter upon a treaty. The Romans are to purchase a peace with gold. While the gold is weighing, Camillus arrives: He forces the Gauls to raise the siege, and quit the Country. §. VII. Rome being destroyed, the Tribunes renew the proposal of removing to Veii. Camillus (who is continued in the Dictatorship the whole year) opposes it with great zeal; but an accidental word of a Centurion is what determines the People to stay and rebuild the city. §. VIII. Before the end of the next year (during which the Commonwealth is governed by six Military Tribunes) the City is intirely REBUILT.

Year of
ROME
ccclxvi.
Ref. I. C.
Three
hundred sixty.

Thirty-
first.

Mil. Tri.
* A 7th
time.

+ A 2d
time.

Liv. E. 5.
C. 32.

Plut. in Camillus,
P. 134.

Ib. p. 135.
Livy, B.

5. C. 32.

§. I. L. LUCRETIUS, Serv. Sulpitius, M. Æmilius, * L. Furius, Agr. Furius, and † C. Æmilius, the six new governors of the Republic, entered on their office the first of July. The war with the Volsinienses fell by lot to Lucretius and Æmilius; that with the Salpinates to Agrippa Furius and Sulpitius. A total defeat, suffered by the Volsinienses, taught them prudence, so that they begged a truce from the Romans; which was granted for twenty years upon conditions. As for the Salpinates, they were so terrified by the defeat of the Volsinienses, that they durst not appear in the field, but left their country open to be pillaged.

At this time, one Caditius, a man of the lowest rank, pretended to have heard a miraculous voice, which pronounced distinctly these words, Go to the Magistrates, and tell them, the Gauls draw near^a. The meanness of the man made the Military Tribunes despise the warning; and, notwithstanding the daily conquests made by the Gauls, the Romans appear plainly, by their manner of treating the great Camillus (their only General capable of making head against such formidable neighbours) to have had no apprehension of any danger from them. Apuleius, one of the Tribunes of the Commons, summoned him to appear before an Assembly of the People, and answer to the accusation of having robbed the publick of some of the riches of Veii, of which charge certain brass doors, seen in his house, were said to be a proof.

Camillus was, at this time, in excessive affliction for the death of a son; and therefore, on receiving the summons, he sent to the great men, formerly his Collegues in office, to his friends, his clients, and the chief

^a Camillus afterwards erected a temple to the unknown Divinity who made this revelation; and the Romans coined for him the name of Aius Locutius.

men of his Tribe, to come to him at his house. His purpose was to find their thoughts and dispositions. When the Assembly, which was very numerous, had considered of the matter, they answered, that they would willingly pay the fine in which he should be condemned; but that it was not in their power to acquit him. Hereupon, he chose rather to banish himself from Rome, than present to undergo the shame of a condemnation. 'Tis said, that when he came to one of the gates of the city, he stopped, and, turning towards the capitol, prayed to the Gods, that his ungrateful countrymen might quickly have cause to repent their having repaid his services with so sharp an outrage. Having thus cursed his fellow-citizens, as Achilles did the Greeks, he retired to Ardea, a city not far from Rome, and, in his absence, was fined fifteen thousand Asses of brass; [about forty-eight pounds of our money.]

Year of
R O M E
CCCLXII.
Bef. J. C.
Three
hundred
ninety.
Thirty-
first Mil.
Trib.

The Destruction of Rome, by the Gauls, following so closely these transactions, it is no wonder, that the multitude, always superstitious, ascribed it to the anger of the Gods on account of the injustice done to Camillus.

Livy, B.
5. c. 33.
Chiv.
† Tuscany.

§. II. HE was no sooner gone, than Envoys arrived from the inhabitants of *Clusium, in Ettruria†, imploring the assistance of the Republick against an army of Gauls, which had made an irruption into Italy, and now besieged their city. The occasion of the siege was this:

ARUNS, a native of Clusium, a man well born, was guardian to an orphan, named (or, perhaps, stiled) Lucumo, the richest and the handsomest youth in the place. The ward, who had been brought up, from his infancy, in the house of ARUNS, could not find in his heart to leave it, even when arrived at that age which puts a young man under his own direction: He had such an esteem and affection for his guardian, that there was no possibility of living without his Company. It appeared, however, after some time, that the chains, which held our pupil so fast bound in the place of his education, were not the virtues of ARUNS, but the charms of his wife. The passion being mutual, and growing too violent to be either conquered or concealed, Lucumo carried off the Lady, avowed the action, and kept her publickly. To obtain reparation of honour, by course of Law, was attempted in vain: Large bribes and the numerous adherents to the ample fortune of Lucumo enabled him to triumph over the complaints of an injured husband, not so rich as he. ARUNS, despairing of justice, applied his thoughts to revenge. The State was now become guilty of the cruel injury and affront which he had received from his ward. Against Clusium therefore he aimed the meditated mischief, forming a design to reduce the city under the domination of an army of foreign freebooters. He knew, that, from several Cantons of *Gaul, multitudes

Plut. vita Camilli,
p. 135,
136.

of

* Gaul was anciently divided into three parts. The first, which reached from the British sea to the Seine, was called (by the Romans) Gallia Belgica. The second, which comprehended all the country between the Seine and the Garonne quite to the Alps, they named Gallia Celtica. The third, containing all that tract of ground which lies between the Garonne, the Pyrenees, and the western ocean, was called Gallia Aquitania.

The

Year of of men had been formerly drawn into Italy by the allurements of its delicious wines: And it is said, that the SENONES (who possessed that part of

ccclviii.
Bef J. C.
Three
hundred thirty.

Thirtvand Mil.
Two.

The only Gauls, who at several times crossed the Alps and settled in Italy, were the Celtae, or the inhabitants of Gallia Celtica. About the year of Rome 160, during the reign of Tarquin the Elder, Ambragatus, King of the Celtae, finding his dominions overflocked with ungovernable subjects, sent away vast numbers of them to seek their fortune under the command of his two nephews, Segovesus and Bellovesus. The former took his way through the Hercynian Forest (of which the present Black Forest was but a small part) and settled in a canton of Germany, ever since called Bohemia, or Boemia, from the word Boii, the greatest part of his followers being of that Celtic nation, which was so named. But these, being afterwards driven thence by the Marcmani or Sclavonians, retired into that country which lies between the Inn and the Iser, and which from them took the name of Bohemia or Barvaria.

Bellovesus was followed by great numbers of almost all the other Celtic nations, as well as of the Boii. He crossed the Rhone, spread his army over Dauphiny and Provence, and at length entered Italy, between the mountains Graevre and Cenis. At this time the Heurians or Tyrrhenians possessed the better part of it. Bellovesus, having defeated them in a battle on the banks of the Ticin, drove them before him, and took possession of their lands, each of the nations which followed him having its distinct portion of the conquered countries. The Taurini, or the inhabitants of the mountains on the side of Gaul, had Piedmont, the capital of which is Turin. Those inhabitants of Provence, who were called Salvies, had Liguria. The Libici, another people of Provence, were placed on the north side of the Po, where Vercil now is. The Insubres or Burgundians settled in the fine country of the Milanese, and there built a town, which they called Mediolanum (Milan) from the name of a little city in the territory of the Auturii, in Burgundy. The Orsbii, who had dwelt on the banks of the river Orbis in the country now called Languedoc, settled in the territory of Bergamo, and built both the city of that name, and Cemo, but retained their old appellation of Orsbii. Bellovesus seems not to have carried his conquests farther than this, nor to have brought into Italy all the nations which had engaged to follow him.

A second irruption into Italy was made by the Cenemani, (or those people of Gallia Celtica who dwelt between the mouths of the Seine and the Loire) under the conduct of one Elitius. He was probably followed likewise by the Bretons of Vannes, and the Carnates. These new adventurers are said to have been tempted to cross the Alps by the wine which Bellovesus sent them. The Gauls were at this time almost perfect strangers to wine; nay, so late as the time of Julian the Apostate, there was none made in France, at least in the neighbourhood of Paris. The Cenemani settled themselves north-east of the Insubres, and possessed the present Brescia, Cremuse, and Mantua, on the north side of the Po. The Veneti, or the Bretons of Vannes, settled more eastward, on the borders of the Adriatick gulph, and the country still retains the name of Venetia, which it received from them. As for the Carnates, they went farther north, and took possession of the territory called from them Carniola.

It is uncertain from what part of Gaul the Levis (or Lavi) and the Ananes (or Anamartes) came, who made the third irruption into Italy; but the historians agree, that the Lavi seized the country of Novara, on the north side the Po; and that the Ananes settled in the neighbourhood of Placenza, on the south side of that river.

The fourth migration of Gauls into Italy was, when the Boii and Lingones passed the Alpes Penninae, or mount St. Godard, and settled on the south side of the Po, between Bologna and Ravenna.

The Heurians, being driven out of their old habitations by these inundations of strangers, passed the Apennines, and retired into that country, which has been ever since called Heururia, or Tuscany. It was divided into twelve Lucumonies, and reached from the Arno to the Tiber; being bounded to the north, by the Apennines; and to the south, by the Tyrrhenian sea. And we are not told, that the Heurians were any more disturbed by the Celtae, from the year of Rome 156 to the year 356.

It was 300 years after the invasion by Bellovesus, that the Senones made the fifth irruption into Italy. C. & R.

Gaul,

A MAP OF GALLIA CISALPINA. LIGURIA AND THE NEIGHBOURING COUNTRIES. By G. Delille Chief Geographer to the French King, and Member of the Royal Academie of Sciences.

Gaul, which lies to the South-East of Paris, and whose capital city was Sens) being hitherto unacquainted with that sort of liquor, he therefore chose to address himself to them, in the hope of gaining them to his purpose, by the means of some excellent wine, which he carried with him. It prevailed against all objections. [O, ye men, how exceeding strong is wine!] A numerous army of these Gauls, guided by the Hetrurian fugitive, passed the Alps, and, without disturbing the Celts, in Italy, fell down upon Umbria, and possessed themselves of all the country, from Ravenna to Picenum, comprehending the present Dutchy of Urbino. They are supposed to have been there about six years, when (in the year of Rome 362) to reward their guide, by revenging his quarrel, they undertook the siege of Clusum.

The Clusians had no alliance with Rome, nor any claim to her friendship, unless it were by their not having armed in defence of their countrymen, the Veientes, when the Romans besieged Veii: Nevertheless they sent ambassadors to crave the aid of the Republick. Succours the Senate did not grant; but commissioned three Patricians, the sons of M. Fabius Ambustus, to go to the camp of the Gauls, and, in the name of the Senate and People of Rome, admonish them to forbear hostilities against the CLUSIANS, from whom they had received NO INJURY. The three brothers having delivered their errand, in a council expressly summoned to give them audience, BRENNUS, the King, (or chief commander) answered, laughing, No injury! Yes indeed, the Clusians have done us a great deal of wrong: For they have more land than they are able to cultivate, and yet have refused to give a part of it to us, who are strangers, and numerous, and very poor. They do us the same wrong that every powerful nation receives from its weaker neighbour, whom it has not yet subdued. The most ancient of all Laws ordains, that the weak should yield to the strong, and the brave be Lords of the world^a.

This haughty answer left the Fabii no hope of effecting an accommodation; and it would seem, that through the excess of their anger they forgot their character of ambassadors. For they soon after put themselves at the head of the Clusians, when these made a sally; and Quintus Fabius had the fortune to kill a General of the enemy, remarkable for his advantageous stature, and gallant appearance. At first, the Gauls mistook the victor for an Hetrurian; but, while he was stripping the vanquished of his armour, BRENNUS perceived, that he was one of the Roman ambassadors, who, violating the Law of Nations, had thus taken part with the besieged. Instantly he ceased the fight, and sounded a retreat from before Clusum: ROME was now his object. Some of his officers would have had him march thither without the least delay. The advice of the elder sort prevailed: BRENNUS, before he set forward, dispatched a herald to demand of the Romans, that, in satisfaction for the injury done by their Ambassa-

^a Plutarch makes Brennus speak, as if he were acquainted with all the petty wars, which Rome had made upon her neighbours, the Albans, the Fidenates, the Ardeates, the Volsci, &c. But Livy represents the Gauls (in their answer to the Ambassadors) as strangers to the Roman name, Et si novum nomen audiant Romanorum, &c. B. 5. c. 36.

Year of dots, these, as the Law of Nations required, should be delivered up to R O M E the Gauls.

ccclxiii.
Bef. J. C.
Three
hundred and thirty-
five.
Thirty-
second
B.C. Tri-
The demand did not appear unreasonable to the Conscrip't Fathers: The Priests especially and the Feciales [the Roman Heralds] declared that it was perfectly just. Nevertheless, as it concerned persons of high birth, and great credit, the Senate would determine nothing; but referred the matter to an Assembly of the People: And so powerful an influence had Fabius Ambustus, the father of the ambassadors, on the multitude, that they not only decreed to send back the herald without the satisfaction required, but chose the delinquents to be three of the six ^a Military Tribunes for the new year.

BRENNUS, on the return and report of his herald, put his army in march with all expedition ^b. Observing that the inhabitants of the villages fled, in a fright, at his approach, he caused it to be proclaimed, wherever he passed, that his arms were bent against the Romans only, and that to Rome he was going.

The Romans (as Livy observes) seem to have been, at this time, infatuated. In their petty wars with the Fiduates, Veientes, and other neighbours, it had been their usual practice, on occasions of extraordinary distress or danger, to create a Dictator; in whose single and absolute authority they always found great advantages, with respect both to the levying soldiers for the war, and to the maintaining discipline in the field; and the person chosen to this high office was ever from among their ablest and most approved Generals: But now, when threatened by a far more dreadful enemy than the most potent of the neighbouring States, they neglected an expedient so successfully tried, and committed the conduct of an army, on which the preservation of Rome depended, to six commanders, equal in authority, most of them young, and of more spirit than capacity.

With a large body of troops, levied in the haste of a general consternation, they marched out, and met the Gauls near the place, where the river Allia falls into the Tiber, about eleven miles from the city. And here they immediately presented battle to the enemy, without having taken any of those previous measures, which were customary, and which prudence and the superstitious prejudices of the soldiers required. No fortified camp behind them, to retreat to in case of a disaster: A total neglect of religion; no sacrifices, no Auspicia, no promise of victory from bird nor beast. Fearing to be surrounded by the Gauls, superior ^c in

^a FABIVS,
CESO FABIVS,
CAIVS FABIVS,

Q. SULPITIUS,
Q. SERVILIUS, a fourth time,
SER. CORNELIVS.

^b Died. Sic. Lib. iv. makes Brennus wait the arrival of a reinforcement from Gaul, before he begins his march; and this delay will give time (which otherwise it will be hard to find) for the solicitations of Fabius the father, and the new Elections.

^c Diodorus Siculus reports (B. 4.) that the Gauls were 70,000 strong. Plutarch says, the Roman army amounted to 40,000 men, and was equal in number to the Gauls.

Livy, Died. Siculus, and Plutarch differ in some circumstances of this action, but agree in the main.

number

number, they thinned their center (weakening it too much) in order to extend their wings and make their line of an equal length with that of the enemy; which, nevertheless, they did not effect. Wherefore, to defend their right flank (for their left was defended by the Tiber) they posted a body of reserve on a small hill, which stood on the right of their Battalia. Brennus, suspecting that these troops were to fall on his flank or rear, during the heat of the engagement, thought it expedient to begin by dislodging them from their post. While this was doing, a pannick seized the main army of the Romans. Intire, unattacked, and without striking a stroke, they turned their backs, and fled; so that not one soldier fell in battle; great numbers in the rout. The troops of the left wing threw themselves into the Tiber, where many were drowned; but the greater part, escaping both that danger and the darts of the pursuers, got safe to Veii; from whence they neither attempted to go home, nor even sent thither any advice of their defeat. The whole right wing made the best of their way to Rome, and, when they had entered the city, without stopping to shut the gates after them, fled for refuge into the citadel.

If the Gauls had closely pursued these terrified legions in their flight, nothing could have hindered the total extinction of the Roman name. But the conquerors, not imagining their victory to be so complete as it was, lost three days in banqueting and dividing the spoil; so that the Romans (who despaired of preserving the city) had time to secure the fortress of the capitol^a. Provisions, arms, every thing necessary for defence, were with the utmost diligence conveyed into it. Thither the strength of the Senate, and all the citizens, able to bear arms, retired; not excluding their wives and children from that asylum. As for the old men, not capable of either serving the publick or shifting for themselves, it was thought the loss of them might be easily borne, seeing they were a generation, that, by the course of nature, must very soon go off the stage. And, in order to induce the multitude of superannuated men of the lower rank to acquiesce the more readily in their being left in the city to the mercy of the Gauls, some ancient Consulars and victorious Generals, who had been honoured with the Triumph, declared publicly, that they would die with them: These bodies, too weak to support the weight of arms, too weak to be employed in the defence of our country, ought not to be a burthen upon those who are armed for its preservation, and who may soon be distressed by a scarcity of provisions: Then, turning to the soldiery, and following them all the way to the citadel, pathetically recommended to their bravery and youthful vigour the defence of what remained of a State, that for more than 360 years had, in all its wars, been victorious. But, when the moment came that these venerable elders and the young men were to take a final leave of each

^a Thus writes Plutarch: Livy tells us, that the Gauls did march to Rome the very day of the victory, and arrived there before sun-set; but, finding the gates open and the walls without soldiers to defend them, astonishment, and the apprehension of some stratagem, to be executed by the Romans in the night, made Brennus incamp at a small distance from the town. Livy, B. 5. c. 39.

Year of other, deep was the distress which that scene exhibited; and it was made
 R O M E consummate by the weeping and lamentations of the women, distractedly cccLXIII. running to and fro, from their husbands to their sons, from their sons to Bef. J. C. their husbands, asking now these, now those, What shall we do? irresolute, Three hundred undetermined which to follow—whose fate to share.

eighty- A great number of the women, however, though not invited, followed nine. their relations into the citadel, no-body opposing it; for, how inconvenient Thirty- soever the admitting them might prove, there was no avoiding that inconsecond venience without being inhuman. The remaining multitude (which con-Mil. Tri. sisted chiefly of the populace) too numerous to be lodged within a fortress that stood on so small a hill, or to be fed there, if it could have contained them, poured forth from the city in a mighty throng, passing over the bridge Sublicius to the Janiculum; from whence they dispersed themselves about the country, having neither leader to conduct them, nor any concerted scheme to follow.

In the mean time, the priest of Romulus and the vestals, after consulting together, agreed to hide, under ground, such of the holy things as they could not carry off; which done, these likewise (bearing, as it is said, the sacred fire, and other important matters) made the best of their way to the Janiculum^a; and from thence they were conducted to Cære in He- truria, where they continued to perform their accustomed religious rites and worship of the Gods.

When the crowd of superannuated patriots had, by their advice and exhortations to the soldiers, done all that was in their power towards the defence of the capitol, they returned to their houses, there to wait, with steady resolution, the coming of the enemy and death. Such of them, as had triumphed for victories, or had been Curule Magistrates, that they might die with the greater dignity, adorned themselves with the insignia of those honours which they had acquired by their virtue. Cloathed in their triumphal robes, or in those of their magistracies, they repaired to the Forum^b, and seating themselves there, in their curule chairs, maintained the same respectable air of greatness, as when in the fulness of their former power.

Some say, that the Pontifex Maximus pronounced over these ancients the form of words prescribed, in cases of self-devotement; which was a high point of religion and virtue among the Romans, they believing that the vo-

^a Livy tells us (B. 5. c. 40.) that one Al- binus, a Plebeian, who was conveying his wife and children in a cart to some place of safety, observing the holy virgins, with their holy burthens, ascending the Janiculum on foot, thought it irreigious to let his family ride while the vestals walked; and therefore, making his people alight, he put the priestesses, and their sacred cargoes, into the cart, and conducted them to Cære.

Here they met with a favourable reception, and because the vestals remained at Cære, and continued to perform the rites of religion there, those rites were thence called Cere- monies from Cære, and Manere to Remain.
Val. Max. B. 5. c. 39.

^b Livy says, that they seated themselves in the porches or halls of their own houses.

luntary sacrifice, which their leaders made of their own lives to the infer- Year of nal Gods, brought confusion and destruction upon the enemy. R O M E.

As the Gauls had met with little resistance from the Romans in the field, CCCLXIII.
Bef. J. C. and were not put to the trouble of an assault to take the city, they entered Three hundred
eighty-nine. it (at the gate Collina) without any thing, in their appearance, of hostile anger, that raging flame kindled by opposition, difficulty, and danger. Moving on, they beheld, with amazement, the streets unpeopled as a Thirty-
second
Mil. Tri. desert; and when they came to the Forum, and cast their eyes all around, they could observe no shew of war but in the citadel alone. What chiefly drew and fixed their attention was the company of venerable victims, who had devoted themselves to death. Their magnificent purple robes, their long white beards, their air of greatness, their silence, stillness, and serenity, all these astonished the Gauls, held them at an awful distance, and inspired them with the same respect which they would have had for so many Gods. It chanced, however, that one of the soldiers (who was, probably, less apt to be religiously affected than his comrades) took the freedom gently to put his hand towards the beard of Manius Papirius, as if he meant to stroke it; a familiarity which so offended the majestick figure, that, with a smart blow of his ivory truncheon, he broke the fellow's head. There needed no more to put an end to all reverence for such a cholerick deity. The Gaul instantly killed Papirius; and as if, by this, he had given the signal for a general massacre, all the rest were now slain, sitting, like him, in state, in their curule chairs. After which, Brennus having properly posted a guard to prevent any attack, from the citadel, upon his men, when divided and dispersed about the city, these betook themselves to plunder and destroy; they spared not a mortal, made no distinction of age or sex; and, when they had rifled the houses, set some of them on fire.

The first day, no great execution was done upon the houses; which makes it doubted, whether the Gauls originally intended to destroy Rome totally, or whether, by letting the Romans see part of the city in flames, they meant to terrify them, and engage them to a surrendry, by the hope of saving the remainder. Be that as it will, the garrison of the capitol were steady in their resolution not to yield; and the Gauls proceeded to lay all Rome level with the ground. Instead of a considerable city, nothing now was to be seen but a few little hills covered with ruins, and a wide waste, in which Brennus incamped his army, investing the ^a citadel. Once he attempted to scale the hill on which that stood; but without success: The Romans met their enemies in the mid-way of the ascent, and, having so great advantage of the ground, easily repulsed them; and the Gauls became sensible that they could never, by assault, possess themselves of the

^a Livy (B. 5. c. 46.) relates that one Fabius Dorso, being obliged on a certain day to perform a sacrifice to the tutelar Gods of his family, and the hill Quirinalis being the only place where this sacrifice could regularly be performed, when the day came, he dressed himself like a sacrificer, came out of the Capitol, carrying his Gods with him; and that the Gauls, out of a regard to religion, suffered him to pass to the place appointed, and to return in safety to the Citadel, after he had offered his sacrifice.

Year of place. It was determined therefore, that one part of the army should R O M E blockade it, while the other made incursions into the adjacent countries ccclxiii. for provisions.

Bef. J. C.

Three

hundred

eighty-

nine.

Thirty-

second

Mill. Tri.

§. IV. FORTUNE conducted these foragers to the neighbourhood of Ardea, whither CAMILLUS, in his exile, had retired. This great man, less afflicted for his own misfortunes, than for the calamities of his country, and watchful to seize every opportunity of serving her, received intelligence, that the Gauls, secure in the terror of their arms, preserved no order nor discipline in their marches: That they spent whole days in drinking: And that neither officer nor soldier dreamt of other enemies, beside those who were blocked up in the capitol. Thus furnished with arguments he addressed himself to the magistrates, and obtained their permission to lead out, against the common enemy, the youth of the city. These were very willing to follow him. He chose the dead of night for his expedition, and, surprising the Gauls, unarmed and asleep, made a dreadful slaughter of them; and those that escaped under shelter of the night fell next day into the hands of the peasants, who gave them no quarter.

The news of this action was quickly spread far and wide. It gave fresh courage to the Romans, who had taken refuge in Veii. These formed a pretty strong body: They had just cut off two parties of Hebrurian pillagers; and their strength was now increased by the coming of those soldiers who, after the defeat at the river Allia, had dispersed themselves about the country.

All in general looked upon Camillus as their last resource, and earnestly wished to have him for their leader: "He is no longer an exile. Rome is no more, we have now no country. Why must the Ardeates, who are strangers, acquire glory under the conduct of Camillus, while we, once his fellow-citizens, lie idle and see our country possessed by the Gauls?" They presently sent deputies with an humble request to him to be their commander.

Camillus would not take the command of the Romans upon him, without the approbation, first obtained, of the Senate in the Capitol. To learn the Senate's pleasure was very difficult, the place being invested by the enemy. Nevertheless a young man, named Pontius Cominius, undertook it. He put on a light habit, provided himself with cork, and in the beginning of the night threw himself into the Tiber above Rome. The stream carried him undiscovered to the foot of the capitoline hill; and at a very steep place, where the Gauls had placed no centinels, he mounted with difficulty to the Citadel. Having made himself known to the guard, he was straight admitted into the place and conducted to the Magistrates. These, without delay, assembled the Senate: The deputy gave them an account of Camillus's victory, and, in the name of all the Romans at Veii, requested, that they might have him for their General. Not much time was spent in debates: the Senate decreed, that Camillus should, by an act of the People, assembled by Curiaë, be recalled from banishment, and, by the authority of the people, be immediately appointed Dictator, Pontius, with the same good fortune that had attended him in going to the capitol, got back to Veii, bearing this decree; and the Romans in Comitia Curiata joyfully made a LAW conformable to it.

* Livy makes the People themselves have this scruple: Consensu omnium placuit, ab Ardea Camillum acciri; sed antea consulto senatu, qui Romæ esset, adeo regebat omnia pudor, discriminaque rerum prope perditis rebus servabant. B. 5. c. 46.

THUS was Camillus from the state of banishment raised at once to be the sovereign Magistrate of his country. On notice of the honour done him he repaired to Veii, and there quickly saw himself at the head of above forty thousand men, Romans and allies.

§. V. WHILE he was preparing to march against the enemy, the Capitol had like to have been taken by surprise. Some Gallick soldiers having spied on the side of the hill the prints of Pontius's hands and feet, made their report of it to Brennus; who immediately conceived a hope of scaling the hill by the same way that the Roman had ascended. For the execution of his design, he chose out of his army such soldiers as had dwelt in mountainous countries, and been accustomed from their early youth to climb precipices. These, under cover of the night, climbed up from rock to rock, and with much difficulty, and more danger, advanced by degrees, lending each other a hand, 'till they arrived at the foot of the wall.

They had got up so silently as not to be discovered by either man or dog: But they could not escape the vigilance of some geese, which, being consecrated to Juno, had, notwithstanding the scarcity of provisions, been preserved alive. These creatures, naturally quick of hearing, and now more ^a wakeful than ordinary through hunger (having been kept at short allowance) were alarmed at the first approach of the Gauls; so that, running up and down, they with their cackling and the beating of their wings, awaked the soldiers that lay near. M. Manlius, a Consular person, was the first who starting up ran to defend the wall. Of two Gauls, whom he found on the top of it, he slashed off the hand of one, while aiming a blow at his head; and, almost at the same instant, with his buckler so strongly pushed back the other, that he fell from the rampart, and in his fall overthrew all those who were behind him. And now, some of the garrison coming to the aid of Manlius, he easily repelled the rest of the assailants, and drove them headlong down the precipice.

The besieged, after their escape, passed the remainder of the night in as much tranquillity as men could do, whose minds had been alarmed and agitated by so great a danger. In the morning, at day-break, the Military Tribunes, by sound of trumpet, called the soldiers together in order to dispense rewards and punishments. First of all Manlius was praised for his gallant behaviour, and had presents, not only from the magistrates, but from all the soldiers; each of whom carried to his house, which stood in the citadel, half a pound of meal, and a small measure of wine, which ^a The learned and judicious monsieur Dacier is much discontented with this philosophical conceit of Plutarch's, and is of opinion, that a goose, how well soever fed, will always be very wakeful.

Year of he spared out of his own allowance: A reward ^b considerable only as it
 R O M E was a proof, in the present scarcity of provisions, of the real affection of CCCCLXIII the givers.

Bel. J. C.

Three
 hundred eighty-nine.

Thirty-
 second
 Mil. Tri.

After this, the centinels, through whose neglect of duty the Gauls had been able to mount, undiscovered, to the rampart of the citadel, were cited to appear. The Military Tribune, Sulpitius, declared that he would punish them all, according to the laws of war: but finding that the soldiers disapproved of this measure, and unanimously and loudly concurred in laying all the blame on one centinel, he thought it not safe to meddle with the rest. The man, universally condemned, was thrown headlong from the rock.

But now famine began to oppress both parties equally. Camillus, since his nomination to the Dictatorship, had possessed himself of all the roads. The Gauls durst not stir out to forage; so that the besiegers were themselves besieged, and suffered the same inconveniences that they made the Romans undergo. A contagious distemper also prevailed in the army of the Gauls, occasioned by the great heats to which they were not accustomed.

• About 45,000 l.
 sterling

|| Vaz vic-
 tis.

§. VI. AT length the distress on both sides occasioned a truce and a parley. Brennus having intimated, that he would raise the siege (which had now lasted seven months) on the Romans paying an inconsiderable ransom; and the soldiers in the capitol having signified to their commanders, that they could no longer support the fatigue of continual watching and the misery of famine^c, and must therefore either surrender or redeem themselves; the Senate commissioned Sulpitius to treat with the enemy. A thousand pound weight ^{*} of gold was the ransom agreed upon; the price of a people who were one day to be lords of the world. The Gauls brought false weights; to which, when Sulpitius objected to them, the King, insultingly added his sword, which he threw into the scale, giving no other reason, but Wo to the vanquished! || The Romans not being in a condition to resent this affront, and wisely considering, that the chief indignity they suffered was not in paying more than they had agreed to, but in paying any thing, were just on the point of finishing the affair, when

^b The Romans extended their rewards and punishments even to the geese and dogs. The former were ever after held in honour at Rome, and a flock of them was always kept at the publick expence. A golden image of a goose was set up in memory of their service; and a goose was every year carried in triumph on a soft litter nicely adorned; whilst those dumb guards the dogs were held in abhorrence by the Romans, who every year impaled one of them alive on a branch of elder. Plin. & Plut. at fest. Rom. C. & R.

^c LaBartius (B. 20.) tells us a strange story of the Romans being admonished and directed in a dream, by Jupiter, tutelary god of the capitol, to make all the corn they had into bread, and throw it into Brennus's camp, not reserving the least morsel of it for their necessities: And that the Gauls being hereby deceived, and despairing to reduce the Romans by famine, raised the siege. In memory of the God's favour, the Romans erected an altar to him, under the name of Jupiter Pistor, Jupiter the Baker. Ovid seems to countenance this story, Fast. B. 6.

Posse fame vinci spes excidit, hoste repulso, Discam Pistoris quid velit ara Jovis.

Both Livy and Florus mention the throwing of loaves of bread from the capitol, in order to deceive; but they both ascribe the driving away of the Gauls to Camillus. C. & R.

on on a sudden appeared Camillus with his forces at the place of conference. [How he made his way thither unperceived, it is hard to guess.] Instantly he commanded the gold to be taken away, and the Gauls to depart: 'Tis with iron, not with gold, that the Romans are wont to defend their country. In vain did Brennus represent to him, that he contravened a treaty, actually concluded. Camillus replied, that, he being Dictator, no treaty made without his approbation could be valid; and he warned the King to prepare for battle. The Gauls were now routed with as much ease as they had defeated the Romans at the river Allia; and Camillus the next morning in a second engagement with them on the Gabinian way, eight miles from Rome, so totally vanquished and destroyed them, that not a man was left to carry home the news of their disaster. The Dictator returned in triumph to the city, and the soldiers in their songs stiled him ROMULUS FATHER OF HIS COUNTRY, AND SECOND FOUNDER OF ROME.

Year of
R O M E
CCCLXIII.
Bef. J. C.
Three
hundred eighty-
nine.
Thirty-
second
Mil. Tri.

§. VII. CAMILLUS, who had thus ^a saved his country in war, may be said to have preserved it a second time, when in peace, by hindering the people from removing to Veii; a project which was now renewed with more warmth than ever.

The houses of Rome being all demolished, and the walls razed, a heartless despondency seized the multitude; they were extremely backward to set about rebuilding; and the rather, as Veii offered them a place fortified by art and nature, good houses ready built, a wholesome air, and a fruitful territory. They said, "they were but just escaped, as it were, quite " naked from shipwreck, exhausted by misfortunes, without strength and " without materials for rebuilding a whole city, of which nothing was left
" but the ruins." Nor did there want declaimers to throw out hard words against Camillus, as if from vain-glory and the ambition of being esteemed

^a That Camillus thus saved his country, as Livy and Plutarch report, is undoubtedly fabulous; though neither M. Vertot nor the Jesuits take notice of any objection there is against giving credit to the story. M. Rollin indeed observes (Hist. Rom. Tom. 2. p. 384.) that Polybius (B. 2. c. 18.) silent concerning the double defeat of the Gauls by Camillus, imputes their retreat from Rome to their being called home to defend their own country against the Veneti who had invaded it: Yet M. Rollin seems to think that the other account may nevertheless be true, for he adds, "It ought " to be remarked, that Polybius does not " enter into the particulars of this Grande
" Action, but confines himself to the giving a " general idea of it." But Polybius, in the passage referred to, tells us, that the Gauls did return home, and had afterwards quarrels among themselves; consequently they were not put to the sword by Camillus. And the same historian (B. 1. c. 6.) asserts, that the Romans [in the capitol] made a convention with the Gauls, upon the terms which the latter thought fit to prescribe. And in B. 2. c. 22. he represents some Gallick Ambassadors encouraging two Kings of the Gesatae to join the Gauls in a war against Rome, by this consideration, That the Gauls had formerly vanquished the Romans in battle, taken their city, held it seven months, and then restored it to them voluntarily, and out of mere generosity, [ἐθελοντὶ καὶ μετὰ χάριτος] returning safe home enriched with spoil.

The pretended generosity of the Gauls is a flourish of the Ambassadors, who are introduced speaking; but the other facts agree with what is said by Polybius himself, in the before cited passages; so that it is evident, this unbiassed historian did not believe one word of Camillus's marvellous exploits against Brennus. See likewise Sueton. Vit. Tib. c. 3. Justin. L. 38. c. 4. Diod. Sic. L. 4.

Year of a second Romulus, a new founder of Rome, he opposed a design of such great R O M E and general advantage.

ccclxiii. On the other hand, the Senate, resolutely determined against removing to Bef. J. C. Vei, would not suffer Camillus to quit the Dictatorship, after his tri-Three umph, and the expiration of his six months. They earnestly intreated him hundred umph, and the expiration of his six months. They earnestly intreated him eighty- not to leave the commonwealth in an unsettled state. The Dictator com-nine. plied with the desire of the Fathers. And now, as he was ever most egre-

Thirty- giously devout, the first business to which he gave his attention was what second concerned the worship of the Gods. He obtained a decree of the Senate, Mil. Tri. "For purifying all those temples and sanctuaries which had been proph-

"ned by being in the enemy's possession; and for consulting the Duum-
 "virs, who had the care of the Sibylline books, about the proper manner "of purification.

"For making a league of hospitality with the Carites, who had so kindly "entertained the Roman priests and the vestals:

"For celebrating the Capitoline games in honour of Jupiter, who had "defended the place of his residence, and the citadel of Rome; and for "impowering the Dictator to constitute a college of persons, chosen from "among the inhabitants of the Capitol and citadel, to superintend that "affair."

Mention too was made of expiations for having neglected the miraculous voice (heard in the night) which gave warning of the approach of the Gauls; and a temple ordered to be erected to the kind monitor (whoever he was, under the name of Aius Locutius.

It was likewise decreed, that the gold which had been rescued out of the hands of the Gauls, and what other gold had in the midst of danger and confusion been taken out of various sanctuaries and brought into that of Jupiter, should, inasmuch as it could not be distinctly remembered from whence and from whom the several parts of the treasure came, be all deemed sacred, and deposited under the pedestal of Jupiter's statue.

All these pious regulations did not divert the Tribunes of the Commons from continually exhorting the multitude to leave Rome, that was nothing but a heap of ruins, and remove to the fair city of Vei. Camillus therefore, attended by the whole senate, repaired to the forum, and made a most elaborate ^a speech to the people there assembled. His chief arguments were addressed to their superstition: Could they find in their hearts to forsake Ju- piter, Vesta, Mars, and Father Romulus? [as if Jupiter and Vesta and

^a Camillus, in this speech, insists much on the constant experience which the Romans had of prosperous or adverse fortune, according to their observance, or neglect of religious duties. And he mentions some rites of religion, the performance of which was confined to certain places in Rome, and could not be transferred elsewhere. This may have been true of some rites. But when our historian makes Camillus ask—Where can the COMITIA CURIATA, for military affairs, be AUSPICIOUSLY held but in the usual place? Shall we transfer them to VEII? he seems to have forgot, that, by his own account, CAMILLUS had been recalled from banishment, and appointed to the dignity he then held, by the people in Comitia Curiata, held at VEII: and this in conformity to a decree of the Senate. Liv. B. 5. c. 46.

Mars and Romulus, if spoken civilly to, would not have removed from Rome to Veii, as readily, and in as good humour, as Juno came from Veii to Rome.] It is said, that his discourse made a considerable impression on the multitude; but that what determined them absolutely not to remove was a chance word seasonably spoken. For shortly after, the Senate being assembled, in the Curia Hostilia, to deliberate on this important affair, just as L. Lucretius (the first called upon, to give his opinion) was going to speak, a Centurion, who (as Plutarch relates it) came with his company to relieve the guard, was distinctly heard to say, Ensign, plant your colours, THIS IS THE BEST PLACE TO STAY IN *. Instantly Lucretius and all the Senators ran out of the Temple, crying aloud, A happy Omen! the Gods have spoken, and we obey. The multitude universally approved the notion ^b: All doubt was now at an end: No more any mention of Veii: ROME for ever!

An Inter-regnum followed the Dictatorship of Camillus: For the Romans would not suffer the Military Tribunes, during whose magistracy the city had been taken, to hold the Comitia for electing new Magistrates. And no sooner was Q. Fabius out of office, than C. Marcius, one of the Tribunes of the Commons, summoned him to appear for his conduct (of which the consequence had been so fatal) when ambassador to the Gauls. Sudden death, supposed to be voluntary, freed him from this prosecution.

Camillus and P. Cornelius Scipio performed the office of Inter-rex, by turns, for a few days. It fell to the former to preside at the election of Military Tribunes.

§. VIII. THE six new Magistrates were L. Valerius Poplicola, L. Virginius Tricostus, P. Cornelius Cossus, A. Manlius Capitolinus, L. Aemilius Mamercinus, and L. Posthumus Albinus. Their first care (after consulting the Senate) was to collect the treaties with foreign States, and what remains could be found of the laws of the Kings, and of the twelve tables, which had been written on brass, and fixed up in the Forum. Some of these were communicated to the Publick; but of such as related to religious worship, the Pontifices made themselves the depositaries, that they might likewise be the interpreters of them, and occasionally make them serve as a means to keep the populace in reverence and subjection. In making a list of lucky and unlucky days, the fifteenth of the Calends of August, (i. e. the eighteenth of July) was particularly marked among the latter,

* M. Dacier, on this occasion, observes, that Cicero held it to be direct Atheism to despise or laugh at such omens. Cic. de Divin. lib. 1.

^b What the Centurion said, if really spoken by chance, or believed so to be, furnished a reason of the same kind with some of those which Camillus had employed in the long harangue, given him by Livy; and was as good a reason as any of his, for not removing from Rome.

^c By this passage of Livy it would seem, that the same Military Tribunes who commanded the army against the Gauls at the battle of the Allia, were still in office, when Camillus laid down the Dictatorship; and if so, either they must have held their Magistracy two years, or Camillus cannot have held the Dictatorship so long as he is represented by the Capitoline Marbles to have done; i. e. part of the year 363, and all 364.

Year of as memorable for two unfortunate battles; that in which the 300 Fabii
 ROME were slain near the Cremera, and that wherein the Romans were defeated by CCCLXV. the Gauls upon the banks of the Allia; no sacrifices were to be offered, Bef. J. C. no business done in the courts of justice, no new expedition begun on this Three hundred day; and so of several others.

eighty- And now the care of all was the rebuilding * of the city. The State seven. furnished tiles, and the People were allowed to take stone and other ma-Thirty- terials wherever they could find them, giving security to finish their houses third within the year. The hurry in which they went to work made them heed-
 Mil. Tri. less whether the ground they built on was their own or their neighbours;
 Livy, B. 6. each raised his house where he found an empty space, so that the common sewers, which before ran under the streets, ran now under the houses.
 And so little taste had they for order and beauty, that the city, when rebuilt, was even less regular than in the time of Romulus: And though in Augustus's time, when Rome was become the capital of the world, the temples, palaces, and private houses, were more magnificent than before, yet these decorations could not rectify the fault of the plan.

* Plutarch (in Camilla, p. 145.) tells us, that among the ruins of the city, and under a heap of ashes, was found Romulus's augural staff unburnt: And that this was looked upon to portend the everlasting preservation and prosperity of the Roman State.

THE Roman History.

T H I R D B O O K.

From the Year of ROME 365, when the CITY was REBUILT, after the burning of it by the GAULS, to the Year 489, when the ROMANS, having subdued ALL ITALY, began the first PUNIC or CARTHAGINIAN WAR.

C H A P. I.

§. I. The Hettrurians, Æqui, Volsci, Latines, and Hernici, all the nations bordering upon the Roman State, combine to take advantage of his weak condition. CAMILLUS, appointed now the third time to the Dictatorship, raises a numerous army, which he divides in several bodies for different services. He marches in person, with one part of the troops, against the Volsci, forces their camp, and subdues that People: After which he takes the capital city of the Æqui, and recovers Sutrium from the Hettrurians. §. II. The next year (when the Commonwealth is again governed by Military Tribunes) the Roman arms prosper abroad. The year following is a year of peace. Four new Tribes are added to the twenty-one. §. III. The expectation of a new war makes the Romans chuse Camillus to be one of the six Military Tribunes for the next year. He leads the Roman troops first against the Volsci of Antium, and then against the Hettrurians; and has success in both expeditions. The Latines and Hernici submit.

§. I. ROME, arising as it were out of her own ashes, appeared once more a city. But scarce did her citizens begin to take breath, when new wars called them again into the field. The Hettrurians, the Æqui, and the Volsci, all near neighbours of Rome, and of course her enemies, made a league to oppress her before she had recovered her strength. Nay, the Latines and Hernici, who had long been allies of the Roman People, engaged in this design. The

Year of
R O M E
CCCLXV.
Bef. J. C.
Three
hundred eighty-
seven.
Thirty-
third
Mil. Tri.
Livy, B.
6. c. 2.

Year of Romans seem to have lost their empire when the seat of it was destroyed, and to have had most of the same conquests to repeat, as after the expulsion of Tarquin the Proud, and the first establishment of the Commonwealth.

In this distressful situation the Republick had recourse to a General, always superior to dangers and difficulties. Camillus was a third time named Dictator. Immediately he summoned the citizens to take arms, without excepting even the old men. He divided the new levies into three bodies, caused one of them to incamp under the walls of Rome, appointing M. Marcius to command it: The second he ordered into the neighbourhood of Veii, under the conduct of L. Æmilius, to watch the motions of the Ætrurians: And he led the third himself against the Volsci. His very name, and the report of his march, filled the enemy with terror; they now thought no more of conquest; their whole study was how to avoid being conquered; they shut themselves up in their camp, which they fortified with a strong palisade of stakes, and a barricade of trees. Camillus, having observed the nature of their fortification, caused his soldiers to throw fire in great quantity against it. The fire, made fiercer by a brisk wind, that chanced to rise, and blow the flame and smoke full upon the camp, presently destroyed the wooden fence, and put the soldiers into such a consternation, that they rushed out in crowds, and fell into the hands of the Romans, who made a terrible slaughter of them. Camillus then sent to extinguish the flames, in order to save the booty, with which (as he had taken the camp by assault) he rewarded his army; a bounty so much the more agreeable, because unexpected from the Dictator, who had never been known to be over liberal on these occasions. Pursuing the routed enemy in their flight, he ravaged the whole country of the Volsci, and at length intirely subdued that untractable People, after they had harrassed the Republick with continual hostilities for more than 107^a years. From the Volsci he next turned his forces against the Æqui, and by assault made himself master, not only of their camp, but of their principal city, Bolsa. In the mean time almost all Ætruria had taken arms, and was now engaged in the siege of Sutrium, a town in alliance with Rome. Camillus, by order of the Senate, marched to its relief. The place had capitulated before he came, and the inhabitants had obtained nothing but their lives and the cloaths on their backs. In this destitute condition they were going to seek new habitations, when Camillus met them, bad the women dry up their tears, and promised to transfer their sorrows to the enemy. His promise he performed: For the Ætrurians, secure after their victory, and wholly employed in plundering, had left the gates of Sutrium open, and without guards. He came upon them by surprise, slew many, and made

I. iv. B.
L. c. 3.
Hist. 13.

^a So the critics say we should read, instead of 70, as it is in Livy, there being from the year 258, when the war was renewed against the Æqui, in the Consulate of Sp. Claudius and P. Servilius to this time 107 years. We find that Tarquin the Proud made war with the Volsci. And we shall find presently, that all the Volsci were not now subdued.

an incredible number prisoners. The *Sutrin*i, before night, found themselves again in possession of their city, which had been thus twice taken in one day.

This expedition ended, the great Camillus, victorious in three wars, in one and the same year, entered Rome triumphant.

With part of the money raised by selling the Hebrurian captives (after they had been led before his chariot) the Roman Ladies were paid the value of the jewels they had formerly lent to the State: And with the remainder the Senate bought three vases of gold, which, with Camillus's name inscribed on them, they placed at the feet of Juno in the temple of Jupiter.

§. II. UNDER the six ^a new Military Tribunes of the following year affairs prospered abroad: They ravaged the country of the Æqui, and took two cities, Cortuosa and Contenebra, from the Hebrurians.

The Romans being at this time in a humour for building, the capitol was now rebuilt (or repaired) with square stone, and with so happy an execution, as to be thought worthy of admiration, even in the reign of Augustus.

While the People were busied in this sort of works publick and private, the Tribunes of the Commons endeavoured to revive the old quarrel about the division of the conquered lands, on occasion of the Pemptin territory, for which the Romans and Volsci had long struggled, and which, after the Republick had got possession of it, the Patricians had appropriated to themselves. But the time was ill chosen for making a bustle about this affair, because the minds of the Commons were so intent on building that they did not much frequent the Forum; and, besides, they were almost quite drained of their money, and had not enough left for the expence of cultivating new farms, and stocking them with cattle. They took little notice therefore of the harangues of their Tribunes. The Military Tribunes for this year, upon some scruple concerning the validity of their election, voluntarily laid down their offices, and, after a short Inter-regnum, six ^b new ones were chosen; whose year, being a year of peace, was spent in works of peace. To the twenty-one tribes were added four new ones, Stellatina, Tromentina, Sabatina, and Arniensis.

§. III. THE expectation of a war induced the centuries to chuse ^{*} Camillus to be one of the Military Tribunes for the next year. They gave him, for his Colleagues, † Ser. Cornelius, † Q. Servilius, † L. Quinctius, † L. Horatius, and † P. Valerius, all men of moderation, who knew how to do themselves and Camillus justice. In full Senate they transferred their authority into his hands, and left to him the sole management of the war, so that he was in effect Dictator. The Republick had designed to turn her arms

^a T. QUINCTIUS,
L. SERVILIUS, a fifth time.
L. JULIUS,
L. AQUILIUS,
L. LUCRETIVS,
SER. SULPICIVS,

^b L. PAPIRIUS.
C. SERGIUS,
L. ÆMILIUS, a second time,
L. MENENIUS,
L. VALERIUS, a third time,
C. CORNELIUS.

against

Year of
R O M E
ccclxv.
Bef. J. C.
Three
hundred eighty-seven.

Thirty-
third
Mil. Tri.
Livy, B.
6. c. 4.

Year of
R O M E
ccclxvi.
Bef. J. C.
Three
hundred eighty-six.

Thirty-
fourth
Mil. Tri.
Livy, B.
6. c. 5.

Year of
R O M E
ccclxvii
Bef. J. C.
Three
hundred eighty-five.

Thirty-
fifth
Mil. Tri.

Year of
R O M E
ccclxviii.
Bef. J. C.
Three
hundred eighty-
four.

Thirty-
sixth
Mil. Tri.
^{*} A 4th
time.
† A 2d
time.
† A 6th
time.
Livy, B.
6. c. 6.

Year of against the Hetrurians; but this design was altered upon the news, that the R O M E Antiates * had entered the Pomptin territory in arms, and obliged the Rocccxlviii. mans, who had taken possession of it, to quit it. Camillus allotted to Bef. J. C. each of his Collegues an employment suitable to his rank, and joined Three hundred Valerius with himself in the command of the army which was to march eighty-four against the Antiates; but Valerius refused to be upon an equal foot with ————— Camillus, No, (said he) you shall be my Dictator, and I will serve under you as Thirty-six your General of the Horse. The Latines and Hernici had joined the Anti-
 Mil. Tri. ates near Satricum: So that the Roman soldiers, when they came within
 * i. e. The sight of the enemy, were terrified at their numbers, which Camillus under-Volsci of standing, mounted his horse, rode through the ranks, put his men in mind, Antium. that these were the same Latines and Volsci whom they had so often van-Liv. B. 6. quished, and that he was the same Camillus who had led them so often to
 c. 7. victory. He then dismounted, took the next standard-bearer by the hand,
 c. 8. and led him towards the enemy, crying out at the same time, Soldiers advance. A battle ensued, in which the enemy were intirely overthrown. The Latines and Hernici separated from the Volsci, and returned home. The Volsci fled for refuge to Satricum: Camillus came before it, and carried it by assault. He then left his army under the command of
 c. 9. Valerius, and returned to Rome, to solicit the Senate's consent, and get things necessary for undertaking the siege of Antium. While he was proposing this affair to the Conscript Fathers, Deputies arrive from Nepete and Sutrium (cities in alliance with Rome, and that were, in a manner, its bulwark, as well as the keys of Hetruria) demanding succours against the Hetrurians. The Senate ordered Camillus to their relief, and assigned him those troops which Servilius had commanded in Rome, and kept in readiness in case of an exigence. He marched, came before Sutrium, found it almost taken, and preserved it. Nepete had surrendered voluntarily to the Hetrurians, the greater part of the inhabitants being better affected to them than to the Romans. The recovery of this place seemed therefore a work of greater difficulty. However, he took it at the first assault, and, having put the garrison to the sword, condemned the Authors of the revolt to die by the axes of the Lictors.

Camillus, before the end of this year, called the Latines and Hernici to account for their late conduct. The Magistrates of those nations alledged, that the reason of their not aiding the Romans was the necessity they had been under to keep their troops at home to defend their own country; and that, as to the assistance which some of their People had given to the enemies of Rome, they had done it without authority, and had been punished for their fault; not one of them having returned safe home. These excuses were not satisfactory, but the Senate readily admitted them, being unwilling at this juncture to multiply the enemies of the Commonwealth.

C H A P. II.

§. I. M. Manlius (who saved the Capitol) uses such Methods to make himself popular, as alarm the Senate. They name a Dictator, who commits him to prison, and presently after resigns his office. The Senate, fearing the rage of the People who are devoted to Manlius, set him at liberty. §. II. Camillus is chosen one of the Military Tribunes for the next year. Two of the Tribunes of the Commons impeach Manlius of treason, and, by sentence of the People, he is thrown headlong from the Tarpeian rock.

§. I. IN the following Magistracy of six ^a Military Tribunes, a dangerous war abroad, and a more dangerous sedition at home, distressed the Republick. The Volsci, joined by the Latines and Hernici, who had revolted from Rome, commenced the war: the sedition had for its author a Roman of high birth, consummate bravery, and illustrious fame. Marcus Manlius (who saved the Capitol) though he had pride enough to despise all the other great men of Rome, yet envied one: He could not bear to see Camillus so distinguished, as if he alone were fit for the Supreme Magistracy and the command of the army: This exalted man looks down upon his Colleagues, as his ministers, forgetting that he and they were elected under the same auspices. What ground for all this arrogance? Could he have recovered Rome, if I had not first saved the Capitol? He came by surprise upon the Gauls, when employed in receiving the gold, and secure in the treaty of peace; I had to do with men armed, and just upon the point of taking the Citadel: Every soldier of his army had a share in the glory of his exploit; but I had no companion in my victory.

It is said, that Manlius by such speeches gave vent to his envy; and that, not finding his merit prized by the Nobles suitable to his own idea of it, he forsook that party, concerted measures with the Tribunes of the Commons, and set himself to court the multitude. Not content with renewing the proposal for distributing the conquered lands, he made himself the advocate and protector of such Plebeians as were oppressed with debt. Nothing could be more popular at this time than a warm concern expressed for insolvent debtors; because most of the lower People had been forced to borrow money, to rebuild their houses. The Senate, alarmed at the proceedings of Manlius, thought it necessary to create a Dictator, who, by his absolute power, might be able to crush the rising faction; and the war with the Volsci (now strengthened by the Latines and Hernici) furnished a plausible pretence for this creation. The Dictatorship was given to A. Cornelius Cossus, who named T. Quinctius Capitalinus to be General of the Horse.

^a A. MANLIUS, a second time,
P. CORNELIUS, a second time,
T. QUINCTIUS,

L. QUINCTIUS,
L. PAPIRIUS, a second time,
C. SERGIUS, a second time.

these are the pure effects of Marcus Manlius's bounty. From him I have received all the benefits that a son can receive from a parent; and to him therefore I devote my body, my life, all that remains unspilt of my blood. Whatever ties I have to my country, to the Gods of my country, to my household-gods, those same ties fasten me inevitably to that one man. Both the nobleness of the act, and the effusion of praise and gratitude from the person obliged, made so strong an impression on the multitude, that they were already disposed to attach themselves, like the Centurion, to that one man, when he did another thing, which was still better imagined, to turn their heads quite, and to throw all things into confusion. Having, in the territory of Veii, a farm, the chief part of his estate, he caused the publick cryer to notify the sale of it.—No, Romans, whilst I have any thing left, I will never suffer, that any one of you be cast into the prison of his creditor. Nor did he stop here in his endeavours to make himself popular, and to alienate intirely the hearts of the commons from the Senate. In assemblies which he held in his own house (in the citadel) he confidently gave out, that the Senators, not content with being the sole possessors of those lands, which ought to have been divided equally among all the citizens, had concealed, with an intent to appropriate it to their own use, the gold which was to have been given to the Gauls, and which had been raised by the voluntary contributions of all the citizens who were then in the Capitol; a treasure which alone would be sufficient to discharge all the debts of the poor Plebeians. And he promised to shew them in due time, where this treasure was hid. So pleasing a prospect, as that of every man's having his debts discharged, took up all the attention of the People; their whole care was to draw those riches out of the hands of the Patricians.

Things were in this situation when the Dictator returned to the city. Having agreed with the Senate upon the measures to be taken, he went to the Forum, accompanied by the Fathers, and a great number of other Patricians, ascended his tribunal, and sent a Lictor to cite Manlius to appear before him. Manlius did not disobey the summons, but, making all his adherents follow him, he approached the Tribunal with so numerous a guard, that the Assembly looked like two armies ready to join battle. Silence being made, the Dictator spoke thus: “I heartily wish, Manlius, that I and the Senate could in every thing agree with the Commons of Rome, as readily as I trust we shall do in what concerns you, and the matter I am going to question you upon. You have been heard to say, that some of the principal Senators have secreted the gold that was designed for the Gauls, and that this fund alone would be sufficient to discharge all the debts. I am so far from desiring to hinder such an extraordinary benefit to the Commons, that I exhort you earnestly to ease them of that burthen of usury they labour under, and to name the men who “——addita alia commotionis ad omnia quem vestrum, inquit, Quirites, donec quieturbanda consilii res. Fundum in Veienti, quam in re mea supererit, judicatum, ad caput Patrimonii, subjecit praconi: ne dictumque duci patiar. c. 14.

Year of. " have stolen and concealed this important treasure. But, if you do not in-R O M E " stantly name those robbers of the publick, be assured that I shall without ccclxix. " delay send you to prison, as an incendiary and a slanderer ; for I will Bef. J. C. " not suffer you any longer to deceive the People with vain hopes"
 Three " Manlius answered, " I find I was not mistaken in my opinion, that hundred " the Dictator was created, not to act against the Volsci, but against me, eighty- " and the Commons of Rome. He openly espouses the cause of the Usuthree. " rers, and I am to be destroyed on account of the affection which the Thirty- " people bear me. Does it indeed offend you, Cornelius, and you, Con- fiverth " script Fathers, to see the crouds that attend me ? Why do not you en-Mil. Tri. " deavour to share their affection with me ? Why do not you relieve the " poor citizens, who are quite sunk and overwhelmed with debt ? Pay " for some, answer for others, supply their necessities out of your su-
 " perfluities : Nay, without bestowing any thing upon them of what you " possess, do but deduct from the principal sums what you have re" ceived for interest. You will then see, that my train of followers will " be no greater than any of yours.—But why is Manlius (say you)
 " the only man who thus concerns himself for the citizens ? You may " ask me too, why I was the only man who saved the Capitol ? As I
 " then exerted myself for all in general, so now I am ready to give my " help to every Roman in particular. As to the secreted treasure, you " put a question to me which you can better answer yourselves. The " very demand makes that difficult, which would otherwise have " been easy. The more you press me to declare the place where the " gold is hoarded, the more reason I have to believe that you have re" moved it, and hid it beyond the reach of the most curious inquiry.
 " Am I to reveal where your thefts are concealed ? or ought not you " rather to be compelled to bring them forth ?" At these words the Livy B.6. Dictator commanded him to give over his evasions and subterfuges, and
 c. 16. go directly to the proof of his charge, or else to confess before all the People, that he had slandered the Senate. To this Manlius replying, That he would not speak at the pleasure of his enemies, he was immediately ordered to prison. When the Lictors laid hold of him, he cried out, O Jupiter, most beneficent, most mighty ; O Juno, Queen of Heaven ; O Minerva, and all ye other Gods and Goddesses who reside in the Capitol : will ye suffer your Champion and Defender to be thus treated by his enemies ? Shall this right hand, with which I drove the Gauls from your sanctuaries, be manacled and locked in chains ?

We have on this occasion a surprising instance of the ready submission of the Romans to the commands of a lawful Magistrate. The People, though seditiously devoted to Manlius, made not the least motion to hinder the execution of the sentence ; not an angry expression was heard, nor a threatening look seen in the whole Assembly. His adherents and abettors expressed their concern only by habits of mourning, neglecting to cut their hair and beards, crouding about the prison-door, and there lamenting his misfortune.

In.

In this time of the People's affliction Cornelius Cossus had a triumph for Year of his victory over the Volsci. The multitude expressed nothing but a deep R O M E dejection on that day of joy. Some were heard to say, that the Dictator ^{ccclxix.} triumphed over a citizen, not over the enemy; that the chief ornament of ^{Bef. J. C.} the show was wanting; and that to gratify the Victor's pride Manlius ^{Three} should have been led before his chariot. The Senate, to soothe and pacify ^{hundred} the People, decreed of their own motion to send a colony of Romans to ^{eighty-} Satricum, and allotted to every man two acres and a half of arable land. ^{three.} But this expedient proved ineffectual. So soon as the Dictatorship of Cor- ^{Thirty-} nelius was expired, and the People freed from the dread of an uncontroll- ^{sevench} able Magistrate, the discontent of Manlius's party began to grow into Mil. Tri. open sedition. Some reproached the multitude in public discourses, "That it was their custom to exalt their Protectors to high and slippery ^{Livy B.6.} stations, and then to forsake them in the very moment of danger and ^{c. 17.} downfall: That Sp. Cossus, the first who proposed the Partition of the " Lands; that Maelius, who in a famine generously fed the People at his " own expence; had both of them been abandoned and destroyed; and " that now Manlius, for endeavouring to free the poor debtors from sla- " very, was given up to his mortal enemies. It is a shame to see a Con- " sular thus treated, merely because he did not answer at the nod of the " Dictator. Suppose him to have invented a story, and therefore not to " have an answer ready, was it ever known, that even a servant was put " in irons for only telling a lye? Call to mind that fatal night when the " Gauls climbed up the Tarpeian cliff, and when Manlius, all covered with " sweat and blood, rescued, in a manner, even Jupiter himself out of the " hand of the enemy. Do you think that half a pound of meal was a " sufficient reward for the preserver of our country? Will you suffer a " man, whom you have almost equalled to Jupiter, by giving him the " surname of Capitolinus, to drag on a miserable life in a dungeon, and " draw his breath at the pleasure of a Jailer? Was one man able to pre- " serve all, and shall not all be able to succour one?" Discourses like these were frequently repeated, and the people, surrounding the prison day and night, threatened to break it open. The Senate, fearing lest the multitude in their fury should execute what they threatened, made a Decree for his release: But they did not thereby put an end to the sedition; they only gave the seditious a leader.

During these commotions, Ambassadors arrived from the Latines and the Hernici, as also from the cities of Circei and Velitrae, demanding releasement of the prisoners taken in the last action when the Dictator Cossus defeated the Volsci. The Ambassadors of the former were received. (though their demand was rejected) because those Nations had been only allies of Rome; but the Ambassadors of the latter were ordered immediately to depart, and not appear before the People, because those cities had been upon the foot of Roman Colonies. The former enjoyed their own laws; the latter were subject to the laws of Rome, and had therefore no right to send Ambassadors.

Year of R O M E cccclxx. Bef. J. C. Three hundred eighty-two. Thirty-eighth Mil. Tri. Livy B. 6. c. 18. * A 3d time. † A 2d time. ‡ A 2d time. § A 2d time.

§. II. WHEN new Magistrates came to be elected for the next year, the Centuries chose Camillus Military Tribune a fifth time; and with him they joined * Ser. Cornelius, † P. Valerius, ‡ Ser. Sulpicius, C. Papirius, and § T. Quinctius. The confidence of Manlius was now much increased by the timorousness of the Senate, and the remissness of Cossus in not punishing him as a former Dictator had done Mælius. And the poor Plebeians entertained the hope, that under such a leader they should be able to get usury abolished. Livy gives us a long speech (doubtless of his own making) as spoken by Manlius, in an assembly held at his house in the citadel. The substance of the discourse is an exhortation to the Plebeians to free themselves from the burthen of their debts, and the tyranny of the Patricians, by exerting their natural superiority of strength, and assuming the ascendant.—No more Dictators—No more Consuls—I declare myself the PATRON of the Commons of Rome: My steady concern for their Interests has already fixed upon me that Title. If you are willing to bestow a higher upon your leader, it will enable him to assist you more effectually in the accomplishing of what you desire. Livy adds, “It is said, that from this time was set on foot a project for restoring kingly power; but it is not clearly said, how far it went, nor who were the projectors.” In the debates of the Senate, alarmed at the cabals held at a private man’s house, a house too in the citadel, many of the Fathers declared loudly, “That the Commonwealth stood in need of another Servilius Abala, who by one stroke should rid her of a bad Citizen, and restore the publick safety and tranquillity.” And tho’ the resolution of the Assembly was, in words, more gentle, it was, in effect, not less violent: For by an order to the MILITARY TRIBUNES to take care, that the Commonwealth suffered no detriment from the pernicious projects of Marcus Manlius, they empowered them to act as Abala had done. And now these Magistrates and the Tribunes of the Commons (for the latter, foreseeing that the loss of their dignities would soon follow that of the publick liberty, had given themselves wholly to the Senate) consulted together upon the proper measures to be taken in the present exigence; and when they were at a loss, no one having proposed any better expedient than Assassination, which yet in all appearance would occasion a dangerous conflict, M. Manlius and Q. Petilius, both Tribunes of the Commons, started a new thought: Why do we make that to be a strife between the SENATE and the COMMONS, which ought to be a war of the whole State against one pestilent Citizen? Why should we attack him united with the Commons, when we may more safely attack him by the Commons themselves? We purpose to appoint him a day to appear in judgment. Nothing is more odious to the People than royalty. And when the multitude shall see, that there is no contest with them; that they are made JUDGES in the cause; that the accusers are Plebeians, and the accused a Patrician, and the crime, charged, aspiring to be King; they will unquestionably shew, that there is nothing they regard with so true a tenderness, as their liberty.

c. 20. This advice being unanimously approved, they notified to Manlius a day for his appearance [before an Assembly by Centuries.] The Plebeians beians were at first much affected to see him going about in a dress of mourning to solicit favour; not one Senator, nor any of his kindred, not even his brothers, Aulus and Titus, accompanying him; any thing the like to which had never happened before. Whence it is evident that there was a combination of all the Patricians to oppress him, because he was the first of his family who had fallen off from their party to espouse the cause of the Plebeians.

Year of
R O M E
ccclxx.
Bef. J. C.
Three
hundred eighty-
two.

When the day of trial came, his accusers charged him with holding private assemblies, and with seditious words, ill-meant liberalities, and slandering the Senate [with relation to the gold.] But Livy tells us, that he could not in any Author find what direct proofs the Tribunes brought of Manlius's aspiring to the regal power. However, he supposes, that sufficient proofs they had, since nothing but the circumstance of the place where he was tried (which was the Campus Martius) hindered his immediate condemnation.

Thirty-
eighth
Mil. Tri.
Livy, B.
6. c. 20.

Manlius is said to have produced near 400 citizens, for the payment of whose debts he had advanced money, without interest, thereby recovering their effects which had been seized, and keeping their persons out of the prisons of their creditors. He produced two mural crowns [of gold] his rewards for having entered the first into cities taken by assault; eight civick crowns [of oak-leaves] for having in battle saved the lives of so many citizens, among whom C. Servilius (when General of the Horse) was one; the spoils of thirty enemies, whom he had slain with his own hand in single combat. He then opened his bosom, and shewed it covered with scars, left by the wounds he had received in fight. Looking often to the Capitol, he called upon Jupiter, and the other Gods, for help; and he conjured the People to turn their faces to that sanctuary, and, when they were going to pronounce judgment, to think of the Gods who resided there.

The People, touched with the humiliation and distress of a Roman, who by his bravery had saved the Republick, and having before their eyes the very place where he had fought so valiantly against the Gauls, could not resolve to condemn him. The Military Tribunes, plainly perceiving this, and that, unless the multitude were removed to some place whence they could not see the Capitol, they would never give sentence against the accused, deferred the decision of the affair to another day, and appointed the place of the Assembly to be in the Peteline wood, without the gate Flumentana. Then the object, which had saved Manlius, no longer dazzling the eyes of his Judges, he was condemned to be thrown from the Capitol itself; and the theatre of his glory became that of his punishment and shame. Two marks of infamy are said to have been fixed upon his memory; one by publick authority, the other by private. The publick decreed, that no Patrician should thenceforward dwell in the Capitol, or the Citadel; and the Manlian family came to a resolution among themselves, that no member of it should ever bear the prænomen of Marcus. Such (says Livy) was the end of a man who, if he had not been born in a free state, would have deserved to be remembered with honour by posterity. The multitude multitude very soon regretted the loss of him. Their fear of his ambition being over, they remembered only his virtues: And, because a plague broke out at this time without any discernible cause, many of the People ascribed it to the severe treatment of Manlius: The Capitol, they said, had been polluted with the blood of its deliverer; and the Gods were offended at the execution, almost in their very presence, of a man who had rescued their Temples out of the hands of the enemy.

REMARKS on the DEATH of M. MANLIUS.

M. Dacier expresses his wonder at “the fantastick humour of the Roman People, who [though fully convinced of the guilt] could not prevail with themselves to condemn the criminal, while they had the CAPITOL before their eyes; yet presently after [without any new offence by him committed] could throw him headlong from that very CAPITOL, the sight of which had hindered them from condemning him.”

Perhaps the reader may wonder at M. Dacier's giving credit to this part of the story; I mean the Trial and Condemnation of Manlius by an assembly of the People: I am well persuaded that Livy gave no credit to it, nor to several other particulars which he has so pompously delivered concerning Manlius.

- I. The public examination (as Livy relates it) of MANLIUS, the year before his death, by the Dictator, Cornelius Cæsus, has too strong a mark of fiction, to have passed upon Livy for true history. The Dictator charges Manlius with having slanderously^a accused the principal Senators of secreting the gold that was snatched [by Camillus] out of the hands of the Gauls. And Manlius is represented as making no difficulty to own, that he had so accused them, and that he believes them guilty. Now it is absolutely incredible, that Manlius charged the Senators with secreting what every Roman, then living, knew with certainty to have been carried away by the Gauls^c;

^a Etrange bizarrerie du Peuple! il ne peut se résoudre à condamner Manlius à la vue du Capitole, et un moment après il le précipite de ce même Capitole, dont la vue l'avoit empêché de la condamner. Dac. Plat. Vie de Cam.

^b ——— sermones pleni criminum in patres: inter quos — thesauris Gallici auri occultari a patribus jecit: nec jam possidentis publicis agris contentos esse, nisi pecuniam quoque publicam avertant. Ea res si palam fiat, exolveri plebem ære alieno posse — indignum facinus videri, quum conferendum ad redimerendam civitatem à Gallis aurum fuerit, tributo collationem factam idem aurum ex vestibus captum in paucorum prædam cessisse. L. 6. c. 14.

Spem factam à te civitati video, fide incolami, ex thesauris Gallicis, quos primores Patrum occultent creditum solvi posse. C. 15.

^c N. B. It is not improbable, that Manlius did accuse the principal Senators, and Camillus, among the rest, not falsely but truly, of embezzling (not the gold weighed out for the Gauls, and which the Gauls carried off, but) what remained of the treasure, which the Magistrates had amassed from voluntary contribution, after their paying the sum agreed upon for their ransom. That they were guilty of fraudulent purposes with regard to that remaining treasure, Livy furnishes ground to believe, by what he says of their scrupulous casuistry, and of the reasons they found for not parting with the gold they had got into their possession. And it is very possible, that this gold, properly applied, might have gone a great way towards discharging the debts of the poor Plebeians, as Manlius is reported to have said.

for that the Gauls, when they marched off, did not go without the ransom-Gold, Vid. supr. is made indisputable by Polybius's account; which account Livy had before him, p. 447. though he takes no notice of it.

Indeed the saving of this gold is a point, with which the Latine Historian seems to have been much perplexed. Saved it must be; because it was not fit that such a majestic People as the Romans should be redeemed like so many paltry slaves: Diique et homines prohibuere redemptos vivere ROMANOS. Nam forte quadam, prius quam infanda Merces perficeretur—Dictator intervenit, &c. Lib. 5. c. 49.

Well, but what became of this gold, so fortunately preserved? Why truly, both this (which, in order to avoid a profane use of sacred treasures, had been collected from the women) and other gold, that in the fright and hurry had been taken out of several sanctuaries and brought into the sanctuary of Jupiter, were deposited under the pedestal of Jupiter's statue.

But why, when all was safe and quiet, were not the women's ornaments restored to them? and why were not the other parcels of gold replaced in the respective sanctuaries to which they belonged? The reason was, it could not be distinctly remembered from whence and from whom the several parts of the treasure came; so it was thought best, that the whole should be deemed consecrated to the Gods. [As if the priests could not distinguish the gold of their respective temples, nor the women their own trinkets.] The women, it seems, in reward of their virtue received publick thanks; to which the publick added an honour: Instead of restoring to them the fineries of their dress, it was decreed, that they should have fine things said of them at their funerals, as the men had ^a.

THAT MANLIUS was convicted before the People, assembled by centuries, of attempting to make himself King of Rome; and that the People condemned him, as guilty of that crime, to be thrown from the Tarpeian Rock; are facts which seem to be as little worthy of belief, as that he accused the Senators of secreting gold, snatched [by Camillus] out of the hands of the Gauls.

1. For, first of all, Livy tells us that he could not in any author find what direct proofs the accusers of Manlius brought of his plotting to be King. Crouds of people about him; seditious words; ill-meant liberalities [largitio]; slandering the Senate in relation to the gold [fallax indicium;] these were all the particulars mentioned by those writers from whom Livy borrowed his accounts: Yet our Historians supposes, that weighty matters were proved against him, because [it is said] the sentence was deferred, not on account of any want of evidence, but merely on account of the place where the criminal was tried ^b [the field of Mars, whence the CAPITOL could be

^a Aurum quod Gallis ereptum erat, quodque ex aliis templis inter trepidationem in Jovis cellam collatum, quum, in quæ referri oporteret, confusa memoria esset, sacrum omne judicatum, sub Jovis sella poni jussum. Jam ante in eo religio civitatis apparuerat, quod, quum in publico deesset aurum, ex quo summa pacta mercedis Gallis confieret, a matronis collatum acceperant, ut auro sacro abstineretur. Matronis gratiæ actæ, honosque additus, ut earum, sicut virorum, post mortem solennis laudatio esset. Lib. 5. c. 20.

Plutarch reports that the privilege granted to the women of having funeral orations was in reward of their giving [he should have said lending] their ornaments to make a vase, to be sent to Delphos, in discharge of Camil- lus's vow, when he was just going to the assault of Veii.

^b Quum dies venit, quæ, præter cætus multitudinis, seditiosasque voces, et largitionem, et fallax indicium, pertinentia propriè ad regni crimen, ab accusatoribus objecta sint reo, apud neminem auctorem invenio. Nec dubito haud parva esse, quum damnandi mora plebi non in causa, sed in loco fuerit. C. 20.

N. B. Manlius's liberalities to the poor are said to have been urged against him as indications of his inordinate ambition. And he, in his defence, is said to have produced 400 citizens, to whom he had advanced money, without interest, to prevent their falling into the cruel hands of their creditors.

seen:].

seen:] That is to say, IF Manlius was certainly tried by the People, and if sentence against him was deferred on account only of the place where he was tried, then it is probable there was sufficient proof of his guilt. But presently after,

2. Our Historian lets us know that he is not quite sure that Manlius was tried and condemned by the People: For, after speaking of their passing sentence against him, contrary to their inclination, even when they were in a place from whence the Capitol could not be seen, he adds, live report that he was condemned by Duumvirs, cited to inquire into it. Treason. Sunt qui per Duumvires, qui de perduellione antiquerent creatos, auctores sint damnatum.

3. As Livy by these last words discovers, that he did not know certainly before what court Manlius was tried; so, by what he says in the preceding chapter, he seems to allow his reader to believe, that the supposed criminal was never brought to trial before any court whatsoever, but was cut off by an act of mere violence, an act of that absolute power with which the Senate had invested CAMILLUS and the other Military Tribunes, on purpose to destroy him. I say, Livy seems to intimate this, when he tells us, that the Senate's giving that extraordinary power to the magistrates amounted to the same thing as a resolution to dispatch Manlius (as Abala had dispatched Mælius) without any previous form of process^a.

That they destroyed Manlius, by casting him down from the Tarpeian Rock, may be easily believed, though we suppose no publick sentence to have passed against him, specifying that punishment: because his house, where, it is probable, the officers of the magistrates seized him, stood in the citadel, and therefore very near to that rock.

4. To the arguments, above offered, against the pretended trial and condemnation of Manlius, for plotting to be King, may be added the great unlikelihood, that any Roman, not out of his senses, would, in those times, furnish even the smallest ground for suspecting him of such a plot. Is it not, in the highest degree, improbable, that Manlius should hope to raise himself to a regal throne, by the help of a populace, whom he could not but know to have an hereditary and insuperable aversion to the very names of King and Kingdom: insomuch, that the ambition of reigning [cupiditas regni] was, with them, the most unpardonable of all crimes; and for which no kind nor degree of merit could atone? Livy, on the present occasion, (as on several others) intimates this to have been the temper and turn of the Roman People: Illud notandum videtur, ut sciant homines, quæ et quanta decora scæda cupiditas regni, non ingrata solum, sed invisâ etiam reddiderit, c. 20: and then enumerates the worthy actions and heroic exploits of Manlius. [See what has been said on this head in the close of Chap. XIV. B. 2.]

BUT if Manlius was not guilty of designs against the LIBERTY of his Country, nor of slandering the Senators, what was it that made them so unanimously combine to destroy him? I answer; His singular merit, his honest zeal for the LIBERTY of his fellow-citizens the poor Plebeian debtors, continually exposed to become slaves to their merciless Patrician creditors; [Consensu opprimi popularem virum, quod primus a patribus ad plebem defecisset.] His reproaching the Nobles severely in words, and more severely by his example, with their rapaciousness, avarice, and oppressive usury; and his urging them to do, freely and from virtue, what a

Livy, B.
6. c. 20.

^a Magna pars [Senatus] vociferantur Servilis Abala opus esse qui non in vincula duci jubendo irritet publicum hostem, sed unius jacturâ civis finiat intestinum bellum. Decurritur ad leniorem verbis sententiam, vim tamen eandem habentem: ut videant Magistratus, ne quid ex perniciosi consiliis M. Manlii republica detrimenti capiat. Lib. 6. c. 19.

few years after, they were constrained to do by an act of the legislature, an act passed by the Tribes, in spite of the most vigorous opposition from the Senate, aided by CAMILLUS, then Dictator, and by a majority (which the Senate had gained over to them) of the Tribunes of the Commons: I mean that LAW, which, to relieve the debtors, deducted from the principal debt whatever sums had been paid for interest. It was but seven years after the death of Manlius, that LICINIUS STOLO proposed that LAW: which, with two other Laws, he, after a ten years struggle, prevailed to have enacted; much to the benefit of the Commonwealth, as will be seen in the sequel of the story. Whatever appearance of injustice it may have to make a law on purpose to hinder those, who have fairly lent their money, from exacting what by contract is legally due to them from the borrowers; such a law was absolutely necessary at this time, in order to preserve to the Commons of Rome any appearance of freedom. And the very passing of this law, notwithstanding so mighty an opposition made to it, is alone a cogent proof, that the oppression which they suffered was excessive, and the distemper of the state such as required extraordinary and violent remedies. If we consider the words with which Livy furnishes the Centurion *, (whom Manlius delivered out of the hands of his creditor) and the speech of Manlius †, to the Dictator Cornelius Cossus, we shall have a just idea of the miserable condition of the Commons, and of the relief proposed by their brave and generous advocate. For it is evident (as the reader will find) from the following parts of Livy's narrative, that he does not make the two speakers exaggerate the grievances of the Commons, or make them say more than was strictly true concerning the cruel oppression which the poor debtors laboured under: And the very remedy proposed by Manlius was one of those remedies that, very soon after, were by the legislature judged necessary to be employed.

• See p.
456.

† See p.
458.

LIVY and PLUTARCH represent the zeal of Manlius in behalf of the debtors, as having its source in envy and anger, envy to CAMILLUS, and anger against the SENATE for preferring that rival before him to govern the State and command the army. Doubtless in the year 369, when Manlius's popularity is said to have alarmed the Senate, he had just cause to think himself unworthily and injuriously neglected by them. But that THIS NEGLECT of him was not the CAUSE, but the EFFECT of his ZEAL for the poor debtors, will I think appear from the following considerations.

A braver soldier than Marcus Manlius the Roman State had never produced. The Military rewards which he received from the Generals, under whom he served, are an incontestable proof of it; and in the year 361, two years before his most celebrated exploit of saving the Capitol, he had been honoured with the Consulship. And yet after that important service (in 363) we never see him in any magistracy whatsoever. How shall we account for this? It may easily be granted, that CAMILLUS was superior, in abilities, to Manlius, and to every other Roman of that time, for the conduct of an army; and this may furnish a plausible reason, why the Senate, in pressing and extraordinary exigencies, had recourse to those abilities. But since no less than six persons were every year chosen to the Military Tribuneship (except in the year 364, when the Senate continued Camillus in the Dictatorship, that he might hinder the people from removing to Veii) and since there had been five elections in the time between the Gauls departure and the commotion occasioned by the generosity of Manlius in 369, how came it to pass, that a Patrician of such high birth, a hero so applauded and extolled at the time of the siege, was never after appointed to be one of the six governing magistrates? His brother, Aulus Manlius, who had no merit (that we read of) to recommend him, was nevertheless a Military Tribune in the year 365, and again in 369, the very year in which the Senate created Cornelius Cossus Dictator to quell the commotion raised by the liberality of Marcus.

May we not fairly gather from this uninterrupted exclusion of Marcus from the Magistracy after the rebuilding of the city, that he began about that time to dis-oblige Camillus, and the other Oligarchs; and that their discontent with him was on account of his compassionate concern, warmly expressed, for the poor Plebeians, loaded with debt, and who had lately increased the burthen by borrowing money to build their houses, as Livy informs us?

It ought here to be remarked, that the necessity of borrowing money to build was a necessity to which they were subjected, merely by the Senate's refusing to let them remove to Veii; which removal, after the total destruction of Rome by the Gauls, would in all appearance have been a very reasonable measure: But it would not have been consistent with the views of the Oligarchs, who were bent upon making to themselves immense estates out of the newly conquered Veientan territory.

It is not indeed unlikely, that MANLIUS (who unquestionably saved the Capitol) was discontented to see Camillus (who unquestionably did not drive away the Gauls and save the gold) so distinguished by the Senate, as if he alone was qualified to command an army. And Manlius might with the more reason be dissatisfied, as he knew, that Camillus's chief merit with the Fathers was not his military skill, but his skill and inclination to keep the Plebeians in extreme indigence, and thereby in a state of servitude to the Patrician usurers. Livy, though he seems to have made it a rule to himself, always to speak respectfully of the Senate, yet tells us, "that, when the election of Military Tribunes, for the year 354, was coming on, the attention of the Fathers to that affair and their concern for the event were very near being greater than their care about the war^a." And yet the Romans were at that time engaged in the important siege of Veii: And he likewise tells us, "That the Senate, when, in the year 359, by using their utmost efforts, they got Camillus into the Military Tribuneship, pretended, that it was to provide the Republic with an able general, but that their real motive was to provide themselves with a magistrate, who would oppose the Tribunes bill for a distribution of the publick lands^b." So that Manlius, who was as compassionate and generous as he was brave, needed not the incitement of ambition or envy to make him displeased with the Senate's throwing so much power into the hands of a man, whose temper and character made him very unfit to be at the helm of a free state.

Just reasons unquestionably there were, why CAMILLUS, though an exile on account of male-administration, was by an act of Senate and People recalled from banishment and created Dictator in the year 363, when the Gauls invested the Capitol: But the reasonableness of continuing him in the Dictatorship throughout the year 364 may very well be questioned. For it is not evident, that, in this unprecedented step, they had any view to the good of the publick; and it is plain beyond a doubt, that they had a view to their private interests: That by the means of Camillus, invested with the terrors of absolute power, they purposed to keep the People at a distance from Veii, and thereby to hinder them from having their just share of the conquered lands, and likewise from seeing how shamefully the Oligarchs made themselves rich by robbing the commonwealth. For that these were their principal objects appears from the whole thread of the history of these times.

We have seen that the Fathers, when in the year 360, by tears and intreaties and Vid. supr. talking much about religion, they had prevailed to have the [very unreasonable] bill, P. 435. for dividing the Senate and People between Rome and Veii, rejected, were in such joy for their victory, that, the next morning, they passed a decree for assigning to every freeman of Rome seven acres of the lands of Veii. Doubtless this decree, though re-

^a Jam Comitia Tribunorum Militum aderant, quorum prope major Patribus, quam belli cura erat. L. 5. c. 14.

^b Comitibus Tribunorum Militum patres summa ope evicerant, ut M. Furius Camillus crearetur. Propter bella simulabant parari ducem, sed largitioni tribunicia adversarius querebatur. L. 5. c. 26.

presented by Livy as an act of voluntary bounty, when joy had opened and dilated the hearts of the Senators (not apt to such effusion of goodness) was made in performance of a promise, by which they had gained a majority of the Tribes to vote against the bill in question. And there is some reason to doubt, whether they ever put the decree in execution. And, if they did, it would seem, that they very soon got the land back again out of the hands of the poor Plebeians, and probably * in * Vid. satisfaction of interest for money they had lent to those Plebeians. For Livy intro-^{supr. p.} duces one of the Tribunes, in that long contest which began about thirteen years 435. after this notable bounty, expostulating with the principal Senators, How they could have the confidence to desire that every one of them might be allowed to possess more than 500 acres of land, while no more than two acres was allowed to each Plebeian?

To return to CAMILLUS: He was again created Dictator in 365; and Military Tribune (for the fourth time) in 368, and again in 370, and invested with absolute power, purposely to destroy MANLIUS. Though Camillus had five Collegues, Plutarch represents him as principal in the prosecution, and as the Magistrate who removed the Assembly to a place whence the Capitol could not be seen: Which makes M. Dacier ask, “But why was Camillus so eager to get Manlius condemned, a person of such eminent merit, and who had served so well? Why did he not leave that melancholy honour to his Collegues?” He adds, “Livy, to avoid throwing all the odium of the action upon Camillus alone, says, That the [Military] Tribunes, perceiving the effect which the sight of the Capitol produced ^b, &c.”

M. Dacier might have found perhaps a satisfactory answer to his question, if he had attended to what Plutarch says in his comparison of Camillus with Themistocles. The biographer, though he sometimes extols the Roman hero to the skies, yet leaves it doubtful, “Whether it was the love of liberty and of his country, that made him prosecute Manlius to death, or whether his hatred to Manlius was not owing to a secret jealousy of a rival, illustrious by many noble exploits, and especially by that of saving the Capitol; whence he acquired the surname of Capitolinus.”

But, without having recourse either to Amor Patriæ, or to any supposed jealousy of a rival for military Glory, it would seem that we may well account for Camillus's being the chief actor in the destruction of Manlius. This humane, generous, noble-spirited hero, by his civil and social virtues, reproached, eclipsed, and dishonoured the invincible Camillus; and, by patronising the cause of the distressed Plebeians, opposed the gratification of his (seemingly ruling passion) avarice.

A late celebrated author observes, “That the writers of particular lives are apt to be partial and prejudiced in favour of their subject, and to give us a Panegyrick, instead of a History”—and that “this seems to flow from the nature of the thing itself, where the very inclination to write is generally grounded in prepossession, and an affection already contracted for the person whose history we are attempting; and, when we sit down with the disposition of a friend, it is natural for us to cast a shade over his failings, and to give the strongest colourings to his virtues.”

* Auderentne postulare, ut quum bina jugera agri plebi dividerentur, ipsis plus quingenta jugera habere liceret? Ut singuli prope trecentorum civium possiderent agros, plebeio homini vix ad rectum necessarium, aut locum sepulturæ, suus pateret ager? Liv. L. 6. c. 36.

And in lib. 6. c. 21. Livy informs us, that the Senate (in the year 371, just after the murder of Manlius) to engage the People's consent to a declaration of war, passed a Decree for dividing the Pomptin Territory

among them. Yet we do not find, that this was done till many years after the Decree.

^b Mais pour quoi Camillus poursuivoit-il avec tant d'ardeur la condamnation de Manlius, d'un homme de ce mérite & qui avoit si bien servi? Que ne cedit-il ce triste honneur à ses collegues? Aussi Tite Live, pour ne pas faire tomber toute la haine de cette action sur Camillus seul, dit, Que les Tribuns s'étant appercus de l'effet que cette vue produisoit, &c.

Perhaps there is not a more striking instance of the truth of what is here said, than PLUTARCH'S Life of CAMILLUS. It abounds with indications of an extreme partiality. He extols the only good action (recorded) of his hero, greatly beyond its merit; and discovers a most friendly disposition to believe, that he never did any thing wrong.

Certainly it required no extraordinary elevation of soul, nor any thing beyond common prudence and policy, and a moderate sense of honour, to act as Camillus did, with relation to the school-master of Falerii. It was one of those parts of conduct, the performance of which does not render a man so praise-worthy as the non-performance of them renders him infamous. Yet, from Plutarch's admiration of the deed, one would imagine it to be something so glorious as not to be looked at without having the eyes of our minds dazzled with its brightness.

Vid. sup. CAMILLUS was, by the Roman People, thought guilty of impious vanity, when
p. 429. with his face painted red, and in a chariot drawn by white horses, he rode in triumph for the conquest of VEII. What says our biographer to this? Why truly he is of opinion, "That we may reasonably presume the Gods would not have showered down so many favours upon Camillus, if he had really offended them by any impiety."

But did not Camillus imbezzle and appropriate to his private use some of the wealth belonging to the publick? Of this he was accused; and he was cited to appear in judgment before the People to answer the charge. Neither the principal men of his Tribe, nor his Clients (which, says Livy, made a considerable part of the Commons) nor (according to Plutarch) his Colleagues heretofore in office, nor his Friends, when all were assembled to consider of his case, would give him any hopes of escaping condemnation: So, to avoid a trial, he ran away, cursing his countrymen. One would naturally conclude from these particulars, that he was guilty. No, says Plutarch, "the Gods declared him innocent, by bringing the Gauls against Rome to revenge his cause, and punish the Romans for their unjust treatment of it."

And the biographer will have it "that he was banished for his steady opposition to the BILL for removing half of the Senate and People to VEII;" which Bill (if we may credit Livy) the people themselves, moved by the intreaties of the Senators [and probably more moved by a promise of seven acres of the lands of Veii to each of them] had rejected three years before this prosecution.

Indeed it is highly probable, that, long before the impeachment of Camillus, the greater part of the Plebeians had received impressions much to his disadvantage: For the whole series of his conduct towards the Commons appears, even from the accounts given of it by his Panegyrists, to have been base and detestable; so base, that one may reasonably wonder how it could happen, that Camillus should be such a favourite character as he certainly is with most readers of ancient history. However, this may perhaps be sufficiently accounted for by the same reflections which the ingenious writer, before quoted, makes on another occasion:

Midd. "Among the celebrated names of antiquity, those of the great conquerors and Life of "generals attract our admiration always the most, and imprint a notion of mag-Cicero, "nanimity, and power, and capacity for dominion, superior to that of other mor-Pref. p. "tals:—these are the only persons who are thought to shine in history, or to merit xvii. "the attention of the reader: dazzled with the splendor of their victories, and

* — M. Furium ab urbe amovere. Qui die dicta ab L. Apuleio tribuno plebis, propter prædam Veientanam, filio quoque adolescente per idem tempus orbatus, quum accitis domum tribulibus, et clientibus, quæ magna pars plebis erat, percunctatus animos eorum responsum tulisset, Se collaturus quanti damnatus esset, absolvere eum non posse, in exilium abiit. L. 5. c. 32.

“ the pomp of their triumphs, we consider them as the pride and ornament of the “ Roman name ; while the pacifick and civil character, tho’ of all others the most “ beneficial to mankind, whose sole ambition is to support the laws, the rights and “ liberty of his citizens, is looked upon as humble and contemptible on the com“ parison, for being forced to truckle to the power of these oppressors of their “ country.”

That Camillus was superior in military skill to all his cotemporaries, and that he did important service to his country by many victories ^a in the field, is not to be disputed. But, when we have granted thus much, what is there more to say in his praise ? How scandalous an appearance does he make as a citizen, a member of a Republick erected on the principles of Liberty ?

1. He is reported to have vowed the tenth of the spoil of VEII to APOLLO, in case the Romans should become masters of the place.

Livy says, that Camillus made this vow just before he assailed the walls : According to PLUTARCH, it was before he set out from Rome to go to the siege : And it seems most probable from the sequel of the story, that, neither before nor after he left Rome, did he ever act so senseless a part : But that when he and the Senate, thinking that the poor soldiers had got too rich a reward of their labours (during a ten years siege) wanted to rob them of part of it, he then falsely pretended to have made the vow in question. For should we grant, that the general of a Roman army might, from certain religious prepossessions, without being out of his senses, really intend to make a present of a tenth part of the wealth of Veii (the richest city of Tuscany) to the Grecian Priests of Apollo at Delphi ; I say, supposing this, How came it, that Camillus did not in due time, and before the booty was carried off, acquaint the soldiers with his act of devotion ! Why truly, He had forgot it ; the Vid. supr. worst, says Plutarch, and the most ridiculous of all excuse. The soldiers nevertheless, p. 430. threatened with the anger of the Gods, paid into the publick stock the value of a tenth of what they had brought home.

2. Fraud and imposture succeeding so well, a new trial of it is made the next year. The poor citizens being many of them eagerly bent on removing to VEII, that they may get a reasonable share of the lands belonging to it, Camillus, to throw a religious obstacle in their way, is pleased then to have a new scruple : He recalls to mind, that Vid. supr. his vow to Apollo had comprehended, not only the moveables, but the city of Veii, p. 431. and all its territory. The Senate ^b have tender consciences, and therefore refer this nice case to the Pontifices, the Casuists of the State. These, having discoursed with Camillus, had informed themselves satisfactorily of his Intention when he made the vow, are clear in opinion, that Apollo must have the tenth of whatever had, before the vow, belonged to the VEIENTES, and had, since the vow, fallen into the power of the ROMANS. [Not a word however of the money raised by the sale of Vid. supr. the captives, and transmitted to the publick treasury (that is to say, transmitted to p. 428. Rome for the use of the leading men of the Senate :) For though the persons of the VEIENTES had fallen into the power of the Romans, yet the Casuists, it is likely, might hold that, the persons of the VEIENTES being the Veientes themselves, they

^a Plutarch, in comparing the exploits of Camillus with those of Themistocles, intimates that there is so much of surprise and of the Merveilleux spread over the actions of the Roman, as made them fitter subjects for painters and poets than for historians.

^b Quum ea disceptatio anceps senatui visa, delegata ad pontifices esset, adhibito

Camillo, visum collegio, quod ejus ante conceptum votum Vientium fuisset, & post votum in potestatem populi Romani venisset, ejus partem decimam Apollini sacram esse. Ita in æstimationem urbs agerque venit : pecunia e ærario prompta, et tribunis militum consularibus, ut aurum ex ea cõmerent, negotium datum. L. 5. c. 25.

could not properly be said to belong to the Veientes, and so were not comprehended within the vow.] Weil but how shall Asinius get his due? The tenth of the houses and lands of Asinius cannot be sent to Deities. Camillus and his associates have an easy expedient for this. They get the town and territory appraised, and they pay out of the publick treasury, into their own hands, the tenth of the value; that they may buy gold to make a cup for Asinius. [The God was to have had a cup before the appraisement, and he gets nothing more now: No; but the Senate find their account in this transaction. For, the people having purchased, of the God, his tenth of the city and lands of Asinius, and this tenth not being divided from the rest, it is become impracticable for the people to put their project in execution, till the Senate shall think proper to ascertain and set out the particular houses and lands that belong to the publick, in virtue of the late purchase.]

Livy exhibits to his reader this whole scene of oppression, knavery, and religious imposture, and makes Camillus the principal actor in all: And yet speaks of him as the glory of Rome at this time, and the envy of M. Manlius.

On the other hand, though the historian (wanting proof) first supposes Marcus Manlius to have been actuated by pride, envy, and ambition, and then invents for him words and discourse, such as a man, under the influence of those passions might possibly utter, yet it is to be remarked, that he mentions not any one thing as certainly done by Manlius, but what is praise-worthy.

And from these observations one would be inclined to think, that the oldest traditions, and perhaps the first written accounts concerning the transactions of those times, were all favourable to Manlius, and much to the disadvantage of the Senate and Camillus: But that the later historians (and Livy in particular) who on many occasions do evidently consult the glory of the Romans, and especially of the Senate, more than truth, perceiving plainly, that, in the minds of strangers and of posterity, the venerable Fathers and Optimates of those days would be much disgraced, if it remained an established point of history, That an eminent Patrician, a man distinguished for his bravery and gallant exploits, and who had done essential service to the State, was agitated by them, only because he impoverished himself to relieve poor debtors, and warmly declined against excessive usury; the later historians, I say, to cover, in part, the infamous conduct of Camillus and the Patrician faction, thought it convenient to suppose (without evidence) the truth of what that faction imputed to Manlius, when they had determined to cut him off. Accordingly those writers have reported, that in all probability Manlius (otherwise a Roman of eminent virtue) was seized with the Cupiditas Regni^a, and endeavoured to make himself king of Rome. Of this charge against him Livy confesses that he found no proof, except his good deeds, (his liberalities, and some sedition discourse, that is to say, some discourse against exorbitant usury, cruelty to insolvent debtors, and robbing the publick; of all which the chief men of the Senate were notoriously guilty: For it is to be observed, that, with Livy, sedition frequently signifies nothing more than opposition to the desires and measures of the Senate.

If it be granted (as surely it will) that, in order to form just ideas of the merit or demerit of those men who make the principal figures in history, we must attend chiefly to what they did, and not to the characters given of them by their historians, M. Manlius Capitolinus will, I think, appear to have been an honest benevolent, gene-•Vid. sup.

p. 254 &
seq.

^a The same distemper had, with equal truth, been imputed to Spurius Cassius^a, and in after times was imputed to Tiberius Gracchus and his brother Caius. This stratagem of the Senate, when they wanted to destroy an adversary by the hands of the Roman people, was somewhat like pointing out to our populace a man, as bit by a mad dog, and incurable, and whom it is necessary to destroy in order to prevent mischief. The latter is not so malicious, because not so certainly fatal, as was the other.

rous, open-hearted, brave soldier, a friend to just liberty; the invincible M. Furius Camillus, a vain, hypocritical, avaricious robber of the publick, the champion of tyrannical usurers, and the murderer of the best man in the Commonwealth. Always a hero in the field, always an oppressor in the city, he opposed for ten years together the enacting of those Laws, to the execution of which, when enacted, were owing the liberty, the virtue, the glory, and the empire of the Romans^a. I mean the laws proposed by Licinius Stolo, in the year 377, and passed by the Tribes in 386. A writer, on no occasion partial to the Tribunes of the Commons, tells us, Dr. Midd. that “they never left tearing the Senate with fresh demands till they had laid Pref. to “open to the Plebeian families a promiscuous right to all the magistracies of the Re- Life of “publick, and by that means a free admission into the Senate.” He adds, “Thus Cicero, p.
“far they were certainly in the right and acted like true patriots; and after many sharp xxxvii.
“contests had now brought the government of Rome to its perfect State; when its ho“nours were no longer confined to particular families, but proposed equally and “indifferently to every citizen; who by his virtue and services, either in war or “peace, could recommend himself to the notice and favour of his countrymen.” To hinder this improvement of the constitution, and to keep the Plebeians in a slavish dependance on insatiable Patrician usurers, were the chief objects of the care of the great Camillus, in his old age. Created Dictator by the Senate (in the year 385) for no other end, but that he might abuse the power annexed to that office, he (to answer the purpose of his creation) by menaces, and by his lictors, drove the people from the Forum, when they were going to enact the most excellent Laws. The two Tribunes, however, not dismayed hereby, and knowing his weak side, quickly frightened him, by an attack there, into an abdication of his Dictatorship. Plutarch speaks only of their threatening him with a heavy fine; but Livy tells^b us, that, according to some writers, the Tribunes actually got a Law passed by the Commons, subjecting him to that heavy fine, in case he interposed his authority of Dictator, to hinder the proceedings of the Comitia. Be that as it will, Camillus, after mention of the fine, suddenly laid down his sovereign magistracy, under pretence, says Plutarch, of bodily indisposition. The Latine historian, very unwilling to believe that the Hero retreated through fear, gives four or five reasons against that opinion; and is inclined to think, that he quitted his post out of a religious scruple, relating to some new discovered defect in the ceremony of his inauguration: But if the love of riches was the Hero’s ruling passion, as it seems to have been, this will furnish a sufficient answer to twenty better reasons than Livy has produced; and, by the account which Plutarch gives of the insult offered to the Hero the next year when he was again Dictator, and of the meek part he then acted, it appears (if the story be true; for Livy says nothing of it) that the Tribunes, by threatening to make him pay, had totally subdued his spirit.

I conclude from the whole of these Remarks, that MANLIUS, innocent of all designs against the liberty of his country, fell a sacrifice to the avarice and ambition of CAMILLUS, and the other Oligarchs, his associates in oppressive iniquities.

^a In the introduction of the fourth book of this history, the reader will find some reflections on the excellency of these laws; and he may find the same reflections inserted in the preliminary discourse of the ingenious author of the new translation of Cæsar’s Commentaries.

^b — re neutro inclinâtâ magistratu se abdicavit: seu quia vitio creatus erat, ut scripserunt quidam; seu quia tribuni plebis tulerunt ad plebem, idque plebes scivit, ut si M. Furius pro dictatore quid egisset, quingentum millium [æris] ei multa esset. L. 6. c. 38.

C H A P. III.

§. I. During the six following years and the beginning of the seventh Rome is almost intirely free from civil diffensions; but wars are carried on abroad againſt the Præneſtini and Volſci with very little interruption. Camillus, being one of the Military Tribunes in the year 373, gives a remarkable proof of his moderation, when diſreſpectfully treated by one of his Colleagues.

Year of
R O M E
cccxxi.
Bef. J. C.
Three Hundred eighty-one.

Thirty-
ninth
Mil. Tri.
Liv. B. 6.
c. 21.

* A third
time.

† A 4th
time.

‡ A 3d
time.

§ A 3d
time.

¶ A 3d
time.

Y. of R.
372. Bef.
J. C. 380.

Fortieth
Mil. Tri.

 A 4th
time.

†† A 4th
time.

Liv. B. 6.
c. 22.

Y. of R.
373.

Bef. J. C.
379.

41st Mil.
Trib.

Plut. Life
of Camil-

lus p.
48.

AULUS * MANLIUS [probably an infamous usurer, and for that reason not consenting to the death * of his brother Marcus] was chosen one of the Military Tribunes at the very next election, and with him were joined † L. Valerius, ‡ Ser. Sulpicius, § L. Lucretius, ¶ L. Æmilius, and M. Trebonius. The plague still raged, and, to add to the misfortune, Rome was not only threatened again by the Volſci, but by some of her own colonies which revolted; so that the Senate found it necessary to engage the People's consent to a war. And in order to this they promised to divide the Pomptin territory among them, and named five Commissioners to make the distribution of lands, and three others to lead a colony to Nepete. Hereupon the Tribes unanimously agreed, notwithstanding the opposition of the Tribunes, that troops should be raised to act against the several enemies of Rome. Accordingly troops were raised; but, the plague continuing, the Military Tribunes durst not lead them into the field. And, though Præneſte followed the example of Velitræ, Circæi, and other colonies, the low condition of the Republick obliged her to suspend her resentments.

But in the following Military Tribuneship of Sp. Papirius, L. Papirius,  Ser. Cornelius, ‡ Servilius, Ser. Sulpicius, and †† L. Æmilius, the two first marched an army towards Velitræ, and in the neighbourhood of that place defeated the Veliterni, tho' joined by great numbers from Præneſte. The generals did not think it adviseable to besiege Velitræ, but rather to pursue the war with vigour against the Præneſtins, who had farther provoked the Romans by assisting the Volſci.

And now the Republick, having much work upon her hands, turned her eyes again upon the invincible Camillus, to raise him a sixth time to the Military Tribuneship. Camillus, apprehensive of the vicissitude of fortune, was willing to spend the remainder of his days in tranquillity: But in vain he endeavoured to excuse himself, by pleading his age and infirmities; the People declared, that they did not expect him to fight in person either on foot or on horseback, but only desired him to assist the army with his counsel, and make it invincible by commanding it. A. Posthumius, L. Post- humius,

*humius, L. Furius, * L. Lucretius, and M. Fabius Ambustus,* were chosen Year of to be his Collegues. The Senate decreed the conduct of the war against R O M E the Volsi to Camillus; it fell by lot to L. Furius to be joined with him. CCCLXXXIII
All the troops consisting of four legions marched towards Satricum, which Bef. J. C.
the Volsi and Prænestins had lately taken, and where they had formed their Three camp. Camillus posted himself at a small distance from the enemy, but hundred was in no haste to fight; he either waited for better health, or to receive seventy-a reinforcement of troops. In the mean time the Volsi endeavoured to nine.
provoke the Romans to a battle, and these grew impatient of the insult. Forty-
Their ardour for fighting was increased by the rash discourses of young first Furius, who imputed the prudent delays of his Collegue to his age, which, Mil. Tri.
he said, had chilled his blood. He at length addressed himself to Camillus, * A 3d reproached him with his inaction, and urged him to comply with the de- time.
sires of the soldiers. Camillus answered with an air of superiority, but Plut. Life with great temper, That hitherto the Roman People had not been dissa- of Camil-tisfied with his conduct in war; that, nevertheless, if the impetuosity lus, p. 148 which hurried the soldiers on to an engagement was not to be restrained, Livy, B.
he wished them success, but desired to be excused, on account of his age, 6. c. 23.
from engaging in the foremost ranks. While Furius drew up his troops in order for battle, Camillus prepared a Corps de Reserve to assist his Colleague in case of distress; and this precaution proved of great importance : For when the young General, whose vigorous charge did not fail to put the Volsi to flight, had, through his indiscreet warmth in pursuing them too far, suffered a defeat, Camillus rallied the broken cohorts, and repuls- c. 24.
ed the enemy. The next day he joined battle with them again. Furius, Plut. Life whom he had placed at the head of the cavalry, being sensible of his of Camilfault, intreated his troops to exert themselves to recover his reputation. lus, p.
Accordingly, when the infantry were hard pressed, the horse, at his re- 149.
quest, dismounted, and gave them assistance so opportunely, as to make them victorious. Among the prisoners were found some of the inhabi- Livy, B.
tants of Tusculum, a neighbouring city, and in alliance with Rome. These, 6. c. 25.
being examined, declared that they had taken arms with the consent of their Magistrates. This account alarmed Camillus, and he thought it necessary to go in person to Rome with the prisoners, and lay the matter before the Senate. Though he left Furius to command the troops during his absence, yet it was generally believed both in the army and in the city, that his chief business at Rome was to complain of him. The Senate therefore when they observed that he said nothing of Furius, but confined his discourse to the revolt of the Tusculans, were much astonished ; and still more so, when of all his Collegues he chose Furius to accompany him in the new expedition against Tusculum. By this conduct Camillus gained honour to himself, and covered the disgrace of the young General [probably his kinsman.] As for the Tusculans, they disarmed the resentment of the Romans by making no resistance. Camillus found the hus-bandmen at work in the fields, as in times of the profoundest peace; the

Year of
R O M E
ccclxxiii
Bef. J. C.
Three
hundred seventy-line.
Forty-first
Mil. Tri.
Livy, B.
6. c. 26.

Magistrates of the city sent him provisions, and came out to meet him ; and when he entered the place he found the shops and schools open, the markets full, and not the least sign of war. The Generals, pleased and satisfied with these tokens of repentance, advised the Senate of Tusculum to send a Deputation to Rome, there to make their submission. Deputies were accordingly dispatched, who, habited in mourning, and with their Dictator at their head, addressed the Conscrip't Fathers in a suppliant manner. The Senate readily forgave the Tusculans, and, to make them intirely Roman, granted them, soon after, the privileges of Roman citizens.

The following administration of * L. Valerius, † P. Valerius, § L. Merenius, ‡ C. Sergius, Sp. Papirius, and † Ser. Cornelius, was disturbed by domestic seditions and a foreign war. The two Censors had begun to examine into the grounds of the complaints made by the poor debtors, when one of those Magistrates died ; upon which the other, as custom required, laid down his office, and the Romans proceeded to a new election. But the Patricians, who were doubtless afraid of a Census, (because it must of course discover the riches and excessive usury, and the oppression which the poor debtors laboured under) pretended some defect in the election, and thence took occasion to declare publicly, that it was against the will of the Gods, that the Republick should have any Censors this year. The Tribunes of the Commons exclaimed against this proceeding, as an intolerable artifice ; and would suffer no levies to be made to oppose the Prænestins, till these, imboldened by the Discord in Rome, came pillaging to its very gates. Then in a fright and a hurry the People all ran to arms, Titus Quinctius was created Dictator, troops were raised without opposition, and the Prænestins (such a dread they had of a Dictator) instantly removed farther off. Possess'd with a vain conceit, that the banks of the Allia must always prove a fatal place to the Romans, they incamped there, and were there routed. The Dictator, by assault, took eight towns subject to Prænestæ, and then Velitræ ; after which Prænestæ, without waiting to be attacked, capitulated. From that city Quinctius brought, in triumph, the statue of Jupiter Imperator, and placed it in the Capitol between the sanctuaries of Jupiter Capitolinus and Minerva, and then abdicated his Dictatorship, which he had held only twenty days.

Year of
R O M E
ccclxxv.
Bef. J. C.
Three
hundred seventy-
seven.
Forty-third
Mil. Tri.
 A 2d
time.
Livy, B.
6. c. 30.

The Government of the Republick passed now into the hands of three Patricians and three Plebeians : The former were P. Manlius, C. Manlius, and  L. Julius ; the latter C. Sextilius, M. Albinus, and L. Antistius. To the two Manlii, because more nobly born than their Plebeian Collegues, and more in favour than Julius, the Senate gave the conduct of the war against the Volsi, but had soon cause to repent of this preference : For those Generals, without first acquainting themselves with the country, sent out some cohorts to forage ; and, upon the single report of a Latine, who, disguised under the appearance of a Roman soldier, came hastily with the false tidings, that the foragers were by the enemy intercepted and surrounded, marched the army with all expedition to their rescue, and thereby fell into an ambush, where the desperate courage alone of the soldiers (not the skil skill of the commanders) preserved them from total destruction; and the Volsci, during the action, detached a part of their troops, which surprised and plundered the Roman camp. When the news of these disasters came to Rome, the Senate were at first for naming a Dictator; but judging by the inaction of the conquerors, that they knew not how to improve a victory, it was only resolved to call home the army and its commanders. During these misfortunes abroad, Rome continued free from all domestic broils; which may reasonably be imputed to the share the Plebeians had at this time in the Government.

Year of
R O M E
ccclxxv.
Bef. J. C.
Three
hundred seventy-
seven.

The next year, when Sp. Furius, * Q. Servilius, C. Licinius, P. Clælius, M. Horatius, and L. Geganius, all Patricians, held the Military Tribune-ship, was far from being so peaceable. What gave occasion to the disturbance were the debts. To inquire into these, two Censors had been created; but they could not proceed in the affair, because of a fresh irruption of the Volsci into the Roman Territory. The Tribunes of the Commons however pursued their point with more warmth than ever, and opposed the levies, till they had forced the Senate to issue a Decree, that no person should be disturbed either for private debts, or for the publick taxes, during the present war. Hereupon all opposition to the levies ceased, and the Romans took ample revenge on the Volsci. But the war was no sooner at an end, than the creditors renewed the prosecution of their debtors; who, far from having any hopes of discharging their old debts, found themselves under a necessity of contracting new, on account of a tax imposed on them, to defray the expence of a wall of square stone, which the Censors were building; and the oppressed Plebeians could get no help from their Tribunes, because, no army being at this time wanted, these had no levies to obstruct.

Forty-
third
Mil. Tri.
Year of
R O M E
ccclxxvi
Bef. J. C.
Three
hundred seventy-
six.
Forty-
fourth
Mil. Tri.
* 2d time.
Livy B.6.
c. 31.

NAY, the next year, when, by the powerful influence of the Patricians, six * men of that order were again in the supreme magistracy, they raised, without any opposition from the Tribunes of the Commons, three armies, one to guard the City, another to be ready to march on any unexpected occasion, and a third to take the field under the command of Valerius and Æmilius, against the confederated Latines and Volsci, who had commenced hostilities, and were incamped near Satricum, a city of the Volsci. In this war the Romans had the advantage. The confederates, after sustaining some losses, quarrelled among themselves, upon the Question, Whether the war should be continued! The Antiates and the rest of the Volsci desired peace; the Latines, obstinately averse to it, separated from them in a rage, which they vented first on Satricum, reducing it to ashes, and sparing only a Temple of the Goddess Matuta. (This Divinity, according to

Year of
R O M E
ccclxxvii.
Bef. J. C.
Three
hundred seventy-five.
Forty-
fifth
Mil. Tri.
Livy, B.6.
c. 32, 33.

* L. ÆMILIUS, a fifth time,
S. SULPICIUS, a second time,
P. VALERIUS, a fourth time.

L. QUINCT. CINCINNAT. a second time,
C. VETURIUS,
C. QUINTIUS.

Year of Plutarch, was the same whom the Greeks called Leucothea, or Ino, Daughter R O M E of Cadmus.) Thence they fell upon the Tusculans, to punish them for havccclxx ii ing deserted the Latin Confederacy, and accepted the privileges of Roman Bef. J. C. Citizens. They surprised the Town, but the inhabitants retired into the Three Citadel, which they held out till they were relieved, probably by that seventy- Roman army which had been kept ready to march upon occasion. The five. Romans took the place by assault, and the Latines within the walls of it Forty- were all cut to pieces, not one escaping.
 fifth
 Mil. Tri.

C H A P. IV.

§. I. The lower sort of the People of Rome are over-awed and oppressed by the Great and the Rich; and the Commons in general lose that spirit and courage they formerly had in contending with the Nobles. In the midst of this extreme dejection, the vanity of a woman sets three bold and enterprising men at work to raise, by some New Laws, the fortune of the Plebeians higher than ever. By one of these proposed Laws (called afterwards the LICINIAN LAWS) the Consulship is to be restored, and, of the two Consuls, one is always to be Plebeian. The three men, who combine to effect this project, are M. Fabius Ambustus, the Lady's father, (a Patrician) C. Licinius Stolo, her husband, a Plebeian, and L. Sextius, another Plebeian, of great distinction. After ten years struggle with the Senate, they carry their point. The Prætorship and Curule Ædileship are instituted. A Plague carries off many persons of distinction among whom is the Great CAMILLUS.

Year of §. I. A TREATY concluded with the Antiates, and the defeat of the R O M E Latines, gave the Republick an interval of rest from foreign ccclxxvii. wars: but as the Senators and rich Patricians, when they stood in no need Bef. J. C. of the assistance of the lower sort, never failed to oppress them; so the Three more quietness there was at this time abroad, the more violence and tyrannhundred ny did they exercise at home towards their Plebeian debtors. Multitudes of seventy- these being insolvent, were condemned to be bond-slaves * to their merciless five. creditors; which melancholy scene so depressed and sunk the spirits not Forty- only of the meaner Plebeians, but even of the most considerable of that fifth order, that, far from having the courage to stand in competition with the Mil. Tri. Nobles for the Military Tribuneship, there was not among them all a man of Livy 5.6. ability and experience, who would sue for or consent to bear even the *Plebei-
 c. 34 an Magistracies* *. But now, at this very crisis, when the Patricians seemed
 * Next to

* Quanto majoris prosperis eo anno bellis tranquilla omnia fore erant, tanto in urbe vis Patrum indies miserique Plebis crescebant; quum eo ipsi, quod necesse erat solvi, facultas solvendi impediretur. Itaque quum jam ex re nihil dari posset, fama & corpore judicati atque addicti creditoribus satisfaciebant, pœnaque in vicem tunc cesserat, Adeo ergo obnoxios summisserant animos, non insinisci, sed principes etiam plebis, ut non modo ad to have secured to themselves for ever all authority in the state, and to have reduced the Commons to a kind of despondent subjection, a trifling accident gave occasion to a wonderful change in the face of things : The Plebeians on a sudden raised their drooping spirits, and with a dauntless ambition carried their pretensions, and with success too, higher than ever.

§. II. M. FABIVS AMBUSTUS, a Patrician of great credit in both parties, had two daughters, of whom the elder was married to S. Sulpicius, a Patrician by birth, and now Military Tribune ; the younger to a rich Plebeian, named C. Licinius Stole. One day when this Plebeian's wife was at her sister's house, a Lictor who walked before Sulpicius at his return from the Senate, thundered at the door (an usual thing) with the staff of the Fasces, to give notice that the Magistrate was coming. This noise, to which the wife of Licinius had not been accustomed, put her into a fright. Her sister, taking notice of it, could not forbear laughing at her, seeming much to wonder at her ignorance. A very small matter, says Livy, is sufficient to disturb the quiet of a woman's mind. The vanity of the younger Fabia was stung to the quick by her sister's laughing ; it made her feel the inequality of their conditions ; and her uneasiness did not fail to be increased by the crowd of people that came to pay their court to her sister, and receive her commands. Her father, happening to see her while she was yet in the first anguish of her grief, and perceiving by her countenance that something troubled her, kindly asked her what it was, and whether all was well at home. At first he could get no satisfactory answer from her : She was ashamed to own, either that she envied her sister, or was discontented with her husband. But, Fabius continuing, in soft words, to press her to disclose the secret, she at length confessed, that the true cause of her pain was her being married unsuitably to her quality, and into a family incapable of honours and high stations. The father, being very fond of his daughter, omitted nothing that could be said to comfort her, promising, that it should not be long before she saw at home the same honours which she had seen in her sister's house. And from this time he began to plot with his son-in-law for the interest of the Commons ; these two associating in their projects I. Sextius, a young Plebeian of capacity and spirit, and who wanted nothing but a nobler birth to qualify him for the highest offices in the Republick. The oppression which the poor Plebeians laboured under at this time, and from which they could never hope to be freed, but by raising some of their own body to the supreme power, gave a fair occasion to the cabal to attempt an innovation in the Government. It was thought expedient, for the easier compassing their designs, that Licinius and Sextius should begin by getting the Plebeian Tribuneship, a magistracy that would enable them to

Year of
R O M E
ccclxxvii.
bef. J. C.
Three
hundred seventy-five.
Fifty-
fifth
Mil. Tri.

Livy, B.
6. c. 35.

ad Tribunatum Militum inter Patricios petendum, quod tanta vi, ut liceret, tetenderant ; sed ne ad Plebeios quidem magistratus capessendos, petendisque ulli viro acri experientique animus esset : possessionemque honoris usurpati modo à plebe per paucos annos, recuperasse in perpetuum patres viderentur. Ne id nimis laxum parti alteri esset, parva (ut plerumque solet) remingentem moliundi causa intervenit. M. Fabii Ambusti, &c.

open

Year of
R O M E
ccclxxvii.
Bef. J. C.
Three
hundred seventy-five.
Fifty-
fifth
Mil. Tri.

open themselves a way to the highest dignities. And when they had carried that first point (which they soon did) they immediately bent all their thoughts and power to put the Plebeians, already not inferior to the Nobles in courage and virtue, upon a foot of equality with them in respect of honours too, boldly aiming, not at the Military Tribuneship, but at the very Consulship itself. They proposed a law for suppressing the office of Military Tribune, restoring the Consulate, and requiring that, of the two Consuls to be annually chosen, one should always be a Plebeian. And, in order to make the People more eager to pass this Law, they tacked it to two others relating to the Debts and the conquered Lands.

By the first of these two laws there was to be deducted from the capital debt whatever sums had been paid for interest, and the principal was to be discharged in three years, and by three equal payments.

App. de Bell. Civ.
B. i. c. 2.

The second was to prohibit any Roman Citizen from possessing more than five hundred acres of land. Whatever lands any one held beyond that restriction were to be taken from him, and divided among the poorer Citizens.

It is easy to guess, that laws of such weighty import were not to be obtained without violent struggles. Riches and honours, those objects of the most passionate desires of men, were the interests in question. The Senators, alarmed and terrified, held publick and private councils, but could fall upon no expedient to avert the impending evil, except that of gaining some of the Tribunes over to their party; an expedient which in like contests they had formerly employed with success. And now the eight Collegues of Licinius and Sextius were all prevailed with to oppose the measures of these two; so that, when the projectors of the new laws had convened the Tribes to give their voices concerning them, the other Tribunes would not so much as suffer the reading of them to the assembly: The word VETO (I forbid) put a stop to all proceedings thereupon. The two Tribunes having frequently assembled the people, but still in vain, Sextius, at length, addressing himself to the Patricians, said aloud, Very well; since INTERCESSION^a is always to have so prevailing a power, we shall take care to defend the Commons with the very same weapon. Appoint an assembly whenever you please for electing Military Tribunes; the word VETO, which our Collegues now chant in concert so harmoniously, will not then be so pleasing a musick to your ears.

Year of
R O M E
378, 379, 380, 381, 382,
Livy, B.
6. c. 35.

§. III. THESE were no empty menaces; for, the time being come for a new election of Curule Magistrates, Sextius and Licinius opposed and hindered all proceeding thereto; and, being themselves continued in the Plebeian Tribuneship, they renewed the same opposition for five years successively, so that the Republick fell into a kind of Anarchy. At length, in the fifth year, a foreign enemy came as it were to the assistance of the

^a The term expressing the Opposition of the Tribunes to any public Act.

Senate. The inhabitants of Velitræ, a Roman Colony, grown wanton with idleness, and seeing no Roman army on foot, made some incursions on the lands of the Republick, and then besieged Tusculum. The Tusculans had long been allies, and had lately been admitted Citizens of Rome, so that the Plebeians as well as the Nobles were ashamed to refuse them assistance. Sextius and Licinius therefore waving their OPPOSITION, an assembly was held by an Inter-rex, for electing Military Tribunes. The choice fell on six *Patricians, who, after some difficulty in making the levies, marched an army against the enemy, defeated them, raised the siege of Tusculum, and besieged Velitræ: And, this place not being taken when their year drew towards a close, the Centuries created six new Military Tribunes^b to carry on the siege: and among these, * M. Fabius Ambustus, the father-in-law of Licinius Stolo. The state of affairs at Rome was now much altered, not only by this promotion of Fabius to the supreme magistracy, but by an increase of strength which the favourers of the new laws had got in the college of Tribunes, of whom at this time there were but five who opposed those laws. Licinius and Sextius being thus supported by three of their Collegues, and by a Military Tribune, pushed their point with more warmth than ever. They were now the seventh year in office, and, by long habit, thoroughly practised in the art of managing the People. In the presence of the multitude they boldly and repeatedly asked the chief men of the Senate, with what assurance they could desire, that the laws should allow them to possess more than five hundred acres of land, when only two acres were allotted to each Plebeian? Is it reasonable that every one of you should hold the lands of near three hundred Citizens, and that a Commoner should hardly have ground enough whereon to build him a small habitation to live in, or sufficient for a burial-place when he dies?

Year of
R O M E
ccclxxxii.
Bef. J. C.
Three
hundred seventy.
Forty.
sixth
Mil. Tri.
A second
time.
Year of
R O M E
ccclxxxiii.
Bef. J. C.
Three
hundred sixty-
nine.
Forty-seventh
Mil. Tri.

When by these and such-like doleful words they had stirred up the People to a much greater indignation than they felt themselves, they immediately added, But how is it possible that any bounds should be set to the avarice of the Patricians, or to their oppression of the People, unless the People themselves will provide for their own security, by raising some of their own body to the Highest Magistracy? Nor will it be sufficient that Plebeians be qualified by law to be Consuls. They obtained the privilege of standing for the Military Tribuneship; and yet, in forty-four years^c, not one of their order was promoted to that dignity! The number of Military Tribunes, at their first institution, was ordained to be Six, on purpose that the Commons

* L. FURIUS, a second time,
P. VALERIUS, a fifth time,
A. MANLIUS, a fourth time,
S. SULPICIUS, a third time,
C. VALERIUS,
S. CORNELIUS, a sixth time.

^b Q. SERVILIUS, a third time,
M. CORNELIUS,
C. VETURIUS, a second time.
Q. QUINCTIUS CINCINNATUS, A. CORNELIUS,
M. FABIUS.

^c From the Year 309 to 353.

Year of ROM E
ccclxxxiii
Bef. J. C.
Three
hundred sixty-
nine.
Forty seventh.
Mil. Tri.

might have a share in that magistracy; nevertheless, by the power and influence of the Nobles, their just pretensions have been almost constantly defeated. And how much easier will it be for the Patricians, when there are but two places to be filled by Consuls, to secure them both to themselves? The only remedy is to make it an indispensable law, that there be always ONE Plebeian in the Consulate. From that very day, and not till then, may the Roman People be deemed to have banished Kings from Rome, and to have established Liberty on a firm basis: From that very day the Plebeians will begin to share in all those things which now give the Patricians the pre-eminence over them, Power, and Honour, Military Glory, and Nobility; they will enjoy great advantages themselves, and transmit them greater to their posterity.

When the Tribunes found that these discourses were listened to with pleasure, they proposed a fourth law, That DECEMVIRS be appointed, instead of DUUMVIRS, to take care of the Sybilline Books, and to interpret them; and that Five of the Ten be always PLEBEIAN. However, all proceedings on this, as well as the other Proposals, were suspended during the siege of Veſtre, which went on but slowly. The five Tribunes in the interest of the Senate had urged, that it was but just to wait the return of the army from before that place, that the Soldiers, who made so great a part of the Commons, might not be excluded from giving their votes, when such important innovations were on foot.

Year of ROM E
ccclxxxiv
Bef. J. C.
Three
hundred sixty-
eight.
Forty-
eighth
Mil. Tri.
Liv. B. 6.
c. 38.

§. IV. THE year ending before the return of the army, the Republick chose six new Governors; but the People continued in the Plebeian Tribuneship the two authors of the laws in dispute. Sextius and Licinius having once more summoned the People (probably towards the close of the year 384) were now resolved to proceed without any regard to the Prohibition of their Collegues*. The Senate terrified hereat had recourse

* L. QUINCTIUS CAPITOLINUS, SP. SERVILIUS,
S. CORNELIUS, a seventh time,

L. PAPIRIUS CRASSUS,
S. SULPICIUS, a fourth time,
L. VETURIUS.

* Father Catrou and Mons. Vertot seem both of them to have mistaken some words of Livy in this part of the story, and by that mistake to have fallen into a perplexity, which has induced the first to suppose a ground of contest between the Tribunes, for which he has no authority, and the other to omit the mentioning of any contest at all between them.

Both the French writers relate, that the Tribunes were now unanimous upon the affair of the New Laws. The passage in Livy, on which I suppose they found themselves, is this: Quum Tribus vocarentur, nec intercessio Collegarum laboribus obſtaret, trepidi Paucis ad duo ultima auxilia, summum imperium summumque ad civem decurrunt. The words in Italic they understand to mean, That there was no longer any opposition to Sextius and Licinius from their Collegues: Whereas the context plainly shews the true meaning of them to be, not that Sextius and Licinius were not opposed by their Collegues, but that they were not hindered by that opposition from proceeding; and it was this that alarmed the Senate so much, as to make them name a Dictator. That the Tribunes were still divided about the new Laws, as before, is evident from the words of Livy, which presently follow those above cited: Quum Dictator course to their last experiments, the Highest Authority and the Greatest Man. They named CAMILLUS to the Dictatorship, this being the fourth time of his being invested with that dignity. His promotion, if we may believe Plutarch, was much against the will of the People, nor was Camillus himself very forward to accept the charge, not caring to exert the Dictatorial authority against those who had so often on great occasions reposed their confidence in him, and believing that he was pitched upon out of ill-will, that he might be the instrument to oppress the Commons if he succeeded, or, failing, might himself be ruined.

The creation of a Dictator did not deter Sextius and Licinius from convening the Tribes to give their votes upon the new laws. Camillus, full of anger and indignation, and attended by a great body of the Patricians, repaired to the Assembly, and there seated himself in his Tribunal. After the usual conflict between the legislating and the interceding Tribunes, and when, in spite of the Veto of the latter, the former, supported by the People's favour, went on to take the suffrages of the Assembly, and the first Tribes had already voted for the Laws, the Dictator, rising up, declared, that he was come to support the privileges of the Commons, and that he would never suffer one part of the Tribunes to deprive the other of their right of Opposition. Sextius and Licinius laughed at this artful speech, and continued to take the votes. The Dictator, hereupon, in great wrath, sent his lictors to drive the People out of the Forum; threatening at the same time, that, if they offered to proceed to Law-making, he would summon them to the Campus Martius, oblige them to list, and to march into the field. His menaces, while they put the Commons into a fright, seemed to raise the courage of the two Tribunes. For these preferred a Bill, and engaged the Commons to pass it into a Law, That, in case M. Furius Camillus made use of his Dictatorial Power to obstruct the enacting of the Laws in dispute, he should pay a fine of 500000 asses of brass. Camillus, presently after, either intimidated by this Plebiscitum, or (as Livy is inclined to think) having discovered that there had been some defect in the ceremony of taking the Auspices, when he was created Dictator, abdicated his supreme Magistracy.

§. V.

Dictator stipatus agmine Patriciorum, plenus iræ minarumque confedisset, atque ageretur res solito primum certamine inter se Tribunorum plebi ferentium Legem intercedentiumque; & quanto jure potentior intercessio erat, tantum vinceretur favore legum ipsarum, latorumque, &c.

Father Catrou, not to be inconsistent with himself, conjectures that some of the Tribunes opposed the proceedings of the rest at this juncture, not because they disapproved of the laws in question, but out of respect for the Dictator then present, Sans doute par respect pour le Dictateur; that they were unanimous concerning the justice of passing the laws, and differed only as to the time.

^a Or 50000 Drachmæ; i. e. 1614*l.* 11*s.* 8*d.* Arbutnot.

The Greek Drachma was in value the same as the Roman Denarius, that is, 7½*d.* English.

^b Livy gives several reasons for his believing that it was not fear which made Camillus resign the Dictatorship. 1. The Character of the Man. 2 The Senate's appointing another Dictator to succeed him; which they would not have done, if the Dictatorial Authority had proved impotent in his hands.

Year of
R O M E
ccclxxxiv.
Bef. J. C.
Three
hundred.
sixty-
eight.
Forty-
eighth
Mil. Tri.
Plut. in Camillus
p. 149.
Liv. B.
6. c. 38.
Plut. p.
150.

Year of §. V. THE Senate in this nice conjuncture, not knowing how to act
 R O M E without a Dictator, whose authority might be a curb upon the Tribunes, ccclxxxv. named P. Manlius to succeed Camillus in that dignity.
 Bef. J. C.

Three Livy tells us, that during a sort of inter-regnum, which there was be-hundred tween these two Dictatorships, Sextius and Licinius held an Assembly of sixty-se- the People, and proposed their Laws anew; and that they might have ven. obtained the passing of those two which related to Land and Usury, if Livy, B. those would have satisfied them: but that, they refusing to separate the
 6. c. 38, Laws, and requiring the People to give their voices upon all at the same
 39. time, the Assembly could not be brought to pass that Law which related to the Consulate.

The new Dictator Manlius presently discovered himself to be a favourer of the Commons, by naming a Plebeian, C. Licinius (not Licinius Stolo the Tribune) for his General of the Horse. Such a nomination was without example, but he endeavoured to justify himself to the Senate by alledging, that Licinius was his near kinsman, and that the dignity of Ge- neral of the Horse was not greater than that of Military Tribune, which Verot. latter Licinius had heretofore enjoyed. [This shews, that in the confusions of a state mutual fidelity between the members of a party is not much to be depended upon, because of the private ties that there are among Citizens of the same City, though of opposite parties.]

When the election of Tribunes came on, the method they took, in order to get themselves continued in office, was, to pretend that they would no longer serve. They represented to the People, that they were grown old in the Tribuneship to no purpose, and that, after struggling nine years with the Senate for the good of the Commons, the only recompence they had met with for their services was neglect and ingratitude: You would very gladly be freed from the oppression of Usury, and you are very eager to have your share of the conquered Lands; but when the question is, to promote the honour of your Tribunes, by whose labours and zeal you are to obtain those benefits, you shew nothing but coldness and indifference. Is it consistent with modesty for you to ask these advantages by our means, while you resolve to leave us afterwards, not only without honour, but without hopes of honour? To be plain then, the laws we have proposed are inseparable. If you are willing to pass them conjointly, you may then abuse us again into the Tribuneship; but, if you are determined to reject that which relates to the Consulate, be assured that we will no longer serve, nor shall you get those passed which concern Usury and the conquered Lands.

Liv. B. 6. All the Patricians in the assembly were struck dumb with amazement at
 t. 40. & this open and resolute Declaration, except Appius Claudius (Grandson of
 seq.

3. Camillus's accepting of the same office again not long after, and while the three Laws were still in dispute; which he would have been ashamed to do, had he been so lately overpowered in the exercise of it. 4.

At the time when the bill, for imposing the fine, is said to have been preferred, he had power to hinder its passing into a Law, or he could not have hindered the passing of those,
 for the sake of which this was preferred.

the Decemvir.) Appius, not moved by any hope of influencing the assembly, but by anger and indignation, stepped forth and made a long and warm speech, full of invectives against the two Tribunes, those TARKUINS, as he called them, the years of whose perpetual Tyranny were regularly numbered, as the years of the Kings were formerly in the Capitol. And he expatiated on the insolence of declaring, That the Commons should not be free to pass such Laws as they approved, unless they would at the same time pass others which they did not approve, nor think to be for the public benefit.

Year of
R O M E
ccclxxxv.
Bef. J. C.
Three
hundred sixty-seven.

Appius's harangue had no other effect, than to delay for a while the publication of the laws proposed. The two authors of them were chosen the tenth time into the Tribuneship; and it is probable, that the multitude, being afraid of losing such able and zealous defenders, engaged themselves to follow their directions implicitly.

Livy, B.
6. c. 42.

Not long after their re-election into power, they obtained the passing of that law which had been last preferred, and which related to the guardianship of the Sybil's Books. The Commons, content for the present with this victory, suffered six Patricians to be created Military Tribunes^a for the next year, without mentioning any thing of the Consulate.

§. VI. IN the beginning of the new administration, sudden advice coming, that a cloud of Gauls^b from the coasts of the Adriatick was advancing towards Rome, the danger, common to all, united the voices of all to raise Camillus (now the fifth time) to the Dictatorship. This great man, though near fourscore, yet considering the peril the state was in, did not now plead infirmity, as he formerly had done, to decline the charge, but readily undertook it, and lifted his soldiers. And knowing that the force of the Barbarians lay chiefly in their great swords, with which they laid about them in a rude unskilful manner, hacking and hewing the head and shoulders, he caused iron helmets to be made for most of his men, smoothing and polishing the out-side so, that the enemies swords, lighting upon them, might either slide off or be broken; and round about their shields he drew a rim of iron, the wood itself not being strong enough to sustain the blows. The two armies came to a battle in the territory of Alba. The Roman soldiers, ever since their defeat at the river Allia, had retained a fear of the Gauls: Nevertheless, Camillus, without much difficulty, obtained a complete victory.

Year of
R O M E
ccclxxxvi
Bef. J. C.
Three
hundred sixty-six.
Forty-
ninth
Mil. Tri.
Plut. in Camillus,
p. 150.
Livy, B.
6. c. 42.

After this success he led his army to attack Velitræ (the siege of which had been interrupted) but the City surrendered to him without resistance.

^a A. CORNELIUS, a second time,
L. VETURIUS, a second time,
M. CORNELIUS, a second time,

P. VALERIUS, a sixth time,
M. GEGANIUS,
P. MANLIUS, a second time.

^b Plutarch tells us, that the Romans feared the Gauls so much, that in a law they made to excuse Priests from military service there was an exception to the case of an Invasion from the Gauls.

Year of ROME ccclxxxvi Bcf. J. C. Three hundred sixty-six. He then returned to Rome, where the honours of a TRIUMPH were decreed him by Senate and Commons.

§. VII. THE People, returning home elated with victory, were more obstinately bent than ever on passing the three Laws, so long disputed. On the other hand, the Senate, equally obstinate in their opposition, would not suffer Camillus to lay down his Dictatorship, thinking that under the shelter of his great name and absolute authority they should be better able to contend with their adversaries. Plutarch reports, that one day when the Dictator was sitting on his Tribunal in the Forum dispatching publick business, an officer, sent by the Tribunes, commanded him to rise and follow him, laying his hand upon him at the same time, as if he meant to drag him away by force. Never was a greater uproar or tumult in the Forum than on this occasion; the Patricians, who surrounded Camillus, driving back the officer, and the multitude from below bawling out, Pull him down, Pull him down. Camillus, though greatly at a loss what to do in this exigence, yet would not resign his authority: Guarded by the Senators, he retired with them to the Senate-house; but, before he entered it, turned towards the Capitol, and besought the Gods to put an end to these commotions, vowing to build a Temple to CONCORD, if Union might be restored among his Fellow-citizens.

After warm debates in the Senate about the measures proper to be taken, it was at length resolved to comply with the people's desire, and to accept the three Laws in question, as the only means to procure domestic peace.

Plut. in Camillus, P. 152. Livy, B. 6. c. 42. The Commons having thus obtained the victory over the Nobles, the Comitia were held for electing Consuls, and then L. SEXTIUS the Plebeian Tribune was chosen Colleague in that dignity to L. Æmilius Mamercinus a Patrician. Nevertheless, when the election of Sextius should have been confirmed by the Senate, the Conscript Fathers absolutely refused to do it; and the new disputes on this occasion between the two parties rose to such a height, that the Plebeians were just ready to leave Rome, and make a new SECESSION, when the Dictator proposed an expedient for a reconciliation. Hitherto the dispensing of justice in the city had been a branch of the Consular Office, but to which the Consuls could not always attend, being commonly during the summer in the field at the head of armies. Camillus's proposal was to separate this function from the Consulate, and to create a judge with the title of PRÆTOR, to whom it should be appropriated; and he advised the Senate to suffer that one Consul might be annually chosen out of the Plebeians, on condition that the Prætor should be always a Patrician. This motion being approved by both parties, the Senate confirmed the election of Sextius, and the Centuries created the son of Camillus Prætor ^a.

^a The Prætorship was the second dignity in the Commonwealth; and the Prætor had the Prætexta, the Curule Chair, and two Lictors, who bearing Fasces, walked before him. The Provincial Prætors, created in after-times, were allowed six Lictors. C. & R.

§. VIII. TRANQUILLITY being thus established, the Romans, in Year of gratitude to the Gods, ordered the Great Games to be celebrated. These R O M E used formerly to last but three days, but now a fourth * day was added; ccclxxxvi. and on this account their name of Ludi Magni was changed into Ludi Bef. J. C. Maximi. It happened that the present Ædiles (for what reason is un- Three hundred known) refused to take upon them the care of making preparations for sixty-six. this festival; upon which the young Patricians cried out, That, since the Forty- affair in question was the worship of the Gods, they should think it no dishonour ninth to be employed in it, provided they might be appointed ÆDILES. According- Mil. Tri. ly the People, at the motion of the Dictator, created a new office in fa- Livy, B. vour of the Patricians. It was called the Curule Ædileship, because these 6. c. 42. Ædiles (two in number) had the honour of the Curule Chair, which the Plebeian Ædiles had not. The business was to take care of the Temples, Theatres, Games, Markets, Tribunals of Justice, and the repair of the City Walls, and also to see that no novelty was introduced into Religion; in after-times they had likewise the inspection over books that were published, and pieces written for the Stage.

Notwithstanding some alarms, caused by a report, that the Gauls, who Year of had dispersed themselves in Apulia, were again got together, and that the R O M E Hernici threatened a rebellion, the Senate were unwilling to enter upon a ccclxxxvii. war under the administration of a Plebeian Consul, lest the glory he might Bef. J. C. acquire should redound to the honour of his whole party; so that all Three hundred continued quiet both abroad and at home, excepting that the Tribunes sixty-five. of the Commons expressed their discontent to see, that for one Plebeian Eighty- Consul granted to the Commons the Nobles had got three new Curule Ma- ninth gistrates. The Senate hereupon were prevailed with to consent, that the Consul- Curule Ædiles should be chosen out of the Plebeians every second year; ship. and afterwards they left the People at full liberty to chuse them every year Livy, B. 7. c. 11. out of either body.

§. IX. ROME after these establishments continued at rest both from Year of foreign wars and intestine divisions, under the new Consuls L. Gemucius a Ple- R O M E beian, and Servilius Abala a Patrician. But it seems to have been the fate ccclxxxviii. of the city never to be in perfect tranquillity: A pestilential sickness spread Bef. J. C. itself on a sudden, when no-body could account for it. It could not be as- Three hundred cribed to the irregularity of the seasons. The winter had not been extraor- sixty-four. dinary dry, nor had the cold weather been too suddenly succeeded by an Ninetieth. immoderate heat; nor had the summer been too rainy; nor had the autumn- Consul- nal fruits, for want of sufficient maturity, caused indigestions: Nor, lastly, ship. had the Calabrian wind blown any dangerous and unwholesome air to Rome. Oros B. 3. This plague swept away, together with great numbers of the People, some c. 4. of the Magistrates; one Censor, one Curule Ædile, and three Tribunes of Livy, B. 7. the Commons: But what made it most memorable was the death of the c. 2. great Camillus, who, though full of years, was more regretted, says Plutarch, than the whole multitude of those who died of the same disease.

* Plutarch says, that this fourth day was added to the Ferie Latine.

C H A P. V.

§. I. The Romans have recourse to various expedients for putting a stop to the plague. The filial piety of the son of L. Manlius Imperiosus. §. II. The earth opens on a sudden in the midst of the Forum, and continues open, to the great terror of the City. M. Curtius, a young Patrician, leaps into the gulph completely armed and on horseback. §. III. The Consul Genucius, the first PLEBEIAN Rome had ever placed at the head of an Army, unfortunately conducts the war against the Hernici, his legions are routed, and he himself slain. §. IV. The Gauls advance within three miles of Rome, incamping on the banks of the Anio. Young Manlius in single combat slays the mightiest champion of the Gauls, a man of a gigantick stature; which so discourages them, that they leave their camp in the night and in confusion. The next year the Gauls appear again in the neighbourhood of Rome; but are routed and driven thence by the Romans. The Consuls make war with success against the Tyburtes and the Hernici.

Year of
R O M E
ccclxxxix
Ref. J. C.
Three
hundred sixty-
three.
Ninety-
first Consul-
ship.
Livy, B.
7. c. 2.
Val. Max.
B. 2. c. 1.
Livy, B.
7. c. 2.

§. I. IN the year of Rome 389, C. Sulpicius and C. Licinius Stolo took possession of the Consulship. The latter was that famous Licinius (son-in-law to Fabius Ambustus) who jointly with his Colleague Sextius had contrived the three Laws, and at the end of ten years, during which he had been Tribune of the Commons, had obtained the publication of them. And now the promise Fabius had made to his younger daughter was fulfilled, and she had the pleasure of seeing the Lictors with their Fasces march before her Plebeian husband, and of hearing them thunder at her gate.

The plague still continuing, the Romans to put a stop to it had recourse to their old superstition of the Lectisternium. But this proved ineffectual; and they endeavoured therefore to avert the anger of the Gods by a new institution to their honour. Hitherto Rome had no other Publick Sports but those of the Circus, that is to say, Races and Wrestling, which were very proper exercises for so warlike a people. But now they introduced a new sort of Shows, which at first were innocent, but afterwards became indecent, and had a natural tendency to corrupt mens manners. These shows were called Scenici, because they were represented on a Scene, that is, a stage built in the Shade. The performers, who were brought to Rome from Hebruria^a, danced to the Flute, and kept time with their motions and gestures; but their Entries had no manner of relation to one another; neither

^a The Hebrurian word, which signified a Player or Dancer, was Hesper; and hence the name of Histriones, given by the Romans to all Stage-players. The first speakers on the stage fell into the vicious taste of the Fescennini, a people of Hebruria, who threw coarse and unpremeditated jests at one another.

These were soon succeeded by satires written in verse, and set to the flute; which satires were repeated with suitable gestures. And, some years after, Livius Andronicus, who acted his own pieces, turned the Satires into regular Plays, and confined himself in his compositions to one uniform matter. But he was neither were the Dances accompanied with any verses or discourses in these early times.

This kind of Comedy being performed in a part of the Circus near the banks of the Tiber, and the river happening to overflow at this time, the people concluded, that the new remedy they had invented to appease the Gods would be ineffectual. However, as they themselves had been agreeably amused, they did not lay aside the entertainments of the Scene.

In the following Consulship of * L. Æmilius and Cn. Genucius, the plague not ceasing, the Romans bethought themselves of an old religious ceremony which, according to tradition, had succeeded in the like cases. This was the driving of a Nail by a Dictator into the wall of the Temple of Jupiter Capitolinus, on the side next Minerva's sanctuary, which was under the same roof. This Goddess was deemed the inventress of Numbers; and the Romans used to number the years of their state by nails. Livy tells us, that there was a law written in antique characters and obsolete words, and fixed up in the Chapel of Minerva, importing, That the chief Prætor for the time being should on the Ides of September DRIVE THE NAIL. (When this law was made, the Romans were perhaps unacquainted with the numeral letters.) The same author adds, that the Consul Horatius, who dedicated the Temple of Jupiter the year after the expulsion of Tarquin, performed at the same time the ceremony of driving the Nail, which function was afterwards transferred from the Consuls to the Dictators, as magistrates of greater dignity and power; and that, the custom having been discontinued, it was now thought a matter of sufficient importance for which a Dictator should be expressly created.

T. Manlius was the person named to the Dictatorship. It is likely that the plague, which had lasted three years, ceased about this time, because Livy makes no further mention of it. But Manlius being dissatisfied to have the whole business of his office confined to a religious ceremony, and it being believed that the Hernici were preparing to shake off the was called upon so often to repeat his Plays, that he at last became hoarse, and lost his voice. Hereupon he got the people's consent that a young man should sing for him, whilst he only accompanied the verses with proper gestures; and then his action soon became more perfect, when his attention was no longer divided between singing and acting. When these Theatrical Pieces were thus brought into form, the farces, which had made people laugh, were despised and neglected. Nevertheless, the Roman youth revived them, and acted them at the end of their serious pieces. When the professed actors had finished their parts, some young Romans came upon the stage masked, and began to repeat merry verses, as formerly, but such as were free from obscenity. These pieces, which were a sort of composition between Satires and regular plays, had their first rise in Atella, a city in Campania, and were called Exodia, that is, Verses not belonging to the Play. The Romans borrowed them from the Osii, a people of Campania. But the Roman youth never suffered the professed actors to bear any part in their Exodia, lest they should dishonour them. The persons who acted these pieces were not liable to the penalties to which the Histriones were subject; their names were not blotted out of the roll of the Tribes in which they had been incorporated; nor were they excluded from military services, as infamous persons. C. & R.

Year of
R O M E
ccclxxxix
Bef. J. C.
Three
hundred sixty-
three.

Ninety-
first Consul-
ship.
Year of
R O M E
cccxc.
Bef. J. C.
Three
hundred sixty-two.

Ninety-
second Consul-
ship.
• A 2d.
time.
Livy B. 7.
c. 3.

Year of Roman yoke, he laid hold of this pretext to continue himself in power.
 R O M E He ordered troops to be raised, and even used violence to make the cccxc. citizens incline themselves. However, the Tribunes of the People opposed Bef. J. C. his design, repelled force with force, and at length obliged him to abdi-
 Three cate. And the Consuls for the new year, * Q. Servilius and † L. Genucius, hundred were no sooner in office, than he was cited by Pomponius, one of the Tri- sixty-two. bunes, to answer before the People for the violence and cruelty which he had exercised towards the Citizens. But nothing was so much detested Ninety- as his cruel nature, and the surname of Imperiosus (intolerable in a free second city) which he had acquired by his excessive severity, shewn no less to Consul- his own blood and kindred than to strangers. For the Tribunes, among ship. other things, accused him of inhumanly and barbarously treating one of Year of his own sons for no just cause, and merely upon account of some natural R O M E defects. This son of Manlius, named Titus, had an impediment in his cccxc. speech, and was besides of slow parts; and, for these reasons only, his fa-Bef. J. C. ther had confined him to the country, where he made him work like one Three of his slaves.

Ninety-
third Consul-
ship.
* A 2d
time.
† A 2d
time.
Livy, B.
7. c. 4.
Cic. Off.
B. 5.
Livy, B.
7. c. 5.
Manlius had a copy of his accusation given him, and twenty-seven days to prepare for his defence. All were highly exasperated against him, except the son himself, who hearing of what passed, and not being able to endure the thought that he too should furnish matter of accusation against his father; and to the end that Gods and Men might know how far he was from wishing to give his father's enemies any assistance; he resolved upon a most extraordinary method to deliver him, a method (as Livy observes) suitable to his rustick education and character, but laudable for the filial piety that inspired it. Early in the morning he privately and alone left the village to which he had been banished, came to Rome, nor stopt till he arrived at the door of Pomponius the Tribune, who was not yet up. He sent him word, that the son of Manlius desired to speak with him about an affair that would admit of no delay. The Tribune, believing that the young man was come either to thank him for the concern he had taken in his misfortunes, or perhaps to discover to him some new proofs of his father's tyrannical temper, ordered him to be brought in. Manlius, as soon as they had saluted each other, desired to speak to him in private without witnesses; upon which every body present was ordered to retire. Then the young man drawing out a poniard, and standing over the Tribune, threatened to run him thro', if he did not immediately and solemnly swear to desist from the prosecution of his father. Pomponius was too much terrified not to swear whatever the other pleased to dictate; and he excused himself afterwards to the People for his dropping the prosecution, by alledging the oath which had been extorted from him. The People were not displeased at the Val. Max. bold enterprise of a son in favour of a father, which was the more lauda-
 B. 5. c. 4. ble, inasmuch as the father's hard usage of his son had not been able to lessen his filial piety. So that not only the father was discharged, but the affair ended much to the honour of young Manlius, who the same year was pro-

promoted, by the suffrages of the People, to one of the most important posts in the army. Every Roman Legion was commanded by six Legionary Tribunes, and these officers had been hitherto left to the choice of the General; but this year the People thought fit to elect part of them in the Comitia. Of twenty-four Legionary Tribunes, appointed at this time, the People chose six, and T. Manlius was named the second of the six. We shall soon see him by his merit surmount all the disadvantages of his education.

Year of
R O M E
cccxc
Bet. J. C.
Three
hundred sixty one.

Ninety-
third.
Consul
ship.
Livy, B.
7 c. 6.
Val. Max.
B. 5.
Oros. B. 3.
S. Austin. de Civitate Dei,
B. 5.

§. II. THE same year a very extraordinary accident threw the City into a consternation. The ground, perhaps by the violence of an earthquake, opened to a great breadth and depth in the midst of the Forum, and continued gaping in a frightful manner. Neither could this chasm be filled up by throwing abundance of earth into it, wherein the Citizens laboured with great diligence. The Augurs, being consulted hereupon, told them, That their purpose would never be effected, until that thing, wherein the strength and power of the Roman People chiefly consisted, were dedicated and devoted to that place, and that such a sacrifice would secure the eternal duration of the Roman state. Great consultation there was, and much doubt concerning the meaning of this Oracle. At length M. Curtius, a Patrician, a brave young man, reproving the stupidity of his fellow-citizens, asked them, how they could doubt whether Rome had any thing more valuable than Arms and Valour? Having armed himself completely, and mounted a horse richly caparisoned, he came to the Forum, where the People were assembled in crowds. While they stood silent with wonder and expectation, he turned his eyes, one while to the Capitol, and then to the Pit, and having adored the celestial and infernal Gods, and devoted himself to death for his country, he leaped at once horse and man into the gulph. The People, both men and women, threw in after him great quantities of corn, fruit, and other oblations; and it is probable that with these, and afterwards with earth and rubbish, the hole was quite filled up. But some authors fabulously report, that the ground immediately closed upon Curtius's precipitating himself into the opening.

Val. Max.
B. 5. c. 6.

§. III. AFTER this expiation, the Romans unanimously resolved to turn their arms against the Hernici, who had made depredations in the territory of Rome, and had refused the satisfaction demanded by the heralds of the Republick. The conduct of the war fell by lot to Genucius, the first Plebeian Consul that was ever intrusted with the Command of an Army; and both parties were very anxious about the success of his expedition, because according to the event it would be judged whether the Republick had done well to admit Plebeians to share in the Consular Dignity. It happened unluckily for the Commons, that Genucius proved unsuccessful in the campaign. He fell into an ambush, his legions were routed, and he himself killed. The Patricians did not fail to take advantage of this accident. They exclaimed in all places, that the misfortunes of Rome were owing to the vengeance of the Gods, who had been

Livy, B.
7. c. 6.

despised.

Year of despised. That the Commons might indeed, by force of a law, deprive R O M E the Nobles of their birth-right, and transfer the Auspices to those who cccxcj. could not take them without impiety; but that no such law would pre-Bef. J. C.vail against the immortal Gods, whose anger at the profanation of their Three rites was sufficiently declared by the defeat of the army, and the death hundred of its Commander.
 sixty-one.

Ninety- Servilius, the surviving Consul, with the approbation of the Senate, third named to the Dictatorship Appius Claudius, the man who had the most Consul- distinguished himself in the opposition made to the new law complained ship. of. While Appius was raising a second army at Rome, the Hernici, flushed Livy, B. with their success, advanced to attack the camp of the Romans under the
 c. 7. command of C. Sulpicius, who had been Lieutenant to Genucius, and had since that General's defeat collected his scattered troops. The Romans, courageously sallied out of their intrenchments, and repulsed the enemy.
Appius soon after arrived with his new levies, and, having rewarded the bravery of the Lieutenant and his soldiers with praises, prepared for a general battle.

On the other hand, the Hernici, in order to preserve the advantage they had gained over Genucius, exhausted their whole country of men to reinforce their army; and, among the multitude of their soldiers, chose out three thousand two hundred, whom they divided into eight Coborts, of four hundred each. These were the flower of their army, and made a separate corps, that their valour might be the more conspicuous; and, to engage them to behave themselves bravely, their Generals honoured them with marks of distinction, promised them double pay, and exempted them from all the drudgery of military service. In the general action, which soon followed, when the Roman Knights had made several efforts in vain to disorder the enemy's battalions, and when with permission of their General they had dismounted, and placed themselves in the first line of the foot, the eight chosen Coborts made head against them, so that the flower of both nations came now to a close engagement. The victory was a long time doubtful, and it seemed to be only the better fortune of the Romans which determined it in their favour. However, they lost a fourth part of their army, and a great number of Knights. Appius had no Triumph granted him, which can be imputed to nothing but the unwillingness of the People to do honour to the most declared enemy of the Plebeian party.

Year of §. IV. AND now notwithstanding the misfortune of Genucius, and the R O M E murmurs of the Nobility, the Centuries made no scruple to chuse a Consul cccxcij. out of the Plebeians for the next year. C. Licinius Calvus Stolo was elected Bef. J. C. a second time; and with him was joined C. Sulpicius, surnamed Peticus.
 Three Under these Generals the Romans advanced into the country of the Hernici, hundred and, finding no enemy in the field, laid siege to Ferentinum. This place sixty. having surrendered, they took the road to Rome; but, when they came to Ninety- Tybur, they found the gates shut against them. There had been frequently fourth misunderstandings between the Republick and the Tyburtes, but now it was Consul- war
 ship.
 c. 9.

war declared; and the Romans, perhaps believing that the Tyburtes could not have the confidence to think of coping with the Republick, unless encouraged by some secret intelligence with the Gauls, who were in motion, thought proper, as in time of imminent danger, to name a Dictator, T. Quinctius Pennus was the person nominated to that dignity; and he appointed S. Cornelius to be his General of the Horse.

Year of
R O M E
CCCXCII.
Bef. J. C.
Three
hundred
sixty.

The apprehensions of the Republick were not groundless. The Cisalpine Gauls, having taken arms again to revenge their defeat, came and incamped three miles from Rome, near one of the bridges of the Anio. The Romans, under the command of the Dictator, immediately advanced to meet them. Nothing but the river parted the two armies, and neither party endeavoured to break down the bridge, lest it should seem to argue fear. This bridge became the scene of many combats between the champions of the two armies. One day a Gaul of a gigantick size advanced upon the bridge, and challenged the stoutest of the enemy to single combat. His extraordinary stature struck such a terror into the bravest of the Romans, that not one of them, for a long time, durst enter the lists against him. Young Manlius alone, who had so remarkably signalised his piety to his father, thought he had found a danger worthy of his valour. He went to the Dictator, and asked permission of him to encounter the Gaul: For, said he, though I were sure of victory, I would never fight out of my rank without your command; but, if you will give me leave, I will shew that huge beast, that I am descended of the same family which drove the Gauls headlong from the Capitol. Go, Manlius, answered the Dictator, and be as courageous for the glory of thy country, as thou wast for the defence of thy father. The two champions soon came to an engagement. Manlius had for this combat chosen a short sword, made both for cutting and stabbing, and, artfully getting within the long one of his enemy, gave him two stabs, and laid him breathless on the ground. The Gaul had a Collar* about his neck, which Manlius took from him, and put it about his own, in token of victory; and hence it was that he got the surname of Torquatus, which descended to his posterity. The event of this single combat seemed to the Gauls so bad an omen for the rest of the war, that they abandoned their camp in the night, and dispersed themselves in Campania. Nor could they well have retired to their own country without the assistance of the Tyburtes, who furnished them with provisions.

Ninety-
fourth Consul-
ship.

Livy, B. 7.
c. 10.

* In Latin Torquis.

Livy B. 7.
c. 11.

This people had too openly declared against the Republick to be suffered to go unpunished; and so soon therefore as the Consuls for the new year, M. Fabius Ambustus and C. Poetelius Libo, entered upon their office, levies were made at Rome to chastise them. Poetilius conducted this war, while Fabius marched against the Hernici, who persisted in their revolt. The Republick was at this time destitute of all assistance from abroad. The very Latines, formerly so attached to her, stood absolutely neuter. In the mean time, the Gauls ventured to advance again to the very neighbourhood of Rome, and blocked up the gate Collina. To make head against these

Year of
R O M E
CCCXCII.
Bef. J. C.
Three
fifty-nine.

Ninety-
fifth Consul-
ship.

Year of
R O M E
cccxciii.
Bef. J. C.
Three
hundred fifty nine

Ninety-
fifth Conful-
fhip.

these dangerous enemies, the Republick named Servilius Abala Dictator, without recalling either of the Consuls. Servilius came to an engagement with the Gauls, under the very walls of Rome, where the Romans, fighting within sight of their fathers, wives, and children, were irresistible. The Gauls fled towards Tybur, and being favoured by the Tyburtes, who made a sally to facilitate their retreat, entered it, notwithstanding the opposition of Poetilius, who attacked them in their flight. Poetilius, nevertheless, obtained a Triumph, while his Colleague Fabius, who had fought with success against the Hernici, had only an Ovation. The Dictator, who had most deserved a Triumph, declined that honour, and laid down his Dictatorship.

C H A P. VI.

§. I. A domestick sedition, which is soon quelled. An incursion of the Tyburtes, who are soon repulsed. The commencement of a new war against Rome by the Tarquinienſes. §. II. The Gauls appear on a sudden in the plains of Præneste. C. Sulpicius, named Dictator, with an army, strengthened by the Latines, marches against them. By the help of a new stratagem he obtains a complete victory. The Hernici and the Tarquinienſes are vanquished by the Romans. §. III. Two new Tribes are formed. A Law is passed against openly canvassing for votes. Another fixing the legal interest of money at One per Cent. per month. Licinius Stolo, author of the law against any man's possessing more than five hundred acres of land, is convicted of a breach of it. A law is passed against holding the Comitia in any place but Rome. §. IV. The Falisci and Tarquinienſes having engaged all Hetruria to take part with them against Rome, C. Marcius Rutilus, the PLEBEIAN Consul of the last year, is named Dictator by Popilius, the PLEBEIAN Consul of this, to the great displeasure of the Nobles. He obtains a complete victory over the enemy, and has a Triumph, in spite of the opposition of the Senate. Two Patricians are chosen to the Consulate, contrary to the intent of one of the Licinian laws, and the custom for eleven years past. The next year the Fasces are again in the hands of two Patricians; and likewise the year following. T. Manlius (who had never been Consul) is named Dictator, to conduct an army against the Cœrites.

Year of
R O M E
cccxciv.
Bef. J. C.
Three
hundred fifty-
eight

Ninety-
fifth Conful-
fhip.

§. I. THE Tyburtes made a jest of Poetilius's Triumph, and threatened to be soon again at the gates of Rome. This made the Romans sensible, that these enemies were neither conquered nor humbled; and the new Consuls therefore, M. Popilius Lenas and Cn. Manlius Imperiosus, would probably have led an army into the territory of Tybur, if they had not been hindered by a sudden rising in the City, of the People against the Senate. Popilius was Pontifex to the Goddess Carmenſis, as well as Consul, and was just offering a sacrifice, when he received the news of the commotion.

motion. He ran from the altar in his Pontifical Robe to the place where the People were assembled, and by his influence put a stop to the sedition. And, because the robe he then wore was Læna, he thence got the name of Lænas. But Popilius was very soon obliged to assume the Soldier. A handful of Tyburtes, out of a bravado, and to make good their late threatenings, came in the dead of the night to the very gates of Rome, and alarmed the City. The two Consuls, as soon as it was day, marched out with their troops at different gates, and easily repulsed these bold enterprisers, whose attempt served only to re-establish tranquillity in Rome, and totally extinguish the sedition.

In this same year the Tarquinienses, a people of Hetruria, entered the Roman territory in arms; nevertheless the Romans postponed their revenge till they had chosen new Consuls.

